This people will I establish in this land unto the fulfilling of the covenant which I made with your father Jacob, and it shall be a New Jerusalem. And the Powers of Heaven shall be in the midst of this people, yea, even I will be in the midst of you. (3 Nephi 9:8 RE)

Christ is reiterating to this group, in this setting, promises directly to them that He had previously given to Enoch about what would happen in the last days. When He told Enoch about it, He said that there would come a point at which righteousness and truth would spring forth; it would be upon the earth; there would be a tabernacle or a temple there; and that He, along with Enoch's people, would return and fall upon and kiss the necks of those who gathered there. This is the same prophecy that was given to Enoch (one of those first Fathers in that first direct descent)—this is a covenant that Christ is reiterating, but it goes back to the first Fathers. Indeed, if we had a full restoration of all that had been given, we would know that the gospel in its fullness was understood far better by the first generations, or the original Fathers, than it is understood by us today. He says to the people gathered there (this is Christ, same talk):

Ye are of the covenant which the Father made with your fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed, the Father having raised me up unto you first, and sent me to bless you in turning away every one of you from his iniquities — and this because ye are the children of the covenant. And after...ye were blessed, then fulfilleth the Father the covenant which he made with Abraham, saying, In thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed, unto the pouring out of the holy ghost through me upon the gentiles. (Ibid.)

In genealogical research, what you find is that if you start with yourself and you go backwards generations for about 500 years, your genealogy chart expands and expands and expands. And at about the 500-year-mark, it begins to contract and contract and contract, so that the genetic spread of the blood of Abraham throughout the world is so far and so wide that you practically can't find people anywhere on the earth that don't have some of the blood of Abraham, to whom He said, "all the kindreds of the earth will be blessed in thy seed."

If they shall harden their hearts against me, I will return their iniquities upon their own heads, saith the Father. And I will remember the covenant which I have made with my people, and I have covenanted with them that I would gather them together in mine own due time, that I would give unto them again the land of their fathers for their inheritance. (Ibid.)

So, it should begin to emerge into your view that physical descendancy is one thing to open up an opportunity—but covenanting, remembering, repenting, returning, accepting what God has to offer is the component in the last days that distinguishes whether or not they are redeemed, whether or not they are to be gathered, whether or not they are to be recognized in the own due time of the Lord as His, to be protected and to be preserved against the harvest. It's not enough merely to have genealogical connection back to some remnant of Father Abraham.

I can trace my genealogy back to Jewish ancestry, to Native American ancestry. That doesn't mean a thing if I don't repent and return. I remain on the outside. I remain a Gentile. I remain a disbeliever unworthy to be gathered. I suspect everyone in this room has a direct genealogical connection, probably, not only to Abraham but also Joseph—and perhaps eleven out of the twelve tribes of Israel. It's just the way that descendancy works.

Christ continues:

Then shall this covenant which the Father hath covenanted with his people be fulfilled; ...then shall Jerusalem be inhabited again with my people, and it shall be the land of their inheritance....

When these things which I declare unto you — and which I shall declare unto you hereafter of myself and by the power of the holy ghost...shall be made known unto the gentiles, that they may know concerning this people who are a remnant of the house of Jacob...it shall be a sign unto them that they may know that the work of the Father hath already commenced unto the fulfilling of the covenant which he hath made unto the people who are of the house of Israel. ...The gentiles, if they will not harden their hearts, that they may repent, and come unto me, and be baptized in my name, and know of the true points of my doctrine, that they may be numbered among my people, O house of Israel... (3 Nephi 9:10-11 RE)—

...means that it was always the design that the Gentiles should also be gathered in—or that what is, in all likelihood, an unsavory, bitter-fruit-producing branch of the original tree should be taken and gathered back to the original root and gather nourishment from that original root, that they may come in and be numbered among the house of Israel. It's always been the intention of the Lord to restore the Gentiles and to make them the means through which the last days' work would become accomplished.

As Mormon completed the record of Christ's visit to the Nephites, he provided this description of the Book of Mormon's purpose:

When the Lord shall see fit in his wisdom that these sayings shall come unto the gentiles according to his word, then ye may know that the covenant which the Father hath made with the children of Israel concerning their restoration to the lands of their inheritance is already beginning to be fulfilled. And ye may know that the words of the Lord which have been spoken by the holy prophets shall all be fulfilled.... The Lord will remember his covenant which he hath made unto his people of the house of Israel. (3 Nephi 13:7 RE, emphasis added)

And as Moroni concluded the record, he inserted some final words of instruction for the people who would receive the Book of Mormon in the last days. These words were taught to him by his father. He says:

Hath miracles ceased? ...I say unto you, nay; neither have angels ceased to minister unto the children of men. For...they are subject unto him, to minister according to the word of his command, [showing] themselves unto them of strong faith and a firm mind in every form of godliness. And the office of their ministry is to call men unto repentance, and to fulfill and to do the work of the covenants of the Father which he hath made unto the children of men, ...declaring the word of Christ unto the chosen vessels of the Lord, that they may bear testimony of him; and by so doing, the Lord God prepareth the way that the residue of men may have faith in Christ, that the holy ghost may have place in their hearts, according to the power thereof; and after this manner bringeth to pass the Father the covenants which he hath made unto the children of men. (Moroni 7:6 RE, emphasis added)

There are numerous other passages in the Book of Mormon that speak to the same thing. The Book of Mormon is a forerunner—a harbinger—that was intended to say to the people who receive it: There are covenants that go back to the very beginning, to the original Fathers. Those covenants got renewed/they got restored/they got continued in the form of Abraham (who received all that had been there originally) coming out of apostasy and being adopted back into that line of Patriarchs. That original covenant material provoked the creation of the Book of Mormon, and it is one of the major testimonies that is given to us by the Book of Mormon about the work that God intends to do in the last days. You can believe in the Bible; you can accept Jesus as your Savior; you can be (in the words of the Evangelical community) "born again." You can be (in the words of Latter-day Saints) someone whose calling and election is made sure. But the work of God, at this point, is not about, merely, individual salvation; it is the work of fulfilling the covenants that were made with the Fathers. It is the work of restoring again that original gospel (of which the law given to Moses pointed forward to but did not comprehend).

We tend to view priesthood in institutional ways. And it's hard to be terribly critical of misunderstandings because, quite frankly, priestly authority (following the success of the Petrine branch of original Christianity and its triumph, with emphasis on authority and priesthood and keys) predisposed the entire Christian world. Even the Christian world, after the Protestant Reformation, succeeded in finally breaking off areas in which a different form of protest Christianity could be practiced that was not subservient to the Roman "See" and papal decree. They still had this misapprehension about priesthood. So, when Joseph Smith began to talk about priesthood and to begin the process of restoring it, he gave a new kind of vocabulary, but possession of a vocabulary does not mean possession of the thing.

When Abraham talks about becoming a rightful heir and becoming a high priest, it would be best if you threw out everything that you have heard or learned or understood about the concept of priesthood. Priesthood includes the prerogative, the right, the obligation, or the duty to go out and perform ordinances that are effective, that God will recognize to be sure—and that's part of it, and it's a true principle.

However, priesthood in the original sense was something far more vast. It included an understanding of things that relate back all the way to the beginning—or before the world was—and goes forward through all periods of time until the end. It includes a basis of knowledge. So, when you read Abraham's description of what it was he looked for, and he mentions priesthood, you have to merge that into the entirety of what he's talking about: knowledge, understanding, commandments, instructions; having the capacity to see things in their correctly-ordered fashion, similarly to how God originally intended that it be ordered—so that you are no longer out-of-sync with this creation and doing your best to "reign with blood and horror" by subduing nature with the iron plow and gunpowder and lead—but instead you find yourself situated in a place that Eden itself can be renewed, and harmony can be achieved between man and the earth.

The Book of Mormon is talking about something vast, but it continually points back to Abraham. And I do not care what arguments can be made (or what a pitiful effort has been put together) to defend the Book of Abraham that Joseph Smith provided us. It was essential to the Restoration that the book of Abraham be given to us, because without it, we would not understand a great deal about the Restoration and what the final objective of the Restoration was to achieve.

If you're going to please God, you don't please Him by having your "born again" experience (or having your "calling and election made sure" experience) if the result of that is to make you proud, conceited, self-assured, and arrogant, and to disconnect you from the restoration process that was begun through Joseph Smith and has yet a greater work to be done than was achieved at the time of Joseph Smith. Go off and be saved, but you will not fulfill the work of the covenants that God intends to achieve. He has committed himself to that end.

Those who will labor alongside Him—whether they be Gentile or Lamanite or Jew, it does not matter—if they will repent and accept the process of the Restoration, as it began through Joseph Smith, not only to say it correctly but to do what it tells us needs to be done, then you will be numbered among those people that God has covenanted to gather against the coming harvest.

But if you want to be the lone guru, whose commentaries fill pages of blogging and hours of pontification, but you're going to labor at odds, I read you the warning: All that fight against Zion are going to perish. So, you can shout your hallelujahs in the spirit world, and you can proclaim your calling and election guarantees you something, but quite frankly, practically everyone's calling and election can be made sure. You get to continue progress. You get to continue to repent. God's not gonna terminate you at the end of this cycle of creation but you're gonna be allowed to go on—and upward, if you'll continue to repent.

You will always be free to choose, but the work of the covenants that the Book of Mormon foretell are to be accomplished through the reclaiming (by repentance and returning to Him) of Gentiles that will, ultimately, reach out to (and include) restoring the Lamanites/ restoring the Jews to a knowledge of the works of the Father, that—that—is what is on the mind of God today. That is the purpose of the covenant that was given unto us in Boise, just a few years ago—two years ago. That is what fulfilling the covenant ultimately requires that we labor to achieve.

That effort began in earnest with the reclaiming of the scriptures and the presenting of those to the Lord for His acceptance—and the marvelous news that God accepted them as adequate for His purpose for us—and the commitment that He would labor with us to go forward.

Anyone can join the party. Anyone can come into this work. Anyone can remain a Catholic or a Presbyterian, a Catholic or a Latter-day Saint. It doesn't matter. Those things are more like civic clubs. I don't care if you're a Rotarian or a Kiwanis Club member—means about the same thing as belonging to any of those organizations. Associate with whoever you like to associate with, but you must accept baptism. You must accept the Book of Mormon. It is a covenant. The covenant must be accepted, and you must help labor alongside those who seek to return Zion.

Now, just a couple of short comments.

(Wow, I took more time than I thought I was gonna take. I know they gave you a schedule, but whatever I'm gonna cover, I'm gonna cover—and then we'll sing or whatever comes next.)

In September 2014... I want to remind you of something. This was the talk given down in Phoenix, September 14, 2014:

Last general conference the entire First Presidency, the 12, the 70, and all other general authorities and [their] auxiliaries, voted to sustain those who abused their authority in casting me out of the church. At that moment, the Lord ended all claims of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, to claim it is led by the priesthood [meaning the leaders who exercise control, compulsion, and dominion, and not the powerless who had no part in the affair]. They have not practiced what He requires. The Lord has brought about His purposes. This has been [done] in His heart all along. He has chosen to use small means to accomplish it, but He always uses the smallest of means to fulfill His purposes. (40 Years in Mormonism, Talk 10, "Preserving the Restoration," page 8 of the paper)

If you will take a moment to consider the path that has been taken by that church's leaders since April of 2014, you can see how (in only five years) they have shown, by their decisions, the lack of heavenly guidance. Their trajectory will continue to arc downward. If you doubted my declaration in Phoenix in September 2014, then do not doubt the course taken by those church leaders since then.

Then I gave some closing remarks in the September 3, 2017 conference that I want to read to you:

Those who have entered faithfully into the covenant this day are going to notice some things. The spirit of God is withdrawing from the world. Men are increasingly more angry without good cause. The hearts of men are waxing cold. There is increasing anger and resentment of gentiles. In political terms, it's rejection of white privilege.

Language of scripture gives a description of the events now underway and calls it the end of the times of the gentiles. This process, with the spirit withdrawing, will end on this continent as it did with two prior civilizations in fratricidal and genocidal warfare. For the rest of the world, it will be as in the days of Noah in which, as that light becomes eclipsed, the coldness of men's hearts is going to result in a constant scene of violence and bloodshed. The wicked will destroy the wicked.

The covenant, if it is kept, will prevent you from losing light and warmth of heart as the spirit now steadily recedes from the world. The time will come when you will be astonished at the gulf between the light and truth you will comprehend and the darkness of mind of the world. (Closing Remarks, Covenant of Christ Conference, 3 September 2017, pg. 1)

And I ended by saying:

May God bless you and send to each of you a growing light and warmth. As the spirit withdraws from the world may it continually shine un-eclipsed on each of you to enlighten your minds and warm your hearts. (Ibid, pg. 2)

In the Answer that we received, there was an explanation given to us. It says:

In your language you use the name Lucifer for an angel who was in authority before God, who rebelled, fought against the work of the Father and was cast down to the earth. His name means holder of light, or light bearer, for he had gathered light by his heed and diligence before he rebelled. He has become a vessel containing only wrath and seeks to destroy all who will hearken to him. He is now enslaved to his own hatred.

Satan is a title, and means accuser, opponent and adversary; hence once he fell, Lucifer became, or in other words was called, Satan, because he accuses others and opposes the Father.

...there are those who have been Satan, accusing one another, wounding hearts and causing jarring, contention, and strife by their accusations. Rather than loving one another, even among you who desire a good thing, some have dealt unkindly as if they were opponents, accusers and adversaries. In this they were wrong.

You have sought to recover the scriptures because you hope to obtain the covenant for my protective hand to be over you, but you cannot be Satan and be mine. (T&C 157:7-10)

I read those excerpts from the talk in Phoenix and from the Covenant Conference in Boise to remind you about what was described in both of those events. There is a process that is underway. People are increasingly accusing, opposing, and fighting with one another without good cause. It is as if they are submitting themselves to listen to obey the spirit of Satan (or the spirit of strife, envy, jarring, accusing). That course is not going to change. I hope it may plateau for a season. There are things we have to do, and we need something other than chaos and warfare, in order to accomplish the things that we need to achieve. But I believe when the command is given, that we're going to have to act with alacrity if we are going to be able to fulfill the covenants and the obligations that have been promised by God and handed to us to do.

But don't expect the world to get better, and don't expect organized religions to get better. But hopefully, there will be more and more who come to take refuge among a band of believers who have no hierarchy, office, position, who have only ourselves to fellowship with informally, gathering at one another's homes, renting (on occasion) facilities like these to meet in larger groups.

I intend to continue my efforts among all of those people that I have been working with up to this point. I will continue that labor for so long as I am allowed to participate in any of this. But each of us, similarly, have the same kind of obligation to spread the truth and the knowledge and the scriptures (that we now have) that more accurately recover. We have to go back to what was given to us through Joseph Smith as the foundation, in order to qualify to be able to move forward.

The new scriptures are a vital part of the Restoration process. And I want to thank all of those who participated in that recovery effort—because it was not easy and it wasn't just one or two people. There was a great number of people, ultimately, who were necessary, in order to get the work accomplished. But as the Lord labored with the group and opened doors, there literally were computer programs that were essential to the collaborative process that were not available. There were resource materials that were essential to the collaborative process that came out, either online or in print, just in time to be available so that the work could be accomplished. The timing, the serendipitous occurrence that coincided with the scripture effort was remarkable. And all that were involved realized that this was not a work that could have been done ten years ago, let alone attempted last century. This is a work that only could be done at the time that it took place because the doors opened and materials became available.

So with that, there is a musical number and then an intermission. And so, we can shout, Hallelujah, indeed! And then, I'm supposed to come back here and answer questions. Someone handed me a bag of questions. I'll come back; I'll be back at twelve. The musical number is next—if they want to come up. You know, why don't we resume at ten to twelve. Is everyone okay with that? Let's do that. Let's do that.

2019.09.22 Conference Q&A Session

Keeping the Covenant Conference

September 22, 2019

College of Idaho, Caldwell, Idaho

Hah! I guess it's "ten to" [the hour], and the blessed moment has arrived. That was a great musical number, and both Sarah [Sariah] and Doug did a remarkable job with that. And I'm led to believe that there's yet another great musical number coming up to conclude this.

I was handed some questions and some of 'em are pretty good, and let me see what good I can do.

[QUESTION:] How can you know if the boils you receive in life are due to being like unto Job, or because you are more akin to Pharaoh?

[ANSWER:] It's a great question; I love the question. First, there's an interesting exercise that I would commend to any of you. Go to the account of Exodus, the early events, and only read the words of Moses. Just read Moses' responses, his reactions, his complaints, his fear, his doubts—and what you will realize is that it doesn't matter if someone occupies a great position, as Moses did, or the lives that each of us are now living. No one fits easily or comfortably or without anxiety into the work of the Lord. There's a measure that you take of yourself in which you look inward and say, "I'm not adequate to what needs to be done; I don't have the faith required." And you'll see that that's exactly what Moses was telling God—that looking inward, he did not think himself equal to it.

In the Book of Mormon, Nephi gives us an account of their journey—after they had been delivered from Jerusalem which was about to be destroyed and they were migrating—here are some comments that he makes about their experience:

- "We have suffered much afflictions, hunger, thirst, and fatigue" (1 Nephi 16:35; see also 1 Nephi 5:10 RE);
- "...we did travel and wade through much affliction in the wilderness" (1 Nephi 17:1; see also 1 Nephi 5:11 RE);
- "...we had suffered many afflictions and much difficulty, yea even so much that we cannot write them all" (1 Nephi 17:6; see also 1 Nephi 5:14 RE).

This is Nephi explaining his experience in the wilderness. Afflictions, hunger, thirst, fatigue—so many afflictions that they can't even talk about 'em. We don't look at those words; we pass over them as if Nephi were somehow being modest, or Nephi were being self-deprecating. We pass over what Moses says when he's getting the responsibilities imposed upon him by the Lord, as if it's just common sense that he's heroic and larger than life and greater than the common man. When you read his reaction, he sounds like us: he sounds common, he sounds ordinary. And when you read the lamentation—we suffer because we are... because we're mortal, because we're here, because that's the common lot that is designed to be experienced as a consequence of the fall. And there's no escaping that.

The question isn't: Are we going to suffer while we are here? The only question is: To what degree do we bear up under the troubles of this life, graciously and humbly—and acknowledging that God rules in the heavens above; He rules in the earth beneath; and He rules in your life, too. And that everything that you experience is designed to make you be added upon by the things that you suffer and the things that you experience here.

[QUESTION:] I was asked, verbally, if I would comment on some of the challenges that people of faith have in defending the Book of Abraham.

[ANSWER:] And that's probably a subject that's worth writing about, rather than just talking off the cuff, but—here's, generally, my observation. The people want to know what Joseph did and how he did it, in order for them to understand, maybe, how they can do it.

So there's this relentless inquiry into: "How did that process take place? What went on?" When, in fact, the gifts of God are almost entirely incapable of being transferred from one to another. Each person has to come to God on their own.

Oliver Cowdery was a man of faith, and he believed in Christ and the possibility of the second coming of Christ being proximate (or in close proximity) to his life. He believed in, and he got answers from God; and then he hears about what Joseph is doing, and he goes to become his scribe.

One of the early revelations that were given to Oliver talked about his, Oliver's, own gift—that he had this gift, in which Oliver could get yes or no answers by using the (what we would call a) "divining rod" (or a stick) that would respond positively or negatively to inquiry. And so he had this—and the revelation does not call it anything other than "a gift." It may seem like a peculiar gift to you and I; but it's, nevertheless, a gift, and it came from God.

Joseph had a gift in which he was capable of receiving revelation—sometimes through instrumentalities, sometimes by study, sometimes simply by God speaking through him in the first person in a spontaneous way. How he went about doing that is unique to him. The way in which you relate to God is unique to you. Running out and trying to replicate something—in order for you to know the process by which God involved Himself in revelation in Joseph Smith's experience—is not gonna teach you what Joseph Smith experienced. In the same fashion, those that would like to anchor the process of restoring the Book of Abraham to the surviving remnant of the Joseph Smith papyri and to say that that is the source material from which the Book of Abraham was derived are neglecting the bigger part of the process.

Can God use a bird in flight to answer a prayer? Can God use a billboard to convey a truth or an idea? Can God use a song to inspire you? Can God use the words of a poet, speaking about something entirely different, to convey to the mind, inspired by the light of Heaven, to see those words in a context that speaks directly and immediately to what it is that they're searching for?

There's a line in one of the Indigo Girls' songs: "The less I seek my source for some definitive, the closer I am to fine" (Closer to Fine, Indigo Girls). It's a beautiful song. It's about the frustration that they have with gurus, generally, and the notion that you really need to divorce yourself—"There's more than one answer to these questions, Pointing me in a crooked line" is part of that same song. "I spent four years prostrate to the higher mind, Got my paper and I was free... The less I seek my source for some definitive, the closer I am to fine." Because the answers that you get from most of the authoritative sources will always point you in a crooked line, but the paths of God are straight. Which is one of the reasons why I juxtaposed those two issues involving "sacrificing for the sacred" and "sacrificing for the benefit of man"—which, if you adopt in an absolute sense, point you in a crooked line. And yet, it's incumbent upon you to find the harmony, to find the middle road, to find the path that reflects the graciousness of Christ's walk while he was down here in this troubled sphere, dealing with all of the troubling issues in which we find ourselves.

In one of the very earliest meetings that we have a report of, Hyrum Smith got up to introduce his brother, Joseph, and he introduced him by saying, And Joseph will now explain to you the process by which the Book of Mormon was translated. And Joseph got up and said, It's not needful for that to be explained. The person who understood the process of translating the Book of Mormon was Joseph Smith. Even the scribes who were in the immediate area don't know the process by which the Book of Mormon was translated. The reason for settling upon the Book of Abraham (and the remnant or relic of the Book of Abraham) as a basis for criticizing Joseph Smith is to enable them (who desire to discredit Joseph) to then extend the argument from the translation of the papyri to the translation of the Book of Mormon—so that they can dismiss the work of Joseph Smith altogether and not have to trouble themselves with the heavy, unnerving obligation that devolves upon the shoulders of every person who finds out that God sent a prophet (in the form of Joseph Smith) in order to begin anew and complete the process of preparing mankind for the second coming of the Lord. And so, criticisms directed at the Book of Abraham and that translation process are surrogate for criticism, ultimately, intended to be aimed at the Book of Mormon—in order that Joseph might be diminished as a authoritative figure, on the one hand, to equip you to dismiss him as authoritative figure, on the other hand. People want a much smaller, more cunning, more contriving, less virtuous Joseph Smith because then it justifies them in their smallness and cunningness and treachery in dealing with their fellow man.

One of the reasons why I mentioned, earlier, A Man Without Doubt is because it's impossible (in my view) for a small, cunning man to write the things that Joseph Smith wrote in the three transcripts of his three longest writings (apart from the Book of Mormon) that are put into A Man Without Doubt—particularly given the graciousness with which Joseph Smith endured the circumstances he was put into by the betrayal of people who should have been his friends and who should have endeavored, in a kindly manner, to reclaim him if they thought he were deluded. That's a quote from what Joseph Smith wrote about his history in the Joseph Smith History (see JSH 2:10 RE) that he was recreating in 1838, after being betrayed by John Whitmer (the church historian who took all of the history) and his brother (one of the three witnesses). They betrayed him, and they took it.

So, when Joseph was writing in 1838, and he was reflecting back upon how he was treated when he had mentioned (to a handful of people) the first vision—when that had happened (in 1820, as he dates it in that history), he wasn't really talking about the persecution that he had received when he was a child; he was commenting to the people of his day who, if they had thought him to be deluded, ought to have endeavored, in a kind and affectionate manner, to have reclaimed him, instead of betraying him and surrendering both him and the people who remained true to him to violence.

Well, if you start with the real proposition about the Book of Abraham, that's really where we ought to go first. And that is: Is Joseph Smith the kind of man that would be capable of receiving a revelation to outline for us something going back to the era of Abraham and give us insight by restoring a text? Is Joseph Smith capable of doing that? Or is he a craven manipulator who's dishonest and inventive and fanciful, egomaniacal, and in it for his own self-gain? That's the real question that the 'Book of Abraham translation issues' raise.

And for the answer to that question, I don't think you can parse your way through a relic of papyri—which is clearly only a fragment of what he was working with and doesn't match, at all, the description of the text being in a beautiful hand in both red and black ink [from a letter Oliver Cowdery sent to William Frye, dated December 25, 1835, and published in the Latter Day Saints' Messenger and Advocate of the same month]. It's a rather sloppy hand (the fragment we have), and there's no red ink. It's black ink, and it's sloppily done.

I don't think we should let Joseph Smith off the hook for being accountable and responsible to us for being a virtuous man, for being a truthful man, for being a reliable man. But I don't think you answer those questions by an appeal to a fragment of papyri and what modern Egyptologists may be able to divine from a complex language that had migrated from hieroglyph to hieratic to demotic—and that, too, over millennia of time in which...

Abraham came along at the first intermediate period. These papyri? They were created in the Greco-Roman era. What...about eighteen dynasties later? After the influence of the Greco-Roman world? The *Book of Breathing*s and the text from which this was drawn, the Book of the Dead, these are very, very Egyptologically late documents. There's nothing comparable to it in an existing culture—maybe in China; maybe if you go to Hong Kong, and you walk down the street in Hong Kong, and you take a look at all the advertisements that are on the billboards that are in both English and Mandarin (or Cantonese—I don't know what they're using on the road signs or their billboards there); and you take that as the measure of reconstructing something from one of the earliest Chinese dynasties. And you say, There was no McDonalds back then; it doesn't work. You're literally trying to bridge a gulf that is almost unimaginably foreign.

So, the earliest pictographic representations were done alongside a story. So, you get a pictographic representation, and you get a story that tells you what this picture is about. Can the picture be replicated to tell yet another story by making a few minor changes and then telling a different story? The answer to that is (obviously) yes, you could. It's not until later that you begin to insert into the text (in addition to the pictographic representation) additional commentary that's designed to explain what this particular one is telling you in this particular setting. But that doesn't mean that the representation hasn't been borrowed from another account or an earlier account or a different account and been slightly modified and adapted, in order to tell another story, based upon the same kind of pictographic representation.

The fact that I have concluded that Joseph Smith was a restrained man (in many respects, a very modest man), whose defense of what he believed to be the truth was fierce, but who recognized that there were a lot of people (including his own wife, Emma Smith) who had a better education than did he—

Joseph was like a sponge when he thought he could get truth or help from others, and he was meek and humble in that respect. But if God had revealed something to him, he was an iron-fisted, immovable man for the truth, personally and privately, just as the scriptures say concerning Moses. Moses was the meekest of all men. If you just read the dialogue from Moses (in Exodus), you'll see nothing but meekness in that man. If you'll read Joseph Smith's three documents in A Man Without Doubt, you'll see a meek man—unbelievably frustrated by some of the circumstances into which he was put, searching to find the right way out of the dilemma, trying to get God aroused to anger in the same way that the circumstances aroused Joseph to anger, but submitting always to whatever the will of God was for him. Ultimately, Joseph Smith left to go to be imprisoned in Carthage, knowing he would not come back from there (or at least expecting that he would not)—and commenting about how his life was no value to his friends, as he returned and he went back for the slaying.

Say what you want about those final moments in the life of Joseph Smith. He put himself in harm's way to prove his fidelity to his friends. He would not forsake them (as they claimed he was doing in their hour of need) and ultimately gave his life up. That's not the conduct of a con-man. That's not the way in which someone who's going to lie and cheat and steal and behave as an immoral exploiter of others would conduct their lives. Joseph, in my view, was not just a virtuous man, but he qualified as one of those who hath no greater love, because he went back and surrendered at the behest of his brethren—in part, with the hope that by losing his life, Nauvoo would be spared the slaughter that had gone on at Far West and Haun's Mill and elsewhere.

And so, when you ask about the translation issues and the controversy over the Book of Abraham, the bottom line/the real issue is: However the mind of Joseph was set on fire with the restoration text of father Abraham's account of his search, you have to decide that the content either is from heaven or it's a lie.

There was a series (it's now been abandoned, but it's a series that was begun at Brigham Young University), the first volume of it—the Book of Abraham series—the first volume of it was pretty good. What they did was take concepts that are included in the text of the Book of Abraham which were completely unknown in the Christian world at the time that the Book of Abraham was put into print. They had to be unique concepts. If you could already find them in the Bible or if you could already find them in what was available to the Christian world, generally, then those weren't included. They had to be unique ideas. They took and gathered the unique ideas that come out in the Book of Abraham (about which Joseph Smith would have known nothing), and then they looked into other material that exists (from diverse places) about legends or stories concerning the life of Abraham. And what they found is that there were Hindu traditions that talked about Abraham, that preserved some of the very same incidents that are only found in the Book of Abraham at the time Joseph published the Book of Abraham. They found there were Islamic texts that were similarly describing the same kind of event, the same incident that's unique to the Book of Abraham. They found sources that were in Coptic Egyptian texts. They amalgamated into one volume (it's a pretty big volume) all of the parallel accounts from the life of Abraham (in cultures from around the world or religious traditions from around the world) that Joseph Smith nailed on the head in his account of the Book of Abraham.

That approach does not defend Joseph Smith as a translator of Egyptian, because it has nothing to do with the papyri. But it does a pretty good job of defending Joseph Smith as a revelator, as someone to whom God could reveal light and truth and he could accurately record it—because echoes of the unique material in the Book of Abraham show up in the ancient world and in other cultures that date back nearly to the time of Abraham. So, the real question is, Do you trust Joseph?

[QUESTION:] Okay. Oh, here's one. This was from a kid, and I like this question. Why are there angels?

[ANSWER:] That's a great question.

[Angels] are subject [to God], to minister according to the word of his command, showing themselves unto them of strong faith and a firm mind in every form of godliness. And the office of their ministry is to call men unto repentance, and to fulfil and to do the work of the covenants of the Father, which he hath made unto the children of men, ... declaring the word of Christ unto the chosen vessels of the Lord, that they may bear testimony of him. And by so doing, the Lord God prepareth the way that the residue of men may have faith in Christ (Moroni 7:30-32; see also Moroni 7:6 RE).

There's a system that was adopted before the foundation of the world that was designed to bring to pass the salvation/the resurrection of all mankind after we fall into the grave.

That system requires a lot of things to come together in order to achieve the purposes of God. You might think that the purpose of angels (in some of the online extravagant claims that we read that people make) is to appeal to the vanity and the pride of those to whom they come.

But my experience teaches me that the purpose of angels is to, first, cry repentance to the individual—because every individual before God is in need of repentance. There are none of us who have gone through life, or who go through life daily, without giving offense— however unintended and however slight—we, nevertheless, give offense to our fellow man and to God. We excuse ourselves—we just don't measure up. The office of the angelic ministrant is to snap you back out of the fog of "indifference to the casualness in which you discharge your daily obligations" and to awaken you to the peril that each of us face if we don't repent and return to God. It's to make us soberly assess our own personal inadequacies. But their office isn't to get someone, somewhere, to pay attention to them and to try and be a better boy or girl. Their office is to invoke the salvation process, itself, for the benefit of mankind.

Those to whom angelic ministrants have come from heaven are given assignments to labor for the salvation of others. They use their own resources, and they wear out their lives and their time in pursuing the obligations imposed upon them, which include:

- the salvation of others,
- the crying of repentance to others,
- the bringing to pass the fulfillment of the covenants that God made with the Fathers.

If they're not laboring on an errand such as that, but they claim to be receiving "God and Jesus in their living room who came and told them all about this or that," I don't know who they're entertaining—but it certainly doesn't fit the model, and it certainly doesn't fulfill the covenants of the Father nor do the work that's necessary in order to prepare the people for the coming of the world [Lord] so that the whole earth is not utterly wasted at His coming (see JSH 3:4 RE).

Salvation for the souls of men is something that no one ought to be trifling with, least of all those who are vain and proud. And I don't care if that vanity comes because they think they're somehow specially chosen by some imagined encounter with the Great Beyond, or if they think they've been so careful in their study of scripture that they know better than all others because they can clearly see a pattern through their own study, labor, and effort. I don't care what you think the correct interpretation of the scriptures are or will be. It's fair game to look at 'em in whatever fashion you want to look at them. But when an angel from heaven tells you what God is doing—or when the Lord Himself declares what and how he intends to go about vindicating the covenants that He made with the Fathers—then there's no room to come up with a contrary interpretation. The fact is, your interpretation, then, is wrong. And the humble man and the searcher for light and truth will adapt what they understand from their learning and study to what it is that the Lord has declared. And what they will find is that if they'll conform to the word of the Lord, that their study and their learning is still of great benefit because it helps them to see things more clearly.

Scriptures are sometimes written, deliberately, in a way that conceals how the Lord intends to fulfill them—in order to let those who may mean mischief never arrive at the correct formula. And the proud and the haughty and all those that do wickedly are not necessarily irreligious or not necessarily unpersuaded that there's a restoration that is taking place through Joseph—they simply will not yield to what it is that God says they mean; they will not yield to the work that God says He now has underway.

So, angels align with the work of God, and they help bring about the repentance of all mankind.

[QUESTION:] If Christ is the prototype of the saved man, is Mary the prototype of the saved woman?

[ANSWER:] Yes.

[QUESTION:] How did She earn Her place on the throne without having atoned?

[ANSWER:] Because She sacrificed and led the Lamb to the slaughter. She had a Lamb whose "fleece was white as snow," and She led that Lamb everywhere She wanted it to go. And She gave up Her Son and attained to the resurrection and laid claim upon Her body because She condescended to come here and to fulfill that work. Read Our Divine Parents (Denver C. Snuffer, Jr., Gilbert, Arizona, March 25, 2018). I don't know if that question was asked by someone that hasn't read Our Divine Parents, but that talk addresses that issue.

[QUESTION:] [Chuckle.] This is a great question. It's probably one of the more important questions that someone came up with: The "name of the Lord," "believe in His name," "believe on His name," "do things in His name"—and in the Testimony of St. John, they lift the quote: "...what name is now yours." No one asked, What name is now yours? Can you help us understand the importance of the name of the Lord?

[ANSWER:] Yeah, uh, okay—let's put it into a bigger context. Hebrew (in the Old Testament form) lacked vowels. As a consequence of the lack of vowels, the name for the Lord had four Hebrew characters, the tetragram[maton]—which, lacking vowels, became unpronounceable. The pronunciation of that name was the property of the High Priest. And the correct pronunciation went from High Priest to High Priest—who would use that name in the Holy of Holies, in order to participate in the ordinances that were required there.

Because the name (we know the consonants, but we don't know the vowels [YHWH]) lacked the ability to pronounce it, when Jerome was working on the Latin Vulgate version and came to the letters, he rendered it "Jehovah." And there are a lot of people who, today, have supplied different vowels, and they render it "Yahweh." (I think the "Yahweh" pronunciation was the creation of a Germanic theological movement in the 1940s, and Yahweh came out of that—although the Germans may have borrowed it earlier from Yiddish or from Hebrew sources.) But the truth of the matter is that the name of God, like many Hebrew words, are late-in-time reconstructions of probable pronunciations of the Hebrew lettering, and they've gained common acceptance, at this point. But if you were to take someone who is absolutely fluent in speaking modern Hebrew and you were to take them back and put them in a setting with/contemporaneous with Moses, even though they may be relying upon the same basic language, they may not even be able to communicate with one another because the pronunciations are so incredibly strange. "Strange." "StrăñGeh." "StrăñGee." The word "strange"—how are you gonna pronounce that? "Străñ Jee." If someone were to say "străñ jee" to you, would you know they intended to be saying strange? You'd think it was gibberish.

The modern convention of how we reconstruct pronunciations is—across the board, and I don't care if you're appealing to the most learned Rabbi breathing today—is wrong. It's not correct. And I know that to be the case. So, having said that...

Jerome supplied us with "Jehovah." It was early; and so, subsequent additions of Christian literature accepted the convention and used that term as a nomenclature, where anyone who's reading the Bible knows the Personage that we are attempting to assign this identity to or this name to. We know Who we're talking about. But (what the correct pronunciation may be, notwithstanding) we're calling Him, "Jehovah." And so King James' translators, Wycliffe, others who rendered the... Martin Luther in his German Bible... They all adopted the pronunciation that had been suggested. So it's just an agreed-upon convention. We know Who we're talking about. We're gonna use this as the Person about whom we're talking.

Then others come along and think, "Well, this is the 'vulgar on the street,' common, ill-informed, uneducated name for the Almighty. But, surely, the Almighty deserves the dignity and the benefit of higher learning, and our higher learning suggests—after we lay 'four years prostrate to the higher mind [and] got [our] paper [which set us] free' (see Closer to Fine, Indigo Girls)—we now can say with authority should be 'Yahweh.' It's Yahweh; that's His name—ohmmmm—because only the uninitiated in the mysteries of our theological schools use the common and vulgar term 'Jehovah.' So, when you say 'Jehovah,' I know (from my vantage point atop the ivory tower) that I'm really talking to a Plebeian and a pedestrian and the ignorant who has not yet been initiated into correct pronunciations." Well, it's not Yahweh, either.

The name in Greek of Joshua (or Yeshua)—in Greek is Jesus. And the New Testament was either originally composed (or in it's first translations composed) in Greek. And so, the name that we inherited, as a consequence of running all the stories about Yeshua (or Joshua) through Greek, is Jesus. And the status of being "anointed"—which is what Messiah (or Mashiah) means—"anointed." I mean, it could have been "Joshua, the Anointed," but it turned into "Jesus." And the word in Greek for "anointing" is "Christ" or "Christos." And so, Jesus became Jesus Christ, and that became the common vernacular by which the identity of that Person who came and taught the Sermon on the Mount, who lived and died as a Jewish teacher, crucified on a Roman cross, and raised the third day from the dead is (in our common language) referred to as Jesus Christ.

Now, you can say, "I would like to be more pure and use 'Yeshua.'" Or, "I would like to be at least more Hebraic and call Him 'Joshua.'" And, "I don't like 'Christ'—I like 'Messiah' or 'Mashiah.' I like that better." And as long as what you're talking about is the same person (the identity of Whom is fixed by scripture), I'm not gonna quibble over how you want to pronounce it.

But the fact of the matter is that in the restoration process, God (who condescends and who is humble enough to speak with men plainly, in plain humility, as one man talks to another) took absolutely no offense to the Book of Mormon and the modern revelations calling Him by the name "Jesus Christ." I use the name Jesus Christ, because He took no offense in that name.

When John the Baptist came and visited with Oliver and Joseph and conferred upon them authority to baptize, the only name he mentioned was "Messiah." Upon you, my fellow servants, in the name of Messiah I confer the priesthood of Aaron (JSH 14:1 RE). John's a good Jewish boy, and so he uses a Hebrew-based term rather than a Greek-based term. But it's still not the original Hebrew, pronounced correctly, because that's been lost. The idea...

(Well, I'm not gonna go there. That's a-whole-nother subject, and that's minutes that I don't wanna take.) The correct pronunciation of God belongs (in the last dispensation) as it belonged in the beginning: in the temple. And if there were ever a full restoration, that would be one of the things about which information would be granted, and we'd finally clear that up.

But for the present, so far as I am concerned, "Jesus Christ" is a perfectly-fitting name to be used in prayer in addressing the Almighty or in referring to Him. And if someone else wants to call Him "Yeshua," it's not gonna trouble me—because I know Who they're talking about. If they want to call Him "Messiah," rather than "Christ," that doesn't trouble me, either. If they want to call Him "Yahweh," I'm fine with that, too. But that doesn't mean I agree that they're correctly nailing the ancient pronunciation of the name (that they're going to some trouble to pretend they possess great knowledge about).

[QUESTION:] What does it mean when the Answer to the Covenant states to not forsake the house of Israel? (See T&C 158:11)

[ANSWER:] You know, the house of Israel occupies a very unique place in history. That is true not only of the Native American remnant of the house of Israel but also of the Jewish house of Israel. We are not to forsake them by ignoring them, by forgetting them, by failing to pray concerning them—people who believe strongly enough in the preservation of their culture. In the Native American sense, their culture was ravaged by apostasy before the arrival of European conquerors, devastated by disease that was imported, defeated in war waged against them, and then consigned to reservation property; and yet, despite all that, there are Native Americans who hold on to a culture that reaches back and has within it echoes of the very truths that we also find in the Book of Mormon.

Their highest and holy teachings resound with the same themes of light and darkness, creation by God, power in the heavens, accountability for the good deeds you do. They reach more closely and correctly into an understanding that nature, itself, is an extension of God and the mind of God; and that harmony between man and nature is something that is part of their religion and should be, also, part of ours.

The Jews have persisted through centuries of persecution and slaughter. My own family line (when you get back far enough) includes a series of Rabbis. My last name is actually an Americanization of a German—it's an old German word, because the transition occurred in the 1400s—in German, the word meant "breath" or "spirit." There's a Hebrew word that means "breath" or "spirit" that is the probable, original family-name that got converted into the Germanic (old Germanic) name or the old Germanic word for "breath," which is, well, it's spelled "S-c-h-n-a-u-f-e-r," which, when they migrated to America (that happened before there was a United States—my ancestors were here long before, more than a century and a half before this country was founded), it was too hard to pronounce, and so it got converted into something that they can pronounce here. At the same time, there were others who came over with the same last name, and their names got altered into other various forms, but the original name goes back to that ru'ach—the word for "breath"—it's what animated Adam when he was given breath; it's what the Holy Spirit of God is called in their language.

I don't think that how we decide to pronounce matters when we have language in scripture that—

I don't think you improve or show greater respect or show greater homage or honor to God by adopting a different form. I think you show greater respect for God—no matter by what name you choose to call Him—by your heed and your diligence to what it is that He asks of you. It is in the doing of what's requested that we show the respect that He asks of us.

[QUESTION:] Here's another one: Christ said that the gifts of the spirit would follow those who believe. The gifts are far too uncommon, even among us. Your ideas, please.

[ANSWER:] Well, one of the things that we are cautioned about is boasting about the gifts of the spirit that we experience. There have been a lot of spiritual/divine encounters/miraculous encounters/vindicated blessings that I have either witnessed or participated in or I know about. And I say very, very little about them.

One of the problems with significant signs is that when that is the focus—and not obedience and laboring to achieve what the Lord would have done—when the focus is upon signs, and we boast about 'em, you attract sign-seekers, including the adulterers who lust after such things and run from sign-giver to sign-giver. Christ constantly told those to whom He performed some miraculous work, See that you tell no man, and they would go out, and they would brag about it, and they would shout about it—and then the net result of that was that a lot of followers were attracted who were not attracted to the work. A lot of people were excited to hear some new titillating thing, but they weren't willing to roll up their sleeves and sacrifice. They were not willing to sell all that they had, give to the poor, and come, follow him, as he asked the rich, young man on the road that he was traveling toward Jerusalem, even though, had the rich, young man done that, we would probably all be talking about him today in a name and not in a category. He relegated himself to merely a category because he was unwilling to step out of that category, have his name known to God and to us by the sacrifice that he made in order to follow the Lord.

The fact is, that however appealing you may believe the things of God to be from what you read in scripture, when you begin to live them, you realize every single one of them lived under a strain—a burden. Those words of Moses in early Exodus help illustrate it. Nephi's lamentation about all the trouble that they had (and all the suffering that they did and what they had to endure) was so significant that he can't even explain all the troubles that they passed through. Joseph Smith's life was filled with compromise by his friends; treachery by those that should have stood by him; betrayal; loss after loss; economic circumstance that brought about trouble after trouble; advisers that told him if he would do this, that they would do that, who then failed to keep their obligation to him.

So, there are signs. They do exist. I have witnessed many of them, but I find no value in talking about or appealing to the minds and hearts of those to whom signs are appealing. I would rather keep them and ponder them in my own heart to try to understand—and then to arrive at the point where it is possible, using the scriptures, to teach the truths, just as Nephi (who would not reveal what he'd encountered in a heavenly vision) used Isaiah, in order to testify of the things that had been revealed to him. That's a good pattern. And so, I speak very little about some of the most important things, but I take them into account as I try to teach things that will bring us all to the labor of keeping the covenants of the Father.

[QUESTION:] Okay, so now I'm just gonna do something entertaining that reaches far and wide, and you can do with this as you see fit. Okay, who were the three wisemen who visited Jesus after He was born? Where did they come from?

[ANSWER:] Probably Magna. [Audience laughter.] I say that—I hope no one's from Magna!—I say that because I use Magna in a lot of my personal humor. I don't know—if I do this, someone's gonna be sorely offended. But Magna's a small town; it's a mining town. And it's suffered a lot because of mine tailings. And so, you know, there's kind of a perception that if you live in Magna, you're probably gonna have buck-teeth and three legs because your genetic makeup has been altered by the chemicals from the mine out there (that is now bigger than the mountain that it's been carved in).

So, I will occasionally use Magna in a self-deprecating way. Someone pays you a compliment, and you say, "Well, that's the rough equivalent of being the homecoming queen at Magna." [Audience laughter.] And I really, I mean, I'm saying this stuff, while I'm apologizing for saying it, but I have a perverse sense of humor in that way—and Magna suffers a lot, at my expense.

So, the three wisemen...

Okay, they didn't come from Magna. There's a lot of lore that got preserved that actually can be pieced together to tell a story. And I'm gonna tell one version of that story because I like it, and it appeals to me in ways that are evidence of God's mercy and caring and love for us. So, here is that story, piecing together a diverse group of legends and tales:

Before Adam was cast out of the Garden of Eden (into the world in which death would enter, and Adam would be obligated to succumb to that death), there was an anointing oil prepared in Eden itself that was designed to be used in order to help the Descendant of Adam who would come to crush the head of the serpent—that, once He was anointed, would equip Him to come back from the grave and be resurrected. And that was entrusted into Adam's care before he was cast out of the Garden, as something to be preserved and handed down until the time that the Messiah comes. And as circumstances would have it, that got passed from those that had the responsibility, down through the generations— until finally, Melchizedek turned it over to father Abraham, who, in turn, handed it down through his lineage. And subsequently, there was a line—entrusted not only with possession of the anointing oil that came from Eden but also knowledge about the signs that would be given when the moment came for the oil to be delivered.

And so it was that the sign was given. They recognized and interpreted it correctly. They went to the place where it had been stored by their ancestors. They retrieved it, and then they traveled to find Him who was born the King of the Jews. And upon finding the family (with a sign that signified—from above, according to their understanding and interpretation of the signs—that this was the child, this was the family), they delivered the gifts, which were, in turn, used.

But the oil for anointing was kept. And that oil was handed down, until finally, the moment came when the Savior intended to go up and to provoke His crucifixion. And preliminary to that moment, Mary (the mother) instructed Mary (the consort of Christ) in the manner by which this was to be done. And so, He was anointed—in preparation for His death and His burial and His rising again—with what had been set out and kept (originating in Eden), to be used in order to complete the process of qualifying Him to return again, to have strength in the loins and in the sinews, and the power to rise again from the dead and to lay hold upon all of the faculties of the immortal, physical body.

And so, He was anointed—at the end—with the oil that had been entrusted, originally, to Adam and handed down with an obscure and small body of believers (who were dying out and who were older—and the last of their tradition, it seemed). But the Messiah came, and they discharged the obligation; and the blessing was able to be given, and the Savior was able to rise from the dead. And so, He opened the way, then, for the return from the grave of everyone who has faith on His name and accepts (on condition of repentance) the terms to have His atonement applied to us.

Now, I know we're a little bit early, but I'm tired of talking, and I'm really looking forward to the closing hymn, which I understand is going to be as good as the musical number in the interlude—which was absolutely wonderful.

2019.10.08 Heart of the Matter Interview, Part 1

This is the first part of Shawn McCraney's interview of Denver Snuffer for the Heart of the Matter podcast, which was recorded on October 8th, 2019 in front of a live audience.

Shawn: Denver Snuffer.

Denver: Shawn.

Shawn: It's good to meet you. I've heard many things about you. I have not followed up to confirm any of it. I've heard about you for years. I'm glad you finally agreed to come on. I've tried to get you a couple times.

Denver: [Laughs]

Shawn: You're camera shy. You prefer the radio.

Denver: Or writing.

Shawn: Or writing, yeah. But let me explain, kind of, to you and our audience if you're not familiar with the approach we take. We do this with every guest. I don't do research at all. I've just heard things. I don't do inquiries. People have told me things over the years, but they're not really that significant. The purpose I want people to come on the show is to have them tell us everything they want to say, and then we'll do some— I'll do some, "Stop for a second; explain that a little bit," if you want. If you say, "I don't want to," you don't have to, and it won't be an inquisition of any sort, and you're free to— And it's so that people who watch the show (many of them who have come out of Mormonism) can say, "Is this a viable alternative for me?"

Denver: Mmmhmm.

Shawn: We've had atheists; we've had transhumanists; we've had every type on the earth. But years ago—a couple years ago—we were doing a show [background rattling] (yeah, that happens sometimes), and I said on the show, "I think the only true religious leaders in the state of Utah are John Dehlin, Denver Snuffer, and myself." And the reason I said that is, John Dehlin— He is leading the "I wanna be me: free; I wanna be what I am: gay, straight, no God, any god, and I just don't even care." And John is kind of the Pied Piper of that group.

I am: Forget relig—organized material—religion altogether. I trust in the Lord Jesus Christ "with all your heart." Forget about priesthood; forget about sacrament, communion. And I base that off my eschatology.

Denver: Mmmhmmm.

Shawn: You are unique because you have been LDS.

Denver: Mmmhmmm.

Shawn: And you are continuing on what—the only thing I can say now, not knowing—is, it seems to be, a form of Mormonism. Is that proper?

Denver: It's fair.

Shawn: Fair?

Denver: I think— Yeah, I think I would say that.

Shawn: So what we try to do is—in the first part (which lasts a little less than an hour)— is we want to know all about you: Grandma and Grandpa; Mom and Dad; upbringing; education; what you were like as a kid; when you were baptized; how active were you? — siblings; thoughts. And that usually takes us, even with people who don't think they have much to say, up to the first hour. You probably will fill it easily.

Denver: Hmmm.

Shawn: After that, we'll come back, and we'll see if— I wanna go— I want you to kind of end up, if you can, Denver, with when you started to say, "Wait a second," and then, "I'm gonna to do something about my view of Mormonism myself." And we'll do Part 2 about what you've done, where you're at, what's happening. And then in Part 3, I wanna do some word association. And there's 40 words, and I'll say it, and then you respond, and we'll use that as a platform to talk back and forth. And in that one, we'll be a little bit— not combative. I could sit here and fight with you on everything you say.

Denver: Sure.

Shawn: I'm not gonna do that. I don't care. I respect your rights to believe whatever you want, teach whatever you want. I really do because I believe you're responsible for what you believe and teach, and your ways may be better than mine as far as I'm concerned. So it's not to attack. But in Part 3, I might say, "Well what about this or what about that?" And you can explain, and we'll go from there. Does that sound all right with you?

Denver: That sounds fine.

Shawn: Okay. So, Denver Snuffer: the man, the myth, the legend. Take it away—about you.

Denver: Well, you mentioned parents. I'm Junior. I was named after my father. My father was a twin. I'm grateful for the fact that he got the name Denver because his twin brother was named Dempsey [audience laughter]. That may have been really problematic, but Denver is okay as a name.

My father is a World War II veteran. He joined the military after Pearl Harbor. As he explained it to me, everyone was pissed off when Pearl Harbor happened, and everyone wanted to go fight the Japanese, himself included. So, he joined to go fight the Japanese, and he wound up going to fight Hitler. And at the beginning of the war, his comment was he had no beef with Hitler. The war was fought without any appreciation for what Hitler was really up to inside the camps.

But he landed on Omaha Beach on June 6, 1944. He got through as a combat engineer. He was one of the first people on the beach, and his assignment was to blow up the tank traps. But as it turned out, first of all, the water was so rough that morning that none of the tanks made it to shore; and second of all, the tank traps were the only things that were keeping the bullets from killing all of them. So, when the mess unfolded, he wound up as a combat engineer, not blowing up tank traps but blowing up some of the fencing that was preventing them from getting up to combat with the pillboxes.

And he was a very modest man about all that he had been through during World War II. He was also in the Battle of the Bulge but he didn't like to talk about it, so we had to pry it out of him with questions and very often the answers would deflect, but he might give you a sentence here, and he might give you a phrase there, and it was up to you to put it all together over time.

One of the things that shocked me, and I wish he had—well, maybe it was a good thing he didn't live long enough—but one of the things that shocked me was the details of the Omaha landing in Saving Private Ryan because some of the things that were depicted in that Omaha Beach scene, I had heard from my father, you know, while he was still living, but they were details that I'd never heard anyone else talk about.

Turns out Spielberg had interviewed whoever he could find that had survived to get the details. There really was a GI on that beach whose arm had been blown off who was holding his severed arm with his other arm, and he was walking around in shock. And people saw him. Spielberg picked it up; he put it in the show.

But to me, you know, they made World War II movies (John Wayne and The Longest Day). They made a lot of movies in which that generation was depicted in a heroic way.

And I always respected my dad, even when we butted heads. He seemed to me to be a historic figure, larger than life—didn't mean we agreed with one another.

I recall after I had finished law school, I was kind of full of myself. I graduated from Brigham Young University's law school, J. Reuben Clark Law School. And after I graduated, I went back to my hometown to visit my parents and let them bask in the glory of their law-school-graduated son. I was sort of full of myself, as law school tends to make one. And while I was there visiting, my dad took me down to—don't remember which bar it was (I don't think it was the Rendezvous), but it was one of the bars in Mountain Home, Idaho—to visit with his friends. He wanted to show me off. And while we're there at the bar, you know, he introduced me, proud as he was, law school graduate, and I viewed them as my intellectual inferiors. You know, none of them had the equivalent of a doctor's degree.

We'd sat around and we talked, and over the course of the conversation, what dawned on me was I was talking to people who had lived through more history and had a greater grasp on life and everything that's going on here than I could hope to have because the stress of difficulty. I mean, these people had been through the depression. They'd been through World War II. They'd been through the Korean conflict. They'd seen a popular president assassinated. They'd been through a lot.

And here I was, full of myself because I had a piece of paper. And it was one of those sobering moments that I really thank my dad for because there are people whose lives live in the trenches of this world who rise to greater levels of kindness, understanding, charity towards others, humility, than some of us who enjoy simply the benefit of the environment that they made possible by the sacrifices that they made. It sobered me. It was another one of those moments with my father that I look back on and think, you know, those few moments in a bar in downtown Mountain Home, Idaho probably were the corrective experience necessary to take a law school graduate, full of himself, and put his feet back on the ground.

My father believed in God and was a Mason and tolerated my mother's Baptist faith—even let the Baptist minister come over and eat dinner at our house, as she was wont to invite him over to do. And he was devout in his own way, but he was not churchy. My mom, on the other hand, was churchy. She taught Vacation Bible School. I was enlisted in Vacation Bible School. I got all the indoctrination that one gets as a Baptist.

We were in Idaho. Idaho has an infestation of Mormonism and, therefore, throughout my youth, I was inoculated against the cult of Mormonism. And I knew that if Jesus and Santa Claus are the good guys in the universe, the devil and Joseph Smith are the bad guys, and so I had very little respect for the idea of Mormonism.

I had one sibling, my sister. She embraced the Baptist religion. They always put that call out at the end of the service, you know, while everyone's singing Just As I Am. They invite you to come forward and be saved and be baptized, and I felt the tug a time or two, but I always managed successfully to resist the impulse, and I grew up without ever having joined a church. The only church I ever joined was the LDS Church. And we can talk about the process that got me there, but I was an incredibly content kid.

I had a Schwinn Stingray. I could put that thing on its back wheel, and I could ride it like a unicycle in a wheelie all through town. We were a safe community, and the kids were allowed to do what the kids wanted to do, and I spent my childhood roaming free. There were practically no violent crimes that percolated to the attention of kids in my hometown.

There was a guy, though. We were sitting in Carl Miller Park, and someone came riding their bike through the park yelling, "Tom Lynn just killed a Mexican at the Rendezvous!" Well, Rick Beck (who was my next-door neighbor and my buddy growing up)— Rick Beck's father owned the Rendezvous. The Rendezvous was a bar. Carl Miller Park is not that far from the Rendezvous bar, and someone just got killed by Tom Lynn. We knew who Tom Lynn was, too. So we hopped on our bikes, and we rode down to the Rendezvous to see what the crap's going on.

There's a crowd. There's wailing. But we're kids, you know. We don't know any better. We elbow our way to the front, and sure enough, Tom Lynn blew the head off a fellow at the Rendezvous.

My father was chosen for jury duty on the trial of Tom Lynn, and Tom Lynn was convicted, and he went off to the penitentiary. And he finally came home, and he became one of the poker players in the weekly poker game that my dad participated in. Well, so a juror who had sent the guy off to the penitentiary and the guy who had been convicted played poker every week. And one evening at the poker table, Tom Lynn leaned over and put his head on the table, and they thought he was tired, so they dealt him out. He died playing poker with my dad at the poker table.

That was the kind of thing that, oddly enough, you remember from your youth and from the things that went on. But I never felt endangered by that. We rode our bikes off in the morning. We floated canals on tubes. We had our fistfights. We had our pranks. We started fires. We escaped liability for what we'd done in Idaho at that point.

They had a law. Because there were so many kids that were helping farmers, you could get a driver's license at age 14. So at 14 years old (it was daylight only, so you'd only drive during the day), you could get a driver's license, and kids started driving at age 14. And there was no difference between a driver's license and a motorcycle license. So, if you had a driver's license, you could ride a motorcycle, and we did. But I mean, you're looking back on it, you think, no one wore helmets; we rode in shorts; we did stuff that should have killed us, and we survived; but it was, in its own way, idyllic. It was a lot of fun.

Shawn: Fantastic.

Denver: So anyway, there's that.

Shawn: Has anyone written The Ballad of Old Tom Lynn?—because that is a story!

Denver: No, that's a country western song.

Shawn: Absolutely! You've heard of old Tom Jones. Well, let's get old Tom Lynn. That is fascinating.

You're quite a storyteller. You're good at that.

Denver: Well, he was convicted. He got beat up by the guy he killed. He left the bar, went home and got the shotgun, came back, called the guy out. When the guy came out, he blew his head off. It was the fact that he left the bar and went home instead of responding in the moment that got him ultimately convicted for...

Shawn: Wow!

Denver: ...for what he'd done wrong.

Shawn: Well, Mountain Home.

Denver: Yes.

Shawn: And you were there through high school?

Denver: I was. Then I went in the military.

Shawn: What branch?

Denver: Air Force. They were peaceable, you know, compared to the Marines. They had a (Gibb Wheeler's older brother, and I want to say it was Tom Wheeler, but it was Gibb's older brother)— He got drafted, and he went to Nam. And he wound up Marine and in the trenches, and very often they'd encounter those tunnels; and he was a tunnel rat. He went in. He came back weirded up. He had some—well, today we'd call it PTSD. But he'd also— He had a lot of battle injuries and what have you, and he was sort of the walking example of why one in Mountain Home does not want to be a Marine and go to Vietnam. And so, he helped inspire a lot of enlistments in the Air Force.

Shawn: I see.

Denver: Myself being one of them.

Shawn: And where were you stationed?

Denver: New Hampshire.

Shawn: Was that eye-opening to an Idaho boy?

Denver: I rather liked New Hampshire. I was surprised, though, that there was a Mormon out there. That's part of the later story, but I spent two and a half years in New Hampshire and then a year and a half in Texas. And then I left and ultimately got admitted to law school shortly thereafter—never returned to Idaho although that was the plan. I got a job offer out of law school that kept me in Utah. I'd never planned to remain in Utah. But yeah, the Air Force and in New Hampshire was an interesting time and an interesting experience.

Shawn: Was that where you were introduced—because you went to law school at BYU—so, you either converted at BYU or...

Denver: No, it was earlier. It was actually while I was on active duty.

Shawn: Oh, tell us about it.

Denver: I was attending night classes at the University of New Hampshire, and a professor who was on loan from Brandeis University, Cal Colby (in the middle of a—it was a business management class), was talking about corporate ethics and corruption and just went off on the Mormon Church which, to the ears of someone that had grown up in Mountain Home, Idaho, and was now safely thousands of miles away from the Mormon infestation, thought the whole idea of bringing up Mormonism in a class seemed so superfluous. It was silly. I mean, okay, Cal—Professor Colby—we'll stipulate the Mormon Church is corrupt. If it exists, it's gotta be corrupt. It was founded by, you know, the devil's best friend. So, I took no exception to the professor's position.

But there was a fellow in the class who raised his hand and took on the professor and defended the Mormon Church, and I thought that was, first of all, bizarre. I mean, what the hell? Are you kidding me? And he got the better of him. He did a fabulous job of defending the faith against the charge of corruption specifically being addressed in the management class.

I made the mistake afterwards— I didn't know the fellow from Adam at that point, but he became a good friend. I made the mistake afterwards of saying that I thought he'd done a great job and, you know, good for him because he'd had the courage to speak up. Undergraduates are very vulnerable to the predilections of your professors, so, to defend and to be contrary, that's fairly remarkable.

The fellow's name is Steve Claproth, and he and I became good friends, but he mistook that for interest, and then they sic these missionaries who pamphleteer and filmstrip you—you probably did that.

Shawn: I did.

Denver: Did you use the filmstrips and the felt board?

Shawn: Oh yeah.

Denver: Yeah, they did all that. And they mistook politeness for interest. I was not interested. If being raised by a Baptist mother and not heeding the call to come forward and be saved had been successfully resisted over the course of 18 years, pamphleteering and filmstripping was not at all likely to excite my interest in Mormonism.

But these guys were so nice and so clean-cut, unlike you now. I mean, look at you!

Shawn: [Laughing] Look at you!

Denver: You're a refugee from the Mormon mission. I never went on a mission.

Shawn: I know.

Denver: Okay, but you did. Anyway, you know how [audience laughter]— You know how that was.

Shawn: I do.

Denver: They were clean-cut. They wore white shirts and ties and suits. And their sincerity just— It clung to you; it was so earnest. I hated to break their hearts and tell 'em, "Dude, I think your faith is full of crap!" So, I refrained from that. It was at least interesting.

But I was a long, long, looonnggg investigator. It's because of the scarcity of interest in Mormonism in New England that the missionaries persisted for as long as they did. It was nice.

They asked me to read some Book of Mormon stuff. I did as they asked, being polite. They wanted to know the next time we got together, "What did you think? What did you think of what you'd read?" I don't think they were calling me "Brother" yet then. And my response, literally, and I meant it (it seems funny now, but I meant it at the time)— I said, "It's gotta be scripture. It's every bit as boring as the Bible." It had all that, you know, King Jamesian antiquity about it, and it did not grip me.

But by the same token, the things that had gripped me are the kinds of things that I see in here. It's the stories that are told about Daniel in the lion's den, and you've got a picture of David holding the head of Goliath, and you've got Christ with the storm. It's the Bible stories that you learn in your youth that, you know, tug at your heart. Reading the actual scriptural canon, at least at that point in my life, was not connecting in the same way that the stories or the interpretation based upon what the scriptures contain meant to me.

So, reading the Book of Mormon was rather the same kind of experience. It's arm's length and not appealing.

Shawn: I'm going to jump in real quick. How about the Gadianton robbers story, or the 2,000 stripling warriors story, or Alma the Younger story? Did they affect you the way those stories on the wall affected you?

Denver: They would eventually, but they didn't at the time because the problem is it's clothed in the scriptural, canonical, off-putting verbiage that, at that point, I did not relate to. I do relate to that kind of language today, but at that point, I had not acquired yet the tongue for that other language, and it is another language.

But Steve Claproth invited me to a— I don't know if it's called a young men's camp-out or called an Aaronic Priesthood camp-out. I don't know what they were calling it at the time.

But as it turns out, Joseph Smith was born in Sharon, Vermont, which is about as far away from where we are now to Nephi as where we were in New Hampshire was, away from Joseph's birthplace.

So, he invited me to camp out, and hey, camping's fun. So, I went up to the Joseph Smith [Birthplace] Memorial [in Sharon, Vermont]. They've got an obelisk there, 38½ feet tall, a foot for every year of the life of Joseph. They pointed out the obelisk and its height and the reason for its height. And I was surprised because I hadn't realized that Joseph Smith had lived so short a lifetime.

There was a— Back at that time, the stake encompassed states, so the stake president was the stake president over Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, parts of Massachusetts —big stake. I think the fellow was from Boston. His predecessor stake president had been L. Tom Perry. (There's a story about him, too, eventually, if we get there.)

Anyway, the stake president got up and gave a talk, and it was about David and Goliath, one of those old favorite stories from back when. And he filled in details, and he talked about things that made the story come alive even better than had Vacation Bible School. And it surprised me to have Mormons talking about that kind of content in a getaway with the—you know—the young skulls full of mush, being indoctrinated into the vagaries of the cult that I viewed them as. And the talk was actually quite good and touching and held a good moral story.

We spent the night. The next morning the visitors' center was open. As you are looking at the obelisk, it's the visitors' center on the right, not the one on the left. On that one they had a counter back in those days. (They renovate everything, so it's probably now a mega-mall of some kind, probably selling trinkets that are profitable.) But back in those days, there was a counter.

There was a couple of old people behind the counter, what I would now say is a missionary couple, but they were manning the desk, and they had literature and pamphlets and crap that I'd been given by missionaries as they were filmstripping and all the rest of that. And there was a red volume called the Doctrine and Covenants and Pearl of Great Price, and I hadn't seen that thing, and I asked them what that was. They started to tell me, and then Steve, who was— I was his golden contact. Steve elbowed his way in between, and he proceeded to talk it all up, and he dog-eared the Joseph Smith History (which I had previously gotten in a pamphlet), and he dog-eared Doctrine and Covenants section 76.

I wanted the elderly couple behind the counter to tell me how much it cost to buy one of these things, and they said it was free, and so I got out with my book before they changed their mind and wanted to charge me because I expected all religions want your money.

Anyway, it was actually after the camp-out, after we got back, and after I had taken the time to look at the book that I went to that dog-eared section 76 of the D&C, and I was struck by that. It was not the missionaries; it was not the camp-out; it was not the cleanliness of them all. It was the incongruence between everything I thought I knew about Joseph Smith being raised and the content of D&C section 76 that seemed to resonate with good things, virtuous things, answering questions about the afterlife. It just seemed incongruent, and it struck me at that moment.

I'd been an investigator, probably half a year or more. I'd been through all kinds of missionary companions that had come and gone. But the actual investigation of Mormonism in a sincere way commenced then. Everything else had been wasted time. And it was a matter of overcoming a lot of presumptions and prejudice that I'd been raised with that required, you know, sober reflection and taking time, and careful, solemn thoughts which, in a 19-year-old now, was something new for me.

I have to admit that one of the barriers for me was the fact that, however unchurched my father may have been, he seemed to be aligned with my mother in the opinion about Mormonism, and so I didn't want to disappoint him or enrage my mom or piss off my sister. And growing up, my friends were universally aligned in their viewpoint about Mormonism. And everyone looked down on the religion, although there were a handful of Mormon kids that were accepted at school. The religion itself was not well-regarded.

One of the things that Mormons tend to do is to be politically active, and Idaho is no exception. So, the legislature in Idaho, which had a very large LDS presence and, therefore, very large LDS influence, on occasion boiled up into political conflict with Mormonism being one of the issues that divided people into camps. And so, you know, the concern crossed my mind as I was investigating Mormonism that one of the things that would be lost in the transition would be all the friends I valued, family members, my past history.

I mean, Dude, I was cool. I was sophomore class vice-president; junior class president; I was a drummer in a rock band. I was cool. If you had a party in Mountain Home, you needed to invite me, or it wasn't a thing. I mean, and now, white-shirt-clad nerds are to become my compadres, and I'm gonna leave the cabal that I grew up with, and I'm gonna sit among the nerdy? This is the destiny that the religion brings you to? You know, I don't want to be sacrilegious, but you know, "if it be possible, take this cup from me"— It's not a lamentation I couldn't identify with. This seemed like a horrible, horrible exchange to be made.

In the context of everything in life that you like, enjoy, you find to be desirable, fun, Mormonism was a form of death to everything that had gone before. It required— The enormity of the sacrifice in the mind of a 19-year-old was practically incalculable. It was — The barrier to entry for me was like trying to leap across the Grand Canyon. I just did not see myself doing that.

In fact, one of the things that I concluded was that even if I were to become a Mormon, there was no way I could become a very good one. I hated the idea of being a bad one, but I didn't think I could become like them. They were better than me. They were living cleaner lives, doing cleaner things, and enjoying hokey stuff. And, you know, they hadn't been to the places I'd been; they hadn't seen the things I'd seen; they hadn't done the stuff I'd done.

And, you know, a lot of my Air Force buddies— Coming out of boot camp, it was rare. In the Army they try to keep units together. In the Air Force they just scatter you to the four winds. I got assigned in a squadron in a barracks in which another guy from my flight (that's what they called it in boot camp) was also assigned at the same time, so they made us roommates.

Well, my roommate, Mike, was a— He was a black fellow from Watts. I mean, he'd lived through the riots in Watts. One of the reasons he was in the Air Force was not because he was afraid of the draft. He was in the Air Force because he wanted to get off the streets, and his mama wanted him somewhere safe. And so, he's a refugee from Watts, and I'm from Mountain Home, Idaho, but the two of us really got along well in spite of what you would view as an insurmountable cultural gap between where we reckoned from. Hell, he was just a guy like me, and we had a lot of fun doing the same things. And some of the same things that we did are the kinds of things that they denounce in General Conference.

For some reason (I guess it was because of the streets of Watts), one of the things that Mike liked was cheap wine. You know, you can go down and get a bottle of—there was Ripple, and—

Shawn: Ripple [laughs]!

Denver: And Annie Green Springs and all that crap.

Shawn: Strawberry Hill.

Denver: Yes, Strawberry Hill. They made all that crap for kids, really, and, you know.

So, me and Mike, Jimmy Givens— Jimmy was a black kid, also, from Detroit, kind of a refugee himself. My friends, my buddies in the context, primarily were black fellows. And there was a serious, serious racial tension nationally and conflict—racial tension and conflict. And Martin Luther King got murdered. There was just a— There was a problem, and the Air Force was trying to address that at the time by having race relations classes. The race relation class that was being taught, in my view, only made things worse. I mean, it sort of pointed out what in everyday life could be just ignored. It pointed it out, and I thought they were doing a terrible job.

Well, the squadron had a command in the barracks, and the command in the barracks had a young—oh, he was a lieutenant of either first or second, but who was in charge of that race-relations thing—and he called me down. I was required to go down and report in to the fellow in charge of the squadron, and I thought, What have they found? I mean, what contraband had they managed to locate up in the room during inspection? How much trouble was I in? They called me in, shut the door, sat me down. He was very personable. He came around the desk. He sat like we were buddies. He was chatting me up. And the reason he wanted to talk to me was to find out how come I got along with the black guys in the squadron the way I did. I mean, I didn't even think about it. I mean, Summers and me played chess, and we hung out. There was no "getting along." I am; they are; it's a— I didn't know what to tell them.

I mean, here they are, dealing with this crisis. Here they are, trying to help with the crisis. Their attempts at help are only making it worse, and this guy wants me? I'm a teenager from Mountain Home, Idaho, hanging out with guys from Mississippi and Watts and Detroit and New York, and we're not in any of those places. I can't take them down to the canal and inflate a tube and hop on the tube and go down. And we're not in Mississippi. We can't go catchin,' you know, catfish. And we're not in New York, so we can't, you know, run through the projects. And we're not in Watts, and we can't burn something. We're in New Hampshire, and all we're doing in New Hampshire is hanging out, doing what you do in New Hampshire when you're bored, and you're getting paid by the military, and there's time on your hands.

Shawn: And this was all prior to being—

Denver: Yeah, yeah, yeah. I mean, Jimmy Givens would subsequently become a black Muslim, and I would subsequently become a Mormon.

We used to go drink beer at the bowling alley and get pizza. The pizza was gosh-awful. It was like cardboard with cheese on it—and bad cheese at that—and drink Budweiser. So, we'd been reassigned to different places. We ran into each other after I had joined, and I said, "Well, let's go to the bowling alley," because that's what we used to do.

We went over to the bowling alley, and I was trying to warm up to the fact that I didn't drink. And as I'm about to tell him that I didn't drink beer anymore, he tells me he doesn't drink beer anymore. And I asked him what that was all about, and he said he'd become Muslim, and they don't drink. I said, "You're kidding!" I said, "I've become Mormon, and Mormons don't drink." And he said, "Well, in my religion, you're a blue-eyed devil" because I have blue eyes. And I said, "In my religion you can't hold the priesthood!" And we had a laugh about our respective religions, had a pizza, and drank a Pepsi because they only had Pepsi on base for some reason, but you know—sugar rush. Everyone liked Pepsi back then.

So, are we out of time? Is that...?

Shawn: Well, we're getting close.

Denver: Okay.

Shawn: But— And because we're getting close, I'm gonna jump in and move us forward. So, then what was it that got you, having hung out with some black guys and their friends, and you joined the church then, later, that banned the blacks from having the priesthood?

Denver: Yeah, that was weird. That was one of those— Again, it's just one of those—

Shawn: Was there any conflict there?

Denver: Oh, sure. There's conflict in all of this. I did not want that to be my destiny. In fact, joining Mormonism to me was a form of death. It was literally— The only thing that I consoled myself with was that I wouldn't be a very good one, and it probably wouldn't last, but I felt like I needed to join.

I happened to be alone, which was odd in a military barracks. I was alone. It was quiet, which, again, is odd in a military barracks, and I decided to pray about this whole thing. I'd been asked to do it. I'd been cajoled and harangued and pamphleteered and taught to do it, but I hadn't really taken the opportunity to do it. The story they tell about Joseph Smith praying vocally for the first time struck me as something—well, I hadn't done that yet. And so, alone in the barracks on a quiet weekend evening, I got down and prayed and asked God (over an army blanket, kneeling in the barracks) about the whole of it and whether or not there was anything to this; and if so, whether I could be excused, or I needed to, you know, to rally to the call—what ought I do; and finished praying—and nothing. There was no conduit from heaven that opened up, and there was no, you know, earthquake.

I sat on the bed and just reflected on it all, thought about what had gone on. And I thought about the reasons why Mormonism could not be true from what I knew. I came up with reasons why it could not be true, and as I thought about each reason, in turn, I got an answer to—I thought of an answer—to the dilemma, to the problem.

There cannot be any more scripture because whosoever adds to the book, God will add to his condemnation. Whoever takes away from the book, God will take away his part in the Book of Life, so there can't be more scripture which is what Mormonism is predicated upon—except that book happened to have been written chronologically before much of the rest of the New Testament canon. So, that's really not a barrier.

Beware of prophets, you know, false prophets. They come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they're ravening wolves. So, can't I dismiss him as a false prophet? And the solution is, well, there's no statement that there will never be another prophet. In fact, there are prophets referred to in the Book of Acts.

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: There are unnamed prophetesses in the Book of Acts, and, therefore, the end of the ministry of Christ is not the end of the presence of prophets or the gift of prophecy. In fact, the gift of prophecy is named in one of Paul's letters to the Corinthians, so, you know, you can't dismiss it on that basis.

Shawn: But because of time, Denver, the— Doctrinally, I'm getting that in terms of prophets and added scripture and whatever. But did you have any queries and qualms about polygamy? Certainly growing up, if Mormonism was the— If Joseph Smith was the brother of the devil, or whatever that saying was...

Denver: Yeah, yeah.

Shawn: ...certainly you'd heard all the dirt. So the polygamy, the blacks and the priesthood, the misogyny that historically has been there, all of that.

Denver: All that stuff, yeah, all that.

Shawn: You had answers for that as well?

Denver: I didn't ask necessarily those specific questions. I asked questions on a big picture about the foundation of the possibility of a new revelation itself. And literally, I spent a couple of hours doing that—question and then thought of an answer, question and thought of an answer. After a couple of hours of that alone, meditatively, in my room, the last query that I came up with was: Well, how do I even know there is a God? And that's the ultimate question, and how do I know that? And the thought came in response to that, Who do you think you've been talking to for the last two hours? And that brought me up cold because my conclusion was: If that is how God communicates, and if God communicated with me, then I had the responsibility to respond to that communication because I would like it to continue. I would like it not to end.

But the price that would be required to have that continue seemed to be far greater than was reasonable or rational. It seemed like I was literally giving up my world in order to respond to that. But my conclusion was: If that's an answer from God, and He's made Himself known now to me in the context of this inquiry, then I need to respond favorably to that answer and go ahead and become baptized. And so, feeling like I literally was giving everything I had on the altar, I went ahead and got baptized in the Atlantic Ocean on October the 10th, 1973. Oh, excuse me, I said October—September the 10th of 1973, September 10th. We're in October now. And that is also a significant date, and we can talk about that eventually.

Shawn: And with that final thought from Denver, we're going to pick it up in Part 2 next week where we're going to hear about what his—briefly, what his membership and his activity and marriage and kids (I don't know if he has them; I know he has a wife)— And then we're going to see when that changed and what started happening. And so, join us then. Remember, put your comments down below. Let us know what you think, questions you might have. We'll pick them up on the phone and talk about those when you look and watch tomorrow.

This is the second part of Shawn McCraney's interview of Denver Snuffer for the Heart of the Matter podcast, which was recorded on October 8th, 2019 in front of a live audience.

Shawn: Denver Snuffer. Last week we heard about your life in story form. It was a great prose, it was narrative; it flowed from one interesting tale to another and brought us to the point where he was baptized in September of... '72?

Shawn: '73. East Coast, Atlantic Ocean.

Denver: Atlantic Ocean.

Shawn: What I want to do on this part, if we can, is I'm going to try to— When you interview someone you don't know, you learn how to approach that person in the second part and third part, and so I'm going to kind of move us along at a pace where we can get to more information because we've got a lot to cover.

Denver: We do!

Shawn: We do. All right, so you were baptized. Tell us about how long it was until you met your wife, and what you did between that time.

Denver: Well, one of the differences after baptism was— Where before, reading scripture had very little appeal or connection to me, after baptism the scriptures came alive to me. It seemed to me that what the New Testament was talking about as history...

Shawn: I want to ask you again about your wife, though.

Denver: ...was living.

Shawn: You're not answering—you know you're not answering.

Denver: No, no...

Shawn: We need to keep this thing so people will watch it.

Denver: These two go together.

Shawn: I know, but...

Denver: My zeal...

Shawn: Yeah...

Denver: My zeal turned me into a golden-contact-generation facilitator for the missionaries. Where the entire New England States mission had been relatively dead, I had the missionaries teaching everyone. I had dozens of people who they were teaching. And they were baptizing. And one of the people that I got interested in the church, interested enough to ultimately be baptized, was a gal that I wound up later marrying.

Shawn: Yes!!

Denver: I baptized her.

Shawn: Excellent!!

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: That is a beautiful story!

Denver: She's not my present wife.

Shawn: Oh, dang it!!

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: Come on, man! Okay. No, it's okay.

Denver: So, yeah.

Shawn: So, you've been married twice?

Denver: Yes. She subsequently divorced me and left the church.

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: Yeah, left me.

Shawn: So she never had the truth?

Denver: Well...

Shawn: I'm just kidding.

Denver: Yeah, but I baptized her. I got orders transferring me to Texas, away from New Hampshire, and I knew that if I left— She's my, you know, my product, my conversion evidence. And about that time Spencer Kimball gave a talk that said any two people can be married if they'll live the gospel. So really, it doesn't matter who the hell you marry if you live the gospel. That was bad advice, but I took it in my zeal.

I got a fellow who was Jewish to join the church. I got a number of people, that subsequently I stayed in contact with, to join the church. The ward in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, visibly grew as a result of the zeal. I was obnoxious. I was just on fire!

Shawn: But we know that early converts to any group are always the ones they put in for recruitment because you're most on fire, and so that's normal.

Denver: It is.

Shawn: We get that, right? So, move us along. You got married, you got divorced—quote, within a 'short period of time?'

Denver: Yeah. I wound up in Texas. We had our first daughter in Texas. We had two daughters, two sons. And she ultimately— After law school, she divorced me and she left the church—and I had four kids. I married my current wife. She and I have had five more children.

Shawn: Wow!

Denver: But she raised nine, so...

Shawn: Wow!

Denver: So yeah, she's the mother of nine. She grew up in the LDS Church and lived in Sandy—grew up in the town we currently live in.

Shawn: You're kidding?

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: Nine kids.

Denver: Yeah!

Shawn: So when you met—what's her first name?

Denver: Stephanie.

Shawn: Stephanie.

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: When you met Stephanie, your oldest child was how old?

Denver: Oh, see now you're requiring me to remember things that only mothers...

Shawn: You're remembering the name of guys in bars who said hello to you!

Denver: But ages?!

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: Ages?!!

Shawn: All right, around...

Denver: Really!

Shawn: Around— Were they still in high school?

Denver: Yeah. She was she was in junior high and she was the oldest. And then the youngest was Benjamin. He was in kindergarten.

Shawn: How'd you meet Stephanie?

Denver: She had worked at my law office. We were growing and we were hiring. And there was an office management class that was taught in the local— It was a high school program, but they drew students from a variety of high schools and she was one of the hires from that program. Another hire out of that program is still working for me— Lisa. She came in and has been with me for like— I've been practicing law 38 years, and I think about 35 of those I've had Lisa with me. Anyway, Stephanie was a University of Utah student. She was a year away from graduating, and she'd been talking about going on an LDS mission when she graduated. One of the jokes was that she had had 1,500 first dates, but she didn't have a second date. She rather intimidated...

Shawn: Oh, wow!

Denver: ...boys.

Shawn: But not men.

Denver: But she didn't intimidate me. Anyway, I found myself divorced. She invited me to a Thanksgiving dinner with her family, took pity on me. You know, that was nice. She was the only person I had known for years. And dating after divorce is a— It's all phony. I mean whoever you're...

Shawn: Dating's all phony from any age.

Denver: Yeah, but they're going to put on something...

Shawn: But you can start at 13!!!

Denver: Yeah, well, there's that. But...

Shawn: It's the same game!!

Denver: She'd been at the office for three/three-and-a-half years at the time.

Shawn: Yeah.

Denver: And so I knew her. I knew her on a good day, I knew her on a bad day. And why not date someone you know instead of dating someone that's going to, you know, do their best to fool you.

Shawn: It sounds like you got a gem.

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: Any woman who would take on four kids, raise them, and then another five...

Denver: Yes.

Shawn: Hats off!

Denver: Yeah, yeah.

Shawn: Great! Fantastic! I should be interviewing Stephanie too.

Denver: She would be a better candidate for a whole lot of reasons.

Shawn: So you raised your nine children. You're an appellate attorney. Is that...

Denver: I just finished arguing before the Tenth Circuit, but I do trial work as well.

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: So, and you're raising them. Does she work with you while raising the kids? Are you active in the ward? What jobs are you holding?

Denver: Well, okay, there's that. You know I'm not Mormon now.

Shawn: Yeah, I know.

Denver: Yeah, okay.

Shawn: But you were when you married Stephanie.

Denver: I was.

Shawn: And she was too.

Denver: And we got married in the Salt Lake Temple.

Shawn: Salt Lake Temple.

Denver: Yes, yes!

Shawn: Did you have the four kids sealed to you?

Denver: They were sealed to me from the prior, you know...

Shawn: Right.

Denver: No reason to have them sealed to her that we could think of. I suppose there was a time when we could have done that. I can't get in a temple these days.

Shawn: Yeah, yeah. I bet.

Denver: Persona non grata.

Shawn: Yeah. So, you're raising the family. How was— Were you active, you and Stephanie? Are you going to the temple monthly, or quarterly, or like that?

Denver: Yeah, we were. We were active, faithful. I think I was a hundred percent home teacher for the last 15 years of membership. I taught gospel doctrine. I was a ward mission leader in Sandy, Utah, which is tantamount to a do-nothing job because no one joins the church in Sandy, Utah. They made me the ward mission leader, and for the first time in seven years, they had baptisms while I was on that assignment.

Shawn: So your zeal continued on?

Denver: Well, I'm not sure that it was— It was contemplative. If you're going to believe in a faith, then that faith ought to be as carefully and continuously examined as you can. I taught gospel doctrine for about 25 years. I never taught the same lesson twice. I wanted to get into the material deeper, each time that you go round. And so the lesson that I would teach—the fourth time you go through the material—was considerably more in-depth than what it was taught, you know, four cycles earlier when you were going through that material. To me, it was always a matter of trying to understand more deeply, more profoundly, more carefully. And in that regard, you need to be willing to find things that you don't want to find. You need to confront things that you don't want to confront.

The exploration into Mormonism has been exhilarating and disappointing, challenging and reassuring. It's been a bundle of conflicts, and it's been marvelous throughout. And I enjoyed immensely the entire time that I was active in the church. I was thrown out; I didn't leave voluntarily. The current president of the LDS Church came to my stake and called a new stake president—because the old one defended me—called a new stake president, handed him my membership records, and said, "This man needs to be dealt with. The committee's decided that this man needs to be dealt with."

Shawn: Before you go forward on that, Denver, take us back to the one of the— Give us a main thing, for our audience who doesn't know you, of one of those things that was difficult to find in the constant teaching, and searching, and preparing that you were doing—one of the first things that was really brutal to see the reality of it, and you said, "Wait a second."

Denver: There are a number of them. There was a disconnect, across the board, at the end of the life of Joseph Smith and then when the election was held in Winter Quarters in December of '47. There was a disconnect between those. When I became a Mormon, I read everything I could get my hands on—all the biographies, all of the histories, everything there was from early church history, everything B.H. Roberts put out there, all of the biographies.

I had a command of Mormon history—in the way that the church presented its history and the apologists presented the history. But D. Michael Quinn wrote about early Mormon history in a way that was, to me, heretical and contradictory. He was telling a different narrative than the narrative that the church was telling, and he made me mad. But because I was always searching, I read his book. And then I looked at his bibliography and his footnotes. And then I searched to find the source material to try and show, to myself, why Michael Quinn was being unfair and biased in the way he was presenting this material. That he was not— He was a critic, he was not a historian; this is unfair. But the more I looked, the more I found I agreed with what Michael Quinn was saying and the more problematic the orthodox histories were. And I have taken some of those issues farther than I think Michael Quinn has taken the issues, and so he and I have some disagreements about things that I probably have disagreements with most Mormons about. I just did not think that the church was truthful. For a whole lot of reasons, the church was not being truthful about its history. Now understand, I'm not trying to rock anyone's boat.

Shawn: Yeah.

Denver: I'm not trying to say, "Hey, let me come bitch-slap you because you ain't right and I am!" That was not my objective. I had approached, I took— We rented a motorhome. We went back to the Nauvoo temple dedication—well, it was the open house. We didn't stay for the dedication. You had to have tickets for that and I didn't have the pull to get them. We went back—rented a motorhome, took my kids, we parked on, is it Mulberry? The Main Street there? Mulholland. We parked on Mulholland, and one of the evangelical folks had rented a shop and they were giving out anti-Mormon stuff in the shop on Main Street. And I sent my kids in and I said, "You kids go in and you get every bit of anti-Mormon stuff you can find in there, and and bring it in here in the motorhome." So they went in and they harvested what they could. They brought it back, and I said, "You go through all this stuff, each one of ya, and you find where they've made mistakes. And if you can't find they've made a mistake, bring it to my attention and I'll go over it." Because I wanted them to see.

We drove down as a family during General Conference, to drive through and look at the signs of the protesters during General Conference. You grew up in Utah; you're insulated. I joined the church in New Hampshire. I believed, in Texas that was another— There's a lot of stories out of Texas about Mormons and how we interface down there. I wanted my kids to encounter the opposition, the push back, because if you've got a faith that you haven't examined— I would rather have a child awaken to some truths and depart from the faith, at least temporarily, and come back to it, than I would have a kid that simply salutes and says, "Yes, sir!" to an unexamined faith. And so I wanted them— I want to struggle with it; I want them to struggle with it.

So, as an aid— I have one son who went on a mission. The one son who went on a mission came home from his mission and fell away from the church. And I wrote a book that was designed to help him understand the value of the faith that he'd been raised in, as an exercise in pure, religious devotion as opposed to respect for an institution. In some respects, you have to destroy the respect for the institution in order to penetrate to the level where there's value, there's truth, there's holiness. And so I wrote a book that was intended to heal the broken Mormon heart, and to allow them to say, "Yeah, there's problems in this institution, but there's no reason to throw away those things of value, and truth, and goodness that you can find within it." So, the book was written primarily for a struggling son, and then for whomever else there may be out there that could benefit from it.

Shawn: What's the name of the book?

Denver: Passing the Heavenly Gift.

Shawn: I think I've seen it. Was that part of the reason Nelson said...

Denver: Yes, that was the reason I got kicked out. They wanted that book suppressed; they wanted it taken off the market. Well, the book percolated for a bit and it had an effect on my son—it was very positive. It also had an effect on those who were troubled that was very positive.

The stake president, who was given the assignment to get rid of me, took that book and gave it to 20— He bought 20 copies and he gave it to 20 men inside our stake, none of whom were at all an appropriate audience to read that thing. None of them knows there are problems in Mormon history. They're just going along fat, dumb, and happy with whatever's being dispensed each Sunday. And to find out that there's trouble in paradise, I mean, it shook them to the core. And so these people, unprepared to hear anything about this, are given a book that's shaking to the core. And they find out about murders, and they find out about deceit, and they found out about treachery, and they find out about dishonesty, and they find out about lies. They find out about things that you will only find if you go search for it, or if you happen to wind up in a position where someone's trying to proselytize you away and they want to present you the problem; so now it's dumped in your lap. None of these were candidates for that book. All of them read and all of them came back with the same consensus, "Oh, this book is horrible. Oh, this is terrible."

Well yeah, if you think that what you're getting is pure and undefiled, that book will upset you. But if you think what you've got is something you're prepared to walk away from and abandon, because you feel betrayed, that book will help you. It will provide you with a way to have faith in spite of failure, to have hope in spite of setback.

Brigham Young turned Utah Mormonism into a trap. It was a horrible period of time. The Mormon Reformation and the Home Missionary Program was literally designed to determine whether or not the church should kill you. Brigham Young did not believe that the failure was at the leadership level, he believed the failure was at the rank and file. And that the reason all of the cattle died when they took them to Cache County, and the winter was so bad, was because the members were sinning. And as a consequence of the members sinning, God had punished them by destroying the cattle. It never occurred to him that maybe his leadership was flawed. He never questioned that. I think Brigham Young had a mental breakdown when the 'Battle Axe of the Lord' didn't respond to Johnston's Army, and he was actually dispossessed to the governorship.

I presented a paper on that, and I did that at Sunstone; and one of those papers I presented at Sunstone is in a book called Eight Essays. I just want to make sure... no... "Other Sheep Indeed," no... it's not it. It's called "Brigham Young's Telesial Kingdom." It's not in this book of essays, but I brought you this book that includes several of my Sunstone presentations and a couple of other things that I've written. Chapter 8, which is the eighth essay in this book, is called "Problems in Restoration History." And I brought you three books.

Shawn: Thank you.

Denver: This one is a series of essays that has been recently published, gathering together things I've written over the years.

This one's called A Man Without Doubt. A Man Without Doubt presents three failures that Joseph Smith confronted. And in response to each of the three (he wrote his lengthiest three efforts to try and help people), I give an introduction and a set up to describe why the document got written, and then I get out of the way and let Joseph talk. And it goes to show that Joseph Smith's biggest nemesis were his own followers.

And then this book is called Come Let Us Adore Him. The cover of this book is a sketch by Leonardo Da Vinci, incomplete, but a drawing that he made of the Nativity. And I thought, "What a perfect cover," because this book is an incomplete sketch of the Savior. But you can tell the subject matter of the Nativity from what Da Vinci had done, and you can make it out in rough form. I took, in Come Let Us Adore Him (a book that was written while I was still an active member), and I selected from the life of the Savior those incidents in the Gospels that have never been adequately addressed, in order to understand the personality of the Lord—the ministry of the Lord, the meaning of things that he had done. And so while it is incomplete, it really does—in my attempt—try to introduce the Lord to people in a way that that makes Him seem a far more resilient, far more firm minded, far more authentic character, that really did respond to the burden of prophecy and fulfilling the burden of prophecy.

I got into a lot of trouble because I tried to deal honestly with problems in Mormonism. I know that there are people who want to dismiss Mormonism altogether, for a whole host of reasons. But there are people that want to dismiss evangelical Christianity, Catholicism, Islam. What I found is that if you take all of the the disagreements, the level at which we argue back and forth about issues, and you say, "Okay, that exists and that's true enough," but what is it when evangelical Christianity approaches the idea of holiness, of goodness, of God and man's relation to one another? What is it that evangelical Christianity has to offer that is the highest, and best, and most pure, and most desirable? What you'll find is that in Catholicism—what is highest, most noble, what is best, what is most desirable—and in evangelical Christianity, it's the same. The same is true of Mormonism, and the same is even true of the deepest Islamic thinkers. In fact, at its highest level in the search for light and truth and goodness, you can find it in the Bhagavad Gita. You can find it in Buddhism.

Shawn: And what is it? What's that common thread?

Denver: Christ said to His disciples—and it was in a harrowing moment: He had just announced that one of them was going to betray Him, and He had just sent Judas on his task. And in that moment, before He goes out in the Garden to suffer, He says, "By this shall men know that you are my disciples, that you have love for one another." Okay? So, is it an act of love for me to search for and to find the things that I can agree with and that I treasure, that you believe in and that you treasure? Is it an act of love for me to come and argue and denounce?

I understand that people defend the idea that by denouncing, we're really helping to save because we need to rebuke them. But Christ's interface with the critics that He had was almost uniformly tolerant, and benign, kindly, and attempting to get them to see something higher and better—right up until He chose the moment (I defend that in this book, that Christ chose the moment) for His sacrifice. He went in to cause, at the Passover, the sacrifice of the Paschal Lamb by His "Woe unto you scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites!" by comparing them to whited sepulchers. He went in and He controlled the moment of sacrifice because it was necessary that the Paschal Lamb be slain on the Passover.

And so, His provocation controlled timing. But up until the moment of the provocation, you know, we found someone that was taken in adultery. Well, He doesn't deal with that other than in a kindly way, to force them to look into their own conscience. And looking into their own conscience, they back down. Is it lawful to give tribute to Caesar? Well, show me a coin. Whose image is on this coin? Well, give to Caesar the things that belong to Caesar, and give to God the things that belong to God. Those are not the words of a hostile, street-preaching evangelical with a fist in your face, those are the words of someone that actually is trying, in a loving and kindly way, to reclaim someone from from error.

And I love to be corrected from error, but many times people trying to correct me have not done the work I've done. I would venture to say, if anyone has written or read a history of Mormonism that was written before 2010, they're way behind in understanding what the current state of Mormon history is. Most people read and rely on second and third-hand sources. I have devoted the last decades to looking for original journals, original diaries, original content, contemporaneous newspaper accounts; searching for the source material.

Historians write fiction. They try to smooth over the events to try and make a narrative, to try and give you the moral of the story. When lives are lived without a storyline, they're lived without the plot being developed. They set out to achieve something headed in this direction, and that's their goal. But through a bunch of missteps, misfortunes, oppositions, failures, they wind up over there. So the historian comes along and says, "Here's the story of their glorious trip there," when the life that was lived was frustrated; it was hedged up. They lived their lives with blinders on, stumbling through circumstance-and-predicament after circumstance-and-predicament. And to ignore the reality of what they went through is to ignore what, really, the lessons are.

I suggested in a talk I gave a couple weeks ago at a conference that people read the account in Exodus and only look at Moses' words. Just read what Moses says—ignore the rest of the story and isolate what Moses has to say. This is a man overwhelmed, intimidated, frightened—judging his own inadequacy, protesting to God about his unfitness, his unsuitability—about the difficulty of the challenge; about his own reluctance. That's life. The problem is we pick up the scriptures and we do to the scriptures exactly what has been done to Mormon history.

When you and I talked about doing this interview, I said, "I think every Christian should study Mormon history, every Christian should get deep into Mormon history." Because they'll realize there's an institution, a trillion-dollar institution—a political powerhouse, an economic engine, a social force in the entire world—sitting here, built upon a whole bunch of misrepresentations, falsehoods, and skewing of the events. If you were to study carefully the content, in order to be able to see the difference of that, a Christian

(if they're being fair) would then have the problem of going back, and saying, "What might I learn, if I had available to me the source material to do the same thing to the evolution of the Christian Church? And how might I reconsider, a little more humbly, my own dogmatism about my state?"

And if you're Jewish and you go back to the period of Ezra and Nehemiah—the incidents immediately preceding the Babylonian captivity, the discovery of the scroll, the reading of the law—what you realize is that Judaism was in tatters at the end of the first temple period, and it got rebuilt and reconstructed. And it doesn't matter, it doesn't matter how many of the scholars' tools get applied to try and ferret out, from the clues that we have left, the content of the the old canon and the veracity of the new canon. The fact is you can't do with those what I am able to do with Mormon history because I have far more available, first-hand resources from which to conduct my reconstruction of the Mormon experience. But by analogy, every lesson you learn along that reconstructive effort should lead to the humble acceptance of the fact that the form of Christianity currently believed, by the entire Protestant world, did not exist in any form for 1,500 years. It's an invention, a relatively recent one, that is the fruit of the effort that was made by Martin Luther in putting his life on the line to rebel. And ultimately, much of evangelical Christianity is the product of that founder, Roger Williams of Rhode Island.

But in Mormonism, I have the ability to look and see where the fingerprints are. I still have access to source material from which I can actually say, "I know what's going on down there is based on myth and dishonesty." And I can somewhat reconstruct a more accurate version, and vision of what it began as, from the available source material.

I've got the Ante-Nicene and Pre-Nicene fathers' works; they're a valuable resource. We've got the lectures that were done by Martin Luther; we know what drove him. We don't have access to the papal archives; we don't know what they have suppressed. We do know that there were early teachings that divided, at about 1,000 A.D., the Eastern Orthodox from the Catholic world; and that they represent a preservation, in part, on the eastern side, the things that were neglected and lost on the western side, and vice versa. But we come onto the scene at a point in history in which it's arrogant to say, "I can tell you what pure Christianity looks and feels like," because we've come so late to the party.

The one thing I can know for certain is that one of the evidences of actual Christianity is the love that people can have for one another, across all the rubble, across all the ruin, across all the disagreements. And if we can begin with the highest, most noble aspirations of loving and caring for one another— Christ chose, deliberately, a character that would be considered odious in the Good Samaritan. He was not only odious socially and politically, in the story he would have been odious economically. And here you've got someone that the Jews had this religious disconnect, and yet, the one who helped him overlooked his Samaritanism, overlooked his predicament.

"What was he doing on the road if... He should have been smart enough to travel in a pack... He should never... It's his own fault to fall among thieves! He's a foolish man, he got what he deserved!" There's none of that. There's no, "You're a foolish man, you shouldn't be Jehovah's Witness!" "You're a foolish man, you shouldn't be Catholic!" "The ministry and Catholicism has turned into rampant pedophilia: you should be anything but Catholic!" "How can you be that?!!"

Why am I trying to inflict pain upon a Catholic who's doing his best to hold on to his faith, instead of inspiring him to look for something noble and good and virtuous that's exemplified in his faith—like praising Mother Teresa, and saying, "She deserves the sainthood that your church is going to visit upon her?"—because he exemplifies the kind of human caring for one another that Christ came to deliver. And Saint Francis, I mean the current Pope—everything the current Pope is doing or not doing (notwithstanding, he chose a name for which I have abiding respect; and he earned my respect as a consequence).

Shawn: I could personally listen to you. And I understand why you have people who listen to you and follow, because you have a great perspective—which, I agree with everything you said. I have no problem.

Denver: No.

Shawn: The show is called Heart of the Matter and I need to get, for our audience, to the heart of what this all means. And you're a great teacher, and you're laying out principles here that are established in the history of Christianity and Mormonism. But what does that mean? Because on one hand, you're saying we're wasting our time poking on the Catholics, and this and that, but you are poking on the North Temple Mormons. You do go after them. So the love thing, it seems to be, apparently, somewhat lost between you and North Temple. And so I agree with you that, look, let's just let people believe what they're going to believe, let's point out the positives—all that you said—but what are you about now? What are you doing? What is happening? What's the threat? Why do they consider you a threat, besides the obvious?

Denver: Yeah. When I— Most of what I have written was written at a time that I was a faithful member of the church, therefore, most of what I've written reflects the viewpoint from inside faithful Mormonism.

Shawn: Can you tell our audience what you've written? I'm sorry to interrupt your thought.

Denver: The first...

Shawn: How many books?

Denver: Well, seventeen volumes of material, but in addition there's— They asked for, and I gave permission, to gather collected works of blog posts and other things. And so, there's a number of those volumes that are... I think five of those, so if you count them, like 22 volumes.

Shawn: And how do people get those?

Denver: Oh, you can buy them on Amazon.

Shawn: Just look up Denver?

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: Twenty-two volumes on Amazon.

Denver: Yeah, they're all there.

Shawn: All right.

Denver: The breach came when Passing the Heavenly Gift was written. Again, it was still written inside the Mormon world. It was after that (and I got kicked out) that I felt no need at all to pull punches, and so what was written after that— I've been asked, "Why don't you go back to that first book, The Second Comforter (which is the short name. The long name is The Second Comforter: Conversing with the Lord Through the Veil— which as a former Mormon should should mean something to you)."

Shawn: It rings a bell.

Denver: It rings a bell. Or at least three knocks. (Audience laughter.)

So that book was written to try and inspire people to seek for, and obtain for themselves, revelation. Look, the Joseph Smith story, the Book of Mormon, the testimonies of the missionaries— When I came into Mormonism, I thought all those good people were visited by angels and experiencing miracles; and my expectation was that that was commonplace. I thought that's what Mormonism was: it was a revival of the original New Testament religion with all of the accouterments that occur in that New Testament religion.

Shawn: Road to Damascus. You're waiting for it.

Denver: The whole thing.

So, when it was within the first year of being baptized and the scriptures were opening before my mind, that having an angelic visit—which happened—I thought that was commonplace, that happened to everyone. That's, you know, that's what Mormonism is. It's, you know, the veil gets thin, you go through, they come through, you have fellowship on the other side.

It was really not until I got out of Texas to Utah, into the Brigham Young University Law School, that associating weekly with, you know, the hometown crop of Mormonism out of the mission field, that it began to dawn on me that extraordinary experiences were not expected—and actually weren't even welcomed. The miraculous was deferred to the hierarchy; and the hierarchy was responsible for dispensing that to you and me. And so, what The Second Comforter (the first book I wrote) was attempting to do was to testify and to suggest the miraculous—the thinness of the veil, the proximity of angels—needs to become commonplace in Mormonism.

Shawn: Let me stop, just for a second.

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: You just dropped a huge bomb.

Denver: Oh.

Shawn: Gigantic bomb.

Denver: Which was?

Shawn: That you were visited by an angel. You went like this to respond to that.

Denver: Oh.

Shawn: But, maybe it's that to you, "Oh yeah, of course. I visit with them weekly, you know." But, to most people— That's not a reality for most people. I'm not saying it should or shouldn't be, I'm just saying most people don't seem to have that reality. So, can you explain a little bit about that? Or do you— Maybe what the North Temple guys say, "It's a little too sacred, I don't discuss that?"

Denver: No. I've never bought in to that idea. But there is an idea that I do buy into, and the idea is that Christ did a variety of miraculous things—always charging those to whom the miracle had been given to tell no one about it. There's another comment that He makes...

Shawn: But we know that was because He was, like you said, orchestrating His death, and had that...

Denver: He was, He was. But there's another comment that He makes, and I put these two together, not— (It's a long story why I put them together, but I put these two together), He says it is a wicked and an adulterous generation that seeks after a sign. I believe that the more you talk about the miraculous, the more you attract a certain personality. That is, in Paul's words, they have itching ears. They really want a tale; they really want the fantastic. When the burden of Christianity is the daily life, it's treating one another kindly; it's loving those that are in need; it's doing things for others. And so, I tend not to speak about the miraculous, primarily because I don't want people that are eager for only the miraculous, because it's the wrong sort, and it's not the burden...

Shawn: But Denver, the first book you wrote is about...

Denver: Yes, the miraculous—in an effort to try and get others to experience it, not to boast of myself.

Shawn: Right. I know. I'm not finding you boastful, I just want to know...

Denver: But I'll tell you what happened in that first visit, because it really reflects poorly on me. And I have no problem telling the story because it shows what a poor candidate I am for doing any kind of work on an errand from God. I can still close my eyes and see everything about it. It made that indelible of an impression upon me at the time. I was caught up— I know that the scriptures speak using a phrase, 'I was caught up to an exceedingly high mountain.' I think I understand what that phrase means because I was, in fact, caught up. I could see the circle of the horizon of the earth in the distance.

Shawn: So you just crushed the flat-earthers right there!

Denver: Yeah. I could see, and I was standing on an actual surface.

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: And there were actual walls, and there were paintings on the walls, okay? And I'm taking this in. And there's a personage there. I could sketch him if you gave me— Well, I'm not going to do that. (I thought she was going to hand me a pen.)

Shawn: (He thought you were bringing him a pallet!)

Denver: Yeah, I could sketch him 'cause I can still picture him. Okay, he had a beard, he had hair, but it was not, like, long and flowing. It was reasonably well groomed, and, you know, not shoulder length but not collar length either—white hair, white beard, elderly, as somber a personage as you would ever encounter. And he said to me exactly this: "On the first day, of the third month, in nine years, your ministry will begin; and so, you must prepare."

Shawn: Wow.

Denver: That's exactly what he said. Okay, so, here's my attention span—I hear that and I think, "I wonder why the walls are transparent? Why would you have a wall if you can see right through the thing? And why are they painting? Don't they have photography? And why is it that I know that painting I'm looking at is Moses? Because I know that face is the face of Moses! And no one's ever shown me a picture, but that's Moses—and he's bald. I had no idea Moses was bald. Because one of the criteria for the high priest— A defect included baldness. That's weird! And where are we?"

So, this is where my head is at, and I've just had an angel give me— I didn't ask, "Prepare? Wh...what? How? Mini...ministry? Wh...whaat?" And the man literally waited. He wasn't going to force anything. He had a message, he had the content, and he gave it to me. It was up to me then to inquire, and I didn't inquire. I'm acting like a tourist. It's only weeks later, I mean— Then I was dismissed, I mean, and as I was dismissed I noticed, as I departed, that there was someone arriving. And I thought, "Does heaven operate like, you know, a bus terminal where there are people coming and going all the time? 'Cause that's interesting." And I believe that as I departed, that the direction that someone arriving came from was earthward, and therefore, coming up.

But the whole thing was singular. I didn't talk about it, but I did write down an account of that. And it was only weeks later that it occurred to me that that was an opportunity to learn a whole lot, but I didn't ask a single question. In fact, I was so distracted that I didn't— I got out of it a message that I didn't understand, that deserved inquiry, that deserved some amplification, explanation, elucidation—something other than those words because I didn't know what to make of those words. And as I thought about it in the weeks that followed, all I had were questions. So when I had questions then I made it a matter of prayer—and I got nothing.

Shawn: We're out of time.

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: Nine years, three months, first day of the third month...

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: What date? What date—what is that, or what was that?

Denver: Oh, it's a good story, but we'll...

Shawn: But I just want to know that day to whet our audience's appetite.

Denver: Oh, it was the day—after the year I thought it was—in which the Sunday School president, the bishop, came to my house and called me to be the Gospel Doctrine teacher for the first time. And I taught gospel doctrine for 25 years after that. Yeah.

Shawn: So that gives us some idea.

When we come back with Denver, we're going to have more exchange on some words that I want to throw at him, and just let him say what he thinks about these words. And then we're going to hear him tell about what he's— What's really happening now with what he's doing today within the faith—and I'll call it the faith of all faiths—within the faith. What is he doing? And what does it mean to people who are seeking?

Really appreciate you taking the time. Appreciate your audience's respect. We've had some audiences not respectful. These guys are good, so that best reflects well on you in some ways.

Denver: That's good. That's good.

Shawn: Yeah, it is good. And so let's keep going, and we'll come back and see you next week here on Heart of the Matter.

2019.10.08 Heart of the Matter Interview, Part 3

This is the third and final part of Shawn McCraney's interview of Denver Snuffer for the Heart of the Matter podcast, which was recorded on October 8th, 2019 in front of a live audience.

Shawn: All right, welcome back. We were just talking, Denver and I. One thing we have in common (we have a lot of things in common, actually), but one thing is we never change our clothes! Thank you for that joke, Denver.

Part 3— Part 1: We heard about Denver's life through story, really. It was a lot of different, sort of chronological, a little bit disparate—but stories that led up to his conversion and baptism in 1973 and into the Mormon Church.

And then we talked a little about (in Part 2) about his getting married to his wife of all these years, nine kids between them and together. And then we talked about Mormonism and about sort of how he got the hook and yanked offstage a little bit. We talked about that in Part 2, so if you're just catching up with us today, we're—or tonight—we're gonna talk a little bit more specifically. And I am begging for truncated, succinct answers.

Now, this is a man of words, and he's eloquent and intelligent, so intelligent that the empty— He just says things in a way that really paints the picture, but our low-attention-span audience doesn't necessarily always get that. So, I'm hoping we can do this:

Now, I have four categories. These are the categories, Denver: social issues, Mormonism, doctrinal basics, and Denver Snuffer. 'K? So, you choose the category. I have about ten questions in each. That shows you how short you have to be, and I want to hear what you believe, think, teach, share on the concept presented.

Denver: Okay, what were the categories again?

Shawn: Social issues?

Denver: Nah.

Shawn: Mor—that would be last then—Mormonism?

Denver: Sure, let's do that.

Shawn: Thoughts on, first of all, Joseph Smith.

Denver: Misunderstood, far more personally insecure than people make him out to be; far more respectful and dependent upon Emma than the LDS tradition would ever acknowledge; and in many respects never felt comfortable with the role that he was assigned.

Shawn: Excellent, and the brevity almost makes me cry.

Denver: Yeah, I know. It does me, too. [Laughter]

Shawn: Brigham Young.

Denver: An ambitious man who managed to see, in the construct that Joseph bequeathed him, the potential for monetizing it (in what we would call today monetization); who successfully developed it into an empire of control and dominion that today reflects far more the Brigham Young version of Mormonism than does it reflect the Joseph Smith version.

Shawn: Translation for our audience: He's a dude that's fallen off a tree to make money.

Denver: Yeah, he's the first multi-millionaire west of the Mississippi.

Shawn: Excellent.

Denver: And he was a carpenter from New England!

Shawn: Right.

Denver: It's like you elect someone to Congress, and they come back—22 million in their pocket.

Shawn: Yeah.

Denver: How'd that happen? You make him church president, and he becomes a multimillionaire. How'd that happen?

Shawn: So, it's obvious, between Joseph Smith and Brigham Young, you see a lot going on.

Denver: Joseph Smith had a pending petition in bankruptcy when he died. Brigham Young died a wealthy man. Yeah.

Shawn: Priesthood.

Denver: Fabulously misunderstood. Completely misused by the Catholic precedent to subjugate and to control that left so indelible an impression upon the minds of the Christian world that that abusive view echoed down right to today. Priesthood in the form that Christ exemplified it is a call to service and subservience and not a call to...

Shawn: Be served?

Denver: Yeah, what we've turned it into. It (priesthood) is synonymous, in my mind, with abuse and, primarily, male abuse.

Shawn: Okay, so just curious— Just to take that out a little farther, do you believe in a priesthood which is based or exemplified in service that both men and women bear?

Denver: I've redefined the concept, and I—you don't read what I've written, so you wouldn't know this—but I've redefined the concept of priesthood as fellowship.

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: I think women can have fellowship with one another, and that's a form of priestesshood. Men can have fellowship with men; that's a form of priesthood. Men can have associations with angels; that's a form of priesthood. And I think the way to conceptualize priesthood in its best form is as an association between sisters or an association between brethren.

Shawn: Fascinating, fascinating. Water baptism. (I have heard, just to let you know, that you do perform these, and I've heard, often.) So, water baptism.

Denver: Water baptism— And I've said that I think having a living ordinance should be done in living water, that you ought to go out into a river or a lake, a stream, a body of living water in which nature created it, not going inside a building in a tile font and be baptized. I think living ordinances should be by immersion in living water, and it ought to be in a facility that God created—to remind us that this is something intended to draw us closer to God, to be born again. Anytime you find living water, as you come out of the water from baptism, you see new life. You see the animal kingdom and the plant kingdom. I believe in baptism by immersion, and I think it ought best be done in living water.

Shawn: Okay. A couple things—one, I'm sure you know that the earliest church fathers believed in living water. In fact, that was one of the main things, but the question I have is can anyone do these? You believe in immersion. Can a teenager baptize a woman or...

Denver: Yeah, one of the things that I have recommended— In the Book of Mormon, there's this example of Alma who had been a servant in an unrighteous king's court. They're called the wicked priests of King Noah. He was one of the wicked priests. He gets converted by Abinadi, as you know. He goes out, and he starts his own thing. Well, before he performs a baptism, he prays, and he asks God for the authority to baptize, and he gets an answer that gives him the authority, in answer to prayer, to baptize. P

I've recommended before you baptize anyone, pray and ask God to give you the right to baptize and get from God, as Alma did, the yea, the yes, and then perform baptism— and yeah, anyone.

Shawn: So, authorize it. So, what you have done there, and I love this— C.A.M.P.U.S. stands for Christian Anarchists [Christian Anarchists Meeting to Prayerfully Understand Scripture], and I won't go into it, but I love the fact that you leave it in the hands of the person who says, The Lord has said I can.

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: And you let them take that responsibility on because ultimately, it's between them anyway.

Denver: Yeah. In fact, the more you can push responsibility onto the individual, and the less you try to aggregate power to yourself— It's a toxin. It's a toxin to the person getting it, and it's a toxin to the person that is giving it. People need to be responsible to God directly.

Shawn: I love that.

Denver: Man.

Shawn: I love that. That's beautiful. Sabbath day.

Denver: Yeah. Dude, that would require an hour of talk to...

Shawn: Come on, you can summarize it!

Denver: We're commanded to keep the Sabbath day holy. I recommend that you do something on the Sabbath day always to remember God. If you find yourself in a predicament where, due to the circumstances of life, you're doing things that you would rather not do on the Sabbath, then do them cognizant in remembering God. You can serve God even if what you do on the Sabbath is work as a mechanic. Just do what you do for the benefit and the glory of God.

Shawn: Is the Sabbath day—and I don't want to belabor this— Are we talking about Friday night to Saturday night, or are we talking about Sunday?

Denver: That's the problem because that requires a long explanation, but...

Shawn: In you, does it matter?

Denver: I'm content with Sunday Sabbath. I understand why some would say it ought to be on Saturday. I believe that the answer to the question goes all the way back to the Fall and how everything got pushed forward. And I think Christ's resurrection on what had become the first day of the week was really restoring the early Fall...

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: ...because they didn't have the Sabbath at the beginning. They were kicked out of the garden. And then Christ's resurrection authorizes the celebration of the Sabbath on Sunday as opposed to Saturday. But look, keep a Sabbath day holy. Yeah.

Shawn: So, we could say you're Sabbath fluid.

Denver: I'm Sabbath fluid. [Laughter]

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: That sounds cultish.

Shawn: Yeah, well, we have gender fluidity. I figure we can have Sabbath fluidity.

Denver: Sabbath fluidity.

Shawn: All right. Tithing. Gotta give it to me straight, Brother.

Denver: I believe that you have a responsibility to care for yourself, to care for your children, to care for your wife and that the payment of tithings is not to be done before taking care of everything that's necessary for food, shelter, clothing, medical care, education; that whatever is left over, you tithe on that.

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: You don't tithe on your gross.

Shawn: Got it.

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: Appreciate that approach far better than the evangelicals in this valley who pitch the old LDS struggle: And the Lord will bless you. Give us the money you would have paid on your electric bill.

Denver: Yeah! Yeah! And God gave you the money to use for your electric bill!

Shawn: Yeah.

Denver: And you're using it to support... Yeah, it just— It makes no sense.

Shawn: Word of Wisdom.

Denver: Okay. The Word of Wisdom was not given in defined terms. It was given in colloquial language. The Word of Wisdom had no meaning until the high council at Far West interpreted what they thought the Word of Wisdom meant. At a later time, Hyrum Smith was asked about the meaning of the Word of Wisdom, and Hyrum Smith, respectful of the order of things, repeated what the high council at Far West had said.

I believe the Word of Wisdom actually recommends beer—barley drinks.

Shawn: Sure.

Denver: Mild barley drinks—what's it talking about? At that point, it meant beer. I believe that hot drinks are not coffee, tea. I believe hot drinks are what people at the time—we now identify this as an Indian word, firewater—I believe that what it's talking about are those drinks that when you take bourbon, or you take some hard liquor, and you drink it, it burns your throat.

Shawn: I've never heard of that.

Denver: I think the hot drinks is referring to hard alcohol. Wine in the sacrament is commended. It's the only liquid that's mentioned for use in scripture—wine for the sacrament; and I believe that beer is just fine. I think hard liquor is probably hazardous. (And a good friend of ours died from liver failure.)

Shawn: Sure.

Denver: And it would be very hard to accomplish that with beer, but you can certainly achieve that with vodka.

Shawn: So, would it be safe to say that you really don't appreciate hard alcohol based off the Word of Wisdom? But do you give the liberality of people who are participating?

Denver: It's a word of wisdom...

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: ...that is given, not by commandment or constraint. I think it's unwise, and I think I know from personal experience in my youth that hard liquor tends to make one act foolishly.

Shawn: Yeah.

Denver: Yeah. My father...

Shawn: Not me, but everybody else, it does.

Denver: My father and Wayne Water's father met for the first time after the two of us had been picked up. He, Wayne, was guilty of a DUI. I was just along for the ride, but, yeah, hard liquor will make one behave foolishly.

Shawn: Russell M. Nelson. And I have to put a rule on this. You don't get to say, "Quick!"

Denver: Yeah. No, look. I think he's the victim of a system that he inherited that he does not see any way to execute his role other than in conformity to the system that he inherited, and he would be far, far better off if he said the system is not the gospel.

The gospel is not necessarily confined. We do not need to be slavishly following an order of things. The truth will set you free, and tradition— In the Book of Mormon, tradition is a negative. Every time the word tradition is used in the Book of Mormon, it is used in a negative way except on, I think, two (and it may be three) occasions where it specifically identifies the tradition as being good. Otherwise, the default for tradition is always evil.

Russell Nelson is leading an organization that has been out of control, probably since 1890. And I picked that day because that was when the lawyer wrote Official Declaration 1 that Wilford Woodruff published in order to satisfy the Tucker-Edmonds Act [Edmonds-Tucker Act] and to extract the church from the loss of their property.

You can't serve God and Mammon, and right now a lot of hard choices ought to be made. Mormonism would thrive if they made the right choices, if they were willing to lay aside the traditions and the things that cultivate and curate the wealth. Forget about the world; the world's headed for destruction anyway.

Shawn: Ooh, we'll have to talk about that.

Denver: The more you hold on to that, the more disappointed you're gonna be at the outcome. But the things of eternal life—they'll be with you forever.

Shawn: Last one: Communion.

Denver: Oh! In the sense of the sacrament, sacramental communion, I believe that that ought to be celebrated every Sabbath (but as often as someone feels inclined to do so) and that it ought to be breaking of bread, the taking of wine. And I think that wine was intended to be part of the sacramental observance because a little bit of wine, for most people, will put you in a more meditative state, in a more reflective state.

We're very harried in our every day. Our minds are busy running from place to place. We have short attention spans. Wine has a way of slowing you down a little and letting your attention span expand a little, and your reflection become a little more deep. I think communion in that sense— I see no problem if someone wants to have communion celebrated as a sacrament every day. But I also think there's a communion between people, a fellowship.

Shawn: Okay, yeah.

Denver: Yeah, a sharing of ideas. There are a lot of things that everyone holds in common, and there are so many things that we can fight about. I don't think we please God when we decide, Ah, what we're going to talk about today is what we fight about. There ought to be a lot more (used to be!)— They invited ministers to come to the tabernacle and to preach in the tabernacle to a Mormon audience.

Shawn: D. L. Moody!

Denver: Yeah! Van Der Donckt, the chaplain of the United States Senate.

Shawn: Wow.

Denver: And B. H. Roberts!

Shawn: Wow.

Denver: They gave lectures...

Shawn: Did that happen there?

Denver: Yeah!

Shawn: That's where we get the...

Denver: Yes!

Shawn: ...Van Der Donckt?

Denver: Yes! That's from the tabernacle!

Shawn: On materialism?

Denver: Yes!

Shawn: Wow!

Denver: That's tabernacle! Yeah.

There was a time when Mormonism was confident enough that it would allow someone to come in and criticize. Mormonism today has no confidence to let a critic come in and criticize 'cause it scares them.

Shawn: This is an aside. I don't know your age; you look young but gray. But the question I have is: Do you remember the days when priesthood meeting (I was really— I was a kid, about eight), opening priesthood meeting was like a debate! I don't like that candidate! Another person would say, Oh I...

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: ...I think he's great!

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: They were open!

Denver: It was lively. See, what happened is that Joseph Fielding Smith and Bruce R. McConkie, his son-in-law, wanted to stabilize Mormonism. I think they were far less concerned with getting it right and far more concerned with just stabilizing it. They were opponents of that, and I loved that era.

Shawn: That was a great era.

Denver: That was fun.

Shawn: That ends your first category, Mr. Denver Snuffer! We have the basics in doctrine, yourself, or social issues.

Denver: Wait a minute. Are we going through all of them?

Shawn: Yes!

Denver: I chose one...

Shawn: This is interesting!

Denver: ...I chose one in the expectation that that would be it.

Shawn: Your expectations were incorrect, sir. [Laughter]

Denver: So, this is all double jeopardy. This is all— Yeah, we don't ring the bell and say, Okay, you've made it to the end.

Shawn: No, we knock three times, remember?

Denver: Yeah. Man. So, what was the first one 'cause we may as well do...

Shawn: Social issues.

Denver: That's the one I like least, so, yeah, let's go there.

Shawn: Marijuana.

Denver: It's funny. One of the fellows who was going to meet me here is not here because he has to harvest his marijuana crop. He has a license (this is weird, okay?). He lives in Utah. He's been licensed by the state of Utah to grow a crop of marijuana, which he has grown and is now harvesting because it's supposed to snow tomorrow, and he's gonna turn it into CBD oil that's legal. And how weird is that?

Shawn: It's weird.

Denver: I mean, seriously. Look, I...

Shawn: Herbs?

Denver: ...I think—yeah, I get all that—but I think smoking stuff is ill-advised to your lungs. (You know, edibles over in Colorado might be an answer for some people.)

I do think that there's therapeutic uses of a whole variety of things. I learned from a fellow whose daughter's in med school that one of the very first heart medications that they developed for blood thinning came from using a poisonous snake venom to adjust it for dosage that will allow the blood to be thinned in order to help heart patients prevent further damage. If snake venom can have a therapeutic use, then it's likely that just about everything in the hands of someone that knows what they're doing can have a therapeutic use. We react hysterically because someone abuses something without ever considering that maybe further use ought to be experimented with to find out where it fits.

This creation was fine-tuned by God who put man as the culmination of that creation, and everything—everything—was given for the use and benefit of man in the Garden of Eden. Now, he was kicked out. The kind of environment became progressively more hostile, but that doesn't mean that everything in the garden didn't exist for the use and benefit of man. We just abuse stuff.

Shawn: Like your views; I really do! Government.

Denver: The United States has one of the greatest governmental structures ever created, and it is populated, at present, by scoundrels and knaves and dishonest and just wretched individuals. Fortunately, we have egomaniacal leaders occupying all three branches of government which is exactly what the Founding Fathers anticipated would happen, and so, we get a daily vaudeville show.

Shawn: Yeah.

Denver: I mean, it's slapstick humor what's going on back in Washington.

Shawn: Yeah.

Denver: Are you telling me that that both political parties don't realize there's an immigration problem that could be solved? Why are we ignoring a problem when we're importing disease? Why can't someone that has a disease that would like to come here go through a system that welcomes them but cures their disease before they set them loose in the general public? Some people say, Well, we want to welcome them, and some people say, Oh, this is a danger; we have to have it regulated. Why can't we both welcome them and regulate it and do it in a way that protects the people that are here and aids the actual people that are coming in?

Our government right now is utterly dysfunctional, and we're the beneficiaries of that because they leave us alone.

Shawn: So, you have obvious ideas. Let me get more to the point on that one, government. What is your thought on the separation of church and state?

Denver: It was always intended that the state not be allowed to meddle in the church, but I think that churches were always expected to speak up and to have a voice. I think churches ought to speak up.

I think there are a lot of issues that affect churches and the values of the churches. And when you say that you have to gag the churches, then are the only voices that are permitted in the public discourse the secular voice, the atheist voice? Why is the atheist voice more pure and worthy of being heard than the religious voice if you're going to open up the First Amendment for everyone to speak? It just— It makes no sense. We've skewed it. Churches should be as vocal as they want to be. Atheists should likewise be as vocal as they want to be.

The only thing that shouldn't happen is that a government should not say, This religion is destined to prosper and succeed, but that one is destined to ruin in taxation. They should be hands off. The government shouldn't control that.

Shawn: Got it.

Denver: But if churches have the ability to win the political argument and to elect people to Congress that represent their views, churches should have the right to rally and to elect.

Shawn: With the continued support of tax-exempt status?

Denver: I think so because anytime you say you will forfeit your taxes in... The power— Oliver Wendell Holmes said the power to tax is the power to destroy. The power to destroy when it comes to churches— You really have to take a tax-free approach.

Shawn: Got it.

Denver: You just have to.

Shawn: Got it.

Denver: Otherwise, government can destroy it.

Shawn: I see. Excellent. Abortion.

I think I know what you're gonna say on most of these, but let's just get it on the record.

Denver: Yeah. I think you're taking a life.

Shawn: Okay. Homosexuality.

Denver: I think it is the— Ultimately, anyone who does not have children— I don't care what their orientation is. Having a sexual union between the man and the woman that produces a child, no matter what it is that drives your libido, is part of what it means to be human, made in the image of God, and to experience, in this life, part of what is our destiny.

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: And, therefore, I understand that there may be people who find that challenging. Nevertheless, I think they will find greater joy and happiness in having and raising a child than they can in a union that will deprive them of that.

Shawn: Got it.

Denver: So, I mean, I don't want to throw rocks at anyone. What I would like to do is encourage them to contemplate the value and the godliness of the union of the man and the woman and the product of progeny.

Shawn: Got it.

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: Capital punishment.

Denver: Because I have been a lawyer and seen innocent people be convicted, some — At least one fellow is in jail right now for a crime he did not commit that we're doing what we can to try and change that. I hate to have finality like execution when you have the potential for error. If you know; if the person confesses, I don't have a problem with an execution although if there's no proof to support his confession, and all he's doing is using you to commit suicide, I got a problem with that.

But there's a serial killer I heard about driving into work today. He's confessed to...

Shawn: Ninety-four.

Denver: ...ninety— Yeah, and he's got proof, and they found bodies where he said they'd find them. I don't have any problem with execution.

Shawn: That's no connection to blood atonement.

Denver: Oh, goll!

Shawn: I just have to ask! You got to clear up the mystique, Brother.

Denver: Yeah, Yeah. I think the whole notion of blood atonement is asinine. The Apostle Paul said he was guilty of murder.

Shawn: Yeah.

Denver: I mean, the whole concept was he committed a sin, but most...

Shawn: Yeah.

Denver: Christ's blood can't reach, so we gotta shed your blood.

Shawn: Right.

Denver: Ah, yeah, that's nonsense.

Shawn: I'll just throw this one out there. We'll end it with that one. Evangelicalism.

Denver: A recent innovation, largely dependent upon the constructural framework that Martin Luther came up with, which itself was, in a way, to escape Roman Catholicism without, you know, trusting that Catholicism's excommunication of you will consign you to hell. I mean, evangelical views were inevitable, and I think they are supportable by the biblical text, but they are really recent. Here, the evangelicals are the only ones that got it right?

Shawn: Yeah.

Denver: Then we've got like 1750 years of Christians that are consigned to hell because it didn't exist. I mean, look, given the chaos of what Christianity came to in the wake of Catholicism and Martin Luther and Knox and Calvin, evangelicals are probably putting a better face on the ruling of Christianity than most. And I have a lot— I harmonize with a lot of what the evangelical world has to say.

Shawn: Not on my list, but just between, you know, you and I, have you done much reading of Erasmus?

Denver: No! I should do that.

Shawn: Yeah, really interesting.

Denver: Okay.

Shawn: We have two categories left, my friend, and I know the one you're not gonna pick unless you want to get the pain out of the way. We can do Denver Snuffer, or we can do the basics of doctrine.

Denver: Well, let's do the basics of doctrine, and then— Aren't we out of time? [Laughter]

Shawn: No. I know you're hoping for that. We're not letting that happen.

Denver: I need to... [Denver gestures stretching out space between his hands. Laughter.]

Shawn: Yeah, you're good at that! All right. God the Father.

Denver: God the Father is clearly cross-culturally recognized as an existent male deity that, in Jewish tradition and in Egyptological depiction and in Hinduism, offered the promise of a redemptive God-Son who would come to rescue mankind from a predicament. P

And I think that God the Father in our current scriptures, biblical and Mormon, seems distant and disconnected; and yet, God the Son comes in and says, I do what the Father tells me to do. I'm a reflection of Him. I'm here as His, essentially, His surrogate. When you see me, you've seen the Father. P

And so, we have this disconnect between us and the Father that Christ was trying to disabuse us of to try and make the Father seem just as loving, just as sacrificial, just as kindly as is the Son. And we've lost that. P

One of the fascinating things that Mormonism has is that Christ in the Book of Mormon repeatedly refers to things He's doing as what the Father told Him to do; and in dialogue in the first books of Nephi (First and Second Nephi), the Father's voice is actually heard. I mean, Bruce R. McConkie, when trying to stabilize Mormonism, says that God the Father never talks to mankind except to introduce His Son. P

This is [imitating B. R. McConkie]... Actually, I think I can do that voice. This is my beloved Son...

Shawn: It's called... [copies Denver's gesture, stretching out the space between his hands].

Denver: ...in whom I am well pleased; hear [ye] him—Bruce R. McConkie (Matthew 17:5; Matthew 9:4 RE). But he's wrong because the Book of Mormon says,...

Shawn: Right.

Denver: ...in the first-person voice of the Father, a lot of things that aren't This is my beloved Son; hear him (Luke 9:35; Mark 5:5 RE).

Now, I could go on...

Shawn: You can.

Denver: ...about that, but they seem to be growing increase...

Shawn: Yes and no, quick yes or no. A body of flesh and bones?

Denver: Glorified body...

Shawn: Okay. Glorified body of flesh and bones?

Denver: Yeah, within...yeah! Look, when you talk about that...

Shawn: Denver, yes or damn no! [Laughter]

Denver: In order to know the biology of a resurrected being...

Shawn: You're killing me...

Denver: Yeah, okay. Yes.

Shawn: Okay, thank you. King Follett Discourse. Once a man? Yes or no.

Denver: Well, if you define Christ as God, absolutely, God was once a man.

Shawn: No, I'm not talking about incarnation through Christ. I'm talking about the Father. Yes or no, darn it! Come on! My mom is waiting for me for dinner! [Laughter]

Denver: Is your Mom still— Are you still living in a basement? What's up with you, Man? [Laughter] Is this religious gig so poorly paid?

Shawn: You think I would live in a basement? I live here!

Denver: Oh. Well, I hope they shut down the...

Shawn: It's the only time I get sleep.

Denver: ...the cabinet plant next door.

Shawn: Are you gonna give me one on that? God the Father, once a man. Yes, no?

Denver: I believe that God has made it possible for people, as is stated in Revelation, chapter 3, to sit on a throne as Christ sits on a throne with His Father; and that, as a consequence, the deification of man (which is an Eastern Orthodox preserved doctrine) is true.

In terms of the genealogy of God the Father, you know, we can go round and round on that without ever getting an answer...

Shawn: I don't want to go round and round.

Denver: ...in the King Follett discourse.

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: But yeah.

Shawn: Okay. You're too wily of an attorney to know how to just manipulate the hell out of me, so I'm jumping categories, and we're going like this down the thing. Are you a prophet?

Denver: The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy, so everyone ought to be a prophet.

Shawn: So, that would be a yes.

Denver: Everyone ought to be a prophet.

Shawn: Are you a prophet in the sense of the missionaries going door to door in, say, like unto Moses?

Denver: No, I don't have a podium, and I don't have a tabernacle, and I don't have a temple, and I don't have an organization.

Shawn: Less specifically. Do you receive revelation for people?

Denver: I receive revelation.

Shawn: For others.

Denver: Some people have thought what I had to say significant enough that they use it in their own lives.

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: Do I have the ambition of trying to lead a group of people? If so, my ambition is to lead them to become prophets in their own right.

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: All right, fair enough. The next one: Satan.

Denver: Because of a revelation, I happen to know that Satan is a title, and what it means is accuser. And we can be Satan, as Christ said to Peter, Get thee behind me, Satan [See Matthew 16:23], when Peter was trying to convince the Lord that he didn't need to go undertake the sacrifice; and I think Satan is a role any one of us can occupy as soon as we want to become accusers of one another. And you know that— The opposite of that is what Christ talked about, loving one another.

Shawn: Okay, so, it's more of a principle, concept, rather than an entity.

Denver: I think anyone can become an accuser...

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: ...and an adversary, and many people do.

Shawn: Hell.

Denver: I think there is such a thing as torment and regret, but I think that the inflictor of that torment is ourselves.

Shawn: So, not literal flames.

Denver: No, no, no, no, no, no pitchforks, no horned heads and pointy tails and...

Shawn: That's only the Mormons.

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: Just kidding—total joke because people used to say we had horns. Geez, you guys at home— I know what you're thinking. Anyway, have you seen Jesus?

Denver: Well, yeah, and a little bit of a description of that is given in the book that I gave to you.

Shawn: Okay, good.

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: All right.

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: Different from the angel or the angel...?

Denver: Oh yes, yes, yes, yeah.

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: Are you the head of this dispensation?

Denver: Well, the way you define dispensation requires that you understand the term. Do I have a dispensation? Has the gospel been dispensed to me from heaven so that I'm not dependent upon something including the words of an old book to know God? Yes.

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: Does that mean that now I get to run a multi-national corporation? No. I'm doing my best to try and preserve faith in Christ at a time when, because of everything that's going on in our current environment that is so corrosive, it is increasingly more difficult for people to have faith in Christ. P

But I know He's real; and I know that He died for the salvation of a fallen world; and I know that He's going to come to judge it and redeem it; and that between now and then, faith is going to be increasingly more difficult to hold on to. And I hope to do what I can to have people preserve their faith in Him and stop squabbling with our fellow believers. Yeah.

Shawn: In the context of asking that question, Denver, ...that Joseph was the head of that dispensation, you know, where we have to pass through the sentinels, and you got to see him, Brigham Young, and all that. The question is: Can people enter into—and we're going to get to heaven next—but enter into heaven without your approval?

Denver: Yeah. Well, I would hope, yeah. I would hope.

Shawn: So would I, but you never know on this day. Some people might say, No they've got to come through me. I just want to know.

Denver: Yeah, yeah, that— To me, that's kind of a silly notion.

Shawn: Is it?

Denver: So, I mentioned before, Saint Francis...

Shawn: Yeah.

Denver: ...and that the current pope took the name of Saint Francis, and that endeared him to me. Saint Francis believed in the Sermon on the Mount, and he wanted to start a Catholic order in which they lived the Sermon on the Mount. He was initially turned down because the pope didn't think anyone could do that. And so, he went out, and he got a group of followers, and they lived the Sermon on the Mount; and they came back, and he got his order.

When Saint Francis was dying in his final illness in the last weeks of his life, he said angels came and ministered to him, okay? Joseph Smith's older brother Alvin died. As Alvin lay dying, he was talking about the angels that had come into the room and were ministering to him.

Those two illustrations are what I believe happens with the Christian journey and the Christian redemption. There are a lot of people who live very good lives who, in the waning— When they were stoning Stephen (in the Book of Acts), Stephen is standing there in the final moments of his life being brutally slain, and he says, The heavens opened to me, and I see the Son of man on the right hand of power [See Acts 4:10 RE]. He beholds the heavens open.

These are the kinds of people that died with a firm expectancy that they have salvation because something occurred before they departed. A lot of people think that that's an event that needs to occur in the life of a Christian soul when they're 14 years old or 12 or 50 years. P

I think for most people, they do have that experience, but it's in the waning moments of life, and I think that a lot of people experience that here in order to have the right to inherit it there. And some of that last-minute babbling that you hear from the dying souls or the mentally-impaired that are talking about babblings that sound religious, there's something more going on. And I think God's mercy extends far and wide and is experienced by many, many souls outside of the confines of denominationalism.

Shawn: Totally agreed, and that's a beautiful hopeful thought that you have. Second Coming.

Denver: Ooh! An absolutely...

Shawn: That's a thumbs-up?

Denver: Yeah! It's an absolutely firmly predicted, inevitable event. If everything that was said in scripture concerning our Lord and concerning the prophecies that have been and are being fulfilled are true, then, without any doubt, there will be a Second Coming; and Christ will come to take possession of this world that He created— belongs to Him!

Shawn: Right!

Denver: He'll reclaim it!

Shawn: Right! Do you subscribe to the highest degree of the celestial kingdom? Are the three kingdoms part of your theological makeup?

Denver: I believe in the idea of progression.

Shawn: Okay.

Denver: I believe in the idea of being added upon. Yeah. There's a lot more to that story than just— And the idea that you're gonna finish this world; and you're gonna depart; you're gonna arrive somewhere; and that that's where you get to, you know, build your condo on the beach and remain forever...

Have you ever read Mark Twain's short story and act, An Extract from Captain Stormfield's Visit to Heaven?

Shawn: I don't believe so.

Denver: It's freakin' hilarious, and it's pretty good.

Shawn: I'll have to read it.

Denver: It's pretty good, yeah!

Shawn: A couple more, and we're done. Are you a cult leader? You have to have heard that from somebody.

Denver: Well, it's actually kind of silly when you think about it. Yeah. Look. I say what I say openly. I advocate in favor of faith. I advocate in favor of truth. I don't think that history should be skewed in order to prop up a false proposition. I think that sometimes the study of history is painful and requires you to come to a reckoning about what's going on or what went on. And I don't doubt that you can (if you define the term carefully enough) say that I lead a cult, or that you lead a cult, or that Mormonism is a cult, or that the Roman Catholic Church is a cult. But, in the sense that there's some kind of secretive...

Shawn: Right!

Denver: ...you know, sexually aberrant...

Shawn: Right.

Denver: ...criminally deviant—all of those things usually go with the idea of cultism—no, I try to be as open and as forthright and as forthcoming as I possibly can be.

I do speak very little about the miraculous and the otherworldly because I think it attracts the wrong kind of people. I would rather teach in order to have people have their own experience and to enjoy their own communion with the heaven. And then, they've got it for themselves. They don't need me talking that stuff up. I think talking that stuff up — It really skews people's perception of you, the way they interact with you, and it limits their own growth. They need to grow. Everyone needs to become prophets in their own right.

Shawn: Yeah.

Denver: Yeah.

Shawn: One last question with...it tags onto that last one 'cause...and then...thank you for answering it. It's— I hate it because you get called a cult leader if you do anything, anything! They just... You're a cult leader!

But, the question is: Typically and historically, we see that leaders of groups— They fall for gold, glory, or girls. That's, you know— We've seen that historically through almost every group, almost everyone. They fall for one of those.

And I don't think you're having a problem with the girls, and I don't think you're having a problem with the gold (at least as far as I know), but the glory— Are people allowed, that are in your group, to disagree with you and remain loved, and can someone— Like here, we have people who say, You know, Shawn, you're crazy; I don't believe that. You say, So what, stay here. You have that same approach?

Denver: Yeah! And, in fact, there are a lot of things that go on that I disagree with, and I just hold my tongue. There are things that get discussed that I know if I weigh in, I can get my way, and I think that's bad for me, and I think that's bad for them.

Shawn: Yeah!

Denver: I have a very different view of what Joseph Smith was, and what he accomplished than most ex-Mormons. I think the trajectory of Joseph Smith's life— He died at age 38 and a half. He was still a young man. When you go back to— One of the letters that you'll find in here is the one he wrote from Liberty Jail. You have this priesthood structure, control, hierarchy. You have all of this stuff being constructed in the religious development that Joseph Smith undertook.

Then you have things literally fall all apart at Far West. Three witnesses abandoned him; members of the Quorum of the Twelve abandoned him; members of the Quorum of the Twelve signed affidavits that helped put him in jail. The hierarchy had been decimated by opposition and infighting, and he wound up in jail because of that.

He's in jail, and he's writing a letter, and in his letter, he puts something that completely reverses everything that had gone on before. No power or influence can or ought to be maintained by virtue of the priesthood, only by gentleness and persuasion and pure knowledge (See T&C 175:31; 139:6 RE).

Joseph Smith's ark, which tended towards the authoritarianism, began to be dramatically reconsidered during the imprisonment in Liberty Jail. What he wrote in there absolutely eviscerated hierarchical control, and when he gets to Nauvoo, and he gives the talk to the Relief Society in Nauvoo, he says, You are depending too much upon the prophet, and you are darkened in your minds because you're neglecting the duties that devolve upon yourselves.

Well, if we're students, and we're careful students of history, and we can see what's going on in downtown Salt Lake right now; and we know that that's not going to yield the kind of righteous, self-sufficient, self-confident Christian souls converted to a living faith that would go to their death because in their hearts, they harbor the conviction that what they're doing and what they're living is, in fact, pleasing to God—then you can't—you can't take away from people and aggregate to yourself the authority or the control.

The thing I try consciously (and that I've asked my wife, and she tries constantly to remind me of) is it is not a virtue or an advantage to be the one in charge. It's a virtue, and it's an advantage to be down laboring alongside and helping lift others. It's an advantage to try and teach and preach in a way that will make them better people for your having been there. And if you've managed to move people along so that they can reach a state of harmony that we would call Zion (or City of Peace), and you're not there, but you helped facilitate it, then you've done something for which God will give you what you're due, whatever that may be. You trust Him. You leave it in His hands. But to say, I need to be the mayor of Zion is— It's Nauvoo all over again.

Shawn: Sure!

Denver: Joseph Smith's experiment in restoration efforts to try and bring about the kingdom of God (the Lord's Prayer asks that His kingdom return) didn't work! It didn't work.

And the Book of Mormon says this land shall not have kings on it. I don't want to be a king. I would love to be a servant in the service of the Lord and to elevate others.

Shawn: I've really enjoyed this. I have a new appreciation for you as a person. And your thoughts—I think they're great. I think they're— If they are what you claim them to be— I always have to have that caveat 'cause I don't know you personally, but in terms of what you've communicated, it's been excellent. And I think you give people hope, and you seem to want to help them to stand on their own two feet, to know the Lord and walk with Him in that way. And I really appreciate you taking the time, all this time, to do this. Thank you for...

Denver: You bet, and yeah, you'll probably figure a lot more out about me in those, particularly the essay books. And let's not do this again!

Shawn: All right! [Laughter] We will not. But I do have one favor: a message for the audience. That's the camera. They really want to see you, what you have to say.

Denver: Yeah. Look, there is absolutely no reason to be afraid of the truth. The truth will not harm whatever you're doing, and that includes what's going on in downtown Salt Lake. It may require that you change the nature of the message. But the truth will not harm you. The more of it that you can deal with...

We tend to think that the opposite of faith is hatred. It's not. The opposite of faith is fear. Fear is what produces a lack of confidence that produces evil and hatred—fear.

Stop being afraid of the truth! Christ said the truth shall make you free, and He meant that. It's true. You don't need to carry the burden around of trying to hide or conceal or mislead. Just be forthright, honest. And the fact that you're a weak man— All of the heroes of the Old Testament were weak men.

We don't lose our faith in God because David betrayed one of his generals, ultimately sending him off to be murdered in order to hide his adultery. We don't hide that. Our opinion of David is altered as a consequence, but our faith in God is not; the same of Peter denying the Lord— That is not evidence that Peter wasn't commissioned and sent forth with a message. It just meant that he wasn't as strong as he would like to have been, or perhaps that we would like to have seen him be. But none of us are, either.

None of us have ever been strong enough to carry the burden that was necessary for our own redemption. That's what Christ did for us. So, confessing your own inadequacy is simply another way of reminding us that we're all dependent upon the Lord. So be truthful!

Shawn: Praise God! Denver Snuffer, we will see you next week here on Heart of the Matter.

2020.03.22 The Heavens are Open (And Therefore, We Have Work To Do)

General Conference Address
March 22, 2020
Hurricane, Utah

I want to thank the committee that organized this conference. They've learned that adversity is one great cure for monotony as you struggled to make things happen despite all that's gone on. There are a lot of people who are necessary right now to make this thing go out, broadcast over the Internet. They're unseen. Some of them are here, and some are at remote locations. I wanna thank all of them for their contribution and all the volunteers who have worked to try and make this happen.

Yesterday, there was a get-together in a city park where a few of us were able to hear and partake of the sacrament, listen to Rob Adolfo talk for a bit, share some feelings with one another. I met a young lady named Mandolin. Her mom introduced her to me, and I thought, "That's a great name. I've never met anyone named Mandolin." So, I violated all of the protocols that everyone's respecting, and I gave the little girl a hug; and I assume that's at my peril, not at her peril [audience laughter]. So—

It's been 200 years since the First Vision took place. John Lefgren and John Pratt (both independent of one another) were trying to fix the date on which that occurred—John Pratt using calendaring to try and find an alignment of dates, and John Lefgren investigating weather reports that would conform to the description that Joseph Smith gave of that morning on which it took place. And independent of one another, they both reached the conclusion that it was on a Sunday, March 26th of 1820. So, we're rapidly coming up on that date.

Thousands of people, perhaps hundreds of thousands of people (maybe more) have had the opportunity to have the veil lift and be in the presence of the Lord or in the presence of the messenger who speaks in the first person in the name of the Lord. But comparatively few are ever told, as Joseph was told, that God had a work for him to do.

What distinguishes Joseph—in the First Vision—to me are two things: First, when he prayed and he was bound up by something that he called thick darkness gathering around [him] (Joseph Smith History 2:4 RE), he didn't submit, he didn't surrender, and he didn't accept that as the message God intended for him. But calling upon God, he persisted through that.

I've mentioned before there was a shouting Methodist tradition that typically would acknowledge that as a divine message. They go out, they pray, they shout to Heaven, they get bound up. And when that happens, then they've got their witness from the other side, and they know they've come in contact with God.

Joseph, for some reason, did not accept that. He pressed through, he persisted; and calling upon God, He was delivered from that—at which point he saw what was, initially, a pillar of light that troubled him until he saw that the treetops were safe from contact with it, that he might survive contact with it, also. And it gradually descended, and he saw personages within it.

The second remarkable thing about Joseph is that God had a work for him to do, but he ends the description of the First Vision with: many other things did He say unto me which I cannot [reveal] at this time (Ibid, vs. 5). Joseph knew a great deal more right at the beginning than he understood; and Joseph gradually understood more than he was able to teach. At about the time that Joseph reached not just the height of his comprehension but the height of his capacity to be able to teach, he was taken from us. We lost him.

So, God had a work for him to do, but the work that he had to do never did get completed, which is why, then, the Restoration needs to pick up and continue.

Well, a new Restoration has begun preliminary to winding up God's great work. God is very active at present. Being chosen to do God's work does not make us godly, virtuous, or better than others. Every individual must be godly and practice virtue, and even then, we're no better than any other people. The difference consists in God's willingness to direct us forward as He completes the promises and covenants He made to the Fathers. It's God's presence, not our worthiness which distinguishes us.

In the last few weeks, a great alarm has been raised about a viral pandemic. It illustrates something about all nations and institutions. Although they may seem durable, they are all vulnerable and easily destroyed by very simple means. Like locusts destroying the crops of Egypt in the story of Exodus, great societies are shaken through the smallest of means. We know there will come an overflowing scourge, for a desolating sickness shall cover the land (T&C 31:7), for the Lord has told us beforehand so that when it comes, we'll not be overtaken. This current unrest illustrates what will happen one day soon. Being forewarned gives us the opportunity to prepare.

But our society suffers most from evils we inflict upon ourselves. It's estimated that in January and February of this year, the greatest cause of death in the United States has come from one of our great evils of abortion. An estimated 141,000 abortions in those two months added to the estimated 51,000,000 who have been slain since 1973. Abortion is the leading cause of death in the United States. By tolerating this mass killing, we're not unlike those who anciently killed their children, sacrificing them to the false god Molech. The Lord repeatedly condemned that:

And the Lord spoke unto Moses, saying, Again, you shall say to the children of Israel, Whoever he is, of the children of Israel or of the strangers that sojourn in Israel, that gives any of his seed unto Molech, he shall surely be put to death. The people of the land shall stone him with stones...

Stoning with stones was intended to be an expression of community condemnation to require that everyone participate, everyone know, and everyone witness the horrendous act of putting someone to death under the law for this kind of an offense. This is in the book of Leviticus.

And I will set my face against that man and will cut him off from among his people because he has given of his seed unto Molech, to defile my sanctuary and to profane my holy name. And if the people of the land do in any way hide their eyes from the man when he gives of his seed unto Molech and kill him not, then I will set my face against that man, against his family, and will cut him off and all that go whoring after him to commit whoredom with Molech, from among their people. (Leviticus 9:16 RE)

This was an act of killing children for worship of a false god. There's very little difference between that act and the idea of exercising a fundamental right enshrined as though it were a sacrament.

In the book of Kings, it's repeated: that no man might make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Molech (2 Kings 7:10 RE). And Jeremiah: to cause their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire unto Molech, which I commanded them not (Jeremiah 13:4 RE).

We've slain—as a society in the United States—over 51,000,000 children. Where is the alarm? Where is the upset? Where is the shutting down of business and the cutting off of travel in order to preserve those lives?

What kind of a society allows killing 51,000,000 innocent children to continue uninterrupted for over 47 years? As we've been told, Nevertheless, when the wicked rule, the people mourn. Wherefore, honest men and wise men should be sought for diligently, and good men and wise men you should observe to uphold; otherwise, whatever is less than these [come] of evil (T&C 98:2).

It's not honest, it's not wise, and it's not good to uphold leaders who celebrate the murder of children as if it were a sacrament to be protected, sacrosanct, and constitutionally protected. It is something that will cause the greater society, eventually, to mourn.

We have elected and upheld men and women who have tolerated this obscenity for 47 years. The United States will be punished for this. By and by, you will see the chastening hand of an Almighty God, until the consumption decreed has made a full end of all nations (T&C 85:3, emphasis added). That full end of nations will include the U.S. And so, we have an opportunity to prepare if we will heed the Lord's counsel.

Anciently, Enoch was shown in a vision in which he beheld Satan, and he had a great chain in his hand, and he veiled the whole face of the earth with darkness; and he looked up and laughed, and his angels rejoiced (Genesis 4:15 RE). The chain and the veil of darkness over the earth at that time were lies and deceit that covered the earth. Men spoke lies continually to one another and falsely accused one another. God told Enoch, They are without affection, and they hate their own blood (Ibid, vs. 17).

Many false spirits, false ideas, and lies are spread among us. There are too many for me to be able to respond to them all. You have the Scriptures. Study them, pray continually, and walk uprightly. Never compromise your virtue nor allow your thoughts to go unguarded. Understanding the Scriptures will fortify anyone from today's lies. Political leaders, entertainers, news reports, and even scholarly studies distort and mislead. We live in a time similar to Enoch's. The world is chained by lies.

The Jews claimed that they were Torah-observant and that that would be enough to save them. They asserted, Good Master, we have Moses and the prophets; and whoever shall live by them, shall he not have life? (Luke 9:10 RE). But Christ responded, You know not Moses, neither the prophets, for if you had known them, you would've believed on me; for, to this intent they were written (ibid, vs. 10).

They accused Christ of violating the Torah by healing on the Sabbath (see Matthew 6:10 RE). But Christ disputed their Torah teaching, saying, if an ox fell into a pit, it would be lawful to rescue the ox on the Sabbath (see Luke 9:4 RE), asking if a daughter of Abraham should not also be rescued on the Sabbath (see Luke 8:32 RE) Christ also compared healing a son of Abraham to make him whole with circumcising on the Sabbath. The Torah-observant Jews approved of Sabbath-day circumcision.

As a practical matter, it is impossible to follow the Torah without a temple and sacrifice. But Christ fulfilled the law's required sacrifice, and therefore, the Law of Moses ended. The Roman destruction of the temple made observance of that law impossible to continue.

Between the 11th and 13th centuries, the Crusades brought a stagnant Christian Europe into contact with Islamic culture. Baghdad was a cultural and literary center where great philosophical works that had been lost to Christianity were studied. The works of Aristotle and Plato were preserved and transmitted to Christians from contact with the Muslim world. Europe gained learning in mathematics, astronomy, and Christianity, or excuse me, and chemistry from the Muslims.

Musical instruments (including the violin and guitar) are derived from Arabic instruments, the rebec and the oud. Distillation, including alcohol, along with cultivation of cotton, rice, sugar cane, the silk industry, paper, the suction pump, and the spinning wheel came to Europe through contact with Islam in the Crusades.

The 14th century Renaissance was the result of light and truth flowing into benighted Christian Europe from an enlightened Islamic civilization. Catholic Christianity had oppressed the continent and kept people in darkness. When that world was enlightened, civilization changed, and with greater light and truth, Catholicism's oppressive domination was challenged through the Protestant Reformation.

The theological, social, and educational revolution underway during this time period produced several esoteric traditions. Ideas were imported into Persia from the Far East. Hindu, Zoroastrian, Buddhist, and Taoist ideas refreshed Islamic thinkers and, in turn, filtered into Christian and Jewish European circles.

Freemasonry and the Kabbalah both were developed as a result of events in this 11th to 14th century period. Other esoteric traditions were also invented. They all claimed to have much more ancient origins than when they were actually developed.

The Catholic Knights Templar Order was founded in 1096 and destroyed in 1307. Freemasonry claims some relationship to the Knights Templar and, in turn, to the temple of Solomon. Those claims are not true.

The Kabbalists claim to have learning that can be traced back to Abraham. It is more correct to say they can trace their notions to the Far East than to Abraham. Their claims are untrue and are among the superstitions Isaiah prophesied against. This is Isaiah: You, LORD, have abandoned your people, the descendants of Jacob. They are full of superstitions from the East; they practice divination like the Philistines and embrace pagan customs (Isaiah 2:6 NIV; see also Isaiah 1:6 RE).

Kabbalah began to be developed by the Jews in Spain after contact with the Moors. None of the Kabbalist claims about the antiquity of their beliefs' origins are true. It is another mingling of the doctrines of men with Scripture. Despite this, some thought-provoking and interesting things are taught by Kabbalists.

Today, you will hear voices trying to use Kabbalist ideas to claim the Law of Moses has always been and is still binding. They advocate the idea that there are levels of meaning to the law, and the highest meaning is where enlightenment and understanding of God is to be found. These are interesting ideas, but they are not ancient. They are Middle-Age notions derived from contact with Islam. And so, we see irony again playing out in the Jewish-Islamic relationship in which Jews, claiming superior enlightenment through the Kabbalah, owe an unrecognized debt to Islam.

Christ interpreted the Law of Moses to require charity, even if doing so appears to violate the commandments. Christ showed that God cares for those who are hurting, injured, or in need. Therefore, any commandment from God should be understood in light of that merciful objective. Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this: to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the vices of the world (Epistle of Jacob 1:7 RE). There are two challenges to this. Caring for those in need is one, but keeping ourselves unspotted is a second.

As for the first, those who follow Christ have an obligation to care for one another. There are single mothers and children with substantial ongoing needs. They need help with food, clothing, housing, and medical care. These are basic needs calling for our help.

Vulnerable people in humble circumstances should not be asked why they are in need. It does not matter. We have no right to judge them. Our obligation is to help them. The Good Samaritan helped the man in need without judgment. His response was based only on the need he saw: When he saw him, he had compassion on him, and went to him and bound up his wounds (Luke 8:8 RE). This is the behavior our Lord encouraged. Go and do likewise (Ibid).

Succor those that stand in need of your succor. Ye will administer of your substance unto him that standeth in need...ye will not suffer that the beggar putteth up his petition to you in vain, and turn him out to perish. Perhaps thou shalt say, The man has brought upon himself his misery; therefore I will stay my hand and will not give him of my food, nor impart unto him of my substance that he may not suffer, for his punishments are just. But I say unto you, O man, whosoever doeth this, the same hath great cause to repent; and except he repenteth of that which he hath done, he perisheth for ever and hath no interest in the kingdom of God. For behold, are we not all beggars? (Mosiah 2:4 RE)

The light of Christ is withdrawing from the world, and darkness continues to spread. If you have the Spirit, you can see clearly the steady decline of light in the world. It's obvious. The increasing darkness will eventually result in the wicked slaying the wicked as has happened in two previous civilizations on this land.

The Book of Mormon describes how this happens: The spirit of the Lord had ceased striving with them and Satan had full power over the hearts of the people, for they were given up unto the hardness of their hearts and the blindness of their minds, that they might be destroyed (Ether 6:17 RE). God will not suffer that the wicked shall destroy the righteous (1 Nephi 7:4 RE). He has declared, The wicked shall destroy the wicked, and I will hold the peacemakers in the palm of my hand and none can take them from me (T&C 157:65).

But being among the peacemakers and being among those who are not covered in darkness requires practicing charity towards those who are in need. It enlarges your heart. It increases the light within you. It makes you feel better when you minister to and help those who are in need. All of that is godliness.

Now as for the second, no one is entitled to assume they have the right to be idle while imposing on laborers to provide for their needs. When seeking assistance from others, always consider this principle: You shall not be idle, for he that is idle shall not eat the bread, nor wear the garment of the laborer (T&C 26:10). No one should judge or dismiss your needs, but as the recipient of help from others, you should always evaluate yourself by this standard.

In keeping unspotted from the world, it involves a true principle that adultery and sign-seeking go hand in hand. Among all mankind, John the Baptist was chosen to baptize the Son of God, yet John did no miracle (John 6:30 RE). Signs do not produce faith but follow faith. Even Christ could do no mighty works among those who lacked faith. There are signs that do follow faith, and I've witnessed many of them. But I speak little of them because sign-seeking attracts the wrong kind of follower. Even Christ would not accept loyalty from such people.

The idea that signs must be open for the world and spoken of frequently is a false idea. Sign-seekers are unable to have faith unless they repent. God is not fooled by pious pretensions.

Righteousness is required for God to gather a community into Zion. We have a law given to us:

And now behold, I speak unto the church: you shall not kill, he that kills shall not have forgiveness, neither in this world nor in the world to come. And again, you shall not kill; he that kills shall die. You shall not steal, ...he that steals and will not repent shall be cast out. You shall not lie; he that lies and will not repent shall be cast out. You shall love your wife with all your heart, and shall cleave unto her and none else, and he that looks upon a woman to lust after her shall deny the faith, and shall not have the spirit, and if he repents not he shall be cast out. You shall not commit adultery, and he that commits adultery and repents not shall be cast out; and he that commits adultery and repents with all his heart, and forsakes and does it no more, you shall forgive...but if he does it again, he shall not be forgiven, but shall be cast out. You shall not speak evil of your neighbor or do him any harm. You know my laws, they are given in my scriptures. He that sins and repents not shall be cast out. If you love me, you shall serve me and keep all my commandments. (T&C 26:6)

These are minimal standards required of us all. They are not constraints but the only way to have freedom and enjoy a peaceful community. Commandments are a gift. Obedience to commandments is the only thing that allows mankind to live in harmony.

There are two opposing forces at work, and God's light still remains productive and positive. Because there is a necessary opposition, darkness and light are both growing.

There are very good things happening in the world. We are witnessing technological progress bordering on the miraculous. People around the world are rising from poverty at a faster rate than at any prior time in history. More patents are being issued at a quicker pace than at any time before. Agriculture is more productive. Medicine is finding more cures. Stem cell therapies are in their infancy and showing extraordinary promise. This could and should be a golden age for mankind. But at the same time we're witnessing extraordinary progress in material benefits, we're also seeing an increase in oppression, despair, drug dependency, violence, and suicide.

The gulf between actual progress and social despair is illustrated by the political debate involving global warming. The United States has reduced its greenhouse gas output by 12% since 2005, the largest reduction of any nation in the world. The United States is leading the world in reducing greenhouse gases, accomplishing far more than any other nation. At the same time, the United States has increased oil production by 80% and natural gas production by 51%, making it energy-independent and an exporter of oil and natural gas, the world's largest producer of energy.

China is the worst polluter and produces nearly double the amount of greenhouse gases as the United States. As the U.S. continues to decrease, China's greenhouse gas increase is growing at a rate of about 2% per year. Therefore, if you care about this issue, you should advocate for moving all the commerce, manufacturing, and production that can be moved from China to the United States in order to reduce greenhouse gases.

But for political reasons, manufacturing and production in the United States is being condemned by emotional, loud, angry voices who are silent about pollution coming from China and India. Every company that moves its manufacturing to the United States is helping to reduce greenhouse gases.

Political dialogue is so angry, so emotional, and irrational that everyone should take notice. Why has political dialogue become so angry? Why is there so much despair?

Christ spoke against disputing this way:

There shall be no disputations among you....he that hath the spirit of contention is not of me, but is of the Devil, who is the father of contention; and he stirreth up the hearts of men to contend with anger, one with another. Behold, this is not my doctrine, to stir up the hearts of men with anger, one against another, but this is my doctrine, that such things should be done away. (3 Nephi 5:8 RE)

No matter how you measure progress, material progress is growing at an astonishing rate, more than in any prior generation. Despite this, there's greater mental illness, depression, despair, and drug abuse among the most prosperous societies today.

It is in the minds and the hearts of men where darkness grows. A great fog of lies spreads over the earth again today. There's decreasing light because of false, evil, and destructive ideas. Life expectancy in the United States has declined for the first time largely due to two causes: suicide and drug abuse. There is a crisis of depression, loneliness, and mental illness underway. Pollution of our minds is a far greater threat than anything we see in the physical environment.

The Book of Mormon warns about our time. It describes pollutions of both the environment and the spirits of mankind that we now see:

Yea, it shall come in a day when there shall be heard of fires, and tempests, and vapors of smoke in foreign lands; and there shall also be heard of wars, and rumors of wars, and earthquakes in divers places. Yea, it shall come in a day when there shall be great pollutions upon the face of the earth—

So, now he's talking about pollutions which he will illustrate in the words that are coming up, pollutions that you're going to see in the last days. And these are the pollutions about which he was concerned:

There shall be murders, and robbings, and lyings, and deceivings, and whoredoms, and all manner of abominations — when there shall be many who will say, Do this or do that, it mattereth not, for the Lord will uphold such at the last day. But woe unto such, for they are in the gall of bitterness and in the bonds of iniquity. Yea, it shall come in a day when there shall be churches built up that shall say, Come unto me, and for your money you shall receive forgiveness of your sins. (Mormon 4:4 RE, emphasis added)

Today's greatest pollutions are lies, deceits, and advocating all manner of abominations as if they were good. Abusive and wicked practices are now advocated boldly and incorporated into our entertainment media and culture—fearlessly. Their advocates have no shame, no fear of judgment, and no concern for godliness.

The needs of the poor are often forgotten—and their direful circumstances used by political leaders only to advance their power and control. The sick and infirm have become a political opportunity. Governments face increasing perplexities and fail to address them with common sense. The world's leaders welcome perplexities to increase public distress because they hope to ride that increasing public distress to increased political power.

Christ described our socially bleak times but told us not to be discouraged because of it. He told us to look up, for the time of redemption is promised when a generation sees these signs:

In the generation in which the times of the gentiles shall be fulfilled, there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars, and upon the earth, distress of nations with perplexity, like the sea and the waves roaring. The earth also shall be troubled, and the waters of the great deep, men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth, for the powers of Heaven shall be shaken; ...when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, lift up your heads, for the day of your redemption draws near. (Luke 12:17 RE, emphasis added)

We have a sideshow going on in this nation's capital and even worse foolishness in the governments of other nations. The people of some nations starve because their leaders believe military power matters more than their citizens' hunger. Taxes are squandered, speech is suppressed, citizens are killed, and leaders pursue foolishness and vanity rather than benevolence and kindness.

Despite the present distresses, we are expected to uphold the government for the present. As our Scriptures explain: We believe in being subject to kings, presidents, rulers, and magistrates, in obeying, honoring, and sustaining the law (T&C 146:32).

And in another place the Lord stated:

I, the Lord, justify you and your brethren of my church in befriending that law which is the constitutional law of the land. And as pertaining to law of man, whatsoever is more or less than this comes of evil. I, the Lord make you free; therefore, you are free indeed, and the law also makes you free. Nevertheless, when the wicked rule, the people mourn. [And then He adds what I read before.] Honest men and wise men should be sought for diligently, ...good men and wise men you should observe to uphold; otherwise, whatsoever is less than these comes of evil. (T&C 98:2)

Governments and churches are both subject to corruption. We have learned by sad experience...it's the nature and disposition of almost all men, as soon as they get a little authority, as they suppose, they will immediately begin to exercise unrighteous dominion. Hence many are called, but few are chosen (T&C 139:5).

The genius of the U.S. Constitution is that it presumes ambitious and corrupt men will rise to power. It both limits and then fragments government authority. The Constitution sets restrictions on what the government is permitted to do. Then, as a further precaution, it divides power between three branches and makes a system of checks and balances so that ambitious and corrupt men who rise to offices will have only limited means to act.

Rhetoric stirs emotions that erupt like storm waves crashing against the cliffs. Isaiah described how mankind now behaves: Woe to the multitude of many people, who make a noise like the noise of the seas, and to the rushing of nations, that make a rushing like the rushing of mighty waters. The nations shall rush like the rushing of many waters, but God shall rebuke them (Isaiah 6:13 RE). This was the image that Christ used: Upon the earth, distress of nations with perplexity, like the sea and the waves roaring (Luke 12:17 RE).

Much of the toxic pollution spreading despair and anger is through social media. Our computers and smartphones are filled with the fog of lies. People who are lonely and isolated post pictures with false captions to inspire envy and respect. Others believe these false images and become unhappy with their own circumstances.

Lies are now political capital for all parties. Democracies vote liars into office, and once elected, leaders keep their supporters committed by lying to them yet more. Dictators lie to their citizens to manipulate and control them. Churches and businesses are being swept into the polarizing political fights that demand you either accept their political viewpoint or suffer boycotts, condemnation, or false accusations.

Loud-but-small minorities use social media to exert a wholly disproportionate influence over society and over government. Churches foolishly fear offending in this partisan climate and surrender to the intolerant demands of destructive agents.

Churches do not preach repentance for fear of offending. A person is more likely to receive praise for denouncing the Bible than for denouncing sin. The Bible was once the primary text used in public education in the United States. It was once common sense to do unto others as you would have them do unto you (see 3 Nephi 6:8 RE).

The fog of lies and the foolishness of society should not make you despair. Instead, now is the time for us to hope for a better world. It should make us want to help establish a better society.

Guard your children. Let them know that the primary content of social media, news (and even in education) are falsehoods. You are responsible to teach your children.

Fleeing Babylon will require us to part ways with her. Our departure will require that Babylon be paid. We will have to render [unto] Caesar the things [that] are Caesar's (Mark 5:41 RE) before Babylon will permit us to depart in peace.

Honoring, obeying, and sustaining the law require that land used for a Zion community must be acquired through legal purchase. People cannot just take what they want. Property needs to be acquired in the way the law will respect—and no one can challenge our right to occupy and use.

For Zion, land must be redeemed in the way the Lord has instructed:

Let all the churches gather together all their moneys. Let these things be done in their time, lo, not in haste, and observe to have all things prepared before you. And let honorable men be appointed, even wise men, and send them to purchase the lands. And every church in the eastern countries, when they are built up, if they will hearken unto this counsel they may buy lands and gather together upon them, and in this way they may establish Zion. There is even now already in store sufficient, yea, even abundance, to redeem Zion and establish her waste places, no more to be thrown down... (T&C 101:16)

That direction was given in 1833. The men of that generation failed. Today, women are gathering the money for this purpose. I have more confidence in today's women than yesterday's men.

There is land given to us by covenant, but no one is any more justified in taking that land without purchase than was Abraham. Abraham received a promised land by covenant from God, yet he still had to purchase it from the owners before taking possession. The account of him purchasing a burial site for himself and Sarah is in the Old Covenants, Genesis chapter 8, paragraphs 9-10 and 20. I'm not gonna read those, but they'll be in the transcript [paper] of the talk, as if I read it.

Like Abraham, we are commanded that we must purchase the land on which Zion will be built:

Behold, the land of Zion; I, the Lord, hold it in my own hands. Nevertheless, I, the Lord, render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's. Wherefore, I, the Lord, will that you should purchase the lands, that you may have advantage of the world, that you may have claim on the world, that they may not be stirred up unto anger. For Satan puts it into their hearts to anger against you and to the shedding of blood. Wherefore, the land of Zion shall not be obtained but by purchase or by blood; otherwise, there is no inheritance for you. And if by purchase, behold, you are blessed, and if by blood, as you are forbidden to shed blood, lo, your enemies are upon you and you shall be scourged from city to city, and from synagogue to synagogue, and but few shall stand to receive an inheritance. (T&C 50:7)

Whenever there are people who are God's, the Lord instructs them to build a temple. One day soon, there will be a command to do so. When the command comes, it will need to be accomplished in an orderly way required by society.

Some have questioned why a temple should be considered when there are so many unmet needs. The answer is that the Lord expects it, the prophecies require it, and we cannot avoid building it if we are obedient.

There's so much more we need to know and do before we will see Zion. This creation was ordained through natural laws known and understood by God. He will establish Zion through natural means. Barren places, depleted of micronutrients and microorganisms, will blossom as a rose through the work of competent husbandmen. In the beginning, Adam and Eve were given the responsible to dress it and to keep it (Abraham 7:10 RE). To return the earth back to Eden, we will be required to likewise dress it and to keep it.

It will be through natural means that we will realize the promises made by covenant with us: I will raise you up and protect you, abide with you, and gather you in due time, and this shall be a land of promise to you as your inheritance from me (T&C 158:13-14).

We are promised the earth will yield its increase, and you will flourish upon the mountains and upon the hills, but that will not be accomplished without us acting the part of the husbandman. There will be a great work required to renew the fertility of the earth. But we can, with God's direction and blessing, accomplish that work, that you may stand independent above all other creatures beneath the Celestial world, that you may come up unto the crown prepared for you (T&C 70:4).

The Doctrine of Christ is simple. It has a negative and a positive declaration. First, the negative declaration: This is not my doctrine, to stir up the hearts of men with anger, one against another, but this is my doctrine, that such things should be done away (3 Nephi 5:8 RE).

Second, the positive declaration:

And this is my doctrine, and it is the doctrine which the Father hath given unto me — and I bear record of the Father, and the Father beareth record of me, and the holy ghost beareth record of the Father and me — and I bear record that the Father commandeth all men everywhere to repent and believe in me. And whoso believeth in me, and is baptized, the same shall be saved, and they are they who shall inherit the kingdom of God. And whoso believeth not in me, and is not baptized, shall be damned. (Ibid, vs. 9)

This doctrine will save anyone who follows it. But it is a mistake to assume that Christ's gospel does not contain more. The fullness of the gospel of Christ is vast.

It includes this truth about God: I, Nephi, am forbidden that I should write the remainder of the things which I saw. Wherefore, the things which I have written sufficeth me, and I have not written but a small part of the things which I saw (1 Nephi 3:31 RE). That which was not written by Nephi is part of Christ's gospel. You have not yet received them, but that does not change it from being part of Christ's gospel.

Moroni wrote the prophecies of Ether and recorded: I was about to write more, but I'm forbidden; but great and marvelous were the prophecies of Ether (Ether 6:4 RE, emphasis added). Those prophecies of Ether are also part of Christ's gospel and are presently not restored.

The children of the Nephites were taught by Christ in a pillar of fire, and afterwards, these children bore testimony to their fathers:

It came to pass on the morrow that the multitude gathered themselves together, and they both saw and heard these children; yea, even babes did open their mouths and utter marvelous things. And the things which they did utter were forbidden, that [they] should not any man write them. (3 Nephi 12:2 RE)

Those marvelous things are part of Christ's gospel but are forbidden from public knowledge. It will require a similarly sacred space to restore this part of Christ's gospel.

As Christ ministered to the Nephites, He prayed to the Father. What He revealed to that audience was unspeakable, forbidden from our Scriptures.

He went again a little way off and prayed unto the Father, and tongue cannot speak the words which he prayed, neither can be written by man the words which he prayed. And the multitude did hear, and do bear record, and their hearts were open, and they did understand in their hearts the words which he prayed. Nevertheless, so great and marvelous were the words which he prayed that they cannot be written, neither can they be uttered by man. (3 Nephi 9:5 RE)

Those words are also part of Christ's gospel, and He has the right to teach them. But they are not part of the public revelation available to man.

When Moses asked for greater understanding of all God's works, he was told:

And the Lord...spoke unto Moses of the heavens, saying, These are many and they cannot be numbered unto man, but they are numbered unto me for they are mine. And as one earth shall pass away, and the heavens thereof, even so shall another come. And there is no end to my works, neither my words. (Genesis 1:7 RE)

The endless works and endless words of the Lord God are also part of Christ's gospel. It is foolish to assume even a small fraction have been recorded.

John testified concerning his own record of Christ: In addition to this account, many other things [which] were done by Jesus, which, if they were all written, that library would fill the entire cosmos (Testimony of St. John 12:22). All of the things done by Christ have not been written, yet they are still part of Christ's gospel.

Christ's statement of His doctrine is short, simple, and complete. But Christ's gospel has vastly more.

As I've said previously, you should hunger and search for understanding. This is all of Christ's doctrine. There is no more doctrine. But this is not all of Christ's teachings nor all His tenets; these are not all of Christ's precepts or His covenants. This is not all of Christ's commandments; this is not all of His principles, but it is all of His doctrine.

Christ posed this question to all of us through the Book of Mormon: Wherefore murmur ye because ye shall receive more of my word? (2 Nephi 12:9 RE).

He explained, Because that I have spoken one word, ye need not suppose that I cannot speak another, for my work is not yet finished, neither shall it be until the end of man, neither from that time henceforth and for ever (Ibid, vs. 10).

Many great and glorious things pertaining to the Kingdom of God are reserved for God's house.

In the Glossary of Gospel Terms, the "Mysteries of God" are explained in this way:

That knowledge which is hidden from the world and only made available through revelation to the faithful. Much of such knowledge may be learned but it is not to be taught. One will have to apply the process of learning the mysteries in one's life if he or she intends to learn the mysteries themselves. The scriptures tell us how to get the "mysteries of God." Learning these mysteries is the fullness of Christ's Gospel. There is a system by which men learn the mysteries of heaven and are saved. That system is set out in Alma 9:7: first, angels are sent to prepare men and women; second, they are allowed to behold the Lord's glory; then they converse with the Lord, at which point they are taught the things that have been prepared from the foundation of the earth for their salvation. All this is driven by the man or woman's faith, repentance, and holy works. Joseph Smith said, I advise all to go on to perfection and search deeper and deeper into the mysteries of godliness.... [As for myself] it has always been my province to dig up hidden mysteries, new things, for my hearers. This is the Book of Mormon theme. Search deeper, and find God. Ask that you may know the mysteries of God. That is a commandment. Although given to Oliver Cowdery, it is a principle that is applicable to all of mankind (see T&C 3:3). The claim that one should stay away from the mysteries of God is false. Refusing to follow the command to ask that you may know the mysteries of God (JSH 13:23) denies the power of godliness and opposes the doctrine of salvation. It is anti-Christ. "We make our own mysteries; we are not meant to be kept in darkness, and the mysteries of heaven will be unfolded to us as [soon as] we make an effort to understand them." Christ said that the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven are understood only by those who have been initiated and given that understanding (see Matthew 7:2). Mysteries can also be defined as solemn ceremonial ordinances or rituals which take place in a special setting. "Mysteries (from the Greek, mystērion, μυστήριον)...[are] confided only to the initiated and not to be communicated by them to ordinary mortals.

This is the real reason why God requires that a temple be built. A temple ordained by God, built by His command and according to His pattern, will be a repository for teachings, precepts, commandments, tenets, and covenants that are not public but are all part of Christ's gospel.

Like true temples built in the past, there will be places for general assembly where everyone will be invited to come and worship. There will be other places for fewer people to assemble where not everyone will be extended an open invitation to come. There will also be some places forbidden to the public where God alone determines who will enter.

There will be no temple recommend to enter the innermost courts of God's house. No one will be required to pay to enter. The only requirement will be God's approval, through revelation, to identify those He will invite. I assume that as soon as any soul is prepared to receive what God freely offers, God will extend His invitation.

The house of God is a place of learning. It is a house of prayer, a house of fasting, a house of faith, a house of learning, a house of glory, a house of order, a house of God (T&C 123:3). God will determine how His house will be ordered.

But the Doctrine of Christ is the foundation, and without it, understanding the mysteries of God is nothing. Paul says: And [although] I have the gift of prophecy and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and though I have all faith so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing (1 Corinthians 1:51 RE).

The Doctrine of Christ commands that whosoever believeth in Christ and is baptized, the same shall be saved, and they are they who shall inherit the kingdom of God. And whoso believeth not in Christ and is not baptized shall be damned. If followed, the Doctrine of Christ leads to that illumination of mind and spirit called fire and the Holy Ghost. It can purge and cleanse, enlighten and instruct. It can make you one with God the Father and Christ, His Son:

I say unto you that this is my doctrine, and I bear record of it from the Father. And whoso believeth in me believeth in the Father also, and unto him will the Father bear record of me, for he will visit him with fire and with the holy ghost. And thus will the Father bear record of me, and the holy ghost will bear record unto him of the Father and me, for the Father and I and the holy ghost are one. And again I say unto you, ye must repent, and become as a little child, and be baptized in my name, or ye can in nowise receive these things. (3 Nephi 5:9 RE)

We must obey the Doctrine of Christ to qualify to build His house. Scripture confirms that not every one who would want to build a house of God is allowed by God to do so.

King David gathered everything required to build the temple of God but was forbidden from accomplishing it because he had been too violent a man to be permitted:

David said to Solomon, My son, as for me, it was in my mind to build a house unto the name of the Lord my God; but the word of the Lord came to me, saying, You have shed blood abundantly, and have made great wars. You shall not build a house unto my name because you have shed much blood upon the earth in my sight. (1 Chronicles 10:15 RE)

To qualify to build an acceptable house to God requires that His instructions and commands be followed. Therefore, any land for that purpose must be acquired by lawful purchase.

I know of no way to flee Babylon other than to pay her what she values. She values money above all else. Babylon believes you can buy anything in this world with money. It is by giving to Babylon what she values that we prove our heart is not set upon her. Hearts set upon Babylon mourn parting with her money. We should willingly give her her due, and redeem the land to build Zion.

There is a lot of opposition to even the preparatory work. There are many false spirits distracting and hindering the efforts. Accusers and opponents rail against this effort. They're like the ancient dissidents who complained:

And the whole multitude of the children of Israel murmured against Moses and Aaron in the wilderness. And the children of Israel said unto them, Would to God we had died by the hand of the Lord in the land of Egypt, when we sat by the flesh pots and when we did eat bread to the full; for you have brought us forth into this wilderness to kill the whole assembly with hunger. (Exodus 10:2 RE)

If the invitation to build a house of God by a kindly Lord is not attractive to you, then don't contribute. Do not give this work a second thought. But when the time comes, do not gather together with those who are delighted to answer the invitation to prepare... [long pause]

...because that preparation for the Lord's return in glory must take place.

In the wisdom of the Lord, unfair and harsh condemnation of this work is permitted to expose for our view those who will always be disruptive to a community. They need to be identified so they are not gathered. Accusations, condemnation, and lies are welcomed at present. They not only tell us who acts the part of Satan but also capture those who are easily taken by the adversary. Accomplishing what the Lord invites people to do is hard enough with the humble and meek. It becomes impossible when the hard-hearted are whispering accusations and insults (as Wormtongue), hindering the work.

Those who oppose the effort often do so while quoting Scripture as if they occupy a higher ground. If they do occupy a higher ground with better understanding, then they ought to leave, establish their model of a city on a hill, so we can all learn from their example. They do not undertake such an effort because they know they only quote Scripture to condemn, judge, and dismiss—never to govern their own accomplishments. They're darkened in their minds and in their hearts, and therefore, like everyone's common enemy, they use Scripture as a weapon to cut, criticize, and condemn. They are Satan, an accuser of the brethren. As we've been warned, that spirit should be cast away from our conversations, our meetings, our gatherings.

There is an example in the Old Covenants of a lying spirit permitted to influence Israel as testified of by Micaiah:

He said, Hear therefore the word of the Lord. I saw the Lord sitting on his throne, and all the hosts of heaven standing by him on his right hand and on his left.

If you read The Second Comforter, you know what's going on in a vision like that of the heavens.

And the Lord said, Who shall persuade Ahab, that he may go up, and fall, at Ramoth-Gilead? And one said on this manner, and another said on that manner. And there came forth a spirit and stood before the Lord, and said, I will persuade him. And the Lord said unto him, With what? And he said, I will go forth, and I will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. And he said, You shall persuade him, and prevail also; go forth and do so. Now therefore behold, the Lord [hath] put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these your prophets, and the Lord has spoken evil concerning you. (1 Kings 5:7-8 RE)

This is Micaiah telling the king what's going on, that all the prophets that are telling him, "Go, go. Go do it. It's gonna turn out just fine" are being misled by a lying spirit. The king rejected Micaiah's prophecy, followed the lies told him by the deceived prophets, and was slain in battle.

Lying spirits are not confined to events and times of the Old and New Covenants. They are active any time the work of God is underway.

We are promised that eventually we will have revealed the contents of a sealed book:

The book shall be sealed, and in the book shall be a revelation from God, from the beginning of the world to the ending thereof. Wherefore, because of the things which are sealed up, the things which are sealed shall not be delivered in the day of the wickedness and abominations of the people; wherefore, the book shall be kept from them. But the book shall be delivered unto a man, ...he shall deliver the words of the book, which are the words of those [that] have slumbered in the dust, ...he shall deliver these words unto another. But the words which are sealed he shall not deliver, neither shall he deliver the book, for the book shall be sealed by the power of God, and the revelation which was sealed shall be kept in the book until the own due time of the Lord, that they may come forth; for behold, they reveal all things from the foundation of the world unto the end thereof. (2 Nephi 11:19 RE)

This promise has been used repeatedly to impose lies on believers. False spirits led Christopher Nemelka to claim he had the sealed plates. Then later, another deceived party produced the Mentinah Archives. And now, Mauricio Berger has claimed that he can provide the promised text.

Here is what the sealed record will reveal:

And it came to pass that the Lord said unto the brother of Jared, Behold, thou shalt not suffer these things which ye have seen and heard to go forth unto the world until the time cometh that I shall glorify my name in the flesh. Wherefore, ye shall treasure up the things which ye have seen and heard, and shew it to no man. And behold, when ye shall come unto me, ye shall write them and shall seal them up that no one can interpret them, for ye shall write them in a language that they cannot...read. And behold, these two stones [which] I give unto thee, and ye shall seal them up also with the things which ye...write. For behold, the language which ye shall write I have confounded. Wherefore, I will cause, in mine own due time, that these stones [which] shall magnify to the eyes of men these things which ye shall write. And when the Lord had said these words, he shewed unto the brother of Jared all the inhabitants of the earth which had been, and also...that would be. And the Lord withheld them not from his sight, even unto the ends of the earth. For the Lord had said unto him in times before that if he would believe in him, that he could shew unto him all things, it should be shewn unto him. Therefore, the Lord could not withhold anything from him, for he knew that the Lord could shew him all things. (Ether 1:15 RE, emphasis added)

That's what it's gonna contain. Here is when they will be revealed:

They shall not go forth unto the gentiles until the day that they shall repent of their iniquity and become clean before the Lord. And in that day that they shall exercise faith in me, saith the Lord, even as the brother of Jared did, that they may become sanctified in me, then will I manifest unto them the things which the brother of Jared saw, even to the unfolding unto them all my revelations, saith Jesus Christ, the Son of God the Father of the heavens, and of...earth, and all things that in them are. (Ibid, vs. 17, emphasis added)

So, ask yourself:

- Do the Gentiles now qualify?
- Have they met this standard?
- Have the Gentiles repented of their iniquity and become clean before the Lord?
- Do the Gentiles now exercise faith in the Lord even as the brother of Jared did?
- Have the Gentiles now become sanctified in Christ? or
- Do the foolish Gentiles still fall victim to lying spirits that interfere with and compromise the work of preparing to establish Zion?

Economic realities and legal obligations must be dealt with. The path to Zion does not go through consecration. Consecration comes after there is a Zion. Even Father Abraham did not live the law of consecration. He was sanctified and qualified to receive all the blessings of the Fathers and now sits on a throne, but he paid tithes to Melchizedek.

When Joseph Smith restored Enoch's record (now found in Genesis), Joseph learned about the last days' Zion. It revealed, And the Lord called his people Zion because they were of one heart, and...one mind, and [dwelt] in righteousness, and there [was] no poor among them (Genesis 4:14 RE).

I do not believe this was their ancient goal, but it was a byproduct. Such a society cannot be organized but can be gathered. Individuals rarely are able to persuade one another through arguing to expose the other man's error.

Even among people who keep their eyes on the Lord and pay no heed to their neighbor's failure still must grow to become:

- People who refuse to judge and belittle others;
- Those who are humbled by the opportunity to build a house of God;
- Those who refuse to become an accuser.

Even among humble people the Lord can use to restore His house, there will be many things on which to disagree. Therefore, we should ask ourselves:

- What if I don't need to always be right?
- What if you don't need to be wrong?
- What if we don't need to debate?
- Can people with different backgrounds be of one heart?
- Can we have different ideas, value one another, and be of one mind?
- Is it possible to disagree with one another about meanings of Scriptures and still dwell in righteousness?
- Can we explore, consider, and respectfully discuss incomplete or inaccurate ideas?
- What if no poor among us includes sharing the wealth of diverse and interesting ideas?

This path of sober, thoughtful, open welcoming of differences is the only way first steps can be taken. We cannot jump into Zion. We must crawl there on bended knee, asking the Lord to bring us there. He's given us a blueprint in the Answer and Covenant. His word to us is:

You think Satan will be bound a thousand years, and it will be so, but you do not understand your own duty to bind that spirit within you so that you give no heed to accuse others. It is not enough to say you love God; you must also love your fellow man. Nor is it enough to say you love your fellow man while you, as Satan, divide, contend, and dispute against any person who labors on an errand seeking to do my will. How you proceed must be as noble as the cause you seek. You have become your own adversaries, and you cannot be Satan and also be mine. Repent, therefore, like Peter and end your unkind and untrue accusations against one another, and make peace. How shall there ever come a thousand years of peace if the people who are mine do not love one another?...

I speak of you who have hindered my work, that claim to see plainly the beams in others' eyes. You have claimed to see plainly the error of those who have abused my words, and neglect the poor, and who have cast you out — to discern their errors, and you say you seek a better way. Yet among you are those who continue to scheme, backbite, contend, accuse, and forsake my words to do them, even while you seek to recover them. Can you not see that your works fall short of the beliefs you profess?...

Be of one heart, and regard one another with charity. Measure your words before giving voice to them, and consider the hearts of others. Although a man may err in understanding concerning many things, yet he can view his brother with charity and come unto me, and through me he can with patience overcome the world. I can bring him to understanding and knowledge. Therefore, if you regard one another with charity, then your brother's error in understanding will not divide you. (T&C 157:10,18,53, emphasis added)

Joseph Smith inquired about consecration, and he received an answer. But the answer did not produce a community dwelling in righteousness, of one heart, one mind, with no poor among them. They failed, and all subsequent attempts have likewise failed to produce Zion.

The early attempts at consecration ended, and the Lord rescinded the law of consecration. In a council meeting on March 6, 1840 in Montrose, Iowa Territory, Joseph Smith announced to the Church, the Lord rescinded the law of consecration:

He said that the Law of consecration could not be kept here, & that it was the will of the Lord that we should desist from trying to keep it, & if persisted...it would produce a perfect abortion, & that he assumed the whole responsibility of not keeping it until proposed by himself. (JS Papers, Documents Vol. 7, p. 215)

It had to end because consecration is never the starting point. Consecration is the result of a society's evolution. And no society is prepared at present to evolve quickly into that state of harmony. It is inevitable when people live in righteousness. But, even then, it is distant and will follow time, experience, careful and solemn thoughts, and love unfeigned.

The Lord has explained this principle: Nevertheless, in your temporal things you shall be equal in all things, and this not grudgingly; otherwise, the abundance of the manifestations of the spirit shall be withheld (T&C 61:4). This important principle is to be followed by those who gather. Between now and that day, there is a lot of preparation needed.

Like Abraham paying tithes, we can also rise up to be God's chosen people before living consecration. Consecration is a byproduct, never a goal. The fact that Abraham paid tithes and did not live consecration should make clear that there is a long way to go before consecration will be attempted. Having all things in common should be understood as the byproduct of a different culture. We cannot live it and should not attempt it until we are in a different culture. Those who raise up to restore the Order of Heaven will find that they have enough concern for their fellow-citizens to have no poor among them.

Because tithing funds are used to help one another, no one gains power through tithes. The well-off lose power, and the poor benefit. As it is put in one revelation, the poor shall be exalted, in that the rich are made low, for the earth is full and there is enough...to spare (T&C 105:5).

When tithes support ministers, wealth accumulates, and the condition foretold by Mormon happens: Leaders of churches and teachers, in the pride of their hearts, even to the envying of them who belong to their churches (Mormon 4:4 RE). This is happening in all of Christian and Restoration churches, faiths, and systems. Because we have no structure that allows this to happen, it cannot take place among us. This brings me to the conflict between order and variety.

The idea of order suggests ideas and some words that come to mind when we think of order:

- uniformity,
- disciplined,
- standardization,
- coercion,
- authority,
- subordination,
- force,
- regimentation,
- restraint, and
- equality.

All these ideas can be negative, particularly when they suppress the souls of men and inhibit independent connection to God even if some can be positive. Yet we do need order, and without it, we descend into conflict. The idea of order is important, but it must come from within the hearts and minds of an ordered people.

Externally imposed order will crush the souls of men. The Holy Order to be restored is after the Order of the Son of God—meaning that it will be based upon service to others, meekness and humility toward God, and intelligence based on the light of truth.

Many corrupt societies impose order. But those societies who use external means to achieve order are the most repressive and abusive on earth.

Freedom and individuality produces great variety. Variety suggests ideas, and some words come to mind when we think of variety, including:

- creativity,
- variation,
- divergence,
- inventiveness,
- originality,
- separate,
- inequality,
- dissimilar, and
- conflict.

In many ways, some of these ideas can also be equally negative. Variety can conflict with order. But the souls of men crave variety, and nature testifies that variety is part of the glory of God. God promotes variety. Zion will have to allow the freedom for individuals to bring their unique gifts and develop the beauty within their souls.

The necessity for order and the freedom to have variety can produce endless conflict, but both are required for Zion.

There's a great work that at this moment is still undone, a project that remains for a faithful people. It will require revelation from heaven to be able to accomplish, and therefore, it will require people willing to receive new revelation.

Although we may understand some few things about the Lord's plans, what we know at present is relatively small in comparison with the fullness of the revelations yet to be restored.

Incomplete understanding has never prevented mankind from obeying God. From the beginning, righteous men and women have pleased God by doing what He asks of them even though they did not yet comprehend the reasons behind the commandment:

And after many days, an angel of the Lord appeared unto Adam, [asking], Why do you offer sacrifices unto the Lord? And Adam said unto him, I know not but the Lord commanded me. ...the angel [spake], saying, This thing is a similitude of the sacrifice of the Only Begotten of the Father who is full of grace and truth. Wherefore, you shall do all that you do in the name of the Son. ...you shall repent...call upon...the name of the Son for ever more. And in that day the holy ghost fell upon Adam, which [bears] record of the Father and the Son... (Genesis 3:3-4 RE)

Ignorant obedience (perhaps decades or centuries) in the absence of the Holy Ghost falling upon him was the prelude that led Adam to receiving the gift. Even those taught by Christ could not understand His message. The accounts of Christ's life in the four Gospel books mention frequently that His followers did not understand what He told them. Here's one example:

Then he took the twelve and said unto them, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and all things which are written by the prophets concerning the Son of Man shall be accomplished, for he shall be delivered unto the gentiles, ...shall be mocked, and spitefully treated, and spit on; and they shall scourge and put him to death, and the third day he shall rise again. And they understood none of these things, and this saying was hidden from them, neither remembered they the things which were spoken. (Luke 11:1 RE)

Adam was the first Patriarch over humanity and stands at the head of his posterity, governing in the Family of God beneath only Christ and God the Father. Yet, when he lived and obeyed God, there were commandments he was given that he did not understand. He was puzzled, but he obeyed.

Christ called twelve disciples and kept them as His closest pupils during His ministry. Yet despite walking continually with Him, there were things He taught them they could not understand. Righteous men and women have followed and pleased God despite their ignorance.

What is more important? To be a person of great understanding or a person of diligent obedience?

Building Zion is daunting. Take a moment and ask yourself what it would take to build a functioning community. Any community for any people will require a lot of the same things to be addressed. For example: housing, streets, water supply, waste disposal, and some form of energy. No matter how rudimentary an infrastructure a community may have, there must always be one.

Without a clean water supply, people get sick or die. But a water source for a community does not mean they have clean, potable water that can be consumed. Clean water requires filtering or processing to remove contaminants and unwanted organisms.

If one person drills a well and recovers clean ground water for his residence, that does not mean there is a water supply for a community. If every resident requires their own well, then the costs for a water supply will multiply far beyond the cost for a community water supply that shares costs among many residents. Communities almost always pool resources to develop a city water system.

Wastewater needs to be handled in a sanitary way to prevent outbreaks of diphtheria, cholera, and typhoid. One solution for a sanitary wastewater system is for an individual residence to have a septic tank. In a community that lacks a sewer system, septic tanks are required for every building that has a bathroom. But that increases costs for each house far above the cost required to build a shared sanitary wastewater system. This is why communities almost always pool resources to develop a city-wide wastewater system.

Roads are also generally maintained by a community in which shared resources allow the cost of a road system to be borne by all members of the community.

A community's energy needs are not always met by gas or electric power. There was a time when many houses were heated by coal or wood. Although rare now, these sources can still heat homes and provide heat to cook.

A community that is not planned and carefully developed can quickly become unlivable, unhealthy, and unsustainable. Planning and thus implementing the plan should not involve haste and hurry.

It seems to be common sense that if a community is to include people with widely varying resources and abilities, the first steps should be taken by those with both the resources and the ability to accomplish the first preparation to benefit others who will come later.

If that's common sense, then it is not discrimination or unfair for those with the means and inclination to sacrifice their resources to be the first who labor to make a land ready for others who will be invited later. Staging in an orderly way is the only method any community is or can be built. It is the only practical way to carefully build what must be built.

And now behold, this is the will of the Lord your God concerning his saints — that they should assemble themselves together unto the land of Zion, not in haste, lest there should be confusion, which brings pestilence (T&C 50:6). If land is not prepared beforehand, confusion and pestilence go hand in hand. Cholera, diphtheria, and typhoid all can and have returned today in this nation.

Forbes Magazine reported:

Los Angeles has a growing problem with diseases borne by both flea and feces. An LAPD officer was just diagnosed with typhoid fever along with two more from the same workplace displaying symptoms. Meanwhile, cases of typhus, caused by a different bacterium, have soared in California from 13 in 2008 to 167 in 2018. In addition, there have been outbreaks of hepatitis A, tuberculosis, and staph in L.A. and other West Coast cities. (Chuck DeVore, Typhoid Fever, Typhus & Tuberculosis: Are L.S.'s Medieval Diseases Coming to Your City? June 4, 2019)

We need to be wiser than the society in which we presently live. We can build a new society that will eventually have people who are at peace with one another, living in righteousness, and having all things in common, but that is still years ahead.

As mentioned earlier, the Lord has taught this principle: Nevertheless, in your temporal things you shall be equal in all things, and this not grudgingly; otherwise, the abundance of the manifestations of the spirit shall be withheld (T&C 61:4). This begins with preparing a place for gathering. And there will be required:

- a water supply;
- a wastewater system;
- roads;
- some form of energy;
- a temple for meetings, instruction, and conferences.

These things are necessary to come first and will make water commonly and equally available, hygiene commonly and equally available, movement through open roads and trails commonly and equally available, and access to heat and light commonly and equally available.

We take much of these things for granted, but these things currently tie us to Babylon. There are great calamities soon to befall the world. God's people are to escape the tribulation which shall descend upon you, that you may stand independent above all other creatures beneath the Celestial world (T&C 70:4) by the work they have accomplished beforehand. God will instruct, but we must do the work.

There will be many skills needed. Blacksmiths, carpenters, farmers, ranchers, electricians, plumbers, roofers, and every practical skill will be needed. Many skills are lost to urban dwellers. We need to recover those lost skills.

The route to equality is forged through united effort to accomplish the instructions we are given. Unity will lead to equality.

Anyone uninterested in helping prepare a community of equals will naturally and inevitably not have prepared a place for them to gather. As Amulek put it, Ye cannot say when ye are brought to that awful crisis that I will repent, [and] that I will return to my God (Alma 16:37 RE) because it'll then be too late. So, we have work to do, and it will need to be done in an orderly way.

I know of no people who are trying to bring Zion today. There have been and are utopians who band together to share resources. Utopian societies are usually missing a religious foundation. Their groups, more often than not, result in aberrant sexual sin, drug use, and disobedient conduct offensive to God. However hopeful a beginning these communities may have, wickedness cannot be peaceful for long.

We are asked to prepare so we can begin to found Zion. But preparing or even beginning is not the same thing as accomplishing. Whether anything can or will be accomplished must be proven. It cannot just be claimed. Braggarts do not impress heaven and have no claim to any title or status they have not first lived.

The Lord is offering an opportunity. He's promised to labor alongside to help us reach the prophesied Zion. With His help, Zion is possible. But we can fail—and Zion be left for another people in another time.

The greatest false spirit of all is the one that inspires you to accuse your brethren, condemn your sisters, and judge others unfairly. This is Satan. We cannot be Satan and also be the Lord's.

I believe we will see Zion established. Sadly, I do not think all can be gathered. Those who find fault now will surely find fault when people start to sacrifice and hard work is expected. It makes little sense to assemble the discontent, angry, and bitter souls into a community seeking to find peace. Zion shall be the only people that shall not be at war one with another (T&C 31:15). That promise of the Lord's cannot be fulfilled by people fighting a war of words and [a] tumult of opinions (Joseph Smith History 2:3 RE). It was such fighting about religious differences that inspired Joseph Smith to ask God for answers. His inquiry led to the Restoration. But Joseph's Restoration has now lapsed into infighting and dividing into separate sects. Our modest return to restoring is not yet free from a tumult of conflicting opinions.

Preparing people to welcome God remains the Restoration's great objective. That will require all of us to humble ourselves before God and eagerly respond to the opportunity He offers us. Prayerfully choose a needed skill and learn it. Spinning thread, weaving fabric, producing paper, making cheese, drying fruit and vegetables, beekeeping, and egg production are all useful for an isolated community, particularly if the larger, more complex society falls into disarray and is unable to provide goods and services.

We have a daunting challenge before us. It will require minds, hearts, hands, and backs to accomplish it. Preparation needs to begin now. It will be followed by an orderly gathering, not in haste but with guidance from above.

I close these remarks in the name of Jesus Christ.

2020.03.22 Youth General Conference Q&A Session

March 22, 2020

Hurricane, Utah

Denver: There were some questions that got submitted beforehand, and there are also questions coming in live. I'll take one that was submitted beforehand.

"Why are there no female writers in the Scriptures? Why are there no accounts of women receiving their Second Comforters? Thank you for the opportunity to ask questions."

Well, number one, we don't always know who wrote down the Scriptures. We don't know who the scribes were. In fact, it's likely, in particular in the Book of Judges, that some of the accounts are clearly reliant upon women to provide the information. And in the Book of Luke, the only source that could have provided information about the private contact between Mary and the angel—that is the source that Luke relied upon for his account—would have been Mary. And so, did Luke have access to an account written by Mary? Did Luke interview her? There's a lot we don't know about the generation of Scripture and who the scribes were. So, the question assumes something about which we don't have enough information to say Scriptures aren't the product of a woman's effort or a woman's writing.

Okay, so—

Stephanie: Okay, I'm on the— I'm looking through some of these, so I'll be looking down. We're going to divide some of them up, and some of them just won't get answered, 'cause that's the way the world works. So— And some of them will be addressed not necessarily answering questions, but just getting some insight about some other things.

So, the first one talks about families—parents, families...being dedicated to the LDS Church and think they're apostates...not arguing, but you can't talk spiritual things and, you know, can we get our families back? And then it follows up with an actual question that I'm not going to answer.

But what I am going to talk about is if the Book of Mormon, Joseph Smith, the Sermon on the Mount, the Sermon at Bountiful, Gospel principles are not good enough for you to talk with your family members about, then you're focusing on the wrong things. Because if all you're talking with your family members about are the things that divide you, like which conference you go to or which leader you follow, then that onus is on you. So, I would suggest that instead of worrying about the things that you don't have in common, that you talk about the things that you do have in common.

I spend an enormous amount of time talking with people I know and love, who are on all spectrums of their traveling back to God, about Gospel principles because we have those in common. And that would be my suggestion—and that goes for your family members, for your friends, for the people you still go to church with, for the people that you used to go to church with.

The missionary effort you're engaged in just does not stop, didn't stop, and shouldn't stop when you decided to worship somewhere else or when somebody decided to make you worship somewhere else. Bring it back to what you know, bring it back to what you have in common, and stop thinking you're better than they are. 'Cause we're all working towards the same goal, we're just doing it in a real— We might be doing it in very different ways.

Denver: This reminds me of an incident that happened. Rob had his daughter, his youngest daughter, on the back of his motorcycle. I think I had Nathan on the back of mine. A group of us were on our way out to Sturgis, and we were south of Newcastle, Wyoming, at a gas station where we were getting some water to drink, and on our way there. And there's a fellow who was there sitting on the benches next to us outside, getting a little bit of rest from the ride. He was from Colorado, and he was a welder, 'kay? So, Rob's a construction contractor, I'm a lawyer, and this guy's a welder; and we're all at the same gas station at the same time on our way out to Sturgis. We have absolutely nothing in common except the motorcycles and the Harley rally out in Sturgis, South Dakota—and that was enough.

We had a great visit. He told us stories that were pretty funny. And I noted that he lacked some hygiene attention that I expect to be usual and customary, and he probably thought I was a bit dainty for a biker. But it didn't matter! We had one thing in common, and that was enough. And for those moments in that gas station in Wyoming, probably 15 years ago now, we were buddies. If you've got something in common, that's enough.

Stephanie: Was that when Jessie drank out of the water bottle?

Denver: Yes, and that was the guy whose water he drank! So, I'm not telling the rest of that story.

Stephanie: Yes, exactly! Yeah, do not pick up water bottles that you do not know who they belong to.

Denver: Yeah.

Stephanie: Okay, I got one here. An eleven year old who feels like the future is pointless... This breaks my heart. (Oh sorry, Reed—whoever—I just smacked the thing.) "I want to have dreams and goals, but everything is changing and unpredictable. How am I supposed to care, or what should I care about?"

So, we have kids. You know, I have older kids—not an eleven year old anymore, but kids who want to grow up and have kids. And I want to see my grandkids grow up! And you know, we had an earthquake in Salt Lake on, whatever, and it was super freaky!

And then, on top of Coronavirus, we're all sitting around going, "What the, what the, what is going on?!"

So, the day of the coming of the Lord is unknown. Scripturally, it is known only to our Creator. So, sitting around—and I don't mean to be flippant, especially to this beautiful eleven-year-old question—but sitting around, and worrying, and wondering is...it's not healthy. And it doesn't help. And so, the only thing I can say, because I can't answer to how much time is actually left—and neither can he [indicating Denver]—is "act as if." That's the thing I want you to remember: Act as if. Act as if you're going to go to school when you're not quarantined anymore, and then go to school. Act as if you're going to graduate from high school. Act as if you are going to go on to college, and get a degree, and get married, and have kids, because the likelihood of that happening for many of us is pretty high.

There is no answer about when things are going to end. You can pay attention to the signs, and you can look around and you can see things happening, but if you let that stop you from acting as if you're going to finish middle school, and then go to high school, and then go to college, and get married, and have kids, and have grandkids, then you're going to sit in a place of despair and frustration and pointlessness. And I do not recommend that. It is not a good place to be.

So, the other thing I would say to this particular question: Talk to the people you love. You don't have to sit with this being fearful and being afraid and being worried. And if you don't have people around you who are hopeful, then expand your circle a little bit and find some more people who are willing to be hopeful and encouraging, and help you see that every day you have is a gift from God. So, Act As If.

Denver: Hmmmm.

Stephanie: Do you want to do one?

Denver: Yeah. "For women who are alone, do you have any thoughts about having those with authority bless over the phone or the Internet?"

I don't have a problem with that. Peter didn't lay hands on anyone when he walked by and healed the person in the gate to the temple. I think you could. If you're at a remote location and there's no one there with authority, I think you could bless the Sacrament over the Internet. I think you can give a blessing over the Internet. I think you can do it having the voice alone, because the intent—

Christ did not go to the house. The Roman said, "I'm not worthy to have You enter in my house, and it wouldn't be kosher for You to come into my house. Just speak the word, and my daughter will be healed." And He spoke the word. And then, as he's returning from the conversation with Christ, news comes and greets him on the way that tells him that his daughter was healed. And he asked, "When did that happen?" And it was in the self-same hour as when he was visiting with the Lord (see Matthew 4:2 RE).

I don't see any reason why people of faith today can't operate on the same basis that we see in Scripture—Peter and the Lord, both.

Stephanie: He knew Him.

Denver: "How can you tell if you have truly forgiven someone?"

That was one that came in that I thought you ought to answer.

Stephanie: Oh. How do you tell if you've truly forgiven someone?

Denver: Yeah.

Stephanie: Didn't that— That corresponded with another one that we were talking about. Basically, you're not worried about it any more. I don't know, is that too simple? I figure—

Denver: You forget about it.

Stephanie: Yeah. I figure if you've forgiven someone, you— If you've actually forgiven someone— In the context of this question, if you have actually forgiven the person that you're thinking about in this question, you wouldn't be asking the question. So, I don't know, too simple?

Denver: Yeah. I can't remember one single thing my wife's ever done that's wrong.

Stephanie: Stop! That is just utter trash!

Denver: She remembers everything.

Stephanie: I do, I do. Do you want to tell them why? Tell them why.

Denver: No, I think it's okay. I'm not going to.

Stephanie: Oh, you're not going to tell them why I remember? Whatever.

Denver: Okay. "In the account of the transfiguration of Jesus and His second visit to the Nephites, the text makes comment about the whiteness of Jesus' raiment—in the later account, the whiteness of His disciples' raiment. Will you share with us an increased understanding about the explanation of a demonstration of Jesus' disciples having no sin—why it would be important to point to 'raiment?' Clearly, it's an illusion to being clean and victorious over sin..." and then, so on.

Anyway. Yeah, I can point you to something. There's a— You can find it as a recording, but it's much, much better as a transcript of the paper itself, called "Treasures in the Heavens," written by Hugh Nibley. If you hear it as a recording, you're just going to assume he's talking. If you read it as a transcript, you're going to realize that more than 45% of the words of the entire article are quotes from early, but obscure, Christian sources.

The "Treasures in the Heaven," among other things, is a white robe that was laid aside before you come to this earth, that is kept in safe-keeping under the throne of God—that is yours to lose, here, or to reclaim if you do what's required, and to have more added to it if you are true and faithful and you give diligence and heed.

And the article is actually, I think, relying upon obscure Christian sources because they were considered sacred, and they're not widely disseminated. They didn't make their way into Scripture. But you'll learn a lot about sacred clothing and ascension and purposes of a temple. "Treasures in the Heaven"—interesting article. You can get it on — I found it on the Internet just by searching, 'Hugh Nibley Treasures in the Heaven.'

Stephanie: Me, too.

Denver: Yeah.

Stephanie: Do you want to do another one, or do you want me to?

Denver: No, I've got to see what I'm looking at.

Stephanie: Alright. This one came in this morning. "Why doesn't God talk about science in Scriptures? I have learned about symbolic things in my chemistry, microbiology, and astronomy classes that denote there is a God, but I've always wondered why the laws of nature and scientific ideas are never discussed."

So, we're going to break this one up. First thing I would say is, I don't know, I tend to think that science is God. Now I know scientists don't think that, and they're looking for ways to disconnect science and God. But I happen to believe that if there was no God, there would be no science, and they wouldn't have jobs. And so, to me, there is no separate— There is literally no separation. So, the fact that this person is finding God in microbiology and chemistry and astronomy is no surprise.

The second thing I would say is I am finding science in human growth and development. I am finding sci— Did I say "science" or "God"?

Denver: You said science, but you meant God.

Stephanie: Oh, no, I'm not finding science. Well, I might be finding that too, but that's not what I meant. I am finding God in human growth and development. I am finding God in counseling theories and practices. I am finding God in substance abuse principles. I am finding God in every textbook I am currently engaged in. So, I would say, much like Jeff said earlier, God is everywhere. And the fact that we should never limit our search for God, or even our presumption of finding Him, to Scripture—which is a wonderful place to find Him—but if I can find Him in substance abuse practices and principles, you can certainly find him in astronomy and microbiology. And then you—

Denver: Yeah. But all things bear testimony of Christ—all things. Whether they are on the earth or under the earth or in the earth or above the earth, all things bear testimony of Christ. The Scriptures say so. You think about the caterpillar that's a pest, that's something to wreck your garden, that goes into a cocoon—and then it comes out of the cocoon, and it's now something that helps fertilize and pollinate. And it leaves its grubby, earthly confines to become airborne and colorful, and a contributor to life and to your gardening. It's the same animal. And tell me that isn't a testimony of Christ. All things bear testimony of Him, and science simply ratifies that.

Stephanie: Do you want to do that one?

Denver: "'Thou shalt not kill; he that killeth shall die' (see T&C 26:6 RE). Are we required to be pacifists?"

No. I mean, the Book of Mormon— How many war chapters are there in the Book of Mormon? I mean, it's a guide to the method by which violence is to be accomplished. You protect the innocent. You use violence to defend families and children and to prevent offenses and abuses, but you don't use it to abuse. And if the person that is the threat, as they do in the Book of Mormon, agrees to lay down arms and no longer be a threat, then there's no reason to continue onward. You meet with force that which is destructive, only at the level required to—according to the Book of Mormon—to deal with the threat. And upon the threat having been dealt with, then you stop.

Clark Aposhian—who is the big gun-rights advocate, and teaches the self-defense, and gets everyone their concealed weapon as a consultant for the Utah legislature—says that you fire your first warning shot into the torso of the person, and you continue to do so until he's "utterly neutralized." And you leave no witnesses other than yourself about what happened there—at least when he taught me the concealed carry permit. But that seems a little non-Book of Mormon-ish.

Stephanie: Okay. All right, this one, "Will you—" This is for you. "Will you explain the difference between the 'Kingdom of God' and the 'Government of God'? And what does it look like to get into the Kingdom?"

Denver: In one sense, they're synonymous, but the term— The usage of the term is a little different when you're talking about mortality. You can have the Kingdom of God any time God, as the King, is speaking. So, as soon as God is speaking and there are people that are giving heed to what the King is saying, they are subordinate to the King, and therefore, there is the Kingdom of God; it exists.

The 'Family of God' is really a Holy Order, requiring ordinances and things to take place. And in the afterlife, the 'Government of God' or the 'Kingdom of God' and the 'Family of God' are all synonymous. In this world, the Family of God doesn't get truly organized but on rare occasions, but the Kingdom of God has appeared a number of times. The Kingdom of God was with John, as Joseph put it, while John was crying repentance in the wilderness and people were coming out to him—there was the Kingdom of God (see Teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith, pg. 271). And the Kingdom of God was here when Joseph was talking because God was administering, in effect, what was taking place; and so, you had the Kingdom of God. The Family of God is another challenge, and it's a little more rare.

How about this one: "The Scripture Glossary says, 'Because the Father's power was what came through and because the Father had attained to the resurrection, it was impossible for the Father's plan to fail. The Father had already taken care of redeeming all the creations under His hand' (see T&C: A Glossary of Gospel Terms, "Surety, Christ As"). If a creation can be redeemed by the Father, through the power of the resurrection He has already attained, can you help me understand Christ's motivations for creating and coming to redeem this world, aside from personal growth?"

Joseph touches on this stuff in the King Follett discourse, in which he talks about Christ attaining to the exaltation, to the throne of the Father, so that the Father can go to yet another higher exaltation. Well, it is never possible for the works to fail, because the glory and the power of the Father was given to the Son so that this creation could be made through the power of the Son as the Creator—because He had to be the Creator in order to be the Redeemer. So, the Father's power through the Son creates this universe, and the Son, by His sacrifice, redeems this universe. But it could not fail, because if Christ were to fail, it was the power of the Father, and He had the power then to redeem.

It's always impossible for the works of the Father to fail, which is why when Christ is bearing testimony (He's teaching the Nephites), He's always saying, "The Father told me to say this to you. The Father told me to command you. The Father told me this is the doctrine. This is the doctrine my Father gave me. This is the doctrine; it's the only doctrine that will save." When He introduces Himself to the Nephites, He refers three times in one short paragraph—three times—by identifying who He is by reference to the Father: "I've suffered the will of the Father in all things. I've glorified the name of the Father. I've taken upon me the sins of the world in order to do the works of the Father" (see 3 Nephi 5:4 RE).

The Savior is an extension of the will of the Father. But fidelity and strict compliance with the works of the Father were done, in order that Christ may then sit on the throne of the Father, and the Father can move on to a higher exaltation—because that is the plan of salvation, and Christ represents the prototype of the saved man.

What we saw Him do on this world was the final step in the process of qualifying to attain to the resurrection, do what the Father did, and sit on the throne of the Father. That was the last step to be taken—we got a chance to witness it here. But the Father had done that before. And the Son will then, sitting on the throne of the Father, continue the works that He saw His Father do in others. And ultimately, the plan continues, worlds without end. But read the King Follett discourse, it will help you. (For one possible source, see www.byustudies.byu.edu/content/king-follett-discourse-newly-amalgamated-text.)

Stephanie: Okay, do you want me to do one?

Denver: Yeah, yeah, yeah. You can finish this. I'll just sit here.

Stephanie: Okay, then we're done.

Denver: No, do another one.

Stephanie: Okay. It says, "In your—" He would never answer this one. "In your opinion, is it better to pray for a soulmate, to pray for someone that would be a good mate, to try and date like-..." (these are one, two, and three) "...to try and date like-minded people, or to just live our lives as good as we can and see what happens, or five, something else?"

Denver: I'd say, five.

Stephanie: Five, something else?

Denver: What are you saying?

Stephanie: I say all of them, to some extent.

Denver: Dude. She had 1500 first dates!

Stephanie: No, I only had 500 first dates.

Denver: She had innumerable first dates! I was the only one who ever took her on a second date.

Stephanie: Totally, that is not even true.

Denver: 'Cause I'm a brave soul. So, you would say some of all of this?

Stephanie: I would say a little bit of all of this, okay? And I'm going to speak from the perspective of a mother, alright?

Yeah, life is a little more complicated than it used to be in terms of, I don't know, finding someone whose values you share. I know in our family, we've sort of transitioned. It's more important to find someone whose values you share than whose religion you share, okay? I'll go that far. And, it's... I think... (I had such good things in my head a minute ago. I think you distracted me.)

I don't personally believe in soulmates—although, he is definitely mine. I don't think we should settle for someone that's just a good mate, because I think God cares more about all of us than just— 'Good' just sounds so much like 'adequate,' you know? And we should be striving for more than adequate.

Certainly, hanging around and being with like-minded people is a good idea, but 'like-minded people' does not mean they either have to be this thing or part of this group or part of this group. You can find like-minded people in a lot of places that aren't part of your groups, if that makes any sense. You just have to be willing to sort of stretch yourself a little bit. And then you should always live your lives the best that you can, and see what happens.

God loves you more than you will ever—more than you can ever—comprehend. And He wants your happiness more than you can ever understand. And it's easy to think that when you're a parent, because my sort-of mantra is "He loves them better than I do." And if He loves them better than I do, then I know that if they are genuinely pursuing the best that they have, at any given moment, that He will bless them for that. And so, that is the advice I give to my kids who, you know, they're out looking for good mates, soulmates, like-minded people, and trying to live the best lives they can too. So, do a little bit of all of that, and have faith.

Denver: There's also that comment about 'some people are only kept from the truth because they know not where to find it' (see T&C 139:15 RE). If you share values, and you value truth and they value truth, eventually you can help them find truth.

Stephanie: Uh-huh, yeah. I'll go to this next one. It's a little bit— It's a little bit similar. It's less about finding a mate, but—

"I'm currently in college...have lots of friends that question my beliefs and ask many questions of me. Since I'm still trying to learn the contents of the Scriptures and be taught the truth, I feel like I don't know enough yet to be a teacher. Do you have any advice for how I can try to bring my friends closer to God at this point in my life? Should I even try, or should I wait until I feel like I have sufficiently learned enough to teach?"

A couple things— I mean, I always go back to the admonition to Hyrum, which is somewhere in the T&C (used to be in the D&C), where, you know, 'seek first to learn my words before you go out and try and teach them' (see Joseph Smith History 14:14 RE). That's always a good mindset to have. But if we all wait until we know enough, we'll all just be standing around with our thumbs in our ears—nobody ever going out on a limb to teach anybody anything. So—

Denver: I don't think the thumb goes in the ear. I think—

Stephanie: Yeah, well.

Denver: I think some other part of the anatomy.

Stephanie: Yeah, I know, but I chose the ear. I chose the ear. So, because I may think it, [whispering] I just don't say it.

Denver: You just don't say it?

Stephanie: [Whispering] I just don't say it.

So, I would say, again, do it all. Continually seek. I mean, I'm 50-some-odd years old, and I can't tell... I don't even think I read the Book of Mormon first through, completely through for the first time until I was in my thirties, okay? Which is not— I'm not bragging about that; I'm just saying you're never done learning. And there's never— There's always time to learn. So yes, please continue to read the Scriptures and learn the truth, and surround yourself with people who can teach you the truth. And then, when you have the opportunity with your friends to bring up subjects or have conversations about religious principles, Gospel principles, God, the universe, or anything like that, do so at your level.

The other thing that this question says: "Do you have any advice for how I can try to bring my friends closer to God at this point in my life?"

"Try to bring my friends closer to God," I think, is a wonderful question. "Try to make my friends believe what I believe" is not a good question, 'kay? We're not trying to make anybody believe what we believe. That sort of is not necessarily— That's not well received. Trying to bring people closer to God can, and will probably, be received by everybody.

So, my answer to this question is make sure you know what you're trying to get your friends to do, and just gauge it based on what you know right now. And be willing to have conversations about God, about Gospel principles, about the bigger, deeper meanings of what goes on in the universe. Those kinds of things will just bring people closer to God naturally. And it beats the heck out of BuzzFeed...and whatever other— Twitter? (I do know these things; I'm not acting like I don't.) But yeah, talk about Godly things, and that will just naturally bring people along.

Denver: There's also a lot of videos that have been put together that are out there and available, and are conversation starters. There's a first and a second seven-part video. They're short videos—you know, four to six minutes long—on the Protestant Reformation and the Restoration. And there's a third video series, the first one of which just got released on the Equinox, dealing with the continuation of the Restoration. There'll be a seven— There'll be a total of seven of those, as well (see www.learnofchrist.org).

And there are a lot of recordings—the Restoration Archives has a whole host of recordings that are either good to listen to, good to use as a basis for conversation, or something that you can ask your friends to look at (see www.restorationarchives.com).

Stephanie: Actually... And they're great; really, they are. And they're short, and they're easy to understand, and they're a good, general-Christian-belief-in-God way to learn things that aren't so entrenched in a specific religious movement or something.

Go ahead.

Denver: So here's one: "How do I know it's not just wishful thinking when I hear the Lord say, 'Your sins are forgiven?' How do I get past the distrust in my own ability to reach God and believe that He can reach me?"

Well, first of all, the adversary doesn't forgive sins. So, if you're hearing a voice that's forgiving you of sin, that's undoubtedly a benign, good source because the adversary's not interested in that. The problem that you've got is that then you decide not to cast it out of your memory, but you want to continue beating yourself over it. Lay it aside! Just forget it! If I— "I the Lord forgive whom I will forgive," and "He remembers it no more" (see T&C 45:9 RE). If the Lord's not going to bear it in His remembrance, why are you? Why do you want to contextualize yourself in that way? Why do you want to think of yourself in corrupt terms?

I'm thinking about all the great stories in literature where people in horrible circumstances managed to escape those circumstances, and go on to be good and virtuous and noble. And then you think about the Count of Monte Cristo who escaped, but never ever could get beyond his plot for revenge, his desire— I mean, he could and should have moved on in a wholesome way, and he moved on in a vengeful way. It's one of the great themes of problems in literature.

Move on; forget about it. The Lord remembers it no more; you ought not entertain it.

Stephanie: That one, then that one?

Denver: "Will animals play a role in Zion?" Well, yeah. Yes.

Stephanie: I'm taking my dogs.

I'll do this one. You can add Scripture to this if you want to.

So, "I've been told that pride is the worst sin, but this confuses me because murder takes away others' free agency, which I always thought is worse."

So, I have had ongoing ideas in my head for the last several years about just trying to make sense of things that I see or believe, and try to synthesize right and wrong down to, you know, six principles. It's not working, but whatever. And so, I'm going to say... I'm going to agree that pride is— I'm going to agree with this, that whoever's told you that pride is the worst sin, that currently is my understanding—my personal understanding. And I'm going with that because pride is the umbrella under which everything else falls.

I watch a lot of TV. It's kind of an escape; I like it. And pride is what leads to murdering someone. And pride is what leads to wanting political power. And pride is what leads to. So, I'm hanging onto the fact that pride is the worst sin, or the umbrella under which all other horrible sins fall. So, my challenge would be: Figure out how pride is working in your life. 'Cause I doubt you're murdering people, but I guarantee you, it is holding you back. So, that's my answer.

You have a scriptural answer to that? Or you just want to move on?

Denver: No, there's a whole bunch in the Psalms and in the Proverbs—mostly Proverbs—about that stuff.

So, here: "In T&C 31:6-8, the Lord told his disciples anciently of events that would take place when the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled...includes the following:

When the times of...gentiles is come in, a light shall break forth among them that sit in darkness...it shall be the fullness of [the] gospel, but they receive it not, for they perceive not the light and they turn their hearts from me because of the precepts of men.

And in that generation shall the times of the gentiles be fulfilled. And there shall be men standing in that generation that shall not pass until they see an overflowing scourge, for a desolating sickness shall cover the land. But my disciples shall stand in holy places and shall not be moved; but among the wicked, men shall lift up their voices, and curse God, and die.

"What does the Lord mean when He says, But my disciples shall stand in holy places and shall not be moved?"

He's talking about Zion. If— It's that same— This T&C 31:6-8, keep reading. When you get to verses 14 and 15 of that same thing, the only people that shall not take up arms will flee to Zion, and the terror of the Lord shall be there.

There's an incident that happens when Christ is arrested in Gethsemane, when they come with their swords, they come with their lanterns, and they come to take Him (see John 10:1 RE and Testimony of St. John 10:1). And He, after suffering what He'd suffered, stood up before them. And they're looking for Him, and He identifies Himself to them: "I am He." I mean, He's submitting. They're confronting the guy that they went to look and find; He's standing there in front of them, identifying Himself as the one. And they stumble, and they fall backward. I mean, if you take a step backward and there's another guard behind you, you're going to fall; and they fell down. It's one of those Monty Python moments.

But, why do they cower? Why is the presence of the Lord intimidating to those that had come armed to arrest him? It's because no matter what you may think, there is something palpable about righteousness. There is something tangible about the righteousness of God, the power of God, the presence of Holiness; and it is frightening. That incident that's described about judgment in Mormon, where the people are in this agony in the presence of a just and holy Being? The just and holy Being is doing nothing except being there for them to behold. But they feel by the contrast of a just and holy Being with themselves (see Mormon 4:6 RE).

I mean, there's one of the revelations that we have in our Scriptures, that aren't in anyone else's, about how at the Second Coming there will be people who are still laden with sin. And they know— Ministers will know that they've ministered falsely. And people will want to have their sins forgiven, and they will be asking people to baptize them. But this is not the day for repentance—this is the day for judgment, and they have to be turned down (see T&C 160:1-4 RE).

Why, if they've been religious? Why, if they are a minister? Because ministers, who ministered falsely, are among those that are convicted of their sin at the Second Coming. Why would you be a minister, and now with the return of the Lord and the presence of the Lord, wishing yourself to be hidden from His presence? It's because there's authenticity. It's real, and it's palpable to the program of the Lord and the forgiveness of the Lord. And it cannot be faked; it cannot be imitated. Because coming face to face with Righteousness is so tangible a reality that you may as well have a pillar of fire by night and a pillar of smoke by day, because that is holy ground, and you go not up against that. Not because they're armed and they have snipers. It's because it's dreadful; it's frightening. It's something where you do not want to be in the presence of that Light and Truth, because you prefer darkness.

I've already... I've already—

Stephanie: All right. Okay, do you want to do this one?

Denver: What is it?

Stephanie: "The three trees on the front of Preserving— Do you know?"

Denver: Oh, yeah. No, those are for self-discovery.

Stephanie: Okay.

Denver: There's stuff that no one's ever figured out yet.

Stephanie: I know, I know. Okay, I'll do this one—another eleven year old who worries about everything. What is up with our worrying eleven year olds? Stop it! Just stop it, stop it, stop it!

Okay. If you're focused on worry, you're going to worry 'cause you can't not do something you're focused on. Okay, I don't know how— I don't know, I'm not exactly sure how to explain this to an eleven year old, because you're in fifth grade. You should worry about your bike and your friends and your—Denver: Well, if they ride a bike, they get the target acquisition/target fixation.

Stephanie: Okay, hold on.

Denver: It's a real deal. Tell them not to— Yeah, use that.

Stephanie: Yeah, yeah, yeah. Well, okay! All right, here's the thing. I'll tell you about riding my bike. If you're riding a bike—it goes for mountain bike riding, skiing, motorcycle riding—it's called target fixation, okay? So I'm riding my...let's do my mountain bike, okay? I'm riding my mountain bike down the mountain, and I see all the rocks that I want to miss. If I look at the rocks I want to miss, I'm going to hit the rocks I'm trying to miss. It's a real thing. If I fade out the rocks I want to miss and look at the path I want to take to miss my rocks, I'm going to stay on the path, away from the rocks I'm trying to miss.

Denver: You look where you want to go.

Stephanie: You look where you want to go. You look where you want to go. You want to go away from worry. You want to go toward the things that bring you peace. You want to go toward the things that bring you joy, that make your life happy, and that help you focus on the positive instead of the negative. Look where you want to go.

Denver: If you're riding on a rural roadway on a motorcycle and you confront a curve, a turn in the road, the way to keep your bike in track is to look at the end of the curve— because you will adjust the arc of your turn to arrive at the spot you're looking at without trying to steer your way through the thing. You look where you want to go; you look at the end of the curve. You arc the bike to conform to arriving at that spot, in that lane, in that track. You look where you want to go.

Stephanie: You look where you want to go.

Do you want to do that one?

Denver: Well, I don't have my glasses on.

Stephanie: You've got to put— Keep your glasses on!

Denver: No, wait. No, I'm done. I'm through.

Stephanie: Then I'll answer one more.

Denver: I'm going home.

Stephanie: Okay. Good.

Denver: What is it?

Stephanie: This one.

Denver: Oh! That's even the best way! You need to answer that.

Stephanie: Yes?!

Denver: Well, yeah.

Stephanie: Okay. There's a question: "Will patriarchal blessings be given by our biological fathers?"

Sure!

Denver: It's the only way it's done in Scripture.

Stephanie: Go ask your dad for a patriarchal blessing. Sounds awesome.

Denver: It's the only way it's done in Scripture.

Stephanie: Yeah.

Denver: Almost always it's done by the oldest one in the patriarchal line. And after that person has been acquainted with someone throughout their life, and as they are approaching death and moving into the things that matter most—and in those circumstances they bring them back, and they give them their final blessing. It's the way it happened ever so frequently in the Old Testament and in the Book of Mormon. And that's a better source than it is through some institutional program, in which they train people and give suggestions of a list of criteria that ought to be followed in order to make sure the programs of the Church continue. It's rather like the prayer circles that have become an instrument for advancing an agenda, in temple rites in the LDS Church, instead of something spontaneous that is heartfelt and may actually stand a good chance of getting the attention of heaven and getting a response.

Stephanie: Okay, I'm going to answer three more quickly. I can do it quickly, I promise.

"How do I turn down friends who invite me to do Church-related things without hurting their feelings?"

I'm not really going to answer this. I'm going to ask a question back—a couple questions:

- Why do you want to turn them down?
- And is this not a good way to maintain friendships and relationships, for people who may need what you have to offer at a later time?

So, that's on you. And to answer the question legitimately, you are not responsible for their hurt feelings. Be polite, be gracious, say, "Thank you, but no." And you cannot help someone else having hurt feelings; that's just the way life is.

"I am a fifteen year old who plays online shooting games with my friends. (For shame! [Sarcasm.] No...) I get torn on spiritual focus or being worldly with my friends. How can I choose God and still be kind of a normal teenager?"

Well, you can. Go ahead, play your shooting games; it's fine. Balance is awesome. (I say, play your shooting games; it's fine. I don't know what your parents think. That's not my call, okay?) You know, if you're finding other ways to be godly and to connect with God, and you feel like your life is pretty balanced, and you're— I mean, if you're torn because you're feeling guilty, because someone is making you feel guilty, I can't answer that. If you legitimately want to know, my answer would be, "Have a good, balanced life."

The measure in our house was, "Does it grieve your spirit?" If something you are doing grieves your spirit, then you probably want to steer away from that no matter how many of your friends are doing it, or who's doing it, or what it is, or what the people around you think is right or wrong about it. If it grieves your spirit, then I say give it up. But in terms of balancing your life between God and being a normal teenager, I'm pretty sure you're already doing that.

"Is it a sin to feel proud about your relationship with God, proud of your family members and loved ones, or of your work done towards growing closer to God?"

I'm going to go out on a limb here and say if it's pride you're feeling, yeah, it's probably a sin. So, re-evaluate what it is you're thinking. Was it Alma, who trumped...and wanted to know... Do you know? You know what I'm saying, don't you? What's the Scripture? What's the Scripture...

Denver: No, give me a little more than "Alma," because Alma said a lot of stuff.

Stephanie: Anyway, help me! Help me, help me! What was it?

Audience comment: Oh, that I could speak with the trump of an angel.

Stephanie: Yes! Oh, that I could speak with the trump of an angel (see Alma 15:12 RE). Then it's like he catches himself—

Denver: Yeah, but I sense... Yeah.

Stephanie: He catches himself—because all of a sudden he feels like he's being too prideful about what he's saying.

Denver: Yeah. If you feel happy, if you feel satisfied, if you're grateful, that's not pride.

Stephanie: Yep.

Denver: If— The difference would be, "I and my family are better than other people." That's not it at all. I think I addressed that in the talk just a few minutes ago. But if what you're feeling is, "I'm so grateful to be in this family. I'm so grateful to have the blessings that God has bestowed upon me. I am so pleased with the circumstances in which I find myself, and it humbles me"—that's not pride.

Stephanie: Right.

Denver: That's gratitude.

Stephanie: Right.

Denver: So, I mean— Was it a fifteen year old?

Stephanie: No, I don't know. This is the...yeah.

Denver: We have a lot of emotional-vocabulary ignorance among the youth that confuse them about what it is that is really going on. The word 'pride' is a negative, but the emotion that's being felt may be misidentified as pride. It may, in fact, be satisfaction, gratitude, humility, and appreciation. And if so, then just re-identify your word.

Denver: Get a better grasp of the vocabulary meaning...

Stephanie: Yeah.

Denver: ...because pride can lead to arrogance and haughtiness and condescension towards others, which is never good.

Stephanie: Yeah, I would agree with that.

Audience 1: Can I ask one, just very quickly?

Stephanie: Oh, my gosh.

Audience 1: I should have thought of it earlier.

Audience 2: We're in no hurry.

Audience 1: Can I? Just one?

Stephanie: Okay. We may not answer it, but go ahead.

Denver: Yeah.

Audience 1: I just want to know. I noticed that Christ, when people—when He appears to them—are there in His presence, He will say, "Come and touch my, you know, the marks in my hands and feet and side, that you may know that I am Christ." Can a false Christ bear those marks? You know, to identify a false Christ that may appear to you, would they have those marks?

Denver: The adversary imitates. The adversary counterfeits. The adversary is not in the business of saving souls, he's in the business of corrupting souls—even if the only corruption he manages to do is slight—in order to hedge up the way and prevent the progress.

Never had a false being try to produce a counterfeit in that fashion, but I have had experience with other forms of counterfeiting that bear remarkable resemblance to things that are, in fact, true. And in that case, it was the content of the message that tipped it off that it was a false message. And at that point, I was able to detect the adversary when he appeared in that manner and to, in the name of the Lord, rebuke and remove him. So, I would say, if an experience like that appeals to pride, appeals to vanity, or delivers anything that is contrary to all of the words of the Lord that we find in Scripture, I would rebuke in the name of the Lord and dismiss, and I would give it no further thought.

And obviously, you don't rebuke the Lord in the name of the Lord and send Him packing. You would dismiss the adversary in the name of the Lord and send him packing. But, the response would tell me something. But it's also the content, because I have seen the adversary go to extraordinary lengths to mock up a false appearance in order to try and to deliver a false message. And I've been able to detect and dismiss, and I've not fallen captive for any of that.

But then, very often, if you're going to have to deal with the adversary on any substantial matters, you're usually going to be exposed in a way—

Joseph was exposed in a way that gave him the capacity to detect the adversary in a dramatic way, that cued him in and put him on guard, because that would have prevented a whole lot of mischief from later ensuing (see Joseph Smith History 2:4 RE). Moses on the mount had an encounter with the adversary that, again, gave him a capacity that helped him to detect the adversary thereafter and prevent a lot of mischief (see Genesis 1:3-4 RE). And Christ, after His baptism, in the wilderness was confronted by the adversary in a way that equipped Him on an ongoing basis to deal with that (see Matthew 2:5-7 RE).

The Lord's educational process sometimes requires that you get exposed to the enemy of your soul in order to know how to avoid falling prey to the enemy of your soul. And I know there are people out there that are so befuddled and so concerned about this very issue—about the devil misleading—that they cannot tell the difference between someone that is in the employ of the adversary, and deceived and preaching a false message, and someone that is not and has not been deceived, and knows how to detect and rebuke, and has not fallen prey to him.

The only advice that I have given to people when it comes to whether they believe anything I'm saying is: Disbelieve all you want. Search, and try to find the errors all you want. But be very careful about what you say when someone has been sent on an errand by the Lord, because that is one thing on which the Lord absolutely does intend to judge this generation.

I have been given a message from Him. I have an errand, and I'm working on it. And I don't care if you have no interest in it whatsoever; that's fine. Not everyone who heard the Lord's message when He was living had any interest in what He had to say. And I don't care if you disregard what I have to say, but I would warn you to be very careful about fighting in opposition to what the Lord IS DOING NOW. Because He IS doing something. And I'm on that errand, and I intend to complete my errand. And fighting against that is not fighting against me; I'm nothing and no one. But it is fighting against the Lord, who intends to vindicate promises made to far greater people than me. I just happen to be the weak and ill-fitted vessel that He chooses now to work with. And I'm doing my best.

Okay!

Stephanie: Let's go.

Denver: We're out of here! We're done. Is there a closing—

Audience comment: Yes.

Denver: Okay, then you get up here, and let me get out of here.

2020.06.07 Unity in Humanity Interfaith Celebration

Online Conference

June 7, 2020

Jill VanHaren: We can see you on the screen, Denver. Thank you for joining us.

Denver: I had my screen off. Can you hear me?

Jill: Yes, we can hear you.

Denver: Should I begin, then?

Jill: What?

Denver: I'm asking, should I begin?

Jill: Yes, go ahead and begin. Thank you.

Denver: I hate to do so because I've been enjoying what the others have said and wish they had spoken longer.

I had not thought about what to say leading up to the get-together today other than I would listen and then respond. But this week I got an email that I wanna read to you. This is from a woman who emailed, asking this question:

How do we deal with anger towards God? I'm struggling getting along with the idea that I need to praise and love and worship a God that I feel completely closed off to and forsaken and unloved. There's no connection there, and all I have inside of me is this growing, red-hot anger, and I can't shake it. It's frustrating to listen to others saying how great God is and how easily accessible He is because it just isn't true for some people. Some people may go their whole life without God giving them any relief or acknowledgment just because that's their trial this round. I need to know how to deal with that. I know He's real. I know He exists. But I cannot understand how God allows the pain and horrors that some people on Earth go through—the terrible things that happen to children and innocent people, the unspeakable things that people do. I feel as though God is playing a game, and we are all chess pieces to Him.

Well, I liked Rupinder's observation that the first step in the process is a problem because I think that is where it always begins. You have to start with a problem.

Well, I intend to address that question, but I was reminded in Sugopi's comment about sunrises and sunsets are God's dress. I live in the eastern part of the city of Sandy in the Salt Lake County basin. On the East, there's a wall of mountains called the Wasatch Front. And on the West, across the other side of the valley, there's a wall of mountains, and they're called the Oquirrh. Because I live so close to the Wasatch mountains, the sun will begin to shine in the valley on the Oquirrh mountains far to the West. And then, the sunlight will creep slowly across the valley as the sun rises to clear the Wasatch Front mountains until finally, the sunlight hits my house where I live in the far East at the foothill or at the foot of the mountain. Then, when the sun sets in the evening, it disappears behind the mountains on the Oquirrhs in the West. And then, the shadow begins to grow, and it grows until it finally covers the Wasatch mountains that I live next to.

In wintertime, the snow-covered Wasatch mountains in the bright sunlight reflect so much light that it hurts your eyes to look at them. You really need to use sunglasses if you're gonna spend a lot of time looking at the sunlight reflecting off the mountains. And sometimes after a snowstorm, the snow has been so thick in what it has done to cover the earth that the trees themselves are no longer green; they're just white. They look like white, jagged teeth sticking out all across the tops of the mountains. But they're white, and they blend in brilliantly with this color.

As the sun sets, as it goes down in the evening and disappears behind the Oquirrh mountains, the shadow (the last light of the day) creep up the Wasatch mountains to the very top, and just the highest peaks have the last bit of light on them before it disappears into shadow, everything being shadow. But because of the angle of the sun as it creeps up the mountain, once it gets about halfway up the mountain, the light is no longer white. It becomes pink, and it becomes blue and purple and lavender—and hues and shades of subtle change that are so different from one another.

Sugopi mentioned that there are artists on Earth, but the greatest artist is God. Watching that every night, it is never the same. It is always different, and it is always beyond the artistry of any man or woman to capture because it is alive, and it is moving; it is light itself. And the canvas that God uses is the canvas He created by the snow and by the mountain and by the Creation. No artist can capture what we get to watch and see every night if we'll just open our eyes and look.

Jesus Christ taught a sermon. In His sermon, He said that:

[His Father] makes [the] sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sends the rain on the just and on the unjust. ...If you love only them that love you, what reward have you? Do not even the publicans the same? ...if you salute your brethren only, what do you more than others? Do not even the publicans the same? You are therefore commanded to be perfect even as your Father who is in heaven is perfect [and to love everyone]. (Matthew 3:26 RE)

God's gift of this beautiful nightly display of brilliant color and subtle hues and artistry is a gift that's given to everyone, but it may not be a gift appreciated by hardly anyone. It is his gift to us.

In the book of the Psalms (which are hymns): The Lord, he is God. It is he that made us and not we ourselves...The Lord is good. His mercy is everlasting...his truth endures to all generations (Psalms 100:1).

We are part of that Creation, and we belong here in this Creation. And we're designed to appreciate what it is that He has done in making this Creation for us.

Someone asked a question: Why are the prayers sung? Prayers for a community are best when they are offered in unison, but speaking in unison is very hard to accomplish without a cadence that allows people to stay on the same word at the same time with the other people who are repeating the same words of a prayer. And so, one way that has been devised (in order to keep prayers synchronized between various voices and have them speak the same words at the same moment) is to turn them into hymns so that everyone together can raise their voice and speak the same syllable and make the same sound at the same time. And so, when Delmar Bondi beats the drum to give the cadence and when Sugopi plays the harmonium to set the tune, what each of them are doing is a reflection of a culture that is seeking to have the prayers unified, to have the prayers united to become one in order to express the desire of the heart of the whole and to do it in a uniform way.

The religion of God and the greatness of God is so vast and so all-encompassing that it's impossible for one person or one group or one denomination or one movement to have held onto it all. The religion began in the beginning with God standing in the presence of the first parents who were the father and the mother of the entire race of humanity and teaching them about everything there is to know, to worship, to understand, to appreciate, to love, to share, to feel, to understand. But we have done a bad job of preserving that.

We had, at the beginning, the truth taught; and then, we had the truth lost. The process of losing truth is called apostasy, but apostasy does not mean that everything is lost. It means that some has been lost because anything less than all of it is less than the true religion. And so, apostasy causes us to only keep part of the religion. But all religion, in all cultures, in all denominations everywhere in the world, have a common root.

From time to time, God has sent messages back into the world. Those messages are restorations in which some of what has been lost is then restored again to help complete the picture. I believe there have been many apostasies. Correspondingly, there have been many restorations. But a restoration, to complete the entire story, has to return us all the way back to the beginning, has to give us the opportunity to have, once again, everything that was here at the start that unifies together and weaves into one great whole all of the truths.

In some of the religions that we have heard glimpses of today, there are greater truths about some characteristics than have been preserved in the Christian tradition. We need to have reunited all the truths from all the limited apostasies (that nevertheless contain truths) into one great restoration—back into a whole—with the guidance and assistance of God.

There was a sermon that was delivered by the apostle Paul two thousand years ago when he went to Greece to teach about the restoration that Jesus Christ had brought about. The audience that he spoke to were a group of philosophers in Greece. That culture, that nation, that society has long since perished. The temples that were built back then have fallen into disarray and many of them into dust, but the sermon that Paul taught on Mars Hill has been preserved, and we have a record of the sermon that he taught. He referred to them. He said:

You ignorantly worship [God whom I] declare unto you. God...made the world and all things therein, ...He is the Lord of heaven and earth, [and] dwells not in temples made with hands, neither is worshipped with men's hands as though he needed anything, seeing he gives to all life, and breath, and all things...he is not far from every one of us, for in Him we live, and move, and have our being. We are also His offspring. (Acts 10:14 RE)

Those words of Paul on Mars Hill are echoed even more clearly in some of the things that have been said by Delmar and by Rupinder and by Jeremiah and by Sugopi today. Sometimes we lose track of how closely connected we are, every one of us, to God.

There was a king who delivered a sermon as he was ending his reign. In his old age and infirmity, he felt no longer able to provide the leadership, the guidance, and the presiding role of a king in helping bring peace to his people and serve them. And so, he called his people together, and he gave them his last bit of advice before resigning as the king and allowing his son to be the one who would lead the community after that by teaching and defending and helping it. And in King Benjamin's talk, like Paul, he mentioned that [God] has created you from the beginning and [is] preserving you from day to day by lending you breath that [you] may live and move and do according to your own will, and even supporting you from one moment to another (Mosiah 1:8 RE).

The story that we have of the Creation in the Bible says that God put into... He breathed the breath of life into Adam. King Benjamin, talking thousands of years later, says that in you (in you, right now, every one of you), God is lending you breath that [you] may live. If you want to know how close you are, in reality, to God, just hold your breath. Exclude —throw away— the act of breathing that God is causing to occur in you at this very moment, and hold your breath for as long as you can. Then, when you take your next gasp for air, realize the power to do that is loaned to you by God. He is that intimate to you. He is that connected to you.

In a revelation that was given to Joseph Smith about this Creation, God, speaking to Joseph, told him that:

[Christ is] in all and through all things, the light of truth, and that truth shines. This is the light of Christ, as also he is in the sun and the light of the sun, and the power thereof by which it was made; as also he is in the moon and...the light of the moon and the power thereof by which it was made; as also the light of the stars and the power thereof by which they were made; and the earth also, and the power thereof, even the earth upon which you stand. ...And the light which now shines, which gives you light, is through him who enlightens your eyes, which is the same light that quickens your understandings, which light proceeds forth from the presence of God to fill the immensity of space: the light which is in all things, which gives life to all things, which is the law by which all things are governed, even the power of God who sits upon his throne, who is in the bosom of eternity, who is in the midst of all things. (T&C 86:1 RE)

God is everywhere. The light of God is in you. If it were not in you, you would not have the power to breathe, to think, to live, to move, and to even be sustained by God's power from moment to moment to continue in your existence. We, in this present form, are not self-existent. We are dependent upon the energy, the power, and the force of God to keep us maintained as His creation. There are components about us that are coeternal with God, but that doesn't mean that we, as an organized being, existed from all eternity. God created us, but He did this long ago and far away.

Concerning this Creation in that same revelation:

There is no space in...which there is no kingdom, and there is no kingdom in which there is no space, either a greater or a lesser kingdom. And unto every kingdom is...a law, and unto every law there are certain bounds also, and conditions. All things are comprehended by God and all things are before him and all things are round about him...he is above all things and in all things and...through all things, and is round about all things, and all things are by him and of him, even God, for ever and ever...The earth rolls upon her wings, and the sun gives his light by day, and the moon gives her light by night, and the stars also give their light as they roll upon their wings, in their glory, in the midst of the power of God. ...Unto what shall I liken these kingdoms that you may understand? Behold all these are kingdoms, and any man who has seen any or the least of these has seen God moving in his majesty and power... The day shall come when you shall comprehend even God, being quickened in him and by him. Then shall you know that you have seen [him], that I am, and that I am the true light that is in you, and that you are in me; otherwise you could not abound. (T&C 86:6-8 RE)

Everything you can see, everything that you can experience, every sense that you are able to employ is a manifestation of God lending you this intelligence in order to comprehend Him.

When people believe themselves to be wise and smart and good and holy, we really do delude ourselves. No matter how intelligent we may think ourselves, the fact is we know practically nothing, and we will only be here a short time period.

God is everywhere and in everything, and we should be in awe of Him. Using everything that we have the ability to assemble, using all of our science, using all of our finest instrumentation, using every mechanism that we can devise, we know that approximately 68% of the energy in the universe is what is called dark energy. It's called dark energy because we know it's there; we haven't a clue what it is. Using that same science and ability and instrumentation, we know that 27% of the universe is comprised of dark matter. We know it's there because physics suggests its presence. We don't have a clue what it is. The total of these two means that 95% of the universe we can detect is composed of things we cannot see, we cannot understand, we cannot comprehend. We detect and comprehend, at best, only five percent of all that exists using our best science and best instruments to examine the universe.

On this world—just this world—depending upon the degree of humility that we acknowledge about our present understanding, we may only know of somewhere between 1% and 14% of the life forms that exist on this planet. Of the known life forms that we know about, humanity makes up no more than .001% of that life.

If we are not in awe of God, then we have an awfully small universe and an awfully large ego and an awfully ignorant vantage point. The greatness of the religions that we have heard from today (from the very first with Delmar to the last we heard from) is that the approach of the religion is the acknowledgment of something far greater than ourselves, and the sense of awe and humility that we approach that greatness stays beyond us.

God may make himself known from time to time, but even when He does so, it's difficult for (first of all) man to take it in and then, having taken it in, difficult for man to comprehend what it is that has been given to him and taken in. And then, it is something altogether more challenging and more difficult to turn that into something that can be explained even in part. But the greatest challenge is, then, to comprehend enough in order to be able to teach it. We've had great teachers in many religions, but I think it is foolish to suggest that the greatest teachers that have been out there have ever been able to adequately convey what it is that they took in because the challenge is too vast.

I liked the reference that Delmar made to his grandparents who were involved in ceremonial worship and ceremonial tradition. I understand why Rupinder says at some point along the path of progression, you reach a point at which you no longer need a ritual or a ceremony.

But the fact is that some kinds of vast information can be conveyed in the way that Jeremiah conveyed it—by telling a story, by giving a tradition. The story has embedded within it symbols that are expansive, that grow outward, that have more meaning than simply the wolf; more meaning than simply the moon; more meaning than simply the paint on the face. They have a library of material that they're trying to convey in a shorthanded way.

And so, the ceremony that Delmar Bondi's grandparents conveyed to him when he was a youth were not simply theater. They were an attempt to take a large amount of information and to compress it into a handful of symbols and then to deliver the handful of symbols so that someone who takes it in can then look at and reflect upon that handful of symbols and to say, "Within this symbol, I see this entire library of material; and within this symbol, I see this library of material; and within that one...." And so, ritual becomes one of the ways in which religion is intended to strike the chord in the heart and convey into the mind and into the senses that you can take information in—something that is beyond merely the senses that we work with; something that reaches out into the universe and touches that infinite.

There is this concept that Christians speak about that's called the Holy Ghost; it's also called the Comforter, that Holy Ghost, that concept much abused in Christianity, much misunderstood, much voiced about (a lot of silly notions), but in part of the restoration of information that has come about in these last two centuries—because we believe that God is continuously trying to restore—one of the things that we've been given in the last two centuries is a description of what that Holy Ghost includes. Let me read those words to you:

It is given to abide in you: the record of heaven, the Comforter, the peaceable things of immortal glory; the truth of all things; that which quickeneth all things, that which maketh alive all things; that which knoweth all things, and hath all power according to wisdom, mercy, truth, justice, and judgment. (Moses 6:61; see also Genesis 4:9 RE)

That is the Holy Ghost that—when we allow ourselves to quiet down; when we allow ourselves to take in; when we recognize the breath that we rely upon to remain conscious; when we realize that the colors that we behold with our eyes are loaned to us as a sensibility given to us by God—at that moment, you're connecting to God. At that moment, He is present with you. At that moment, you should be in awe of Him sharing with you that capacity because He is with you.

So, when the woman is struggling getting along with the idea that she needs to praise and love and worship a God "I feel completely closed off to and forsaken and unloved," the place to begin is to recognize it's an expression of God's love to you that you can see. It's an expression of God's love, kindness, and generosity to you that you can breathe. It's an expression of God's love, kindness, and sustaining power that He makes the rain to fall and the sun to shine on both the good and the evil. It's an expression of His love and His presence with you that you have the opportunity to be here, to be part of a family, to be connected with others, to converse and to eat and to feel love and to feel kindness.

The problem is not that you're not connected to God—because every one of us is. The problem is that the foolish religious tradition that you have been taught shuts your mind down so that you do not comprehend His presence in you, His presence with you, and His presence in this world that you now occupy.

The pictures of the birds that were put up by Sugopi reminded me... I try to hike every day. My wife and I can go out and... In winter, nature has very few of the birds around that we see here during the summer. The songbirds come and go. The butterflies come and go. But winter has its own dress, has its own coloration, has its own beauty. We've waded through snowdrifts up to our thighs, and we've heard the stirring of animals that are underneath the layer of snow (small mammals that crawl around underneath there). We've seen the predator birds that stay around during wintertime that will listen keenly to locate their prey and will then fly into and be beneath the surface of the snow in order to catch their prey and in order to survive in the winter months. And then, in the summer, when the flowers are blossoming—the return of the butterflies and the hummingbirds that eat on nectar and the bees and the other life there (less dependent upon the loss of lives of their fellow-creatures) and, instead, eat in the vegetable world and survive sometimes on nothing more than nectar.

"A land flowing with milk and honey" was what was promised anciently to Israel. Milk and honey do not require the death of anything. They're produced as a symbol of the abundance of life, the promise of life.

When the ancient Israelites built a temple in the land of Jerusalem, they had waited generations to build it because their holy place was really a tent, a tabernacle. It was portable, and they moved it from place to place. But they finally built a fixed location for the temple in the city of Jerusalem. They built the temple on a hilltop previously occupied by the Jebusites that was not actually acquired under the jurisdiction of Israel until the reign of King David. They'd been living there for generations, but the Jebusites retained it.

King David, in the final attempt to conquer that site, said whoever was first over the wall would become the captain of the Lord's hosts, hoping to displace his nephew Joab, who was the only person contemporaneous with David that scared David and frightened him. And He was hoping that someone would be over the wall first, and maybe he could get a new captain of the Lord's host and be rid of his nephew. But Joab was the first one over the wall and conquered the final stronghold. And so, the site on which the temple would be built was obtained by Israel.

David thought that he would be the one to build it, but the Lord told him, "No, you're too bloody a man. You've shed too many lives; you've done too many things that disqualify you." And so, while David could gather the materials, the Lord commanded him not to be the one to build it. It was his son who built it. And so, Solomon built the temple, the (finally) brick-and-mortar building that would house the oracles of God and be the holy place that people came for festivals and worship and sacrifices.

Well, it was built on a prominence, the former stronghold of the Jebusites. It was built on a prominence, and to the east was the Mount of Olives. The sunrise in the East in Jerusalem anciently would rise as the sun came, and the sun would then (as it does here in this valley), it would then start and creep down until the sun cleared the mountain, and then it was visible everywhere.

The eastern wall of the temple that was built by Solomon had overlaid on it gold (a thin layer of gold, but it was gold) on the eastern face. So, as the sun crept up from the East, the sun on the top of the eastern face of the temple would reflect that sunlight and the gold on the temple as the sun rose. And so, for some period of time, every morning as the sun rose in the East, there would be a time where you could not see the sun because it was blocked from view by the Mount of Olives. But you could see the reflection of the sun in the gold on the temple, and it would appear as though the day was beginning with the sun shining from the house of God, as the sun returned and light returned each day to the earth.

It's just a symbol, but it tied together (in symbolic form) the presence of God, the ceremonies, the rituals, the traditions that remind us, that attempt to preserve for us information—so that even in our apostate states (wherever we are in whatever state of apostasy we may find ourselves), we can have hope that God will renew that and that that light of understanding will increase and will grow brighter and brighter—until, at last, we return again to a perfect day: a day in which there is no darkness; a day in which there are no shadows left around the edges of our religion; no more separation and division, because the shadow does not illuminate the truth that we hold dear in our hearts because that also is returned again, renewed again, restored again. And we find ourselves in a vigorous relationship, connected to one another—because a faith that is big enough to incorporate all truths from all sources becomes big enough also to connect us to one another. It's in that search and that desire for restoration that we all have hope of returning once again and finding that we all stand on common ground. In fact, we all stand on the same ground.

Now, I've seen various agendas for today, but my understanding is that we're supposed to end this at noon, and I hate to impose upon people by dragging something out longer than what they had planned to participate in. There's like two minutes left until noon. Is there any... Are there any questions that I oughta take a look at before we wrap this up?

Jill: Yes, Denver, we have just a couple of questions that you might be able to answer. I guess, first, can you please tell us a little bit about your spiritual background and what Scriptures you're quoting from? (Because I didn't really introduce the speakers.)

Denver: Oh, yeah. I'm an excommunicated Mormon, I suppose. I'm a free-range, non-denominational believer in God's work in all ages at all times, and I believe that God did something in the life of Jesus Christ to bring about truth. I believe that that became corrupted sometime after the death of Jesus Christ and that Christianity preserved and perpetuated an echo but not the fulsome thing.

I believe that Martin Luther was inspired by God to rebel against Catholicism because Catholicism had become oppressive. And Martin Luther's rebellion against Catholicism not only helped free people from the tyranny of Roman Catholicism, it helped Roman Catholicism repent and return and improve itself. As much as Martin Luther did to help spawn a new kind of interpretation of Christianity that allowed people to believe in Christ and feel themselves connected to God outside of the institution of Roman Catholicism, Roman Catholicism itself looked at the problems that Martin Luther criticized and underwent internal improvement, internal correction, internal growth. It was a... inspired moment that helped all of Christianity.

I believe that that led, in turn, to (ultimately) refugees fleeing Europe and coming to the Americas in order to get religious freedom—because the Protestant Reformation did not result in the freedom of religion. It resulted in Lutheran nations and Catholic nations and Church of England nations. And those nations all had (by force of arms!) government-imposed religion in which some forms of belief were favored and some were disfavored; and some of the disfavored were not only persecuted, they were killed! John Knox, the "apostle of murder," was responsible for murdering people that he had religious disagreements with.

Protestant fathers practiced Christianity in the rebellion against Rome—but mirroring many of the very same things they hated about Rome. And so, when the Americas were discovered, there were many people that left their European nations to migrate to the Americas precisely because they wanted to practice worship of God without someone forcing them to. And so, one of the very first things that—once the Americas rebelled and got their independence—one of the very first things they did after establishing the government was to mandate the freedom to practice religion according to the dictates of their own conscience so that everyone could believe and worship according to the dictates of their own belief, their own connection to God.

And so, it took all of these events to move forward in order for God to then have the ability to do something about Christianity to correct it again. In 1805, He sent into the world a young man through whom He would begin this process of restoring and repairing. That young man had a common name, Joseph Smith, and I believe that through him a restoration of the truth began.

That restoration is today... It's called "Mormonism" by most people, but Mormonism itself is fractured into some 80 different kinds of denominations. Mormonism is not unified. Mormonism is a fracture. It's much like what you see with Roman Catholicism and Protestantism and all of the offshoots of Protestantism. There's many, many different forms of Mormonism. God spoke to Joseph Smith.

I have a friend... I've written a number of books. I have a friend; I met him because he read the first book I wrote. He grew up a Mormon. He was a Mormon missionary, and he got to the point in his Mormonism that he felt like it was no longer satisfying to the soul. So, he undertook a journey to try and find enlightenment. He went to India. He studied in India. He found a Guru. He got his enlightenment and his understanding there. And then, after he had spent years in India, he returned. And he came back because his roots were in Utah; so, he came back to Utah. But upon returning to Utah, what he found (or to his surprise) was that contained within many of the revelations given to Joseph Smith, there were concepts about enlightenment that he had to go to India to discover, but he found it back here. He read my book, and he contacted me, and he said, "I don't understand how you were able to find it in Mormonism. It took me leaving it and coming back before I could find what there was that was within it."

I became a member of the particular kind of Mormonism that's called The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (or LDS). I was a member of that church for 40 years to the day, to the exact day. And on the 40th year anniversary to the day, I was excommunicated from the Church because I do not believe it is possible to have an authentic relationship with God and to also be subordinate to hierarchical control, administrative enforcement, and surrendering to someone else who exercises authority over you. And so, excommunicated from Mormonism because of the things which I teach—but I base what I believe upon the Bible, the Book of Mormon (which was translated by Joseph Smith from an ancient book), and revelations that have been given by God to Joseph Smith. And because those things have led me to connect to God, I believe in revelations that God has also given to me. But I don't stand at the head of any organization. I believe I am one among a group of equals, of people who are likewise searching to try to find authentic connection to God because I believe that God is in and with and around all of us. It's hard to convey adequately how closely connected we are all to God using only concepts that are found in Christianity and in Mormonism.

It's easier when you appeal to and you incorporate also some of the concepts that we have heard today from an Apache, from Rupinder and his exposition, from Jeremiah (the Blackfoot storyteller), and from Sugopi. There are things that they have said that come straight out of the Scriptures that have been restored to us but are concepts that we do not adequately express even though our Scriptures contain them. We need others who come from a Sikh background or from a Hare Krishna background to articulate and to put into words these vast concepts.

I am someone trying to understand and to teach truth with a recognition that the greatness of God dwarfs the capacity of any man to adequately convey to another. The best that we can do is to invite and to persuade and to say and to deliver constantly the message: Come, come and see for yourself.

I believe that God will reveal Himself to everyone. The way in which He may reveal Himself at first may be very limited. It may be very small, but we ought to appreciate even that, and we ought to prize even that. By the time a person is given the opportunity to stand in the presence of God, they're not standing in the presence of God because God is trying to impress them or because God is trying to give them greater faith in Him. It's because, in all of the little ways in which God has previously revealed and made Himself known, the person has accepted with deep appreciation and humility and come to the recognition that we are all really, utterly dependent upon Him.

None of us are great. The best we can offer is our submission and our humble support to God and our fellow men because God cares as much for each one of us as He cares for any one of us. And so, none of us can say we're great, we're good, we're holy. Should God make us holy for even a moment so that we can endure His presence, that's a gift from Him, and it departs because when we are no longer in His presence, this earth drags us down. We get tired, we get cold, we get hungry. We have to constantly war against the elements of this world. And so, every one of us ought to stand in awe continually of God and who He is.

All I am is someone trying to promote faith and confidence in the existence of, the worthiness of, the greatness of, and our dependence upon God.

Jill: Thank you so much for that answer, Denver. I know you are very considerate of others' time. I was wondering if you have time for one more question, or if you'd like to end now?

Denver: Yeah, yeah, we're only ten minutes—eleven minutes over. But yeah, go ahead.

Jill: In your view, will the restoration of all be accomplished by a single person or a group? Will it require concurrent restorations among many religions, eventually all uniting together as one?

Denver: There's a prophecy about how God intends to gather together into one in the last days and how they're gonna be. According to the Book of Mormon, it's a testimony of God's dealings with one group of ancient people. But the Book of Mormon makes it clear that God's dealings have not been limited to one or two groups, but there have been multiple groups to whom He has visited and provided information. The testimony of all of those are intended to grow together. The Book of Mormon confirms that that is ultimately an objective.

Prophecies require that there be a house built, that there be a people gathered, that there be a location where God can take up His abode. The earth ultimately is going to be redeemed and returned to an original state that was described in Scripture as being a New Creation in which there was a garden planted eastward in Eden in which God could come, and He could visit directly, face to face, with man. The purpose of the temple is to construct another prototype that is symbolically representative of that same condition in which it is possible for angels, God, men, the living and the dead to be reunited as a single spot from which a restoration and a return of everything will spread until it finally fills the whole earth. But it begins in a single spot at a single place.

My understanding of how that's going to come about is that a command will at some point be given about a location. A command will be given at some point about the facility. Direction will be provided in order to put that into motion so it exists on the earth. And as with so many of the prophecies that God has given, we tend to view them vast and macro, and God tends to fulfill them small and micro.

The coming of Jesus Christ into this world was, on a global basis, almost inconsequential to the notice of mankind. It appears that the largest audience that we can confirm that Jesus Christ ever spoke to was about 7,000 people. It appears that most of them turned away from Him because of His doctrine, because of His teaching, because of what He was insisting the truth to include. It appears that by the time He gets to the end of His ministry, He is slain on the cross; and then, He is resurrected from the dead; and He ministers for a period of about 40 days in and around Jerusalem; then, He ascends into heaven; that at the moment of His ascension into heaven that His followers at that point were approximately 500 people. So, the Lord Jesus Christ comes into the world as nothing more than sort of a local disturber of the peace. And by the time that He has finished His ministry and He's resurrected and ascends into heaven, He has about 500 followers.

If you look at the scriptural prophecies, the symbols embedded in the Law of Moses, the foreshadowing of a pascal lamb that would be slain in order to rescue and save mankind; if you look at what Isaiah foretold, what the Psalms celebrated; if you look at the vast body of literature, and then you compare that to the fulfillment of all that in the life of Christ, it would be very easy (if you're being fair about it) to take a look at that and to say, "God fulfills His great designs in very small ways."

And so, in some ways, the easiest way for God to get His work done is for the world to give little heed or little notice of it until it has been completed. No man yet ever built a temple alone. It's just beyond the capacity of a single individual to do. And so, there has to be... There has to be a temple-building people, if for no other reason than to support the cost of what it would take to build a temple. Even if you, like Solomon, used professional builders from King Tyre to send down to construct the temple because the expertise did not exist among the Israelites to accomplish the work, you still had to have the Israelites to support the budget that King Solomon had to employ in order to pay the king in order to bring the people and the material to accomplish the work. Even if it's done with small professional labor, it's still gonna fulfill the prophecies. It's still gonna meet all the criteria that has been given in Scripture. And it's still going to accomplish everything that has been promised to all people.

How we then gather together all of what are called in Scripture, the rich treasures (see T&C 58:3) from the earth... Those rich treasures from the earth are not rubies and diamonds and gold and silver. They are records of truth. They're the truths found in the traditions in the religions.

One of the things that's required in the design of the temple is that there be a treasury. But the word "treasury"... That the room is viewed by some people as having money and gold and silver and value—it's not that. The treasury of the temple are where the records are kept. It's where the greatest truths are to be housed. They're a place for preserving the great truths that God has planted around the earth that are to be gathered together so that there is one place that houses the most valuable thing that we have. It was not the marble temples on Mars Hill that endured. That's not where the treasure was found when the apostle Paul spoke to the Greek philosophers. It was in the truth that was taught by Paul in the sermon he delivered on Mars Hill. All those people have long since been reduced to dust. And yet, the sermon has been preserved. That's the treasure. That's what needs to be gathered.

Okay! Now we're 20 minutes over, so we should wrap up. Thank you all.

Jill: Thank you so much, Denver, for speaking today.

2020.06.14 EU Fellowship Meeting
Zoom Meeting with Denver and Stephanie Snuffer
June 14, 2020

Denver: I'm wondering, it's always an issue of whether the sound is any good...and whether you can all hear. Is the sound good?

Unknown: Thumbs up. Yeah.

Denver: Good?

Unknown: Great. As always.

Denver: I was wondering—particularly when we're covering the kind of distances that we're covering here—whether we're gonna have hiccups or stutters.

One of the things that I thought... You form an impression of someone based upon what your level of exposure to them is. And what you see from me and from Stephanie (I call her Steph, some of [indecipherable]...

Stephanie: [indecipherable]

Denver: Yeah, "Stephanie" does sound funny.

Our formerly-prepared talks, in which you stand behind a microphone, or you sit behind a microphone, and you give a bunch of thoughts in an organized fashion... And that creates an impression that... If you spend any time with us, you're gonna probably have a completely different impression. And I thought one of the things that you can do is listen to talks. One of the things that you would have a hard time doing is figuring out just how incomplete a picture that that gives of both of us.

This morning, for example, we're down here in my law office to do this. We got up, we took care of things at home, and then drove down here and got all of this set up. We have a parrot, and I asked my wife (she's finished all the coursework, but she's now finishing the residency work for a counseling degree), I told her that our parrot was again hiding underneath the matting in the bottom of the cage, where she apparently spent the night. I asked her if there was anything she could do about our parrot's psychosis when she finishes up her residency because I think our parrot is mentally imbalanced; she needs therapy.

Our life is a lot more interesting than just talks. We go out, and we hike every day of the week—the workweek. On Saturday, we ride bikes, which is a miserable experience. We have a challenging hill that we go 1300 feet of elevation over about a two-mile distance up and then down again. And on Sunday, we've started doing yoga (which she can actually do, and I do poorly—a lot of groaning, a lot of moaning, a lot of reaffirming that I don't have the flexibility that she has or that the people on the screen that are demonstrating it have). But we do that to try and stay physically fit. But during all of that (except yoga; you can't talk during yoga), we spend a lot of time talking about things that matter to us or that are funny to us or that are interesting, and our lives are not lived, like, standing behind a microphone.

Stephanie: [indecipherable]

Denver: Yeah.

Steph has been a substitute teacher at a private prep school in Sandy, Utah named The Waterford School. How many years?

Stephanie: 10 years.

Denver: And she's more or less the number one substitute; fell into that by complete accident. Tell 'em about that.

Stephanie: It's a... I started volunteering just as a parent volunteer, doing a whole bunch of things behind the scenes—organizing events and being on committees and stuff like that—and got to know a lot of people and was there fairly frequently, and that's where all of our kids went. So, you know, in... We don't take a bus; you have to drive them there and pick them up, and drive them there and pick them up. So, it requires a lot of time. He did the morning run; I did the afternoon run—but you're there all the time. So, when I got tired of volunteering, I kept thinking I would substitute, but then they required me to turn in a resume and do a teaching demo, neither of which I was willing to do because 1: I didn't have a resume. Resume what? I don't do anything! So, it was the stumbling block that kept me from doing it. And then, one day... I went to high school college with one of the women who worked there as an administrator (just coincidentally), and she called me one day and said, "We fired the entire playground staff. Will you come and just work playground?"

And I said, "Sure, that's fine."

So, I'm out on the playground on the second day, and she comes out, and she says, "Can you substitute a second-grade class for us tomorrow?"

And I said, "Can I suck?"

And she said, "Sure."

I said, "Okay, I'm in."

So, that was my first thing. I didn't have to do a teaching demo, and eventually, they made me turn in a resume. But they helped me, you know, ~~they said~~ the lady in the office said, "Have you taught Young Women's?"

And I said, "Yes."

And she said, "Write it down."

So, we got this resume put together, and that was it. And so, I didn't have to do all of those things that kept me from doing it, because I just happened to be in the right place at the right time. And substituting is the greatest job in the entire world because you can say no when you want to; you don't have to substitute the same classes. And if you're willing to do everything, they will have you do everything. And the more you're there, the more they ask you, and the more jobs you get. And so, there were some times I was substituting anywhere, I was substituting half a month every month. And then I got some longer-term jobs through that. And then I had the opportunity to teach for an entire year for a fourth-grade class, which came at exactly the right time because... By this time, I think our youngest was in... She was a Junior, I guess; I don't know. And I'm trying to figure out what I wanna do with the next third of my life because that's where I'm at. And you know, we tend to live a long time. And so, I taught fourth grade for an entire...for that whole year. Loved it. It was incredibly challenging, and I knew I didn't want to do that. And so, I thought about it for a long time, started saying it out loud so that I would be held accountable for it, and eventually went back to school to get my Masters in Clinical Mental Health Counseling. And it was being in the schools for 10 years and having those relationships, and seeing sort of the ebb and flow of kids and how things have changed for them and the struggles that they're dealing with and the difficulties that they have. And I said this. So, I'm now finishing up my last internships to be a clinical mental health counselor, and then the world is my oyster since we're... Everyone has gone bonkers. So...

Denver: Yeah.

Stephanie: It's one of the fastest-growing professions out there...unfortunately.

Denver: Yeah, everyone's crazy.

Stephanie: So, I went from teaching fourth graders and sixth graders and fifth graders to working in an adult substance abuse residential clinic. And let me tell you, they're not really the same. They're not really the same.

Denver: Yeah, she's... A lot of the people you're working with now are recent...

Stephanie: Most of them are criminals.

Denver: ...parolees who've left prison and are in a substance abuse in-residence treatment facility, and she goes down and works with recent parolees.

Stephanie: Stealing cars is a big thing. I didn't know that. But apparently, it's a thing.

Denver: If you've got a... If you've got a drug habit...

Dionne: And that's a way to fund the drug habit, isn't that?

Stephanie: Yeah, oh yeah.

Dionne: Great. What a great thing to do; it's a neat thing.

Stephanie: So, that's kinda me.

Denver: Okay. There was one issue that was raised in an email that Jonathan sent that I wanted to address and that was this idea about being located in Europe and apprehension or anxiety over gathering to Zion. I'm not gonna go through and read all of the Scriptures (and I'm gonna use the LDS numbering), but if you look at the LDS numbering of Doctrine and Covenants section 45, 49, and Doctrine and Covenants section 133, there is only a small initial gathering that occurs preliminary to the Second Coming. And then there is a much larger subsequent gathering that occurs after the Second Coming. I don't think anyone is going to be left out. I think there will be plenty of opportunity for gathering. There will be two places in which the Lord—when He returns to govern—is going to assert His governance. One of them is in Zion, which will be on one side of the world, and the other is in Jerusalem, which will be on the other side of the world.

At the time that the tribes divided and the Northern kingdom was taken captive into Assyria, at the end of the period of captivity in Assyria, they were released and allowed to return back to the land they came from: the land Palestine, the Holy Land. And the presumption was that that was where they were headed. But when they left, instead of migrating back to where they came from, they crossed the Euphrates, and then they turned; they went north. The ten tribes, if you look at where the North countries would be, occupied the area that many of you are living in right now (the British Isles, Europe, European Russia), that... The ten tribes scattered there. And then later, a migration took place from the European countries into the Americas. The Book of Mormon, of course, accounts for some small group that had remained in Palestine just before the captivity that took them into Babylon. They escaped, but they didn't hail from the remaining two tribes. The Southern kingdom consisted of Judah and Benjamin. But there were a lot of Levites that were located there because of the temple in Jerusalem. But the Levites weren't really well reflected in the population that migrated to the Americas. You have... You have the tribe of Manasseh represented in Lehi and his family, the tribe of Ephraim reflected in Ishmael and his daughters, and then later, you have Mulek who was from Judah, who migrated and joined the group in the West. But the two capitals are essentially on opposite sides of the world.

It's like the old saying, "The sun never set on the British Empire" when Britannia ruled the world because you could go to a colony—India was a colony; Australia was a colony—you could go to any place on Earth and find the representation of the British Empire. And so, when the sun was shining in London and it was dark in Australia, you could say the sun was shining on the British Empire. But you know, at nighttime in London, you've still got the sun up in Australia, and you've got the sun up in India; the sun was still shining on the British Empire.

Well, that's the same kind of concept that the two capitals of Zion (on the one hand) and Jerusalem (on the other) has for the millennial reign of the Lord, having two capitals on opposite sides of the world. The sun will never set upon the kingdom of the Lord. And therefore, there will never be a point at which the rulership of the Lord is dormant because God has gone to sleep, as Elijah taunted the priests of Baal, "Yell louder because maybe your God's asleep." The sun won't set, the Lord won't sleep, and it will be continuously daylight for the kingdom of the Lord.

Well, much of the gathering is going to take place... You... The burden of prophecy almost exclusively deals with two generations of time. One generation is the moment in which Christ came into the world. And an enormous amount of prophecy is focused upon that event. The second generation is a generation in which the Lord returns. If you look at how all of those fabulous prophecies concerning the Lord's first coming were fulfilled in the coming of Christ, it seems, historically, at the moment that it occurred, as nothing more than a little footnote that's occurring out on the periphery of the Roman Empire. It didn't matter much to Rome that Christ came. It didn't matter much to Rome that He fulfilled the prophecies. Largely, they were oblivious to it. The significance of the coming of Christ to Europe would not occur for 345 years when Constantine decided he needed a unifying state religion, and he chose Christianity to become his unifying state religion (not that he believed it, but he wanted a Roman Empire of faith). And then Christianity became relevant and ultimately came to its form at that time to become the dominant religion.

Well, the fulfillment of the prophecies in that second generation is going to very much have a similar look and feel. The world will hardly take any note of it, but it will accomplish exactly what the burden of prophecy says will need to be accomplished. That does not mean that all of God's people will be gathered together into one at one moment in order to vindicate the prophecies. The prophecies talk about some minimalist event that's going to happen that will allow the Lord to return as the lawful possessor and Governor of the Earth.

That requires several technical things to be accomplished on Earth (because mortals are the inheritors of the Earth). That has to be set up, and then it has to be turned over for the Lord to make His return, and that will be accomplished in a relatively small, discreet way. But after that, when He returns to rule, everyone is going to be gathered into the governance of the Zion or Jerusalem; no one is gonna be left out. And during the period between the minimalist accomplishment and the time that the nations of the Earth are shaken until there's a folding of all nations, what the Lord is intending to do is to protect all of those—wherever they are—that are His sheep, wherever they're located, those individuals are as the Lord describes it: as if they are kept in the very palm of God. He's gonna look over 'em. There's gonna be a lot of things that happen that seem very random, very disorganized, very chaotic, very fortuitous. It just... It will seem like there's nothing going on except bedlam. However, despite that, God's hand will watch over and protect all of those that He holds in His hand.

There are stories that... My father was in England, preparatory for Operation Overlord. And he landed on Omaha Beach on ~~December~~ [June] 6, 1944: D-day. And there was chaos; there was slaughter; there was bedlam. There was... It was... It was a slaughterhouse. And they were... Their objective was to take the beach and get up the hill and then overcome the pillboxes on top that were reinforced that were killing all of them. And it didn't matter that the armaments that they had were useless. It didn't matter what they did, they couldn't accomplish anything. My father's job was... He was a combat engineer. His job was to blow up the tank traps that were on the beach, in order to let the tanks arrive and drive up and blow up the pillboxes to protect them. Well, that morning on June 6th was very windy/very rough, and the way that they had designed the flotation device for the tanks was inadequate for the waves. All of the tanks sank; there wasn't a tank that made it onto the beach during the initial assault. And so, here he is armed with explosives to blow things up, and the only things that were protecting them from incoming machine-gun fire were the tank traps. I mean, they were hiding behind these things to keep the bullets from killing them. And ultimately, it became apparent they needed to do something to get off the beach. The explosives were used to blow up some obstacles so that they could get up the hill. All around my father there was death; there was maiming; there was slaughter.

Many, many years later, my father was in a hospital in Boise, Idaho. He announced he was going to die. Everyone thought that that was ridiculous. But he announced he was gonna die three days before his death. We all insisted that he go to the hospital, and he went over, in Mountain Home, to the hospital. They took him by ambulance to Boise. He said, "I will never make it back to Mountain Home; I'm going to die." And we all poo-pooed that idea. He said, "No, no, the doctors do not know your body like you know your body. I will not make it back to Mountain Home." I went over to Boise. I spent the night on Saturday with him. And then on Sunday morning, I drove back to Utah to get the family to bring them up to see him on Monday. During the night, on Saturday night, my father—he couldn't sleep because he was in pain—was talking about all of the people that he knew, all of the friends that he had who died on one day in one few-hour session on the beach in Normandy and how random it seemed to him that on the morning of June the 7th, the entire company that he had come into combat with—the entire company—were casualties, but he could still fight on. They moved him into a new company, organized from the tattered remnants of the other companies, and they moved on, fought their way to Saint-Lô, which was another problem. But his observation was he did not understand why. Why was his life spared when so many others—so many others—had their lives end on that day?

There appears to be randomness: a hand grenade lands near a group of soldiers, and the grenade explodes, and everyone is taken out—several are killed, many are horribly wounded—and one person standing among them—one person—is untouched, not even bleeding. I mean, his ears rang because it was a hell of a noise, but he's untouched.

Why did men die, were men injured, and yet one spared? Well, there's an apparent randomness that conceals the fact that God is absolutely capable of holding in His hand and protecting whomever it is that belongs to Him that he has a purpose for.

There is nothing awful about death. Getting out of this world is something that appears to be unpleasant, particularly in some of the ways that people achieve that. But the other side of that is not an unpleasant place to be (assuming you've lived your life right, and you're not racked with guilt). It's not an unpleasant thing. But God intends to re-establish the civilization on the other side of the Second Coming that will finally be a civilization in which men are at peace with one another, and men are at peace with nature. And that accomplishment needs to be achieved with a population of people that He preserves, that He has watched over, and that He intends to use to rebuild His kingdom on Earth. So, don't think—wherever you are—that you're not in plain sight of the Lord and that the Lord isn't keenly aware of you, with an intention to include you in what His future plans are—because God's more aware of you individually than maybe you are even of Him/of Them.

Anyway, that was one thing I wanted to cover that was a question that had been posed.

But we had talked about pursuing that issue that in the revelation given about the covenant, there's language about us becoming precious to one another. And we've talked about what it means to be precious to one another. What do you think it means to be precious to one another?

Stephanie: Okay, I'm going to set this up. I was somewhere, and I think... I actually think it may have been Silvie who asked the question about being precious to one another? And what does it mean? And it's language from the Answer and Covenant that she was referring to. (And if it wasn't Silvie, I'm sorry; it was somebody else.) And so, I'm pondering this, and the way stuff comes out for me is I think about it and get all these ideas, and then I come home, and I write these ideas on sticky notes—okay?—so that I have some outline, and then I leave them in my planner, and then, ideally, I'll get them in my journal at some point. But it's kind of just the way I... Yeah, it's... That's what it was. So, I do have a journal, but that doesn't always get into the journal. So...

And then on our hikes, our walks, or whatever, we talk about this... Yeah, we talk about this stuff. And I put forth my ideas and stuff. So, I have... We have this outline in front of us, and it's basically just the Socratic method of asking questions. And so... And we do want them to answer right? It's not... Or do you just want me to answer?

Denver: Well, I want them to think about the questions.

Stephanie: Yeah.

Denver: It can be chaotic...

Stephanie: Yeah, that's true.

Denver: ...and frustrating to have a lot... And you get feedback... So, they can think about the questions, but...

Stephanie: So he's gonna ask... He's gonna ask the questions, and then I'm gonna respond the way I sort of process this through my own mind, and then we've sort of come to, you know, where he says these are great ideas or whatever, so...

The idea of becoming precious to each other... You know, you think of families, you think of the way you feel about your kids. He said something about God knows, you know, God knows His children, and He knows them. And I had a conversation with one of my daughters the other day, and... She called me, but I had said something. She was struggling with some things, and I had talked to one of her sisters. And I had an over... kind of an overarching view of what she was going through. And so, she calls me, and she's talking, and I impose something on her—an idea on her—and she said, "You talked to so and so, didn't you?" Meaning, you know, I... "Someone told you how I was feeling."

And I said, "Well, yes, I did. But the other thing you need to understand is sometimes I know you better than you know you."

And that's how our Heavenly Parents... They know us more/They know us better than we know us. So, this idea of becoming precious to each other... What relationships do we have to have or what kind of symbiosis do we have to have in order to be precious to one another?

Denver: Yeah, do you have to be friends? Do you have to know one another? Do you have to be members of a family? Does it require some familiarity in order for there to be value or preciousness to another person?

Stephanie: So, there's a lot of conversation about becoming one, having (like, you know) all things in common, like-mindedness, and that kind of thing. And I get the impression from some conversations I hear and some things that I read that we are really, really expecting a lot of ourselves, in that we think we have to love one another. You know, we have to have some sort of relationship that enables us to say...

Denver: Affection.

Stephanie: Yeah, to have affection. And this doesn't resonate with me particularly well because I find, well, so... Is it/are there requirements? Is it family, is it friendships, is it being...? Do we have to reside in a symbolic or literal Zion before we can become precious to one another? So... And in my life today, who would qualify? Who would I—if I had to list the people who are precious to me—who would I put on that list? Am I fighting with a sister, so she wouldn't be on the list? Am I estranged from my parents, so they wouldn't be on the list? How do we get to this point where we know who's precious?

Denver: Yeah, can someone be precious to you and still just piss you off, just make you...? Look, some of the people that know you the best know how best to trigger you when they want to push your buttons, and very often (given the emotional "give and take" of long-term relationships), sometimes your biggest fights are with your closest friends. Does that mean, at the moment in which you find yourself in conflict, does that mean that the person ceases to have preciousness to you?

Stephanie: Yeah... So, if we're relying on relationship status—okay?— ~~and you~~ and the ideal or the requirement is that you have to have a relationship with people to be precious, does that mean I'm making them earn my affection? "If I like you and if you behave in certain ways, you will be precious to me." So, is that... Does that resonate? Does that make sense? Are we required to earn... You know, do I have to behave a certain way all the time or the majority of the time in order to be considered precious to the people I associate with? And then what happens if that's not possible? I mean, what if I just plain don't like somebody? What if I can't like somebody?

Denver: Yeah. What if there's an absolute personality conflict between you and them? Does that make it impossible for them to be precious to you and for you to be precious to them because you just don't fit together? Everything is alien; everything is foreign.

Stephanie: Yeah. What if we worked on a project together and literally butted heads every step of the way? What if I never listened to them? What if I thought every idea they had was just stupid? What if they thought every idea I had was pointless? I mean, where are we trying to place ourselves so that we can finally say: one heart, one mind, living in—you know—perfect harmony. (And I could break out in song, but I can't think of what it is right at the moment... "I'd like to teach the world to sing to live in perfect harmony.")

Denver: There was a... In order to keep my license to practice law, I have to be trained in continuing legal education. And much of that is wasted time, but there was one speaker who came during one get-together who talked about his work as a consultant with a large group of law firms in New York and Washington, D.C. And he was trying to convey the idea that you need to have diverse viewpoints. And he used an example: They did a preliminary... They used a preliminary test at one large law firm to determine who would get in, and the consultant took a look at the way in which they decided who the next hire would be. On the test, they would only consider taking someone if they got 90% or better of the exam correct. And he looked at all of the test results. And he said, "Your new hire should be from among this small group." And it was only two or three people, this small group, all of whom had gotten less than 40% on it, and one of whom had only gotten about 15% on the test. And their reaction was, "Why on earth would we hire anyone that does that poorly on the exam?"

He said, "Because these are the only people... Everyone that got the 90% missed the same material. This small group of people are the only ones who picked up on and got that correct. Therefore, your law firm will never... If you're only hiring for this, you will be oblivious to—you will never pick up on—what you are missing." And so, his recommendation was to hire... They were reluctant to do so, but they did it as an experiment. And we found out that the firm really valued this "lone voice" that was contrariwise to almost everything that was going on.

Well, the lone voice that speaks up in contradiction to group-think is sometimes the one voice that you ought to spend a little time listening to, because if it hasn't yet entered into your heart, but it resides in theirs... That doesn't mean that they get to rule the roost. It simply means that: take it into account; let that become value; let that other viewpoint become precious to you, and realize that they're just... They're giving you something just as valuable as what you've got already.

Stephanie: And you don't have to like them. I think that's where we're sort of imposing on ourselves.

Denver: Yeah. What if it's based on something much broader and more generalized than "affection" or "desire to be" or "longing to be with their company and enjoying them"? What if preciousness includes something much broader than that? And if it does, what exactly is it that makes one person more valuable or precious to you than you may think they are at first blush?

Stephanie: Okay, well for me, I don't have... I think that broader, more general, over...over-arching thing for me is are they precious to God? And the answer to that is a 100% equivocal yes. So, if I can just labor under the assumption that all I have to do is trust God, that He values every human life equally...

I told this story in the only talk that I ever gave. And it was this brief experience at Circus Circus in Las Vegas where I'm watching, frankly, the people who are now my clients.

Stephanie: ...casinos in Las Vegas. Yeah, and I'm watching these people walk by thinking I would literally hide my children from these people.

Denver: And you're there with your children.

Stephanie: I'm there with my children! And it just was as clear as a voice speaking to me right now. "I love them as I... These are My children. I love them as much as I love you." So, this might have been the very beginning of this whole experience for me. And thinking...

Denver: You sitting in judgment...

Stephanie: (Literally.)

Denver: ...of the ne'er-do-wells...

Stephanie: Yes, I was...

Denver: ...and again we could see Lord...

Stephanie: That is exactly what I was doing.

Denver: ...saying, "They belong to Me."

Stephanie: Yes, "They belong to Me; these are My children. These are..."

Denver: Oops.

Stephanie: Yeah. "The people you are hiding your children from (your children—wink, wink, nod, nod—who are also My children) are My children. And so that was... And that was like 15 years ago. Wait, [child's name] is 19; that had to have been maybe 13 years ago. So, this is probably the beginning of my journey in this "who's precious" and "how do we..." And so, I determined (then and over the course of the years that I've been thinking about this) that the only measure I have to use in order to determine whether I'm going to value another person and whether they are going to be precious to me and whether I can live in community with them is: Are they God's children? And that literally means everybody.

And so, if they're precious to God and if Christ loves them and died for them and suffered for them, how can that not be enough for me? Or alternatively, can that be enough for me? Is that all I need? And if that's the case, what do I have to say to myself to make that a reality? Because, you know, "as a man think, as a man speaks"—that's who he is.

I mean, I can go around and pick and judge and nitpick and criticize with the best of them. And I do sometimes. And then I have to come back and say, "What do I have to say to myself to reel back in my true feelings about who I value/whose life I value?" And I don't have to like them; I don't have to love them. And I guess the question would be: Do I even have to know them? Is that required for me to value them? And then, where in our lives have we come across any... Does knowing someone help or hinder your ability to accept and hold them precious?

Denver: It helps with the pleasant people, and it doesn't... It harms with almost everyone.

Stephanie: I believe that to be true, in my experience.

Denver: People are quirky; everyone's quirky. Everyone's got a screw loose here or there. And we're a product of our education, our environment, our family, our background—and there's some weird stuff that's going on in everyone's head. There were... I mean, normal is normal because you suppress all the abnormalities that are resident inside of every one of us. We're all a bit "off." We're all a bit strange. And yet, we somehow managed to deal with one another comfortably in formal settings because we suppress our desire to, you know, backhand the idiot and... Well, I was gonna say, "...piss on the foot of someone that offends you," but we've got mixed company here, so I probably ought not speak like I would normally. Which is another thing...

Stephanie: Speak like you would "normally"?

Denver: Yeah, which is another thing: You know, you get a whole different impression of what people are like when you're giving a talk (as opposed to what they're like in life). I have a really irreverent sense of humor. I find a lot of things absolutely hilarious. I mean, I laugh at things that are probably inappropriate. And most people have—at least when it comes to their sense of humor—a body sense of irreverence that is just part of being human.

Stephanie: Yeah. I... We're looking... Our actual "pinned" family is Dionne's family. So, you kids, I'm literally staring at you, and I'm sorry, because I'm assessing whether you're enjoying this or not. No, I'm not really. But I want to say, here's the...

So, I remember very vividly in high school (and I don't know your ages, but I'm gonna give you this example), you know, just the cutest... Everybody's after this guy. (I mean, I remember his name; I hope he doesn't live in the UK anywhere. His name's Shane Whetman.) And everybody wanted to go out with Shane—just handsome, blond hair, the whole works, you know, just... And I knew him a little bit. I don't recall being in that group of people who were just pining after him, but he just happened to ask me to (I don't know...) some dance, it might... It wasn't a biggie; it was just one of the dances. And so, we went, and he's a very nice person, but he has such profound... I mean, his insecurities were overwhelming, okay? He ceased to be that good-looking, k? It just went away. I'm now looking at this person, and I cannot even see how people find him attractive. I didn't dislike him; he didn't turn into something offensive or un- (you know) or unpleasant. I just... So, the relationship at arm's length (where I could just enjoy him from afar and pass him in the hall and say, "Hello") was wonderful; it was lovely. We went on four or five or six dates; it was all I could do to go on the fourth and then the fifth and then the sixth—because I got to know him. He ceased to be what I thought he was in my head, okay? Now, if all I ever thought he was in my head was a child of God, just someone God loved, I would have had no expectations. I would not have wanted him to be something he wasn't. I would not have been disappointed when I found out that he was something profoundly different. And it was all I could do not to walk around and say to everybody who was patting me on the back and giving me high fives, "You really don't know what you're talking about. He's really not that great, you know, he's just a dude who..."

Denver: It's like the... It's like the Hollywood actress and make-up, speaking words in a artificial setting, with artificial lighting, portraying an artificial character that is compelling, even beautiful. And then, you hear them on the news spouting off about something, and the illusion is shattered. And now you're dealing with the actual person, and it's just another ass, and they're just another self-centered, loathsome, offensive person with a political agenda. And it... All the varnish goes away. It just, it...

And so, the question on preciousness (to get back on theme) is: What happens when your myth about a person... Because they "believe"; they've been baptized; they've taken the covenant, and they're trying—but they're just a jerk; they can't help themselves. They never grew up in circumstances that civilize them in the way that make them compatible with the way that you grew up. Does that shatter their value? Are they no longer... Can they no longer be precious to you?

Stephanie: Yeah, and you know, I mean, a "courting" relationship into a "marriage" into an "early honeymoon stage" relationship into a "three kids" relationship into a "empty nest" relationship into "old age" relationship, I mean, there's nowhere in your life where you don't come across people at times and places where (to use his phrase), "the varnish comes off." K? So, if we are using "varnish" (we use that as a metaphor), if we're using varnish—and the pretty and shiny and the tolerable and the kind words and the smooth-talking—to decide "precious" and "people who we want to bring into our inner circle," what are we losing?

So, my question (he's supposed to ask the question, but somebody is knocking at the door—isn't that weird?): Who is precious to our Heavenly Parents, to Christ? Well, I... We all know that. The answer is literally everybody. There isn't a single human being ~~who will~~ who has ever lived or will ever live on the face of this Earth (and many other Earths or planets or solar systems), who is not precious to God. And I don't think we earn it—because if we have to earn it, we're doing a pretty poor job of it, and none of us will earn (you know) whatever that could possibly be.

So, if we had to earn it, what would that look like, and could we do it? Because I think the answer is no. And they don't require us to earn it. We do have to follow a few fairly... In some instances, they might be fairly difficult; in other instances, they're pretty easy; and in some instances, we turn them into things much more difficult than they need to be. But we had to... We do have to, you know, keep the commandments, love one another, you know, treat each other as though we are all God's children.

So, my next question (that is impossible to answer) is: In what manner or what experiences have our Heavenly Parents had that enable them to claim us as precious? This idea of omniscience and omnipresence and Their ability to know us all intimately is just huge. I mean, honestly, can you even wrap your head around that? How is that even possible? What would that even look like? I can't even, I mean, I can't even... I don't know if there's Scriptures about that, but I can't even get my head around the idea of Them in Their omniscience being able to know us intimately enough that we are all precious to them.

[Directed to Denver] Are you gonna read it in Scripture?

Denver: Yeah. It's really the best description—is the one given by King Benjamin, talking about how God is sustaining us from moment to moment by lending us breath and supporting us from moment to moment so that we can live and move and breathe and have our being. We are literally employing the power of God in every breath that we take, so God's familiarity with you is based upon the fact that He is the organizing power or force within you. You get to make your choices, but He understands the choice you're making and why you're making it. He is in and through all of us. But the irony is that when Christ performed the atonement, Christ was mortal.

There's an incident that happens in the book of Moses (which is now in Genesis in the new Scriptures), where Moses is inquiring of God, and he wants to know about everything. He wants to know about the entirety of all Creation. And God tells him "I can't do that. If I were to tell you all of that, it would require that I change how you are composed, in order for you to take it in, and it is impossible for me to give that to you and for you to afterwards remain in the flesh on the Earth"—meaning that while we're still composed of this stuff—this mortal clay—we have decided limits on us.

Jesus Christ was incarnated into this mortal stuff. He could not (while He was mortal) take in everything that God (in a resurrected and exalted state) can take in. He had to get through mortality as a bonafide mortal. Therefore, when Christ suffered the pains of the atonement, He suffered the pains in a generalized sense. Every dilemma that any man or woman will ever face/every challenge/every temptation/every disappointment/every bitterness/everything that constitutes a dilemma for the mortal He passed through. But He did that as an exemplar of what all of us goes through. He didn't do it because he comprehended you and comprehended me and comprehended 100 billion different people's mortal experiences; He comprehended the dilemmas that are shared.

I mean, you think about the people down at the counseling you do [addressing Stephanie] that have this addiction problem that they're seeking rehabilitation from; it doesn't matter what their drug of choice is, they have a syndrome in which the weakness and the appetite has gotten on top of them. And so, if you can understand in an aggregate, the nature of the weakness, you can understand and identify with each one of the victims of that particular appetite, and you can form generalizations. Christ took in all of the weaknesses, all the frailties, all of the failures in an exemplar/in an illustration/in a syndrome after syndrome, problem after problem; He experienced it all. He knows how to teach and heal and guide and lead every individual. But our Heavenly Parents—God the Father, whose power was loaned to Christ in order to make this Creation and who animated Christ, sustaining Him from moment to moment during mortality and who has surrendered the throne of the Father to Christ once He was exalted and resurrected and attained to resurrection—God the Father and God the Mother (the Heavenly Parents), they do know everything about all of us. And despite that, they find every one of us precious, valuable, potentially infinite, potentially like Them.

Stephanie: Yeah, and he jumped ahead a little bit, but that was gonna take me to the idea that the...of the atonement and Christ just saying to the Father and the Mother, "I will do it. And I will do it for everybody—not because I'm going to know everybody but because You do, and I believe You." And so, He takes that on, exactly like He said.

I was having a real... Oh, I don't know if it was a "problem," but I had some things, just, that I was micro-managing and sort of spiraling about in terms of just things I couldn't get my hands around in terms of behaviors and, you know, why do people do this and why do people do that? And it was sort of... It came back to the atonement and what Christ...and what the atonement really was and is, because I, you know, I... Very few people are egregious sinners, okay? But we're all weighed down by pride or insecurity, or we may have... We may be having difficulty with a child, or we may have lost a child, and so, we have these moments in our lives where we just can't seem to get a handle on what's going on, and it's not a sin. And while I know that we're not taught the atonement is just for sin and repentance and stuff—it's just for sin; I know that's not overtly taught, but it's always where my mind settles, and I have to break out of that and say, "Oh, the atonement isn't for my sin (which isn't non-existent), but my atonement is for this spiral that I'm in right now." I can actually say, "I can't do this anymore, Lord. I need you to take it. I need the atonement to work in my life for this issue."

And so, I've been doing a lot of praying and a lot of pondering, and I actually was listening to a bunch of random Evangelical and Baptist and Christian podcasts about the atonement and the way they viewed it, and then when it all came roundabout, I went back to the LDS—the remnant—the LDS Scriptures or whatever we call them now. And then I actually went to Come, Let Us Adore Him and ~~did the Geths...~~ and read in the Gethsemane chapter. And I think, again, part of this is all me just formulating this idea that Christ died ~~for the~~ for our infirmities and for our weaknesses, not for us as individuals, although ~~it is represen...~~ it's manifested in us, and we are obligated to value that by really tapping into it for our struggles, whatever they may be. They don't have to be big. They don't have to be huge. They just... We just need to tap into it.

And one of the other things that we've talked about is: To me, in order for the atonement to have any efficacy at all, Christ had to have had a choice. And Christ has to be able to look across the landscape and say, "There are people who will live lives who will be in constant need ~~of my saer...~~ of this sacrifice; their lives will be so full of trauma and heartache and disappointment and missteps..." And I don't like to use the word "sin," although I believe there is sin—I just don't like the word. "...And they will need constant access to this." And He had to know that there would be crappy people. That what He's doing is going to be efficacious even for the worst of humanity. And I know we use it a lot—I mean, it's a... It's kind of a cliché at this point—but, you know, Christ's atonement is as effective for Adolf Hitler as it is for Mother Teresa, as long as they're both willing to accept and use it for its intended purpose. And, again, not to be cliché about that, but that's the reality of life. And if that's how our Heavenly Parents and Christ view mankind—including the Adolf Hitlers of the world—then, I think it's incumbent upon us to say, "Would I give up my life for the Adolf Hitlers of the world? Or would I only/or can I only view the Mother Teresas as precious?" Well, if I know Adolf Hitler, well, that's gonna be hard. You know, if I know Mother Teresa, that's gonna be easy.

So, somewhere in my thinking and somewhere in my acceptance of the love of Christ, which is the highest love we can have, I have to be able to say to myself, "If it is required of me, I will give my life for the best of humanity and the worst of humanity equally." And that's how I reconcile precious. I don't view it as needing to know you or love you or like you. There are too many people in the world for me to get to know, love, and like. I can barely maintain healthy relationships with the people I associate with on a regular basis. It's super hard sometimes. And I think to impose on a group of people who are trying to become one, who are trying to measure up to a Zion standard, who are trying to work together on projects, who will be coming together in either location (physical location or geographic location) or locations in our hearts where we're trying to become of one heart and one mind, I think to say we have to like each other/know each other/love each other is setting ourselves up for requiring people to earn it.

One last thought for me is that, you know, we have a lot of hurts, a lot of offenses imposed on us/given by us to friends and family, maybe ex-Ward members, I... You know, I don't know. The list is long. I mean, I hear horror stories of families who, you know, turn each other in because they're taking the sacrament at home or (I mean, I...) whatever—just horror stories—or estranged, you know, estranged members because of differing views on religious beliefs or how to raise children and... You know, there's no better place to start than in your own home. There's a phrase in substance abuse. They use it a lot. It's like, "I can only sweep my side of the street." And, you know, I write these phrases down because they're so good that they just repeat them over and over again. You know, your side of the street, if it's clean, good on you! You know, way to go! You've done some great work. But I'm gonna go out on a limb and say, I doubt it. I doubt your side of the street is clean. And so, it's really nice to be forward-thinking and, you know, how do I get along with a bunch of people who want to gather in Zion and who, you know, I may have differences with because they wrote a blog post or contributed to an email, and I found it offensive, or you know, they're whatever. But you still have your side of the street, which probably includes family members, close friends, you know, extended family members, aunts, uncles; I don't know. Make them precious to you; start there. Because those are the people that you can really do the hard work for, and...

Denver: Practice.

Stephanie: ...and practice because, you know, you might be gathering at some point with people who are very diverse from you. And you might be associating in close quarters with people who, you know, ~~de~~ you don't share the same view on... I mean, big things you share the same view on, but you got to in a different way, or you... I mean, we get to the same ideas; we get to the same concepts but through very different means—very, very, very different means. We don't take the same path to get places. And so, I think the idea of precious—if you're talking about personal relationships—start on your side of the street. And then, as you go out further, just realize that the only value anybody in the entire world has to have is that they are loved by the same God who loves you. And that's all you need.

Denver: Okay, so we've covered that.

I wanted to comment because, very often, one of the issues... We have a friend who lives in Japan, and he watches the news, and he wants to know why the United States is completely insane right now. Yeah. I wanted to comment on what's really going on in the United States right now. Because the news media gives you a really distorted view of where people's heads are at.

This may seem like completely improbable; it is nevertheless true. The same... The very same reason that Barack Obama was elected the President of the United States is exactly the same reason why Donald Trump was elected President of the United States. Barack Obama appeared to be utterly different, outside, inexperienced, not part of the Washington establishment, and therefore, he would be something really different, and he would shake things up. Donald Trump fits exactly the same mold. He's someone that doesn't appear to be part of the Cabal in Washington, D.C., and therefore, he got elected to be president for the very same motivation.

Right now inside the United States, there is largely a lot of frustration and distrust and disappointment with what they see Washington, D.C. as being. The next president of the United States is likely to be Donald Trump again because he's still (in comparison to Joe Biden) the outsider, and whoever is going to win after that—and it doesn't matter if they are a Democrat or if they are a Republican—whoever's gonna win after that is going to be elected primarily because the public, in general, can't stand what they see in their government. The government is disconnected, filled with self-interest, filled with stupidity: They can't even pass a relief bill in the middle of a crisis without lighting it up with a bunch of things that no one wants. But in order to get the relief that needs to come because of the mess that has been created by the government shut down, the bill gets passed, the bill gets signed, and there's a whole lot of pork and Christmas tree gifts for pet projects included, and the public in the United States doesn't like that. Even the folks (that have some—not a lot; it's very small—but they have some support) that are carrying on in the Seattle area actually represent part of that same sentiment that "we don't like our political leaders."

In the United States right now, political leaders (by and large) are disliked/distrusted because the way in which governance has gone on has been horribly disappointing. Now, the news media has an agenda; they largely want to have the vested interests (that have been doling out the trillions of dollars that come to Washington) to continue to be in power, because that's their network. They feel comfortable/they feel at home with that. And so, the news media hates Donald Trump, but the public (by and large) doesn't. You know, he's an embarrassing, kind of brash... Yeah, he's obnoxious. But I guess he's precious, huh?

Stephanie: Yes, of course.

Denver: So, must be. In any event, I wanted to finish with that, and I also wanted... When we started— because Jonathan had given us a heads up about what the time zone is over there that we're talking to (we're in the evening with you; we're in the morning here)—I wanted to keep this to an hour and a half. And so, we're down to the last few minutes of this. But I have to say, I've written down the names of the people that we got introduced to.

Things may look very different from the distance that you observe it from. But the fact is that even the people that are the closest and the most involved have misapprehensions and misunderstandings and traditions that they bring with them.

When the Protestant Reformation took off in Europe, that first generation of Protestant leaders modeled the behavior of Catholicism; they just changed who it was that got to do the killing. But it never occurred to them that the example of coerced religious conformity was completely upside down. It took generations after the Protestant Reformation before either Protestantism or Catholicism settled down into something that was a little more like the Sermon on the Mount. And the refugees that left Europe to come to settle in the colonies in America were largely motivated by religious the desire to be religiously free and to not be meddled with in what their beliefs were.

But in the American colonies, each one of the colonies, originally, had a state religion. They taxed the Colonialists, and with the taxes that they gathered, they paid the ministers from various churches to be the state-sponsored religion. It was a second revolutionary act for the Bill of Rights to be passed and for Congress to no longer have the power to legislate respecting the establishment of a religion. States still could. It would not be until the Civil War and the passage of the 14th Amendment (in the post-Civil War) that the First Amendment would then become applied to the states, and no state in the United States could have a state religion anymore. So, it was really... Freedom of religion (in an authentic sense, that all religions were on an equal footing) was a post-Civil War occurrence, which is why you could organize the state militia of Missouri and the state militia of Illinois, and you could send them out to evict from the entire state a population of religious believers and send them into exile—because the 14th Amendment hadn't been passed yet.

Well, authentic freedom of religion opens up a responsibility and an opportunity for all of us to look at and to deal with the responsibility and the freedom that we now have. We all come from different religious traditions into a setting that we find ourselves now. And this setting does not have an organized hierarchy. It doesn't have a body of authorized... Everyone is equal. No one gets to be supported by the tithing of anyone else. No one gets paid to participate in this. Tithing, if it's collected, gets collected and used to help the people in need; it doesn't go to support an organization. It goes to help those among you who find themselves in a position that they need some financial assistance.

Stephanie: I need to interject. Can I interject something?

Denver: Yeah, yeah, yeah

Stephanie: On that... Briefly, the idea of deference: We... People become leaders when the people around them give them deference or permission to do that, so... 'Cuz we hear enough around here that people think there are certain people "in the know" or "more this" or "less that" or... And so, I just would like to put the idea out there: We can "think" people into their positions just by the way we act or the way we talk or the way we think. And so, you know, I'm of the view that much of our hierarchical LDS leadership and the admiration and the infallibility that they labor under or with or through has been imposed upon them in large measure by the membership. And so, as you transition out of that into a new experience with new people and new, you know... And some are gonna be way more vocal than others and some are gonna be in the United States congregated regularly/doing regular things and other people in other parts of the world are gonna feel left out and think that there's this group of people somewhere in Utah or Idaho or Colorado (or, you know, wherever they are) being in charge or being more important or being "more than." And I strongly encourage you to self-talk that out of the dialogue. Because if we talk it into the dialogue and talk it into the experience, then it just creeps in. And it's not real.

And so, I guess I'm making some assumptions that you might think things, which is what he was talking about: impressions and misunderstandings. And so, don't buy into the notion that there is a—I don't know what even to call it—an "in-group" or a...an important group. I mean, there might be cohorts all over of vocal people who do a lot of stuff who are very active, and that doesn't make them anything other than just people who are feeling like they've got stuff to do. It's not proscribed or...

Anyway, I just felt impressed to make sure that you know that a lot of what happens, in terms of hierarchical creep, comes from the way we talk about it and the way we view it and our own...

Denver: Yeah, we have the unique opportunity of actually viewing one another as equals.

Stephanie: Yes.

Denver: We have the unique opportunity of saying: No one's greater, and no one's lesser. And we really need to seize hold of that and to say: That—that—is desirable; that's wonderful. I've talked about how—when the Restoration began—there was literally no hierarchy. As it moved along, it began to aggregate hierarchical offices and a pyramid with a Presidency and Twelve and Seventy and then stakes that had kind of a similar organization. And it didn't work. It—literally—it did not work.

By the time you got to 1838 in Missouri, Joseph Smith had a presidency of the Church, and he had a presidency in Zion, and the presidency in Zion was headed up by David Whitmer. (David Whitmer was going to be the replacement president if Joseph were slain.) In 1838, everything fell apart. David Whitmer, the successor, was excommunicated (as was his counselors in his presidency, including Oliver Cowdery). The Church Historian was excommunicated. Several of the Apostles not only left, but they signed affidavits that helped get Joseph Smith arrested. And so, he's sitting in Liberty Jail, and he's writing the letter from Liberty Jail, and it occurs to him that this hierarchy, this... It doesn't work. And he writes in that letter, "No power or influence can or ought to be maintained by virtue of the priesthood, only by patience, long-suffering, gentleness, meekness, pure knowledge."

We have an opportunity to say, "Okay, let's run with that; let's take all of this bigger and lesser hierarchical... Let's take all of that; let's say that we're all exactly on the same footing." Now, every one of us have an opportunity—with gentleness and meekness, kindness, with pure knowledge, and with persuasion—to persuade one another to something that is good. Let's use that as the criteria; let's not use status. Steph was right; there isn't any status. But let's make sure that we don't inadvertently allow there to become some.

If it is not gentleness, meekness, persuasion, kindness, pure knowledge... If it doesn't enlighten and enliven, then give it no heed. Require that of every man. Don't excuse anyone, not myself, not Steph, not any of those people that blog or write or want an audience.

Stephanie: Or have an audience. Yeah.

Denver: Yeah, it should not make any difference at all.

We're a little over an hour and a half, so we're gonna let you get on with your evening, and we're gonna get on with our day. We go back to Jonathan, I guess.

Thank you all. By the way, it was good to meet you, and I hope we can do more of this. Actually, I would like to come there sometime.

2020.06.20 Joseph the Historian

Presented at the 3rd Annual Joseph Smith Restoration Conference

June 20, 2020

Meridian, Idaho

I don't have any computers to run amok with. My wife pointed out that I know how to do that but commended me for having the self-discipline not to do so.

Joseph Smith was a better historian than historians—was a better and more capable describer of the truth of events that took place than people that devote their lives to the skill of becoming a historian.

In the Book of Mormon record, Nephi wanted to understand more clearly the vision that his father Lehi had received. So, Nephi prayed to have a similar experience so that he could comprehend what his father had seen. Nephi records in his record an account of what Lehi told him, and then he records in his record his own experience saying the same thing that was shown to his father. He stops his account because he was told he was forbidden from proceeding with a complete account of the things that he had seen. And so, he interrupts his account, and he doesn't complete it.

Nephi was a literate man—he could read not only the Hebrew language and command that, but he also was familiar with another language in which the Plates of Brass were recorded (which you get all the way down to the time of King Benjamin and Mosiah before you find out that the Plates of Brass were in fact written in an Egyptian language). Then the Nephites used a modification of the Egyptian language that they called Reformed Egyptian, which is now a third language that Nephi would have been familiar with. And so, I have to assume, as a literate man, that at the time the incidents happened in which Nephi had the heavens open to him that he would've created some kind of a record contemporaneous with that event.

Then they migrate across the peninsula of Arabia to the shore, a journey of some four years. Then they settle down, build a boat, and they migrate to the Americas (likely a route that stayed close to the shore) and went around the Horn of Africa, where there was this horrible storm that lasted until the brothers relented and finally un-tied Nephi from the mast. And then they sailed up and around—and ultimately passed British Isles and Greenland, Iceland—into the Americas, where they would have settled.

Things remained (as an intact family) until the death of Lehi, at which point the older brothers resented the younger brother's status among them, and it became intolerable (in fact, life-threatening) for the group to remain together, and so, they separated. And after the separation, Nephi prepared what are called the Large Plates of Nephi, on which he recorded the history.

Many, many years later Nephi got a commandment: make some small plates, and on the small plates, you don't record the history. You only record the things that are sacred to you. And so, the Small Plates of Nephi were prepared by Nephi to record the religious history some three or four decades following the time when the vision had occurred before their migration across the Arabian peninsula. During that ensuing three or four decades, Nephi records what he had accomplished in the interim that allowed him to write the sacred history.

And upon these I write the things of my soul and many of the scriptures which are engraven upon the plates of brass. For my soul delighteth in the scriptures, and my heart pondereth them and writeth them for the learning and the profit of my children. Behold, my soul delighteth in the things of the Lord, and my heart pondereth continually upon the things which I have seen and heard. (2 Nephi 3:6 RE, emphasis added)

Four decades of reflection went into the account that Nephi put onto the Small Plates of Nephi. This account was so good that when Mormon abridged the Book of Mormon and Joseph translated the beginning of the Book of Mormon consisting of the abridgment that had been made by Mormon, those were deliberately lost. It took a whole series of events (and the Lord foresaw those events would take place), but that was lost, and in its place, the Small Plates of Nephi were substituted.

Now, the Small Plates of Nephi were put at the end of the plates. The abridgment of Mormon was how the translation process began. All of the abridgment of Mormon was completed (and the beginning had been lost) before the translation of the Small Plates began, which would then become the beginning of the Book of Mormon. These testimonial words of Nephi were so important that they not only were something that Mormon was not permitted to abridge and include, but they were also withheld in the translation process until Joseph Smith had reached the greatest part of his competency in serving as a person with the gift and power of God to translate the record. And so, the beginning of the Book of Mormon, now, is 40 years of reflection by Nephi upon the things which he had seen and heard—and the account is the greatest, most powerful, most accurate translation rendered by Joseph Smith after obtaining competency in the rest of the record.

So, if we had Nephi's record that he put down contemporaneous with the events, before the trans-Arabian migration, would it have read like what we have in the Small Plates of Nephi in First and Second Nephi? If we had, instead, the Large Plates of Nephi's account (that perhaps was written 20 years after the incident and 20 years before the Small Plates), would that account of what it was that Nephi experienced read the same as what we get on the Plates of Nephi?

So, what we do have is the final product of decades of reflection to put into words the things that he saw and he heard. And in the process of putting together his testimony, he tells you, "This is what happened to me, and this is what I'm permitted to say about what it is that happened to me. However, the Lord told me a whole lot more which I was forbidden from saying, but he mentioned that it had been shown to others. And so, here's my testimony that I can tell you. Now let me incorporate the words of another prophet. And I will apply them, and I will liken them, and I will tell you the rest of what the Lord showed me by resorting to the words of Isaiah. And if you can't get what I'm telling you, then in the final chapters of the Second Book of Nephi, I'm gonna give you the interpretive key so that you can get that I'm not talking about Isaiah, and I'm not employing the testimony of Isaiah as Isaiah's words. I'm adopting and I'm incorporating the words of Isaiah as my testimony of what I saw and what I heard that I was forbidden from writing so that you can understand what it was that was shown unto me."

Well, I'm talking about the First Vision. Joseph Smith experienced something in the Spring of 1820 that Joseph Smith likely did not write down that Spring. And when he did make a first attempt to record it, what he recorded was incomplete and inadequate. Joseph Smith relied on scribes; he relied on others. He had an actual historian that was called to record the events of the Church. And in 1838 in Far West, the entire presidency in Zion...

(That's what it was called. There was a Church President; that was Joseph—and they were in Kirtland; and there was a presidency in Zion—that was in Missouri; David Whitmer was the head of that; Oliver Cowdery was one of the counselors in that First Presidency. In fact, that had been who would be the successor to Joseph Smith—identified as his successor in the event of Joseph's death.)

And Joseph wrote a letter to John Whitmer asking for the records back, but the letter doesn't appear to make a legitimate effort at trying to recover it. He more or less says (sort of like General Moroni writing back to the king when he wasn't getting support for the army), Joseph writes to him: "You are a lousy historian; there's nothing you've got that's of any value. It's just a pile of crap, but I want it back. Will you give it to me?" And with such persuasive prose, of course, John Whitmer didn't do anything.

So, Joseph Smith is left with the dilemma of what to do about the history of the Church in 1838—when the Church is in complete turmoil, when he's lost his successors, when members of the Quorum of the Twelve are signing affidavits to try and put him in prison, when everything is a mess—and he sets about in this period of conflict to write the history of the Church, starting over again.

At this point, Joseph Smith has had 18 years to reflect upon the things which he had seen and heard. At this point, Joseph faces the daunting task of trying to restate (again) the reasons for and the legitimacy of the Restoration that commenced in the Spring of 1820. At this point, Joseph Smith has finished the translation of the Book of Mormon. He's had numerous revelations and visions. Most of the work (all but a tiny fraction of what we find in the Doctrine and Covenants) had already been received and recorded by revelation. Joseph Smith was now an accomplished Prophet who had slightly less than two decades to reflect back upon what it was that occurred in the Spring of 1820.

He has the ability to put it into context that his expanded mind could put into writing in a way that he previously could not have attained unto. And fortunately, the circumstances were such that he was forced to do just that.

So, when you read the Joseph Smith History, what you're reading is the mind of a 33-year-old Prophet that has been tempered by persecution, tempered by betrayal, tempered by years of service in a public setting in which the opponents have railed against him, the critics have shouted him down, and his own closest members have forsaken him and turned their heel against him. And in that circumstance, with the sober reflection of nearly two decades, he sits down to write:

Owing to the many reports...[that] have been put in circulation by evil-disposed and designing persons in relation to the rise and progress of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, all of which have been designed by the authors thereof to militate against its character as a church and its progress in the world, [I've] been induced to write this history, so as to disabuse the public mind and put all inquirers after truth into possession of the facts as they have transpired, in relation both to myself and the Church, as far as I have such facts in possession.
(Joseph Smith History 1:1 RE)

Well, one of the facts that Joseph Smith did not have in possession was the date of the First Vision, as we heard in that video. So, he says, "It was a beautiful morning. It was Springtime. It was 1820, but I can't give you the date." If he could have, he would have. He knew the date on which the visit by ~~the angel Moroni~~ the angel Nephi (later renamed Moroni—he has an alias, "previously known as Nephi"; you wonder if there's a mugshot that he's trying to avoid having identified on the Internet by the assumption of a new name)—he knows that date, and he can fix that date. Probably in the wisdom of the Lord, Joseph didn't know the date of the First Vision so that John Lefgren and John Pratt could perform the research and do the work in order to find the date on which the First Vision took place. Things like "losing the 116 pages" are done in the wisdom of the Lord, and things like "not knowing the date on which the First Vision took place" are likewise done in the wisdom of the Lord.

But Joseph Smith records the First Vision account, and one of the chief arguments by the people who want to detract and criticize Joseph is that it's different from other accounts. Well, if I had Nephi's original notes, and if I had the Large Plates of Nephi... In fact, if I had the Large Plates and Mormon's abridgment of the Large Plates, I'll bet I could advance exactly the same argument against the First and Second Books of Nephi. Because what you get in the final version that we have in print is 40 years of reflection/40 years of mastering the process/of understanding the things which he had seen and heard—and therefore, it was the most worthy account. And that's what we have in the Book of Mormon. And Joseph's most worthy account is what we have when he was put to the extremity of having to re-create the history of the Church after John Whitmer had stolen it and run away.

Now, there's a command given in the Sermon on the Mount—Christ speaking to everyone that wants to follow Him and obey His new and higher law. He rebukes all of us and warns all of us and commands all of us: Don't call your brother a fool. (So, there's a commandment —I can't call you foolish folks a fool.) Christ was resurrected and spent the better part of the day of His resurrection walking on the road to Emmaus with Cleopas and another (likely Luke) on the road, in which He asked them why they were so downcast. And they said, "What, are you new around here? You haven't heard? There was this fellow—we thought Him to be the Messiah. He was crucified, and now it's been three days since then." And Jesus says, "You fools and slow of heart. Don't you realize that everything in the Law in Moses, everything required that these things be done?" So Christ, immediately after being resurrected, violates the commandment about "don't call people fools." And as a lawyer, one of the things you try to figure out is: How do you reconcile differences in the law? And the reconciliation is this: We can't call each other fools, but the judge of all mankind has the absolute right to call anyone a fool who's a damn fool. So, having said that—

One of the things about Joseph Smith that the Lord said (while he was in Liberty Jail, by revelation) was to Joseph: "Fools shall have you in derision. But the wise and the noble are gonna constantly seek blessings from under your hand and counsel." So, one of the things that fools have done with the First Vision is to say Joseph wrote different versions of the First Vision; therefore, it wasn't true. Well, here's one of the things that he says (after what Adrian put up a moment ago, I'll start at the end of that):

They draw near to me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me; they teach for doctrines the commandments of men, having a form of godliness, but they deny the power thereof. (Joseph Smith History 2:5)

Okay, all of that language... All of that language that is put into the mouth of Christ in the First Vision comes from Isaiah/comes from Paul/comes from Scripture. Okay? So he's just... Joseph is trying to convey what happened at the First Vision, and he's putting into the mouth of the Lord in this first encounter all of these scriptural quotes strung together as one statement (and James, too).

He again forbade me to join with any of them, and many other things did he say unto me which I cannot write at this time. (Ibid, emphasis added)

What you've got from Joseph Smith is a condensed effort, using the words of other prophets to put into the mouth of the Lord—conceptually—exactly what the Lord was attempting to achieve in the First Vision with Joseph, after nearly two decades of reflection on how it might best be put.

There are at least two different ways in which we get the words of Scripture. One way is when the Lord actually dictates the words. If the Lord actually dictates the words, then what you're going to get is a statement that the prophet himself may not understand. It may require him years of work in order to figure out what those words mean. A second way in which a revelation can come is a flood of light in which the person is left like Father Lehi: he saw and heard much (1 Nephi 1:3 RE). And that's all Lehi's gonna tell you about it. Or Moses on the mount: he saw all of the inhabitants of the Earth from the beginning unto the end, and not one thing is withheld from his view (see Genesis 1:6 RE).

Okay. Can you organize that into a theme? Can you get... Can you give me some... Can you give me some detail about that? Or you can do as Joseph Smith does in the reflection that he does on the First Vision, and you can say: Many other things did I see which I cannot at this time put out there.

Nephi had 40 years of reflection before he put together his First and Second Book of Nephi. During that time of grappling, who knows how many efforts he made, how many times he tried to articulate it, and how differently he may have put it on different occasions. But what we get in the First Vision by Joseph is an attempt to convey, to the best of his ability, the truth of what came through to him, that in 1838, when he was writing, would be the most meaningful for people who are following the events of the Restoration and trying to understand that the work was afoot and that God was laboring with mankind once again. And so, it's relevant to the circumstances in which Joseph Smith found himself in 1838.

One of the things fools have done is point out he wrote different versions, and a second thing that fools have done is to argue he got the chronology wrong. Well, no, he didn't. He was absolutely right about the Spring of 1820, and through research, we've been able to confirm and find it. Fools also say, "Wait a minute—the burned-over district revivalism was not contemporaneous with the Spring of 1820." Okay... (Now, I'm inclined to resort to my Idaho vocabulary and call it something other than bovine feces.) But here's the problem with that argument. Joseph Smith is writing the account as a 33-year-old man of the recollection that he had of the events taking place as a 14-year-old—in his 14th year—in 1820.

This is a fairly isolated area in Palmyra, New York. Great upheavals that are caused by revivalism in the burned-over district would not settle down simply because tent preachers may or may not have been setting up shop in Palmyra, New York in the Spring of 1820. But the ripples of what they had done would certainly still be reverberating, and in the mind of a 14-year-old observer of the events, Joseph is giving you an absolutely accurate retelling, insofar as he was in possession of the facts of exactly what it was that he experienced as a 14-year-old boy. And so, if you're foolish enough to advance that argument against a prophet of God in order to say, "I reject the testimony of this man," then you deserve the Lord's characterization of yourself as a fool holding in derision a prophet of God. And you deserve to merit the results of that foolishness.

Well, the First Vision that occurred in the Spring of 1820 set in motion things that continue—to this day—to warrant the most serious of inquiry and the most serious of reflection. Time and time again... And I brought a few Scriptures with me, but I'm not going to let this go over; I'm gonna end this on time. Time and time again, the Scriptures take us up to the point that we have an adequate foundation from which to conclude that something profound, something sacred, and something wonderful took place. And then a veil is drawn over it. It's as if the testimony that we're given in Scripture is deliberately designed to provoke your curiosity, to provoke your inquiry, to provoke your own search into and contemplation of the things of God—deeply, soberly, prayerfully.

I wanna read just one of them that I hope provokes your interest in inquiring further of the Lord.

Jesus groaned within himself, and saith, Father, I am troubled because of the wickedness of the people of the house of Israel. And when he had said these words, he himself also knelt upon the earth, and behold, he prayed unto the Father, and the things which he prayed cannot be written; and the multitude did bear record, who heard him. And after this manner do they bear record: The eye hath [not] seen, neither hath the ear heard before, so great and marvelous things as we saw and heard Jesus speak unto the Father. And no tongue cannot speak, neither can there be written by any man, neither can the hearts of men conceive so great and marvelous things as we both saw and heard Jesus speak. And no one can conceive of the joy which filled our souls at the time we heard him pray for us unto the Father. (3 Nephi 8:4 RE)

That sounds pretty interesting. That should arouse your curiosity. That should make you want to hear such a prayer and to witness such a thing—because mortals who wrote this record "saw and heard." It's not that it is forbidden from anyone to see or to hear. It's that some things that are seen and heard are forbidden from being put on public display to be profaned by people who will do far more injury to themselves by acting the part of the fool in relation to them than they already do to themselves by mocking and holding in derision things that are most sacred that are on public view.

So, the vision of the Three Degrees of Glory ends with these words:

But great and marvelous are the works of the Lord, and the mysteries of his kingdom which he shewed unto us, which surpasseth all understanding, in glory, and in might, and in dominion, which he commanded us we should not write while we were yet in the spirit, and are not lawful for men to utter, neither is man capable to make them known, for they are only to be seen and understood by the power of the holy ghost, which God bestows on those who love him and purifieth themselves before him, to whom he grants the privilege of seeing and knowing for themselves, that through the power and manifestation of the spirit, while in the flesh, they may be able to bear his presence in the world of glory. (T&C 69:29, emphasis added)

—not something to happen in the great and glorious afterlife but to be done while in the flesh. And it's purposeful. It has a relationship between the exposure of the individual to the information about these things in the flesh, so as to preserve and to prepare them for what will take place in the world of Glory, that they might be able to occupy a position there and do something meaningful to help advance the work of the Lord.

We've spent too long, as believers in the Restoration, quibbling over who's got the button. That "button, button, who's got the button" game that was put up on the board awhile ago. "Frankly, my dear, I don't give a damn," although what? That's now censored. So, "Dude, where's my car?" Oops, someone gets that...

Okay, so—it doesn't matter. It doesn't matter who's got the button, because I can tell you none of them do. If they had it, they really wouldn't talk about it. They wouldn't put it on display. They wouldn't boast themselves. They wouldn't go about chest-thumping. They wouldn't buy a toupe to put on their elderly chest in order to expose chest hair and the gold necklace to say with (turn the reverberation on...), "I am the man." Because if they really were the man, their interest would not be in being celebrated; their interest would be in helping to elevate others.

Joseph Smith grew to hate what he had created in the organized Church. You see, it was the positions of authority within the Church that created the crisis that resulted in the war in Missouri and the apostasy of the leadership in Far West that created the mess that got Joseph Smith arrested for treason. It was the position of authority within the hierarchy that gave legitimacy to the affidavits that were saying that Joseph Smith was, in fact, a treasonous traitor. And so, sitting in Liberty Jail and contemplating everything that had gone on, Joseph Smith took the hierarchical model that had turned on him—the model that had created the presumption that if you were in a position of authority, then you obviously had credibility and throw-weight and power and influence—and he threw it all away with no power or influence can or ought to be maintained by virtue of the priesthood; only by meekness, gentleness, persuasion, long-suffering, and pure knowledge, that will greatly enlarge the soul (see T&C 139:6). He changed the paradigm in the dungeon in Liberty Jail, and there he said, "Your position doesn't matter."

And a true messenger sent from God, interested in the salvation of others, is never going to stand up and say, "I need to be supported by your tithes and offering. I need to be the boss, and I need to jerk you around and tell you which way's up, and you shouldn't question. You shouldn't have any thoughts of your own. Those thoughts are mischievous, and if you get too far with that, we're gonna excommunicate your ass," but...

That whole approach was thrown out in Liberty Jail, and then when he talks to the Relief Society sisters in 1842, he says, "Your minds in times past have been darkened because you're depending too much upon the prophet. You're neglecting the duties that are devolving upon yourselves." He's rescinding authority. He's saying, "Let's take everyone—myself, Joseph, included—and let's say everyone is on exactly the same level. There's no greater; there's no lesser." The question is who preaches truth? What is it that comes out of the teachings of a man that appeals to your heart, that appeals to your soul?

Jesus didn't come on the road of Emmaus to put on any kind of display, and He didn't glow in the dark. In fact, their eyes were holden that they could not recognize who it was that walked alongside them. It wasn't until he departed from them that they said, "Did not our hearts burn within us while he spoke with us yet in the way?" That! That is the sign. That is the evidence. That is how you know the words contained within them, the power of God unto redemption. And when I read the First Vision, I read a record that to me resonates with the truth, even without the research having been done to confirm that it occurred in May 26th of 1820.

[Audience Member]: March.

March, yeah. Yeah, it was before April. It was in March. Even without that research having been done, I knew that only fools would criticize and hold Joseph in derision. I have never been disappointed in the search into the life of Joseph and the teachings of Joseph.

Nephi saw and heard unspeakable things and found a way to make that information available public by using the words of Isaiah and then, at the end, giving a targum in order to explain what it was he just did for you in the words that he'd been quoting.

Joseph Smith saw and heard things that he couldn't at that time speak of, and throughout his ministry, he would get up and expound upon a passage in Genesis or words that show up in Ezekiel. And he would lift the veil a bit, and he talked about how he always delighted in uncovering some new thing using the Scriptures. Joseph Smith practically confined his sermonizing to the Old and New Testaments because of the audience. Had the audience been a little different, he may have expanded what it was that he used as his text material (from the Old and New Testaments) into the Book of Mormon (because he rarely cited it), and he may have expanded further into some of his own revelations had he been around long enough and had the people been prepared adequately in order to receive it.

You have to wonder how often Joseph looked at Christ teaching the Nephites—getting to the point that he saw they were saturated and said, "I can't tell you what I've been sent here to tell you because you're just not ready. Here's what we'll do. Let's send you home tonight and prepare your minds, and maybe tomorrow we can get there," and then he has the idea, "Hey, bring any sick here." And they bring the sick, and he heals them; and "Hey, bring the children." And they bring the children, and he ministers to the children so that He (in an audience whose hearts are pure enough) can convey information; and the others—the older audience members—can be voyeurs, looking in on the sermon that He wanted to conclude.

Well, I think—just like Nephi used Isaiah—Joseph Smith used the Scriptures, and he was able (by teaching the Scriptures) to lift the veil on things that he saw and heard that were not otherwise permitted to be put out there. And so, when you get to something like the King Follett Discourse, you may be getting a peek into what (in section 76—the vision of the Three Degrees of Glory) the words of that were forbidden from being recorded. He found another way in which to testify about these things.

It's one of the tricks that Nephi used, that Joseph used, and the question always is: At what point are you hearing about things from beyond the veil that are forbidden from being otherwise put out in the public?

Well, let me end by saying Joseph Smith was not only a better historian of his own life, but one of the most remarkable things that Joseph Smith gave us was also a more accurate history of the father of the righteous in the book of Abraham. The book of Abraham is one of the single most important revelations that have ever been handed out. It's been badly handled by people who defend the faith. It's been left subject to criticism that is so unwarranted that, once again, you have fools holding in derision a work that should not be criticized—should be upheld, should be studied, and should be prayerfully approached. Maybe, at some point, I'll mount a defense of that.

I'm out of time. Thank you for coming. Thank you for organizing this. Thank all those who have participated in the talks that have been given in the conference. I really appreciate how despite... I mean, Tausha never learns the same lesson. She has to repeat it—year in, year out. This stuff is kind of brutal on her, and you know, sometimes we get a phone call or an email that kind of reflects the Lamentations of Tausha about trying this again. I mean, Boise State University short-sheeted her, speakers declined to travel, things just became awkward. And you know, she's only set back for a few hours, and then she's right back at it and persisted through. So, for everyone who's helped, including all the technical people involved, thank you for organizing it again. Thank you.

2020.06.28 Gospel Tangents Interview

June 28, 2020

Rick Bennett: Welcome to Gospel Tangents. I'm really excited to have a wonderful guest here in the Restoration movement. Could you go ahead and tell us who you are?

Denver Snuffer: Denver Snuffer, reluctant interviewee.

Rick: [laughter]

Denver: Been persuaded by the promises that you made of remuneration.

Rick: [laughter] Remuneration...

Denver: Yeah, yeah. No, I don't like doing interviews, but after the request was made, I watched a few of the interviews that you've done, and I communicated with Lindsay Hansen Park. And the style of interview that you have really doesn't seem to have an agenda. You're just interested in letting people talk. I watched her interview; I watched Michael Quinn's. So, yeah, this is one of those rare occasions where I'm willing to talk.

Rick: [laughter] Well, I feel really lucky. I'm excited to have you on, so this is fantastic. So, how would you introduce yourself? I mean, I think some people would call you a prophet. Is that a title you accept? Or how do you...? How does that...?

Denver: There's a whole lot of baggage that has accumulated around the idea of some title, some honorific title. And the trappings that go along with those kinds of things are unwanted, unwelcomed, and I just don't like it. I commented one time that in all of scripture, the use of the term Beloved is confined almost exclusively to the Savior. It's a sacred appellation—Beloved—and it gets used by the Lord on rare occasion when He is talking to an individual that is in the presence of the Lord, and He's being acknowledged or promised something by God. So, the appellation Beloved is, to me, inappropriate to use because of its sacred nature outside of talking about the Lord's Beloved, which is Christ.

Beloved prophet: Now you're also going one step further because my understanding of the role of a prophet— It's like Joseph said: A prophet is only a prophet when a prophet's doing something that fits within that framework. Anyone can have a revelation —anyone. It's not confined to Christians; it's not confined to denominational leaders. Revelations are available, generally, to the entirety of mankind in every culture, every religion everywhere in the world. A prophet is someone whose revelation was not intended for necessarily that person but was intended to be a public message.

Almost all revelation is individual, personal, and the property correctly belonging to the recipient of that revelation. A prophet's message really doesn't belong to him. In fact, on some occasions, the message a prophet receives is something that he doesn't even understand himself. He's gonna have to parse it through and try to untangle the content to understand it himself. So, the message to a prophet is not personal; it's not directed to merely him. It's a message to the world.

So, in that context, the term gets misused a lot and—in particular, in this culture, in this geography—implies status, control, deference, authority. And I make no claim to authority. I make no claim to preside over anyone. I make no claim to be anything other than a fellow sojourner here trying our best to follow God.

But you caught me at a fortuitous moment because I now have the culmination of years of work by hundreds of volunteers. And maybe the best way to put a context to me is for me to talk about this [holding up his RE Scriptures].

Rick: Okay.

Denver: These are prototypes. It'll go into production. But we now have a print copy of a new set of scriptures. There are three volumes. The Old Covenants volume is the Joseph Smith Translation of the Old Testament. It begins with Genesis that most LDS people would recognize as the Book of Moses in the The Pearl of Great Price.

Rick: Okay.

Denver: So, the Joseph Smith Translation-Genesis text begins with the Book of Moses, and then, it follows the Joseph Smith Translation version of the Old Testament to the end. That's all in the first volume called The Old Covenants.

Rick: So, that's basically the Old Testament plus the Book of Moses, basically? Is that it? And Joseph Smith's translation...

Denver: It's the Old Testament-Joseph Smith Translation version.

Rick: Mm-hmm.

Denver: And it's the most accurate version of what Joseph did that has ever found its way into print. The Reorganized Church, now the Community of Christ, published what they called the Joseph Smith Translation.

Rick: Inspired Version I think is what they call it.

Denver: The Inspired Version of the Bible.

Rick: Mm-hmm.

Denver: The problem with that is that it was not entirely complete in that they omitted dozens of things that Joseph had done, but the committee that was responsible for publishing it also inserted things that they thought ought be in there. Therefore, the Inspired Version in the RLDS is not what you'll find in this [tapping the RE volume]. The Inspired Version—we've had people compare with the available material, and all of the changes that were omitted are included. All of the additions that were made by others are deleted. And in addition, during talks Joseph Smith gave in the Nauvoo era, there were times when he was talking about a passage of scripture from the Bible, and he would comment that "a more correct translation..." or "a more correct reading..." And then, he would alter the text that he just read out of the Bible. He didn't always do that in the manuscript of the Joseph Smith Translation, but all of those Nauvoo-era comments that he made were picked up and were also added. So, it's the most complete set.

Rick: Wow.

Denver: Joseph Smith also always intended to publish both the New Testament and the Book of Mormon in a single volume. So, the second— The first volume is called The Old Covenants because those are the covenants (plural) that went with Adam and Enoch and Noah and Abraham and Moses down to the time of Christ.

The second volume is called The New Covenants. It's the New Testament and the Book of Mormon. Again, it has the same Joseph Smith Translation version put into it with all of the corrections—most complete version. But, in addition, we have a different Book of Mormon text. Joseph Smith dictated the translation of the Book of Mormon, and it was written by various scribes beginning with Emma Smith's handwriting and ending with Oliver Cowdery's handwriting. That material was then used by Oliver Cowdery to make the printer's manuscript.

The printer's manuscript was intended to be a faithful copy of the original translation, but we know from a comparison between what has survived of the original and the printer's manuscript, that we have 100% of, that Oliver Cowdery made about one and a half copying mistakes per page of the printer's manuscript. That manuscript was then taken to the E. B. Grandin shop, and it was John Gilbert who got hired by E .B. Grandin to typeset the Book of Mormon. John Gilbert took the printer's manuscript, which has no punctuation on it, and then, he punctuated and typeset the Book of Mormon. John Gilbert did what he did in punctuating based upon his understanding of how the words that were on that page should be understood.

There's been this controversy that has existed in Mormonism (scholarly articles being written) about how Joseph Smith's understanding of God changed from, originally, a trinitarian view into, later, a different view where there's different personages who belong to the Godhead. And as evidence for Joseph Smith's earlier trinitarian understanding of the Godhead, they point to the original Book of Mormon text. Well, the punctuation that was put in by John Gilbert, if you repunctuate it, can change from a trinitarian view to the later doctrinal view that Joseph Smith would teach and preach and advocate. I've referred to John Gilbert's use of punctuation (I've coined the term the trinitarian comma) because if you take out some commas, or you move them about, you can actually reach exactly the same doctrinal conclusion that Joseph would later teach simply by repunctuating what John Gilbert did.

So, in the second volume, what we've done is— I think I gave two talks in which I changed the punctuation and showed how you could conform to Joseph's later teachings. I think those got in here. But by and large, as much as possible, punctuation has been removed in order to allow the reader a more independent way of coming to grips with the content of the book and to deciding for yourself how best it ought to be understood.

Rick: Hmm.

Denver: It's also— Joseph made a revision, and he was revising again in the 1844 time period, but he revised the Book of Mormon a couple of times while he was still alive. It appears from comparisons that what Joseph was doing in the revisions he was making was trying to take the printed version that we had and make it conform more closely to the original translation, not the printer's manuscript. Errors crept in there. More errors crept in when John Gilbert worked with it. (The printed copy was after John Gilbert's fingerprints were on it.) He took that back to the original translation, and he tried to correct it to conform back to that.

We— Unfortunately, that original translation got put in the cornerstone of the building. It didn't get pulled out until it had rotted. We only have about 22% of the original left. We have 100% of the printer's copy but only 22% of the original. And so, we don't have the ability to go back and completely conform. But as near as it is possible at this point to recapture that, that's the Book of Mormon version that appears in the second volume.

Rick: Hmm.

Denver: Then, the third volume is something called the Teachings and Commandments. It's a chronological layout of the revelations given to Joseph Smith with the exception of the Joseph Smith History. Joseph Smith rewrote the history after ~~John Gilbert~~ [John Whitmer] left the Church and took the history with him. Joseph rewrote the history of the Church in 1838. Then, he published it in the Times and Seasons when he was the editor of the Times and Seasons (it being based upon the 1838 material) because the internal content of the Times and Seasons material is all referencing the 1838 time frame. We don't have that. We do have a copy that was made in 1839, and it was that copy in 1839 that was the basis for the Times and Seasons version.

While Joseph Smith was the editor of the Times and Seasons, his history began to roll out. It's significantly longer than what is in the Pearl of Great Price-Joseph Smith History that Latter-day Saints would be familiar with. But the entirety of this history, while it was written and published with him as the editor, appears as the first section of the Teachings and Commandments. Then, it follows a chronological layout through all of the revelations of Joseph Smith. And once again, we have access to the revelation as Joseph Smith dictated it.

The revelations of Joseph went through two iterations that altered the text. A copy was taken by Oliver Cowdery to Independence, Missouri, to be published as the Book of Commandments. Oliver Cowdery, in setting up the Book of Commandments, felt at liberty because there was a revelation about Oliver having the right to write for the Church but not by way of commandment; yet, he could write. He had the liberty, he thought, to alter some of the texts and to add to them. So, he did that in the Book of Commandments. And the press was overrun, and it was destroyed. Copies of that got salvaged in loose form. They later got gathered up and bound together as the Book of Commandments. But that publishing effort in Independence was abandoned because of the mobs and the destruction of the press. So, in 1835, they published the Doctrine and Covenants in Kirtland.

Well, the Doctrine and Covenants contained, as its very first section, the Lectures on Faith. A committee was appointed to deal with the revelations, the Book of Commandments material. Joseph Smith was part of that committee but apparently didn't contribute. His diaries say that he spent his time editing and correcting Lectures on Faith.

There are those who say that Lectures on Faith appear to be the product of Sidney Rigdon and not Joseph Smith because they did word comparisons. Joseph Smith, before the publication of Doctrine and Covenants, spent his time editing and correcting Lectures on Faith. When he finished with that, and that is apparently the only thing he worked on getting ready for the Doctrine and Covenants to be printed, he said he would vouch for the correctness of the doctrine that is contained in what he had done, that he would stand by every word of it. That portion in the front of the D&C is the doctrine. The covenants are the revelations.

Well, the committee that was working on the revelations included Sidney Rigdon, and he took even more liberties than had Oliver Cowdery with revelations that had come to Joseph. And so, what you have in the LDS version of the Doctrine and Covenants are two steps removed from the original revelation to Joseph. And what is in the Teachings and Commandments is a chronological layout that includes Lectures on Faith that, insofar as we are able to accurately do so, recaptures exactly what the original revelation was and states it, as near as we can get at present, comprehensively, chronologically, and accurately in the form that it came as a revelation to Joseph Smith.

Rick: So, you're telling me that you've recanonized Lectures on Faith because that was actually taken out?

Denver: Yes.

Rick: Yeah, so you recanonized it, huh?

Denver: Yeah, it's in here. Lectures on Faith is Section—the Teachings and Commandments Section 110. Yes, recanonized it. It was actually never— See, here's two interesting factoids: first is, Lectures on Faith were canonized by a vote of the Church. They were not removed. They remained, by vote of the Church in General Conference, canonized scripture. They were deleted without a vote by a committee in 1921 that simply took the step of dropping it and saying, "We're not sure it's good material. We're not gonna to keep it in the scriptures." So, it was decanonized.

The second interesting fact is that no conference, until these scriptures, ever accepted and canonized the Book of Mormon. The Book of Mormon was simply accepted, but it was never accepted and canonized by a vote of conference until it was done so for these scriptures.

Rick: You mean in one of your conferences?

Denver: Yeah, it happened in Boise in 2017 as I recall.

So, let me tell you the whole reason behind all of this effort—because hundreds of volunteers, donating thousands of hours of effort, worked tirelessly for a long period of time to put this material together in a correct form.

There was a revelation that was given in September of 1832. The Church got organized in April of 1830. By the time you get to September of 1832, this is the sad news that the Church is getting:

Your minds in times past have been darkened because of unbelief, and because you have treated lightly the things you have received, which vanity and unbelief have brought the whole church under condemnation. And this condemnation rests upon the children of Zion, even all, and they shall remain under this condemnation until they repent and remember the new covenant, even the Book of Mormon, and the former commandments which I have given them, not only to say but to do according to that which I have written, that they may bring forth fruit meet for their Father's kingdom. Otherwise, there remains a scourge and a judgment to be poured out upon the children of Zion.... (T&C 82:20)

So, condemnation was brought, and the focus that most people have on those words is to do. But what became apparent is that the problem is not merely doing. It is also in the saying, meaning that the revelations were entrusted to them, but they weren't accurately preserving or accurately saying, "What it was that I..." And the I in that statement is God — God saying, "I gave this to you, and you're not saying what I said, and you're not doing what I've required of you; and therefore, you're condemned." And this happens within what? eighteen months of the founding of the Church? The condemnation's there?

Well, if they'd taken that seriously in September of 1832, you still had available to you the original translation manuscript that we don't have. They would still have the original revelations to Joseph that we still don't have (or we have not been able to preserve entirely intact), and the recovery effort could have been done by the time you got to the conference in 1835 where they adopt the Doctrine and Covenants with Lectures on Faith and the others. But they didn't do it.

And so, today, when you say, "You're under condemnation because you failed both to say and to do what the Lord had done and said and required that you do," if you're going to set about, at this late date, to try and make that right and to put it all back together again, what you find is that it is—it's an impossible undertaking. You can get close. You can get a whole lot closer than what you do in a traditional Latter-day Saint set of scriptures or a Community of Christ set of scriptures. You can get a whole lot closer, but you really would have needed to undertake this work while Joseph Smith was alive in order to actually accomplish what brought the Church under condemnation in September 1832 to emerge out from under that condemnation.

But this effort was undertaken as the best efforts that can be made with the available source material. And it was a labor of love intending to show, at least to the Lord, that although we may not be able to get all the way there, there is a group of people still left on the earth who take seriously the condemnation and would labor as hard and long as they can to try and bring it back into a restored, accurate state. And that was the scripture project which got presented to the Lord for His approval.

The Teachings and Commandments Section 156 is a prayer that was offered to try and get the scriptures accepted and acknowledged. That Section 156 then received an answer, and that's Section 157.

All of these scriptures are now being produced in a leather-bound set with a 100% cotton paper, leather-bound, gilded edging, finest leather, finest binding, finest printing, and finest materials that we can make. Unfortunately, we had to pay in advance to get them made, so...

Rick: Did you ask Martin Harris to mortgage the farm?

Denver: There were actually a couple people who stepped forward to help with that, individuals who contributed in order to get the minimum order made to satisfy the requirements. I think there— It's more than 2500 but less than 3000 copies of the leather-bound material that's gonna be put out. But they were pre-purchased. So, I think that Benchmark is gonna— I think they ordered 15 sets of the three volumes. I think they'll have 15 sets available for sale. But it will require another pre-order at some point in the future before there's ever a second printing. But they're really quite nice and quite accurate.

Rick: Well, it sounds interesting. When are these gonna be available? Can the public purchase these, then?

Denver: No, they would have had to have ordered at the time that the order went in.

Rick: Oh. So, you have to go to Benchmark to get them, huh?

Denver: Well, there will be 15 lucky souls that are able to get them through Benchmark. But all the copies that were printed were paid for in advance. I think I personally placed the largest single order because I bought them for myself, my wife, all of my children, and if my children are married, for their spouse, also. So I bought a number of copies.

Rick: Wow. How much do they run?

Denver: This is what's interesting. The printer that we got for this wanted to get into the Bible-publishing business because the Bible is the largest-selling book in the world still, today. And he'd never printed a Bible. So, he competed with multiple printers around the world that we got bids for. The best Bible printers are not in the United States.

Rick: Hmm.

Denver: The very best is in the Netherlands: Royal Jongbloed. Well, we passed around a copy of the Royal Jongbloed among the committee, and everyone oohed and aahed, but to get them to put these together, it would've been about $500 for this set. Okay? But we loved it.

It just so happens that a fellow was on the committee who builds books as a living. He restores books; he makes them, handmade. But he'll take a rare book— He's restored the majority of the existing prints of the original E. B. Grandin Book of Mormon that had been restored. He did it. He was on the committee. He went through, and he prepared the specs for the printer who wanted to get into the Bible-publishing business. And this set that I'm holding is based upon the Royal Jongbloed workmanship and specifications, and it was done at a fraction of the cost. I think each of these books is about $34 apiece. The whole set is less than $100.

Rick: Hmm.

Denver: And, I mean, they'll obviously all be sold out because you have to pay in advance. But I'm hoping that someday there'll be a second printing, maybe a third. Who knows?

Rick: I'll have to put my order in to Curt Bench.

Denver: Yeah, call Curt.

Rick: [laughter]

Denver: There's another effort that we've undertaken.

Rick: Oh.

Denver: The original purpose of the Book of Mormon was to try to recover two groups of people. One was a remnant in the Americas. Another was a remnant that is referred to as the Jews. There is— There was one Hebrew Book of Mormon that was made (I think it was in the 1940's), but it was taken out of print, taken off the shelf. And the LDS

Church has signed a treaty with the nation of Israel that they won't do anything to proselytise. So, one of the very target audiences that the Book of Mormon was intended for, the LDS Church has abandoned, by their commitment, in order to get the BYU Jerusalem Center on the north of the Mount of Olives. They agreed that they won't do anything to proselytise.

Well, we're under no such constraint. So, there are two things that are underway. The first is a separate, bound copy of the Book of Mormon which has been rendered into a Jewish-friendly version using Jewish spellings. The names in the Book of Mormon have been altered to Jewish spellings. The language has been— This is in English. I mean, the closest thing I can get in order for you to understand what we're talking about is: This is a Yiddish version of the Book of Mormon. It's been published and titled The Stick of Joseph in the Hands of Ephraim, and it has a Hebrew subtitle. That has been printed as part of this printing effort, also, and it will be given away. Several hundred copies of that book will be given away to Jewish people for them to consider the Book of Mormon in a more Jewish context.

And then, secondly, the Book of Mormon itself is currently being translated into Hebrew and will be published as a Hebrew text. The LDS Church, after they took the Hebrew Book of Mormon out of print, donated that translation to the Genealogical Society of Utah. The Genealogical Society of Utah microfilmed it, and we got a copy of it on microfilm. But as it turns out, it's not a particularly good Hebrew translation; so, it's being redone. A volunteer...

Rick: So, this is in Hebrew, then?

Denver: [holding the book] This is not. This is in English.

Rick: That's in English.

Denver: But it's in English with Hebrew spellings and Hebrew usages in it. But it's an English version.

Rick: So, instead of using Jesus, it's going to use Yeshua?

Denver: Yeah, it's—yes, exactly. And Moshiyah instead of Mosiah. I mean, it'll be Jewish- friendly.

The Hebrew-language version, which will be in Hebrew, is a work that's underway. Volunteers and then, some professionals are being compensated, and then, a PhD who — His specialty for his doctoral thesis was rendering into Hebrew, English material, taking English material and converting it into Old Testament Hebrew language. That was his PhD thesis. He's on the faculty of a major university. He's doing the final edit on the work that is being done to bring it into a Hebrew language. And when that's done and is published, it should withstand scrutiny from the most scrupulous rabbi of anywhere in the world—New York, Jerusalem, Amsterdam—doesn't matter. It will withstand scrutiny as a...

Rick: Are you sure? I've heard the saying, "Take two Jewish rabbis, and you get three opinions." [laughter]

Denver: Well, they may differ on what they do with the text, but they won't differ on the language that got used in order to bring it about. But we're doing an equally serious effort with Native Americans and the remnant there.

We don't necessarily want a lot of attention for the effort that's being made. In fact, there's a lot of disappointment, even bitterness, among Native American people because of what happened historically with the Indian placement program with that Indian School that's now abandoned. Much of it's been dismantled up in Brigham City.

Rick: The Intermountain High School.

Denver: Yeah, the Intermountain High School. There are children who were run through that program, who are now adults, who felt that they had been put upon, abused, belittled, discriminated against, mistreated at the hands of an institution. So, to say, "Hey, we're Mormons, kind of," or "We aren't Mormons, but we're bringing you the Book of Mormon," it's off-putting. You're gonna have an uphill battle to even get a fair hearing because the LDS effort has been disastrously off-putting. So, we're trying to deal with, cope with the trauma that has been inflicted by others in hoping to get a fair hearing for what the Restoration could mean to Native American peoples and getting them to respect what Joseph meant and what Joseph was attempting to do and what the Book of Mormon was really intended to accomplish. But we're not doing it with a lot of fanfare because the more fanfare that gets called to something, the more people will draw comparisons and analogies that just aren't true.

I mean, my personal view is that the LDS Church institutionally has pursued an institutional self-interest. A byproduct of their self-interest, fortunately, has been the preservation of the Book of Mormon, for which I'm grateful, the preservation of the Doctrine and Covenants, for which I'm grateful. I don't think that they were as interested in accuracy of the material or even in obedience to the material or trying to understand the material. But it served a self-interest, and that self-interest has been a blessing to me—because they may have profited; they may have built themselves a trillion dollar empire off of the back of these things. That doesn't matter to me. What matters to me is that they have gifted to me, generations later, the Book of Mormon text, and now, through The Joseph Smith Papers, enough material I can do something to recover it; and through the work of Royal Skousen, enough so that I can compare every edition in one volume side by side.

Rick: Royal Skousen was a big part of this. It sounds like he was.

Denver: His work product was. His work product was a phenomenal help. But he personally didn't participate in anything.

Rick: Right.

Denver: But The Joseph Smith Papers, which is also the product of the LDS Church, has been a marvelous aid. I buy The Joseph Smith Papers as they come off the press. I've got every volume. But I mark them up. Mine have interlineations, handwriting, cross-references.

The editors will introduce material. In their introduction, they will absolutely contradict the document you're about to read. It's glaringly stupid how they've approached some of this material. They will footnote stuff to say, "There is more to this story, and this is the 'more to the story'" because they sincerely, devoutly believe that it stayed on the rails after Joseph died and that what they inherited (and the traditions require that they take this position)—what they inherited is, in fact, a preservation of the Restoration through Joseph Smith. But The Joseph Smith Papers demonstrate that it's anything but that. The editorial contributions, the footnotes, the headnotes, the descriptions that they give, and the arguments that they make— It just wouldn't withstand scrutiny if you were subjecting it to, for example, the rules of evidence to get a document admitted in a courtroom. But that's a whole nother story. Anyway, we're trying to fix that in this.

Rick: I understand that historians and lawyers have different rules.

Denver: Sure.

Rick: And I have to mention, you are a lawyer, right?

Denver: Yeah, yeah. Yeah.

Rick: I probably should've introduced that earlier.

Denver: Right.

Rick Bennett: All right. So, I've got a bunch of questions that I want to ask. So, since you mentioned the Book of Mormon translation that you've done, you said that if you take out the punctuation, then it becomes less trinitarian.

Denver Snuffer: Yes.

Rick: Also, you mentioned—cuz I've read Lectures on Faith, and one of my understandings is Lectures on Faith is very trinitarian, and I feel like that's kind of why the LDS Church put that away. And so, I'm curious cuz you've reCanonized that. To me, the Lectures on Faith sounds very trinitarian. And the Book of Mormon, as we have it, does sound very trinitarian. So, it's interesting to me to hear you say, "Well, if you take out the punctuation..." I guess it would support more of a Nauvoo-style theology. Is that...

Denver: Oh, yeah, yeah, yeah. Yeah. / think so.

Rick: So, how would you respond to that, I guess?

Denver: Well [flipping pages], let me see if I can find the language. The lecture that talks about who God is— See, one of my problems is that I just got this on the 25th, and this is the 28th.

Rick: Oh, so you haven't gotten...

Denver: I haven't gotten to Lectures on Faith to look at it just yet [looking up a scripture].

There's a definition given of who God is in Lectures on Faith. And it says that there is God the Father who is a personage of spirit, power, glory. And then, there's God the Son, and He's a personage. And then, there's the Holy Ghost, and the Holy Ghost is the mind of the Father and the Son. And that is very Nauvoo-era, doctrinally correct. And that definition of God is one that he returns to. The Holy Ghost in the Lectures on Faith makes the personage of God two individuals. And then, in addition to the two individuals, the Holy Ghost is the mind of the two of them. Well, this is also in your Pearl of Great Price definition because it's in the Book of Moses; but it's in Genesis chapter 4 in these.

Therefore, it is given to abide in you: the Record of Heaven, the Comforter, the keys of the kingdom of Heaven, the truth of all things, that which quickens all things — which makes alive all things, that which knows all things, and [that which] has all power according to Wisdom, mercy, truth, justice, and judgment.
[Genesis 4:9 RE]

That's in the Book of Moses in the Pearl of Great Price, Genesis 4 in The Old Covenants. That's the definition of the Holy Ghost, the Comforter that God, or that Christ says He will send (in the Book of John) to the disciples after He ascends. That Comforter is the Record of Heaven, the Comforter, the keys of the kingdom, the truth of all things, and so on—which is exactly what is the lecture-on-faith description of the Holy Ghost, which is the mind of the Father and the mind of the Son, the Record of Heaven, the truth of all things, that which quickeneth all things.

And so, you have two personages in Lectures on Faith. You have the Holy Ghost that is really a manifestation of their minds. You have in the Book of Moses the Joseph Smith Translation of Genesis chapter 4, the Holy Ghost being the Record of Heaven, the truth of all things, the Comforter. You have the Holy Ghost not as a personage. You have the Holy Ghost as a kind of vibrant force of truth that is bestowed upon mankind generally. Then, we have from the Willard Richards pocket book that statement by Joseph that "The Father has a body of flesh and bones, the Son also, but the Holy Ghost has not a body of flesh and bones but is a spirit; were it not so, it could not dwell within us."

And there's an interesting article written about how that came about. That didn't stabilize. It went through multiple iterations and multiple expanding and contracting versions of what it was that is attributed to Joseph Smith before Brigham Young finally settled the dispute and reduced it to what is now in the LDS Doctrine and Covenants. That may or may not be a reliable definition of the Holy Ghost. Certainly, what we have in Lectures on Faith that Joseph vouched for the accuracy of, and what we have in the Genesis chapter 4, or Pearl of Great Price-Moses (there! I think it's Moses chapter 6) is a kind of different definition.

So, I don't think Joseph started out trinitarian, although when he reports what he learned from the First Vision (in his story that he wrote in 1838) is that he went home and, essentially, said, "I learned for myself that Presbyterianism isn't true." And that was his response to his mother when she thought he looked rather haggard from what the encounter was. "Never mind. I'm well enough off. I've learned for myself that Presbyterianism isn't true." And I think that was probably what Joseph got out of the First Vision on the day after the First Vision.

Anyway...

Rick: Okay. So, you're saying that Lectures on Faith is not trinitarian, essentially. Is that...

Denver: No, I don't think so.

Rick: You don't think it is.

Denver: Yeah. Yeah.

Rick: Okay. And so, you're saying that the Book of Mormon, if you take out that punctuation as Joseph originally wrote it, is not trinitarian, either.

Denver: Right. I'm saying you can repunctuate. The Book of Mormon in the LDS version is still John Gilbert's punctuation. Today. The LDS Church is living with John Gilbert's punctuation. We're not. And it's easy to repunctuate and to reach a different result.

I've given a talk on this, and there's stuff out there that will demonstrate what I'm talking about if you're interested or if someone listening's interested.

Rick: Yeah. Well, so, a couple other things I want to talk about since we're talking about your scriptures— And I guess I should mention I've read your book, Passing the Heavenly Gift. One of the things...

Denver: And you're willing to admit that? Do you still have a temple recommend?

Rick: [laughing] I do, actually.

But, yeah. So, we should probably talk about that one because that was a bit of a controversial book. And I do want to talk about the history of that. But the reason why I bring it up in the context of your scriptures is when I read it, one of the interesting things to me was your take on Section 132 of the Doctrine and Covenants. And from what I understand, you had said—and I've heard various things, so, maybe you can clear up this— but when you wrote in Passing the Heavenly Gift, you had mentioned it was really four revelations. And I like that interpretation. I don't know that I necessarily agree that that's historically accurate, but— So, I'm curious if you still stand behind what you've written, cuz I understand you've kind of evolved on your beliefs about polygamy. So, will you talk about that?

Denver: Like any interested and attentive Latter-day Saint, my understanding of the history of what happened in the early Church began using the B. H. Roberts material, the Joseph Smith History as gathered by B. H. Roberts.

I got baptized September 10th of 1973. There was a lady in our ward that ran a Seventies Mission Bookstore. I don't know if anyone in your audience is old enough to remember Seventies Mission bookstores...

Rick: So, Anne Wilde—I interviewed her, and she mentioned it.

Denver: Yeah, yeah. Anyway, it was on her porch. I bought and I read, you know, the Autobiography of Parley Pratt. I read all the biographies of Heber C. Kimball, John Taylor. I read the (what's it?) seven-volume set by B. H. Roberts. I read the multiple-volume set that was attributed to Joseph Smith that is the forerunner of The Joseph Smith Papers project. I read everything I could get my hands on in order to try and understand. I mean, if this is really the work of God—if God restored something, He's speaking again; and He hasn't done that since we close out the New Testament record. Now, He's speaking, and stuff is rolling forth that tells us the mind of God. Then, we ought to pay particular attention.

So, in the era that I came in, that 1973 time frame, you're really looking at leadership that consists of Joseph Fielding Smith's son-in-law, Bruce R. McConkie, who's the doctrinal go-to guy. You've got, you know, Marion Romney; he can stand his own. You've got Mark Peterson who thinks he's all that on doctrine. And, you know, you had — Well, N. Eldon Tanner was a money guy. But you've got men up there— Boyd K. Packer who ran CES at the time. You got men who have really strong opinions and, essentially, a consensus about what was and what was not history. And then, you wind up with Arrington, and Arrington winds up hiring D. Michael Quinn. And then, Arrington appears to go a little off the reservation, and D. Michael Quinn appears to go way off the reservation. And my initial reaction to what D. Michael Quinn did was to think, "What an awful turn of events that a man would apostasy [apostatize] and then turn around and trash the history of the Restoration in this wretched fashion." But it was Michael Quinn's work that got me looking for and trying to find original source material.

Michael Quinn donated a bunch of the material that he had to Yale University, and then, Signature Books had someone go back to Yale University; or maybe they went back on their own, and Signature was just the ones that would print it. And so, these diaries and these journals begin to roll out that is the source material from which Michael Quinn drew his conclusions cuz he had access to and made copies from the Church archives that weren't particularly open. Arrington made them open somewhat, but they weren't particularly open. So, Church history was written from a closed point of view, a controlled point of view. And Michael Quinn actually represents sort of opening the door and seeing behind the orthodox interpretation.

So, the materials that Michael Quinn made available became available. And this orthodox, traditional view of history which I understood well— I mean, I had studied it. I was a Fielding Smith-McConkie-Packer disciple; and to me, Michael Quinn's view was heretical. But as you begin to examine the source material from which Michael Quinn drew his conclusions, you begin to see that in some respects, he's not at all unfair. And in some ways, he's not just fair, but he's kindly. He's being sympathetic in his viewpoint. He got in a lot of trouble because what he wrote had a far different look and feel than the look and feel that you get from this other narrative.

So, Passing the Heavenly Gift was an attempt to take a whole nother bundle of source material that existed and was available, and I'd gone to the trouble of buying these small print— You know, 300 copies were all that were ever put in print. But Curt Bench over at Benchmark is one of the outlets that sells this stuff. So, I was able to access these diaries, these journals, and to look at it myself. And my attitude towards Michael Quinn changed considerably, and my view of what the Church was doing with their history changed considerably.

But of all the subjects that are out there, probably the most controversial, internationally known, dramatic topic of all is the plural marriage subject. I mean, I don't want to get really granular about it, but to me, it required over 40 years of research to reach a conclusion.

It wasn't a single view. I mean, if you're gonna read everything that is said by the advocates and the defenders of the plural marriage establishment through Joseph Smith, you have a library of material that you're gonna have to plow through. And if you're gonna to say, "Okay, what are the arguments, then, on the other side of the coin about the issue of plural marriage?"—because you've got Emma denying that Joseph ever practiced that. But you also have incidents in which Emma Smith was present in something that happened that William McClellan tries to sensationalize in his account, talking about his discussion with Emma about the very incident that you're talking about. And then, you've got Joseph's view of that, and you've got Oliver Cowdery's accusation, and the minutes of the High Council in Far West when Oliver Cowdery was disciplined for what he was saying about that same incident.

Rick: You're talking about Fanny Alger.

Denver: The Fanny Alger stuff. And you've got all of these points to triangulate from, you know. What are you to make of it? I can tell you that story and make Joseph Smith an adulterer and a plural marriage practitioner; or I can tell you that story, and I can make Joseph Smith absolutely chaste and that what happened there was not by any stretch a sexual liaison.

Fanny Alger would have nine children from a husband. Joseph Smith fathered eight children through Emma Smith. They were both at the peak of their fertility when the two of them had something going on, and yet there was no progeny; there was no child. In fact, there's no child born that was fathered by Joseph Smith other than the children that came through Emma Smith. So, if you're gonna turn Joseph Smith into something that is akin to the narrative told by the LDS Church, one of the questions that ought to enter into your balancing of what happened is the absence of any progeny when you've got a fertile man, and you've got fertile women who bore children to other men but never bore a child for Joseph Smith. What effect ought that have on your thinking and interpretation of the historical events? You got Emma Smith's denial that anything had gone on.

So, it's a long, arduous process to get through enough of the source material in order to form a fair opinion. And even after you form a fair opinion— And the one I had initially (in Passing the Heavenly Gift) reached was that if people are reliable— And one of the stories of the angel with the drawn sword comes from Eliza Snow; and Eliza Snow is someone for whom I had some respect. So, I'm gonna give credence to that because of her. And the story that she tells suggested that something happened in order to provoke Joseph to initially begin implementation of something that Joseph Smith was reluctant to implement.

Well, you go to the High Council minutes in Far West, and Joseph is acquitted, and Oliver Cowdery is convicted of slandering him. And everyone heard it. You go to the incident in Nauvoo when Joseph dictated a revelation in July of 1843. It was written down by William Clayton. Hyrum Smith took the revelation; it was read to the High Council of Nauvoo. The High Council minutes in Nauvoo talk about what was read to them, and they say it's an explanation of an ancient order of things, and it has nothing to do with some practice today.

How do you reconcile all of the different triangulation points?—because this, now, is a contemporary statement both in the High Council in Far West and the High Council in Nauvoo. These are contemporaneous things that suggest there's a problem with the narrative that Joseph is out there bedding women including, in the most outrageous form, bedding young teenagers. Well, to his credit, when he wrote Rough Stone Rolling, Bushman grapples with this issue. He comes down on the side of the historical storytelling, but he says that—and I'm paraphrasing, but this is pretty close—he says that Joseph Smith was not a nefario and that he didn't father children with other women, that his desire for sealing appears to be related to plentitude in the afterlife, plentitude in the afterlife.

Well, somewhere along the line, the idea of sealing and the idea of marriage become one and the same. And they overlap into "Well, if someone's sealed, then someone's married." And it's not at all clear. If you go back— It's really hard for people to accept this idea.

Well, I had dinner with Michael Quinn, and I posed this...

Rick: Oh, that's interesting.

Denver: Yeah, I posed this to him over dinner. I said, "Okay, let's take June 27th, 1844, and let's say, 'Right there—that's the end of the historical record.'"

Rick: That's the death of Joseph Smith.

Denver: Yes, that's the day Joseph is killed, and Hyrum.

"That's the end. You consider nothing that got written down or got introduced after June 27, 1844; and you are limited, absolutely, to the material that got its existence (put pen to paper) before that date. 'Kay? What do you have? What do you have to support Joseph Smith practicing plural marriage with sexual relations with other women than Emma?"

It was an interesting dinner. It was an interesting evening. We had an...

Rick: What did Quinn say?

Denver: ...interesting conversation.

Well, I don't know if I oughta quote him. I don't know if your listeners are going to be offended. But we got on that topic because he said that his reaction to my position on the plural marriage subject was bullshit. And I said, "Well, okay then, let's start with the proposition that we're gonna take June 27th, and we're only gonna go before." And we went back and forth for a few minutes, and he said, "I see where you're coming from," —because if you consider the source material that only was extant on that date...

Rick: So, you throw out all the Temple Lot case and everything cuz it's after June 27th.

Denver: Yeah, all of that stuff. All the affidavits got gathered. Look, the idea that you get to practice plural wivery is not made public until 1852 in a general conference talk in which Orson Pratt was assigned to introduce the topic by Brigham Young; and then, Brigham gets up. And then, you've got the assistant historian that had worked in Nauvoo (and who was working in Salt Lake under the leadership of Kimball) running the historian's office. And he says, in one of his diary entries, that the records that they brought with them from Nauvoo— The records were being altered to conform to the new regime.

Rick: You're talking about Heber Kimball?

Denver: No, he worked under Heber Kimball.

Rick: Oh.

Denver: His name will occur to me in a minute. But he wrote in his diary (who he's working under) that the records were now being altered in order to fit the new system of things, the new regimen. And so, you have to question if they're willing to go so far as to interlineate and alter original source material including William Clayton's own diary being altered.

One entry that you can see in The Joseph Smith Papers has this incredibly innocent statement that is about fidelity and monogamy, and it's turned into a statement about how only one man at a time has the authority to introduce the plural wife system, and that he, Joseph, was that guy—from interlineations. I've written about all this.

Anyway, the fact is that if you confine yourself to what existed at the time that Joseph was alive, you have a very, very difficult time saying that there is evidence Joseph did anything other than practice something called sealing that was designed to create plentitude in the afterlife. Joseph Smith, as Bushman described it, wanted large families to go into the eternities. In John Taylor's book, The Government of God, he asserts that the government of God in eternity is the family. So, if Joseph Smith is trying to restore on earth the family of God, the way in which you restore the family of God is to bind people together into some sealed family connection—doesn't matter that they're married to one another. If you seal them together, you seal people into a family relationship that can exist on into eternity.

So, Joseph doesn't use the word adoption in the context of sealing until October of 1843. In The Joseph Smith Papers, that's the earliest date I can find that—in his diaries—that the word adoption gets used.

Rick: Like as in the Law of Adoption.

Denver: Yeah, a very misunderstood concept, but Joseph practiced something that was adoption. But apparently, the introduction of that occurs in about the October 1843 time frame.

Until then, if you're talking sealing without defining what sealing meant, you weren't using the word adoption. You were using the word marriage, in people's projection of what the word meant, backward. If the sealing that took place was some form of familial tie that was designed to bind together as a family to Joseph, who had a connection that had been made to heaven, then what was being sealed was a family and not a sexual partner.

But beginning in that October 1843 time frame, there comes out something that results in adoption. Joseph will be dead within six months. Between the October mention and the time of his death six months later, there really isn't enough time in order to develop even an adequate historical record of what Joseph was doing with the idea of adoption in that time period. It gets mentioned. And then, what happens is that following his death, by the time you get to the 1845-November-to-February-1846 time period, there is adoption practice going on.

The language that we get in the word and the will of the Lord about captains of 50 and captains of 100— It's actually kind of code for public consumption. That was adoption practice going on in the Nauvoo era—so, set that aside for just a moment—adoption being the organization of the companies that were assigned and organized through temple ceremonies and adoption process, preliminary to the migration, the abandonment of the Nauvoo temple, the companies migrating out into the Salt Lake Valley. And they practiced something called adoption.

Then, as they migrate across, there are these conversations that enter into journals. One of the funniest to me is John D. Lee's journal where he's talking about someone asking John D. Lee to be sealed to him (adopted to him) because it's going to increase his kingdom, and John D. Lee saying, "Why would I be adopted to you? Why don't you be adopted to me so I get to be the boss in the afterlife in the government of God?"

Rick: It's all a great pyramid scheme, right?

Denver: Yeah, it's all just fabulously stupid because they're aspiring— If this stuff be truthful, holy, and sacred, they're aspiring to manipulate the afterlife by having introduced to them a concept that Joseph only had a six-month time period between introduction and death, and it doesn't get fleshed out. Then, you have to go to many, many years later when you have journal entries by Cannon and by Taylor and by Pratt, Hyde, and their conversations and the notes of meetings that they held where they say things like, "I never understood what Joseph Smith was doing with adoption." Cannon goes so far as to say, "I didn't believe it when he introduced it, and I don't believe it now." And so, the concept of adoption just drips into wreckage. And adoption as a concept related to sealing turns into mush, and it gets abandoned. It wound up being a fight.

But the idea of adoption had a profound effect on the history of the Church. Because Brigham Young led the first company. They come in; this is the place; they settle down; he has himself anointed a king and a priest in the log cabin that was built; and then, the king returns across the plains back to Winter Quarters. On his way back, he runs into the company that had John Taylor and Parley Pratt in it. John Taylor and Parley Pratt had some kind of sealing-adoption organization put together for the companies they led in the migration. And when Brigham Young met them, they had reorganized the companies that they were in contrary to the way that Brigham Young had adopted folks together in the ceremonies in Nauvoo. So now, they were in defiance of the priesthood by what they'd done. Well, they were members of the Quorum of the Twelve. I mean, the vote that was taken on what? August 8th of 1844? was that the Quorum of the Twelve would take care of the Church, not Brigham Young. It was the Quorum! So, John Taylor and Parley Pratt didn't regard Brigham Young as having any right to rule and reign or dictate over them. They were doing what they thought best. After they saw how the company functioned, they realigned the adoptions as they were going west.

Well, Brigham Young fumed from there all the way back to Winter Quarters. And while we didn't have them before, the collected Complete Discourses of Brigham Young, which I think were put in print for the first time in 2011 — you can look. I mean...

Rick: Yeah, that's a really expensive set.

Denver: Yeah, yeah. I bought one of those. They were meant for libraries, but I bought one. They are expensive, but they're comprehensive. You can read what happened.

When Sidney Rigdon was campaigning to be elected after the death of Joseph Smith, his speechifying in Nauvoo to try and solicit votes for him was bizarre. I mean, he seems deranged. Brigham Young spent several days trying to persuade Wilford Woodruff that he, Brigham Young, needed to be elected president. They needed a president. And Woodruff wouldn't relent. His position was it required a revelation to reorganize the First Presidency. And Brigham Young's position was it didn't require revelation. It just required a vote, that Joseph Smith got made president by a vote of the group; he did not get made president by a revelation.

Rick: Common consent.

Denver: Yeah, it was just an election; it was just— And that he could be elected the same way, and it would have exactly the same effect. No revelation required. And eventually, he wore down Wilford Woodruff. Woodruff got on board with that, and they assembled. They called a general conference, and they held a vote. In the process of holding the vote, Brigham Young did some speechifying. And I tell you, it reminds me of Sidney Rigdon in the August campaign in Nauvoo for the election. He's practically incoherent.

Now, to give him the benefit of the doubt, he'd kept Wilford Woodruff awake haranguing him, and he couldn't sleep if he was doing that. So, he's sleep-deprived at the time he's giving the talk. But one of the things that he says in the aftermath of being elected is that he could hardly wait to get back to Salt Lake to have Parley Pratt and John Taylor confess that they are not Brigham Young, meaning that now he's in authority, and he alone has the right to dictate what goes on. And that it is an act of apostasy against the priesthood to rebel against what the chief says cuz they apparently were not willing to relent when they came across the plains. So, having been elected as president in Winter Quarters, he goes back to Salt Lake. And the rest of the Quorum of the Twelve, who were back in Salt Lake, have to choose between a fight, again, after relocating from Nauvoo over leadership or submitting to what Brigham was saying. And rather than split things up again, they relented. Brigham was elected, and he says he has the right to dictate.

Well, he still had not yet clarified that he intended to assert that he, and he alone, could seal —because Parley Pratt, even after that, sealed other women to him, including Lenore whose husband would ultimately murder Parley. And Brigham Young would later say that those women that Parley Pratt sealed to himself after Brigham was elected president, was adultery. And he went so far as to say that the murder of Parley Pratt was justified because it was adultery, and he essentially had it coming to him. Because once he was elected president, Brigham Young said, "I, and I alone, am the only guy who gets to do a sealing."

Rick: So, he consolidated the sealing power because it was kind of distributed before that.

Denver: It was far and wide.

All of that history needs to be taken and put into the hopper if you're trying to figure out what Joseph Smith was trying to do with sealing between the Fanny Alger moment and the moment at which Joseph is slain—because if he had absolutely no intention of creating sexual access to women by sealing, but he had, instead, the intention to put together in a form that would be recognized into eternity as a familial connection (as Bushman puts it, familial plentitude) then, we really have to put on a whole different lens if we're gonna try and interpret what went on.

So, I was grappling still in Passing the Heavenly Gift with the whole subject. I was trying to show appropriate deference to whatever the historical narrative was. I mean, I wrote that book as a member of the Church. I mean, I pulled every punch that I could pull in order not to be someone that's just a hostile critic. I believe if the LDS Church had adopted Passing the Heavenly Gift like they adopted Rough Stone Rolling, and they said, "Look, this is a very different way to look at the history of the Restoration. But you can look at it this way. And if you do, you can still be, you know, happy and associate with us." I believe if they had done that, they would be facing today far less of a religious crisis than they are currently facing with the members of the Church.

I never left Mormonism. I never even left the LDS Church; the LDS Church gave me the boot. But, I mean, I was 100% home teacher, I was a tithe payer, I was a temple recommend holder.

Rick: You were on the High Council as I understand?

Denver: I was a...

Rick: You taught Missionary Prep, I think it was?

Denver: I did. I taught Gospel Doctrine. While all this nonsense was going on—the flap about the book—I was helping, at the request of the stake president, a returned missionary who had lost his testimony and was a student at BYU. And so, he said the only one he knew in the stake that could help the young man was me. And so, I had him come over to my house. In fact, I would go to interviews with the stake president preliminary to the issue of whether I'm going to be excommunicated or not, and on my way home from that, I would stop by and get this returned missionary in a faith crisis.

He'd come to my house, and we'd spend time talking about what his issues were. The first issue, and the most troubling to him, was polygamy. So, we started with polygamy. And we spent weeks talking about that topic. Then, the next topic— I forget what it was, but we didn't— He had a list of concerns. By the time we got through the first two, he said, "Really, I don't think I've got any other concerns because what you said satisfies me that I'm looking in the wrong place for answers. There's more substantive material out there that answers."

Rick: Could it be— cuz in your book, you basically said— This is really attractive to me. I'm going to tell you about it.

Denver: Yeah, yeah.

Rick: You separated the sealing from the polygamy.

Denver: Yeah.

Rick: And from what I understand with your new version of— I know you don't call it the Doctrine and Covenants.

Denver: Teachings and Commandments.

Rick: Teachings and Commandments.

Denver: Yeah.

Rick: You kind of excise the polygamy parts out of 132. Is that right?

Denver: I tried to fix 132. I actually went through it and tried to make it a consistent document. I said to myself, "Okay, knowing everything that I know about what went on in the Restoration, if I start with this document, can I fix it?" And I made a concerted effort. The dramatically contradictory stuff— I threw out the contradictions. And I tried to edit it.

Rick: You probably threw out the condemnation to Emma. Right?

Denver: Yeah, yeah.

Rick: I'm actually really glad to hear that...

Denver: Yeah.

Rick: ...because that bothers me.

Denver: I tried to fix it. And when I got all done with that, I thought, "Well, maybe that is — If they were interlineating— I mean, D&C 132 was hidden until..."

Rick: 1852.

Denver: Yeah, when it was first announced in a general conference talk by Orson Pratt. Until then, it was hidden. What do they do with it in the interim?—because the only copy that we've got is in the handwriting of Joseph Kingsbury.

Rick: Well, Emma burned the one, right?

Denver: Yeah, well, Emma was allowed to burn the one. Everyone agreed to it.

Rick: So, well, going back to here, because...

Denver: But think about what the source is—Joseph Kingsbury. Joseph Kingsbury. It's not a clerk of Joseph Smith's in the historian's office; it's not a scribe of Joseph Smith. It's a guy...

Rick: So, you're saying it's a myth that Emma threw it in the fire.

Denver: No, I'm saying that the copy we have, the only extant copy we have, is in the handwriting of Joseph Kingsbury.

Rick: Mm-hmm.

Denver: Whatever it was that existed before that that he says he copied from what William Clayton wrote (and we've got Kingsbury's word for it), Kingsbury did not work as a scribe or someone that helped write history for Joseph Smith. When Kingsbury was called to testify in the Temple Lot case, he refused to swear to tell the truth about 132.

Rick: Hmm.

Denver: He would not swear that his testimony could be charged with perjury if it wasn't true. He just refused to take that oath.

Rick: So, he did not testify?

Denver: He testified.

Rick: But he refused to take that oath.

Denver: He refused to take the oath, but he testified, anyway. He said, "I'll affirm, but I will not swear to it." And they want to know what the difference was. He says, "Affirm is just me telling you what I understand. But if I swear to it, I can be charged with perjury." And he didn't want to do that.

Rick: And they let him testify, anyway?

Denver: Let him testify, anyway.

Rick: Well, I've never heard of that before. That's interesting.

Denver: Yeah, yeah.

Rick: Okay, so with Passing the Heavenly Gift, you are under the...

Denver: I was still under the effort to explore and try to understand.

Rick: And so, you believed that Joseph Smith did...

Denver: ...tried to make the Church's story work.

Rick: With polygamy.

Denver: Yes, tried...

Rick: That Joseph practiced polygamy.

Denver: Yeah, trying my best to make that story work.

Rick: But, you don't stand by that anymore.

Denver: Well, I finally reached a conclusion. Part of the reason I was able to reach a conclusion is The Joseph Smith Papers coming out and source material that didn't exist then existing now, and research that was done by a number of others that has also rolled out. I mean, I thought at the time Passing the Heavenly Gift was printed, I thought the evidence was really equivocal. It's clear...

Rick: Well, Michael Quinn still thinks it's pretty clear, right?

Denver: What's that?

Rick: Michael Quinn still thinks it's...

Denver: Well, Michael Quinn gives credence to the 1860 affidavits. I mean, he has a hard time envisioning the idea that a whole bunch of people would sign affidavits in Joseph F. Smith's affidavit book to support the lawsuit if they were swearing falsely. And those affidavits were used as evidence in the Temple Lot case. So, they were gathered with a specific purpose in mind.

Well, think about it now. In the 1860's, they're, for the first time, creating a record about what had happened two decades or more earlier. And Joseph is dead. But they've made public, and they have taught you. They've reassured you. They've testified from the pulpit to you since the 1852 time frame that this is a revelation that came through Joseph Smith. And you know your Church is true. And you know that that temple in Kirtland belongs to your group. And you know, because he's said it—you know Emma's apostate. Brigham Young called her a "wicked, wicked, wicked woman." "If Joseph Smith wants to be with Emma Smith, he's gonna have to go to hell to be with her because that's where that wicked, wicked, wicked woman is." They know all that because they've been told that in isolation here for a couple of decades. And Joseph's not around, and you've got a burning testimony of the Restoration. Are you going to sign an affidavit when you know it's true? When you know? I mean, the Church leaders are asking that you sign— a member of the Quorum of the Twelve! A future president of the Church, a member of the First Presidency is asking you to sign an affidavit. Are you going to sign the affidavit?

Rick: An affidavit that makes you look like an unvirtuous woman? Who in their right mind would do that?

Denver: It's not unvirtuous in the state of Deseret in 1860.

Rick: But the entire government is trying to take down the entire Church over this.

Denver: Doesn't matter. They won't succeed in doing that until 1890. In fact, it's those promiscuous Romans [speaking sarcastically] that introduced and enforced monogamy so they could get a supply of prostitutes. The virtuous, lovely, Christian community, including, according to Brigham Young, Jesus Christ Himself— They were all polygamists so that you didn't have to have prostitutes. But the wicked Romans— The Romans wanted monogamy because they needed an ample supply of prostitutes to keep themselves happy in their public baths and such. So, the virtuous women were the polygamous wives that bore children and lived in a familial relationship, not those monogamous fools that pretend to piety and produce prostitutes.

It's like Mark Twain commented in Roughing It. He said when he first thought of plural wives, he thought it was an exercise in licentiousness. But when he got a look at the poor, ungainly creatures that were being married, he said he felt inclined to take his hat off in reverence cuz he's standing in the presence of pure Christian charity. The man that would marry one of them was a Christian soul. But the man that would marry ten of them [laughing] has committed an act of Christian charity and virtue that's unthinkable in the modern world. But that's Mark Twain, and he's always tongue in cheek.

Rick: He's pretty funny.

Denver: But I gotta tell you. Have you seen the picture of Sarah Pratt in Volume 10 of The Joseph Smith Papers?

Rick: I have not.

Denver: It's worth the trouble. It's worth the trouble of looking at the picture of Sarah Pratt in Volume 10 of The Joseph Smith Papers.

I have a friend I went to law [laughing]— I'll leave his name out. I have a friend I went to law school with who's a descendant of the Pratts. His last name isn't Pratt; he's a descendant of the Pratts. Sarah Pratt looks like my law school buddy with long hair.

Rick: [chuckling]

Denver: Twain was right. It was an act of Christian charity.

Rick: [chuckling]

Denver: Boy, now we're way off.

Rick: All right, yeah.

Denver: We're way off base, and [chuckling]...

Rick: Yeah, let's— All right, so...

Denver: I do know some Pratts. They're probably all gonna be offended at this.

Rick: [chuckling]

Denver: Okay, you go look at the photo, and you decide for yourself.

Rick Bennett: Okay. So, I do want to kind of go back to— We'll talk a little bit more about the Remnant Movement. Not to be confused, I should add I previously had an interview with a guy named Jim Vun Cannon. He was a—

Denver Snuffer: Yeah.

Rick: He was in the First Presidency of the Remnant Church of Jesus Christ.

Denver: Right.

Rick: He's no longer part of that church.

Denver: Oh!

Rick: Interesting thing—they've actually split, and it was just kind of like Brigham and Sidney. And he ended up more like Sidney and started his own church: Everlasting Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter Days.

Denver: Ooh, wow!

Rick: Yeah, so—

Denver: How about "The True and Living, Real Authentic, Mostest Correctest Version of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints?" And I'm sure there's an acronym you can put together out of that, that would spell something obscene probably. [laughter]

Rick: But anyways, so your movement is kind of named—

Denver: Look, I— Yeah.

Rick: Do you have an official name for your church?

Denver: No, no. There isn't a church. There isn't a church except in the sense that the church was defined in the revelation given to Joseph Smith. The church that existed were people that repented, came unto the Lord, and were baptized. That's it; that's the definition of a 'church' (see T&C JSH 10:19 RE), and that definition preceded the organization in April of 1830.

There were at least three different congregations or fellowships of people that existed before the incorporation took place in April of 1830, and all of them are considered members of Christ's church because the definition was just repent, come unto me, be baptized in my name for a remission of your sins. And that— If you're going to say there's a church, that's it.

We don't require— I don't require— I don't know of anyone that says you have to leave the LDS Church to accept the work that God has got underway today. I have said a Catholic priest could come and be baptized for the remission of his sins, accept the Restoration, and go on his way and retain his status as a Catholic and a priest if he chose to do so. Methodists can join. Latter-day Saints can join. There's nothing to be done except have someone that has authority to baptize, baptize you.

And then the name of the person, because we're required to keep track of the names, has to be submitted to another volunteer who's keeping what's called a Recorder's Clearinghouse; those names get given to him. At the end of a year, all of the names are alphabetized and they're put in for that calendar year, and they're entered by hand into a book. There's no electronic version; no one can hack it; no one can go online and get into it. There's only one, hand-written copy.

If you want to give it to him by mailing it in to him, the mailed-in copy will be recorded. The mailed document will be destroyed. At the end of the year, all the records are destroyed after having been entered into the book. And the only thing that that is done for is because the Lord requires that that book be maintained, in order to present it at the Second Coming as one of the things that we're accountable for keeping. We're accountable for keeping very few things, but that is one of them.

And so, repent, be baptized for the remission of sins, get your name recorded with the Recorder's Clearinghouse; that's it. Then you're part of it. And you can be a Mormon Latter-day Saint; you can be a Jew. You can be whatever you want to be, but you have to accept the terms that the Lord has outlined in order to come aboard.

And if you want to fellowship with others, there are informal gatherings of people that fellowship together. We're expected to pay tithes from surplus, not what's required to support you and your family but of your excess. Of your surplus, one-tenth is paid into the fellowship, and then the fellowship determines who among them has a need. And if someone among them has a need, then the tithe is used to help those who have health problems, medical bills, education problems, food, housing, transportation issues. They get spent inside the group to help and benefit those within the fellowship. It doesn't get gathered— There's no big slush fund. It gets used to help the poor.

If there's an excess that ever accumulates in a fellowship, then ultimately we expect to build a temple and the funds can be donated for that purpose. But tithes are not used to support a hierarchy—your religion should require that you sacrifice. If you are going to practice it, you should practice it as a person of faith, sacrificing to do the will of the Lord. No one gets remunerated for anything they do.

I gave a series of lectures. I had to personally pay to rent the facilities that I used in order to give a series of lectures. People organize conferences now voluntarily: They rent the venue, and they publicize the thing, and they do all the work with volunteer efforts. And if there are any costs to be advanced, they advance them. If they ask me to help defray costs, I help. But no one's— I spent a lot of money of my own doing the things that I've done; no one's paid me anything for what it is I do.

Rick: So somebody can join your movement and continue to go to the LDS Church?

Denver: Absolutely. Yeah, a number of them have. In fact, some interestingly-situated people have.

Rick: That's interesting.

Denver: I wanted to clarify that, as it turns out, the website scriptures.info (i-n-f-o) was available. All of the scriptures are available, for free, online at scriptures.info. You can either read them all there or you can connect to the website and it will read them to you—in a variety of voices. You can have the scriptures read to you, all of these [tapping the new scriptures]; you don't need to buy a leather-bound set. But they're also available, exactly the same document, through Amazon in a soft-bound, not leather-bound copy, available online. So, they're very accessible for free online. They're available from Amazon in a paperback form, but the leather-bound copies—there was a limited print of those and they're virtually all spoken for, but Benchmark will have a handful.

(*Note: The most up-to-date, print-on-demand version of the Restoration Edition of the scriptures is available for purchase at scriptures.shop.)

Rick: Wow.

Denver: And so—

Rick: Well, that's good to know. So, yeah, I'm just curious if there's anything else about — So, you're going to try to build a temple? Do you have a location for that?

Denver: Not yet. Not yet, but...

Rick: Here in Salt Lake Valley, I assume?

Denver: I assume not.

Rick: No?

Denver: Yeah, I assume not. I think there would be— The likelihood is there would be active interference, active opposition.

In my view, the adversary cares about very little, but the one thing he intensely cares about is the establishment of something that reconnects Heaven and Earth, in a way that fulfills prophecy and opens up the return of the Lord. Because the Lord's promises all have to be vindicated, and right now, there isn't any possibility in all of the existing efforts. But, we're hoping to make the effort to accomplish just that. At which point the adversary will feel threatened, and so, I expect there will be some trouble and opposition in getting it done.

And in this place, in particular— I mean, why am I an excommunicated Mormon? I'm an excommunicated Mormon because they don't want people reading what I write. They don't want people listening to what I have to say. I'm not hostile; I'm just trying to get to the bottom of the correct story. I'm not picking a fight with anyone. If I'm threatening, it's not because I'm trying to overthrow anything; it's because I'm trying to understand correctly the sequence of events and the content of the Restoration and the effort of the Lord to achieve an end goal that, right now, appears to have been compromised and hijacked into real estate development and hierarchical servitude.

It doesn't make any sense to me. I was happy to pay tithing—give them my money! I was happy to go to their meetings. They didn't want me there because they didn't want people to read what I have to write. And they certainly, I'm sure, don't want this material [tapping the new scriptures] becoming generally available because it— In the original iteration in Joseph Smith's day, it was markedly different than what we've got downtown in Salt Lake—or in Independence, Missouri, or in Monongahela, Pennsylvania, or in wherever that group that left Boulder City, Colorado, is now headquartered. They're all off the beaten track.

Rick: Would you consider yourself kind of a unification movement, where you're trying to unify Mormon groups?

Denver: We just had a conference in Boise. We invited everyone to come from all the various— A Latter-day Saint spoke; Church of Christ's representative spoke; Church of Christ Temple Lot...

Rick: Community of Christ—is that what you meant?

Denver: Community of Christ. ...Church of Christ Temple Lot; the group of Latter-day Saints out of Monongahela sent a representative.

Rick: That's nice.

Denver: Yeah. We've had Restoration Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saint group — They split off from Community of Christ. They split off because of their desire to emphasize the Book of Mormon, while the Community of Christ is de-emphasizing the Book of Mormon.

I mean, anyone's welcome to come to the conferences. And unifying is unlikely because people don't really want to try and understand and live the Restoration as it was promulgated in the revelations to Joseph in the Book of Mormon. They really just want a kind of social-club atmosphere where they can come and be reassured that they belong to the one and only, authentic, real church that will get you into Heaven with a pass.

And the superficiality of the Latter-day Saint curriculum right now is so vacuous that I wouldn't waste my time sitting through two hours of their meetings. I mean, they spare you that third hour now, but it's still vacuous, insubstantial. You can't sustain life with the content that they provide at this point. It's been a series of subtractions. It's the opposite of restoration, which is additive; it's deductive—continually deductive.

And so, no, I don't view anything that I've done as being or holding the potential to be popular, to be unifying. I figure every single group gets offended when you talk about what the straight and narrow path may really look like and what it may really require of you. So, no, I don't expect to unify. I expect to be denounced by just about everyone. The more they learn, the less they like what they're learning. [laughter]

Rick: So do you— Is it a big movement in Boise, then? 'Cause it seems like you go there a lot. I know there was a 'Boise Rescue' a while ago.

Denver: There's a lot of activity that's taken place in Boise, but the majority of people are far and wide. I mean, I had a fireside, week-before last Sunday, with a group in Europe that— We did it online. But there were people from Scotland, and England, and Holland, and Slovakia, and various places around Europe. There are people all over. I'm corresponding actively with folks in Japan. We were supposed to have a conference in Japan, when Japan shut down because of the Chinese flu problem that they had going on, and we couldn't. We couldn't get into the country for that conference, but it's now rescheduled to take place in October.

There are people in South America; there are people in Canada; there are people in Alaska, Hawaii. There's a group in Africa. Some of these groups stay under the radar, in part because they don't want to be disciplined or excommunicated or rescued. But they only need to submit their names to the Recorder's Clearinghouse; they don't need to stand up and say, "Hey, please notice me. You'll want to kick me out of your Church too." Because if they find that fellowshipping in an existing congregation of Methodists or Latter-day Saints or Catholics is gratifying or satisfying to them, there's no reason for them—other than being baptized and submitting their name to the Recorder's Clearinghouse—there's no reason for them to become a renegade among another people they want to associate with. If asked, they're probably going to teach something that will be markedly different than what other congregations believe, but I doubt they'll be running around saying, "You're all screwed up and you're practicing priestcraft and you're going to hell." I doubt— Although maybe there's one or two people like that. [laughter] But I wouldn't think...

Rick: Are you aware— Are there any efforts to root out— I'm not— You probably don't like the term "Snufferites," but I know that's what you're called.

Denver: Yeah.

Rick: But people in active LDS congregations, who've been rooted out, that say, "Hey we like what Denver's doing"—

Denver: Yeah, yeah. Sure.

Rick: There is kind of an underground movement.

Denver: Oh, yeah.

Rick: Kind of like the polygamists—we go after the polygamists; we go after the Snufferites.

Denver: Yeah, yeah. Pretty much. Two former bishops were—I met with them last night—who were chased off precisely because they were reading and talking about material that I had written. So, yeah. Yeah, it's silly, really.

But if you're not going to teach anything, if you're not going to try and understand what went on in the Restoration, and someone says, "I would like to try and comprehend exactly what went on in the Restoration; I'm willing to explore that"—but, you're willing to still stay a member of this institution—why would you care? I mean, you've got to be awfully thin-skinned. You have to be extraordinarily insecure to say, "If you think that way, you're so scary that I want you kicked out of our organization." Why does that scare you? Why does that alarm you? Why are you so thin-skinned?

I mean, I take all kinds of foolish, practically obscene, mischaracterizations made of me on the Internet, and I don't react to any of 'em. Why do I care? I'm not what you think I am if you've envisioned this heretical monster gobbling up, you know, the souls of men. If that's what you think, yeah, go ahead and think that, but it doesn't change the reality. Your foolishness never defines me. So, if they think I'm foolish, why would my foolishness define them? Why aren't they live-and-let-live?

Rick: So, what would you say is the attraction to people who are attracted to your movement?

Denver: Most people have awakened to the realization that what they're hearing institutionally—either in polygamist groups or Community of Christ or Latter-day Saint—they've awakened to the realization that what they're getting fed from institutional sources is decidedly limited, misrepresentative, lacking depth. It's not soul-satisfying. And these people are— You would call them the best that there are. They're the Seminary teachers; they're the Bishops; they're the Gospel Doctrine teachers; they're the serious folks that have been on High Councils.

You'd be surprised at the substantial, thoughtful, reflective character of the people that wind up saying, "Oh, I'd like to go there." Because you have essentially two choices: You either stay with something that you realize is not fulfilling and is insubstantial, and in many cases it's compromised and it's not doing its job, or you say, "I've lost my faith in the institution, and therefore maybe the whole of it; the Restoration itself is just a sham." Many people are saved from going to "the whole of it is a sham" by discovering that there is great depth, profound insight, transcendentally important material to be culled from the Restoration; and if welcomed into your life, fundamentally change the way you view your existence here, the way you relate to other people here, and how meaningful your life becomes. Marriages have improved. People that were in conflict, who come in a search for the truth, reach a level of harmony between one another that is soul-satisfying.

These aren't people that I've converted. I've been out here trying to piece together as much of the truth as I can piece together, and I've been joined by people who have helped in that process. The work of the volunteers that put this together— I'm 1 - 2% of the effort that got made to do this, but I'm the beneficiary of it. The hard work, some of the hardest work, was done by a fellow who's sitting here on the Joseph Smith Translation material. These are people, on their own, who have discovered that there are others like them —myself being one of them. And that has coalesced into, now, groups of people fellowshipping around the world together, donating tithing and helping one another with their financial needs, and meeting in conferences from time to time. And now, we have leather-bound scriptures to rejoice in.

Rick: Well, from what I understand— I'm trying to remember your other book, The Second Comforter.

Denver: Yeah, The Second Comforter.

Rick: Because in that book, that's the one where you talk about how—and please tell me if I'm saying it wrong—but how to have angels visit you. Is that right?

Denver: Essentially, yes. The Second Comforter: Conversing with the Lord Through the Veil is a book that was written while I was an extraordinarily orthodox, Gospel Doctrine teaching, active Latter-day Saint. And its curriculum, its agenda, its teaching is trying to get a faithful, active Latter-day Saint to rise up to a higher level of practice of the religion, so that you can stir the Heavens and have some connection be made between you and the Heavens themselves.

It was absolutely correct, orthodox doctrine of the Church when that book was written. The manuscript was submitted to Deseret Book. They spent seven months troubling over whether to print it or not; ultimately decided not to print it but encouraged me to get it into print. It got into print, and it's an orthodox statement of the highest aspirations of the Church at that time.

That teaching has since been renounced. You mentioned the Boise Rescue. One of the things they renounced up in Boise was the teaching of the Second Comforter, and they recently revised the footnoting in the Gospel of John (John 14:16; also John 9:8 RE and T&C Testimony of St. John 10:11 RE) to eliminate the previous footnote that confirms the doctrine you find in The Second Comforter: Conversing with the Lord Through the Veil, so that that footnote, that connection, has now been abandoned.

I've been encouraged to do a 3rd edition of the book and to rewrite it from my current perspective, but I believe it is more important as an artifact to show what the orthodox teaching of the LDS Church was in 2006 when that book was printed, in contrast to where they are today in 2020, abandoning what was once welcomed, accepted orthodoxy. It's now heretical and denounced.

Rick: Well, to me it would seem to be bigger— The Second Comforter would be a bigger problem than Passing the Heavenly Gift.

Denver: Yeah.

Rick: Because the Church doesn't— It would be concerned that angels— And I guess the question...

Denver: But if you read the book and you look at the footnotes, it's hard to say, "Well, someone should be in trouble for writing that." It's impossible; it's orthodoxy.

Rick: Well, I'm just trying to understand why Passing the Heavenly Gift was the bigger problem, 'cause to me, your first book would be the bigger problem and I don't understand why.

Denver: I believe that Passing the Heavenly Gift takes so much varnish off the institution's history that it makes it look like they've failed to perpetuate what was once here, and that they've fallen into disarray. But the end of that book—and I advise readers if they read it to go all the way to the end—the end of that book gives you reason to have continuing faith in the Restoration and to remain affiliated and believing. But I think their view was Brigham Young looks bad; territorially, Utah looks bad.

Rick: Heber J. Grant looks bad.

Denver: Heber J. Grant looks awful. But I'm quoting Heber J. Grant's journals—that's Heber talking about himself. It's actually Heber recording in his journal what his mother said to him about himself, and then Heber writing about, you know, what his own limits were.

Rick: Because that was one of the issues—it was denigrating Church leaders, right? That's why you were excommunicated?

Denver: Yeah. Supposedly I denigrated Church leaders, but how is it denigrating Church leaders to quote the Church leader about himself? If he's being candid in his journal and he's telling you, "I've never had an inspired dreaming in my life," if he says that his mother thinks he's more concerned with money than he is with anything spiritual — I mean, if he's writing these things in absolute candor about himself in his diary, how is it denigrating him to quote him? It's understanding him. It's grasping the concept that there's a man who is absolutely, religiously insecure about his status before God, unsure about where he's going in the next life, standing as the President of the Church. He was probably scared out of his mind every time he got up in a General Conference to address people because he was hollow inside. He knew he was an empty suit. But he knew what he cared about, and he cared about managing 'the kingdom' and making the kingdom function financially and like a business, and he did his best to do that. Whatever his skill set was, that's what he put on the altar, and that's what he had to altar. But religiously, there wasn't much there.

And there are a lot of leaders, I think, sitting down in red chairs in Salt Lake today that would look at the comments about Heber J. Grant in Passing the Heavenly Gift and would identify with that; would say, "That's me. That's the awful position in which I find myself. I got nothing to offer." I mean, go listen to General Conference and tell me if you think that's vacuous or edifying. If it's enlightening— Joseph Smith, when he gathered a group together to give a talk in a conference, startled them with an abundant outpouring of new light and knowledge; talked about how it was his role to always turn up some new thing in order to help edify and move the process along. (From a discourse given May 12, 1844; see Teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith, pg. 364.)

Well, what we're moving along, in a process if there be one, is real estate development, and community development, and condominium development, and land development, and investments in multi-billion-dollar funds. And in that, since the kingdom is in magnificent shape, the kingdom is prospering at the hands of businessmen.

Joseph Smith had a pending petition for bankruptcy at the time he died because he didn't know how to manage money. Joseph Smith was largely responsible for raising the hopes for the Kirtland Safety Society that was an abysmal business failure. Joseph Smith was not a good businessman; he was an awful businessman. In his store, when the poor and needy came in, he gave away the inventory instead of collecting for it. The store was going bankrupt. Everything he touched he failed at in business, as a businessman.

And Brigham Young figured out how to monetize Mormonism and how to turn it into something that would pay off. And the leaders ever since then, they learned some bad lessons; they learned some hard lessons. Heber J. Grant had to go to the bankers in New York to try and get money to make payroll to keep the employees of the Church paid, including the compensated General Authorities. And those were hard lessons in hard times.

So, then you have Boyd Packer calling the clerk, the financial clerk of the stake before he arrives, and he says to the financial clerk he wants to know the names of the top ten tithe payers in the stake for him to interview when he comes out to call a new Stake President. And the financial clerk gets upset about that, and picks up the phone and calls and tells me what an obscenity this is. But they don't understand the history. The history is that you put...you ingratiate people with money to the kingdom, because the kingdom has on occasion run into huge deficits. They were afraid of financial collapse on multiple occasions and were only rescued by bankers back East.

Well, now that they've turned things around in the post World War II era, and they've got billionaires and multi-millionaires who are out there, you ingratiate them and you get their loyalty to the kingdom by having them called into positions of authority. They become your Stake Presidents; they become your Bishops; they become your Patriarchs; they become your Seventies. They become your leaders because you never know when you're going to have another hiccup.

The joke about the Jesse Knight building down at BYU, when I was there, was that Jesse Knight was a drinking, smoking, swearing Mormon, but he made a fortune in the mining business, and when he finally returned to activity in the Church, his tithing that year cleared all of the debts that the Church had. And so, they have the Jesse Knight building down at Brigham Young University in honor of the tithe that the man paid.

There are pragmatic reasons why choices are made; they are based upon historical precedent. They have very good reasons behind them if you're trying to manage a trillion-dollar empire as the Church leaders are. But you think about what they have— They've undertaken a project in Florida on 133,000 acres of ground, approximately. The development costs will be about a trillion dollars by the time the project is finished. Five-hundred-thousand people will live and work and buy groceries and go to school, and do everything in life, there in that community.

They started that project just a few years ago. There will be members of the Quorum of the Twelve who are not yet added to the quorum, who will come aboard while that project is underway. They will live their entire tenure in the Quorum of the Twelve and die, and that project will not be finished. They will inherit it as a project. They will babysit through the completion, and they have no say in whether or not that's what is going to occupy an extraordinary amount of time. That's the way the Church has wound up today.

They've called good businessmen. N. Eldon Tanner helped straighten out a whole host of problems, and they've gone to school on that. Some of the members of the Quorum of the Twelve were called specifically because of skill sets that they have in the business community—skill sets they have in banking; skill sets they have in law. To his credit, the current Church President didn't come aboard with a background as an accomplished businessman, lawyer, or banker; he came as a surgeon, and that's an oddity among the group that's up there. But I understand and I empathize with the plight. They really don't have elbow room. They've got an empire, and the empire *demand*s attention. They have to give attention to it, and they're doing a marvelous job in paying attention to it.

That was not what Joseph Smith set out to accomplish. It's not what the Restoration was intended— And if Joseph Smith were here, my guess is he would bankrupt the Church— probably go out and find great causes, poor people, needs, fund whole hospitals, don't charge anyone anything, help the benighted, run into the inner cities and see if you can bring peace and an end to the murdering and the violence that goes on there, improve schools, give away schools—do everything you can to fund an effort to try and rehabilitate an entire nation first and then the world second. I think Joseph would wreck the Church; the kingdom would be in disarray. You would have, you know, the hat being passed to see if we can pay the utility bill for the ward building. It wouldn't be the empire that we see if Joseph were here because his priorities were contrariwise.

Rick: Well, I do want to hear your final thoughts on their— Just one more question before we talk about Joseph Smith. As far as— 'Cause I know there was a lot of early gifts. I think my opinion's—in looking at your movement—you know, this idea that angels visiting you is very attractive to some people. Also, I was just curious about speaking in tongues. That was an early gift. Is that something that you've had in your movement?

Denver: The way that Joseph had encouraged the 'tongue thing' was to be able to communicate with other people. Yes, the answer's yes, but the way in which it's manifest itself is not something that we've done a lot to publicize, advertise, or speak about. Signs generally attract the wrong sort of folk. So, while there are abundant things that have and do take place, they're not spoken openly too much because the wrong kind of people get attracted to that sort of stuff. And we're interested more in substantive, reflective, serious-minded people who are genuinely interested in trying to find and do the will of God.

We lost a light.

Rick: I know. [chuckles] That's alright; we'll finish up.

But so, anyway, just wanted to hear your final thoughts on Joseph Smith.

Denver: Yeah, I think Joseph is a very misunderstood character. Obviously, he felt confident in his role and in addressing the truth and in testifying about the things that he had experienced, but he was not the character that people make him out to be. Of the two of them, I think Emma was the stronger personality, and I think Joseph was deferential to Emma. I think Joseph had a number of vulnerabilities, including the fact that he didn't regard himself as well-enough educated or erudite to compete with a Sidney Rigdon. And so, he gave Sidney Rigdon a lot of deference and a lot of opportunity to demonstrate leadership because Joseph respected that he was better educated than him. He also respected that Emma was better educated than him.

He was shy around women. I mean, the idea that Joseph was some sexual aggressor around women—he was not that. He and Emma were close. You read the correspondence insofar as it's preserved between the two of them: He was devoted to her, and she was defensive of him and devoted to him. And of their two personalities, she was the stronger of the two. The idea that Joseph would, you know, hold her in defiance and get away with it doesn't match up with what you see—to the extent that we've got material to look at to examine their lives.

Emma was a force to be reckoned with. And Brigham Young wanted her as a prize, to be able to say, you know, he's got her onboard too. And she would not allow herself to be used in that fashion—to her credit. She went to the grave defending Joseph.

And Joseph, I think, was bold as a lion in defense of the things that came from God, and oftentimes frustrated at people around him, but he kept interpreting their intent to be exactly like his own intent. So, when he uncovers the character flaws of John Bennett, and John Bennett cries and says, "Don't, you know, let it out; I'll be a ruined man," and he betrays sincerity and he makes an attempt at suicide, Joseph Smith is convinced he's repented; he's got a good heart. He assumed a lot of people had a good heart who turned out not to have, 'cause he thought they were like he was. That was a flaw; he misread people.

He was insufficiently cynical about the foibles of other humans, and ultimately it wound up costing him his life. But he died with a conscience void of offense towards others because he committed very few offenses towards others—particularly offenses towards women that he's currently charged with. People ought to be ashamed of the way they speak of him. God foretold that fools would hold him in derision, but the noble, and the pure in heart, and the wise, and the prudent would constantly seek blessings under his hand.

And part of his hand under which we seek blessings are in the books that we've put in print. Because I would rather be regarded by the Lord as someone who is wise and noble and pure in heart, than a fool to be held by God in derision as most people regarding Joseph Smith do. They haven't spent the time; they haven't taken the effort; they haven't done the work to figure it out. But Joseph was who Joseph said he was, and if anything he understated all that he was—to his credit.

Anyway, thank you! It's been obnoxious, really, to be sitting here. Let's not do this again!
[laughter]

Rick: [laughter] Alright. So, well thank you, Denver Snuffer. I really appreciate you sitting down with us here on Gospel Tangents.

2020.07.12 Presentation of the Leather-bound Scriptures

July 12, 2020

Sandy, Utah

I see people have figured out where the shade is and have seated themselves accordingly.

I figure everyone who's here knows enough about how these [the Scriptures] were put together, what the content is, how it has been voted upon—

The purpose of getting together was two-fold. One was if anyone who doesn't know anything about the project came, we were gonna make a presentation to bring them up to speed about what these things are/what their content are, but apparently, everyone here is already acquainted with that. So, we needn't deal with that.

There are two things that have been supplied by the factory. One is a set of the Scriptures. I'm holding the complete set in my hands. Then, the Book of Mormon has been also turned into a Hebrew-friendly, English-language version that's called The Stick of Joseph. If you ordered a set of Scriptures, you will get these three volumes. You had to order separately The Stick of Joseph, and that's the other volume that isn't... It's duplicative of half of the New Covenants.

What I have as samples are two different kinds of leather—the buffalo in cognac, and the goatskin in British tan leather. I'm gonna hand them... You know, let's pass 'em around to whoever wants to look at 'em. I'm gonna hold onto this one.

When you look at them, at the top, they make the interior of the book as a separate block. It's all sewn together, it's put into a press, and then it's sanded on the edge. The corners are rounded, and then this is gilded—covered with gold leaf. Then that is put into the cover. Well, to hold the material, the block—the book block—together... Normally, at the top of a book, you get cloth that's stitched around. The top, if you look at the book block binding, it's held together by leather. There's a leather insert that's more durable than the fabric is. It's a suede product that's put on there.

And then the interior—the black paper—is a kind of durable polyurethane that will probably outlast most landfills. They'll be pulling this stuff up through the next cycle of creation because it's extremely durable. That product is what the exterior leather is bound with.

In your best Bible publications, very often the leather cover is then glued to a backing. This one is not only glued to the backing but if you look at it, it's stitched around so it's both sewn and glued. Sometimes if you have a set of Scriptures, the corner will pull up. These are sewn and they are stitched [glued]; and therefore, they're not gonna come apart. You're gonna have to be really determined to get these to fall apart.

The paper that this is put on is actually 100% cotton. It's a fabric; it's like it's been printed on a shirt.

In the middle ages, when they started making books using the Gutenberg press and making book blocks, they learned that insects will destroy the book; they'll eat the interior. And so, gilding on the edge is actually an innovation that was developed in order to preserve the book against both moisture getting in ('cuz it's a metal barrier to the moisture) and insects. It preserves the thing.

The leather that is on these is dyed with vegetable dyes, which are both extremely durable but also very leather-friendly. There are some dyes that look great, but they have a propensity to degenerate the leather. And so, the book doesn't last as long with those kinds of dyes.

We had a fellow who helped with this whole project who knew about leathers and dyes and paper and all of the componentry that's involved. And when the decision was made to go with the printer who promised to match all of the specifications at the lowest price, then the issue became what kind of leather was he going to use? And our committee member said that he knew a group in London that supplied vegetable-dyed leather—it was durable; it was high-quality; it was some of the best—and in all the world, he thought this London supplier was the place to go to get leather. So, he contacted this supplier in London that supplied leather for books that he put together and found out that they sourced their book leather from India. As it turns out, the factory that produced these is located not very far from the leather supplier that got used to provide the leather that got used in the binding of these.

We ran into some issues as we were going along. A paper that we really wanted to have for the book was unavailable 'cuz you had to buy 'em in bulk. It came in a spool that was enough to print a million volumes or so. We were only gonna print about seven thousand books. The factory gave us a different kind, and it was not coated. This is coated. But while they were putting together their program for this, a fellow who wanted to buy some copies of the Quran looked at the project that they were doing for us, chose the paper we wanted, and ordered a half-million copies of the Quran to be printed, which resulted in the paper that we could not afford to use on our projects, suddenly becoming affordable and usable for our project. So, this is not only 100% cotton paper, it's also the coated paper, which means that if you're writing with ink on it, it will not spread. The coating will hold the line, and it also helps with bleed-through. Although, if you're absolutely determined to get something to bleed through the page, just hold that felt pen on there long enough, and it'll, sure enough, go through.

The thing that has surprised me in... Unless anyone... Does anyone have any questions about the manufacturing or the quality of these things or how they were put together?

The thing that has impressed me as I've begun going through them is that Joseph Smith was given the assignment of translating the Book of Mormon by the gift and power of God. He translated the Book of Mormon, and the project was finished, and it got into print in early 1830. Shortly after it was in print—because of recommendations that were made to have legal protection—the decision was made to incorporate a church in April of 1830. When the enthusiasm for incorporating a church came along and inquiries were made, there were approvals given by heaven for the organization of the church. The initiative to do the Book of Mormon came from heaven. The initiative to organize a corporate church came from people, and heaven said, "Sure, this was what you can do and how you can do it." But heaven had another initiative that it wanted taken. Before the end of the first year, after the Book of Mormon was done and in print, the Lord gave another command, which you'll find in—I think it's section 18; I don't have a copy of it with me.

(Does someone have the Teachings and Commandments? You've got Teachings and Commandments? Yeah, let me look at it... I like the idea of walking off-screen for these people on Skype.)

This is almost... Shortly after the first meeting between Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon (it's on the 7th of December of 1830), and this is toward the end of a revelation: And a commandment I give unto you that you shall write for him, and the scriptures shall be given, even as they are in my own bosom, to the salvation of [mine] own elect, for they will hear my voice, and shall see me, and shall not be asleep... (T&C 18:6) and so on. This is the command that started the production of the Joseph Smith Translation of the Bible. They began with Genesis, and what is now in the Old Covenants book of Genesis, which used to be (in part) in the Pearl of Great Price book of Moses (that's now been moved into Genesis where it was located in the Joseph Smith Translation), that is what tumbled out right after the command was given to begin the translation process. In fact, I think in the Pearl of Great Price, they date almost all of that Genesis material we find in the book of Moses—they date that in the December 1830 timeframe as it began.

So, that project was undertaken beginning in December of 1830. As the translation goes forward, there's an alignment that happens sometime early in the next year—it was in, actually, September of 1831. A revelation and a revision to Exodus happened almost simultaneously. In the revision to Exodus, the text is corrected and changed at the point that the second stone tablets are to be produced. The first one got destroyed; so a second one is gonna come out, and it's not going to be the same as the first one had been. The second one is going to include things that were omitted from the first, and the material relating to a higher form of priesthood (contained in the first) is omitted from the second.

And in the command that's given, there's a conversation between Moses and the Lord, in which He talks about how Moses would be part of a holy order—something that we had learned about much earlier in Genesis. Moses would be part of a holy order, but that was gonna be withheld from the balance of Israel because of their disobedience.

At the same time as that, there is a revelation that comes out. In it, it talks about how when the Lord removed Moses from Israel, He removed the priesthood from Israel. That portion that allowed you to come face-to-face with God was removed from the people of Israel so that it was discontinued. The revelation in the Teachings and Commandments (or Doctrine and Covenants) relating to that and the text of Genesis agree with one another. And I had an exchange with a fellow who's been a real valuable research assistant to the committee working on all these things. He's got all of the documentation about all of the changes that were made to the Joseph Smith Translation—a project that he has worked on for many years before the Scripture project; he joined the Scripture project late, and we literally were done with the Joseph Smith Translation. When he joined, we found out that everything we'd done was inadequate, incomplete, and that his research exceeded (by far) what anyone on the committee had done. So, the Joseph Smith Translation of the Old Testament and the New Testament was thrown out, and the work started over again. And the Joseph Smith Translation spilled out.

We exchanged some emails as I was looking at the comparison between the end of Exodus and the September revelation in the Teachings and Commandments, and it appears that they are both absolutely interrelated—that the Exodus text and the Teachings and Commandments text are both September 1831. But you can't tell which happened first. They were more or less simultaneous with one another. Joseph had been through that text and had edited it and then (apparently because of the revelation) went back and re-did the text and apparently re-did it again before we got the final version that appears now in the Exodus text.

Then there is a commandment that's given... It's actually not a commandment; it's a permissive "Okay, you can do this now." They were tired of the Old Testament. They really wanted to get to the New Testament. Sidney Rigdon being a Campbellite evangelical minister (basing most of his ministry upon New Testament text), they really wanted to get there. So, another revelation (I've got it marked in another set—I didn't bring a marked-up set here to pass around, so handing me it won't help)...

In any event, they get permission to go ahead and start translating the New Testament. So, they begin in the New Testament. Shortly into the revision of the New Testament, they come across a description in the book of John about the resurrection of the just and the unjust. And it appeared to them that there had to be more than just a resurrection of the just and the unjust in the afterlife, and so it provokes an inquiry—and what we get is D&C section 76 (T&C section—I think 69... You gotta become ambidextrous with these Scriptures; eventually I will only be able to cite the T&C; right now I'm still a novice. I think it's 69), the Vision of the Three Degrees of Glory. That was simultaneous with working on the book of John in the Joseph Smith Translation.

Later, you can tell when they are in the book of Revelation because there's a series of questions and a series of answers about "What does it mean to have four beasts? What does it mean to have a sea of glass? What does it mean..." Now, the answers to the questions are not put into the Joseph Smith Translation of the New Testament because he wasn't required to change the text of the New Testament. But the answers to the inquiries about what these things meant that are in John's vision of Revelation are in the Teachings and Commandments, and the dates that you'll see on those are the dates in which they're working on that part of the New Testament translation. In short, when (in December of 1831) the command was given to start a revision or translation of the Bible —

And the revelations all call it "translation," k? What Joseph was doing was not looking at a Greek text; he was not looking at a Hebrew text; he was not looking at some source material and then figuring out that there is a better way to convert that source material into English. It was purely revelation. It was... Nothing existed that allowed for the book of Moses material to spring out of the text of Genesis. He had the text of Genesis, and it was altered/it was augmented/it was supplemented/it was elaborated upon by revelation which the Lord and the revelations always referred to as "translation." So, you're looking at a text; you're getting a revelation; you're expanding the text. That's translation, according to the way in which the language is used in these texts.

So, as he goes along and he does this project, he will acquire some papyri in...what? 1835? And then they'll begin the translation of Egyptian papyri, and out will tumble the book of Abraham—a translation. And now we've got a lot of scholars trying to figure out, "OK, if this symbol in Egyptian (as far as we know) means 'that,' and Joseph says that it rather, instead, means 'this'—A-ha!! We've discovered that we can criticize the translator!" If you're looking at what's going on in the Joseph Smith Translation of the Bible and the revelations that are occurring that are recorded in the Teachings and Commandments, you are really headed into a dead-end street if you believe that you're going to be able to capture what Joseph Smith did by saying it's simply a word-for-word movement from one language into another—because it was nothing like a one-for-one movement of language from one to another in the translation of the Bible. There's nothing like that in what happened in D&C section 76 (T&C 69)... And I've said 69 like three times—can someone look? It's... Do you have a T&C?

DENVER: Is it 69?

AUDIENCE MEMBER: Yeah.

DENVER: Dude! I rock! Just like that! I mean, look, I've only been looking at these since a week ago Thursday, so that's pretty good.

...which is one of the reasons why everyone who lacks a conviction that the Book of Mormon was generated by the gift and power of God and that Joseph Smith was actually accomplishing something in furtherance of what God intended to do in the last days... Everyone who lacks that conviction wants to be able to explain, in a way that is satisfactory to the skeptical mind, what it is that Joseph Smith was up to. Because if you can satisfactorily explain it to your own mind, then you're halfway to being able to dismiss it because methodologies are not without basis to criticize/reasons to quibble over/reasons to say, "Hmmm...that's not so good." Look, criticizing the work of Joseph Smith by an intellectual approach to the Egyptian Book of Breathing material (that was in the Joseph Smith papyrus that was accompanying Facsimiles 1, 2, & 3) is a dead-end. It will never get you there.

First of all, Egyptian understanding of the language begins with the Rosetta Stone; and the Rosetta Stone reckons from about... Well, it's Ptolemaic; it's what? Maybe 160 BC? Languages change so much over a period of 500 years that the very same language you are speaking right now is the language Beowulf was written in, it's the language that Chaucer wrote in, it's the language the King James Bible was written in, and it's the language that is spoken today. Do you think if you went back to the King James folks and you simply spoke in today's vernacular that "dude, like, they'd dig and understand what was happenin', man." Do you think they'd dig that? Do you think they'd be with ya? You'd connect? Is that gonna happen? Not.

Everything I said is comprehensible to you because you watch and listen to what's going on in media today. Beowulf is so gibberish-filled that unless you get a translation into more modern English... There are people today that can't even read the King James version of the Bible, and what's that? 1611? The further back you go in the very same language, the more it disconnects from what's happening. Every 500 years, the language is so revolutionized you can't read it.

The text of the book of Abraham reckons from something that is about two millennia before the text that was produced in the Ptolemaic period that is the source from which Joseph derived the inspiration to produce the book of Abraham. Scholars get frustrated because scholars can't capture... They can't capture what it is that Joseph Smith did. They want to be able to do what Joseph did/to explain what Joseph did so that they might stand a chance of also doing that. But (to borrow from Mark Twain) the difference between what the scholar can do and what Joseph Smith did is the difference between a lightning bug and lightning. Joseph was doing something altogether different, on an order of magnitude that scholars will never be able to replicate.

And so, when you hear the scholarly criticisms of anything that Joseph did, you are hearing the words of fools that are holding in derision the very thing that the wise and the noble and the pure in heart will constantly seek to obtain as a blessing under the hand of Joseph. Eventually, I assume, they may become wise enough in their efforts to finally catch up with what Joseph Smith did.

But you, with these new Scriptures—having what has tumbled out of Joseph Smith—have access to the very thing that the Lord said was in His bosom. He wanted us to have the Scriptures even as they are in my own bosom, to the salvation of my own elect (T&C 18:6). That's the purpose of Joseph undertaking the Joseph Smith Translation of the Bible. It was called by him the "fullness of the Scriptures." Well, if you just reflect for a moment on the concept that the Joseph Smith Translation of the Bible is what generated the fullness of the Scriptures and without it, the Church would fail (Joseph prophesied), then what you get from the Joseph Smith Translation of the Bible are the most substantively-informative, doctrinally-rich, historically-surprising sections of the Doctrine and Covenants or the Teachings and Commandments.

That effort provoked another effort that was qualitatively different because of what Joseph undertook in the Joseph Smith Translation of the Bible. And then, because of the failure, once the command was given to bestow for the first time the higher priesthood inside the organization of the Church and that happened, there was an absolute failure on the part of every one of those who had been ordained. The marvelous gifts, the wonderful spiritual experiences, the great power that was supposed to accompany that, turned into apostasy after apostasy, ex-communication after ex-communication, and if you've read A Man Without Doubt, you see the preliminaries for why Joseph produced, then, Lectures on Faith. That failure in the initial ordination to priesthood authority that turned out to be a complete debacle, if Joseph Smith were a fraud would've represented a serious set-back. It would've been discouraging. It would've said, "Maybe all of this stuff that I'm up to is just not going to amount to anything." But what Joseph Smith did was he responded and reacted exactly like a person who knew that this was the work of God and knew that God would ultimately not only stand behind it but vindicate it and bring it to its successful conclusion. And so, instead of getting discouraged, he set about to write T&C 110, which is Lectures on Faith.

Lectures on Faith was intended to be a remedial book to fix people whose doubts overwhelm their ability to move forward in faith, people who would like to believe but want the Lord to help their unbelief. Lord, I believe! Help [thou mine] unbelief (Mark 5:9 RE). And Joseph sets about to do exactly that. He doesn't do anything that suggests his own crisis of faith. Nor does he do anything that suggests that he doubts God's behind the work. He proceeded as a man without doubt in God and in the process of what was unfolding at that point. And so, we get Lectures on Faith, designed to be remedial—for all of us, as well as anyone that got them.

This T&C 110—at one point this was considered to be the curriculum of the School of the Prophets. It was in the Doctrine and Covenants as the doctrine; it was the very first section; and when it was originally type-set in the first publication of the Doctrine (Lectures on Faith) and Covenants (the Book of Commandments)... When it was originally published, the print size for the Lectures were larger than the print size in the rest of the book. You'll notice, oddly, that the print size varies in the Teachings and Commandments,—out of respect for exactly the same thing. There are bigger words because... well... they're bigger words. Okay? And so, this mirrors what Joseph had done when he put the Lectures originally into the text.

There's a section in the back of this that tells you what was excluded. It's called "Excluded Revelations." And it tells you what was left out of this that is included in the Doctrine and Covenants. And some of them are excluded because the people voted and said, "We see no value in that." There are a number of sections that are included in this that are dealing with administrative problems in an organized church that we haven't felt the need to organize.

The Book of Mormon rolled out when there were already people, and the Lord had already defined what His Church was. He defined the church as those who repent and are baptized and come to Him. That church existed in three separate groups in three separate locations at the time the Church was incorporated on April 6th of 1830. But the incorporation on April 6th of 1830 distracts everyone from the fact that there was a larger body that existed that had not become part of the corporate Church. Over time, the corporate Church has its own interests, its own concerns, its own wealth, its own priorities, its own needs. And so, it has redefined what the Restoration is about to emphasize the Church organization and to de-emphasize a number of things that result in the suppression of the gifts of the spirit, the suppression of people receiving revelation—in fact, the fear that people will receive revelation is trying to be hedged-in, controlled, curtailed by saying, "You only get to get revelation for yourself in the calling we've given you in the Church."

But as you look at the structure that they gave to the organized Church, literally every position within the organization is an elected office—"all in favor, indicate; all opposed, by the same sign." You elect a bishop; you elect a Relief Society president; you elect a high councilman. Their position is elected office. And then they can be voted out of office by the same vote that put them in, and someone else can be voted in.

Priesthood existed separate from the organization, independent of it, and before the organization came around. As you read these new Scriptures and as you read the Joseph Smith Translation of the Bible, what you will find is that outside, independently, wholly-separate from the structure that was created at the time of Moses—as a means of governance and establishing temple worship and establishing a hierarchy within the temple of functionaries to perform various Aaronic priesthood functions—wholly separate from that, there are people that are given one-off assignments (from the tribe of Ephraim, from the tribe of Asher, from the tribe of Judah), they're given an assignment (from the tribe of Benjamin) by God, directly to them, and then they discharge the responsibility. And very often, they're killed as a result of the ministry that they were asked to discharge.

So, the structure that you get in the Teachings and Commandments that reflect organizational concerns once the Church was incorporated represent, in one respect, the same kind of thing you see in the Old Testament. Joseph Smith said all—all—of the prophets of the Old Testament held that same priesthood as Moses, but they were ordained by God Himself—meaning that there was not this continuity of succession or laying on of hands from one to the next (to the next, to the next), down in a continuous line. The function that was being discharged by the tribe of Levi and the family of Aaron operated automatically by reason of their descent from father and mother. Outside of that, there was another form of priesthood that did not descend by father or mother. It came by the will of God. (There's an explanation of that given in the book of Genesis, dealing with Melchizedek and his ordination. It was conferred upon him in the same way as it was on the Fathers—by the voice of God.)

In the tracking of priesthood in the earliest lineages, there's a direct line that comes down from Adam through ordination, and every single one of them not only got an ordination, they also got the word of God conferring upon them that authority that had been ordained to them. In the case of Enoch, he was ordained under the hand of someone holding that authority when he was 25. But he was 65 when God then conferred that authority upon him. In the case of the Old Testament prophets, the authority came directly from heaven. It interrupted everything that was going on. And despite the fact that they were expected to give heed to the words of the prophet—because those words came from God; a message from God, delivered by a messenger means that that person is operating in the role of a prophet. And therefore, they're telling you something that comes from God, and you're expected to give heed to that.

On the other hand, if the message that is being delivered comes from vain ambition or from a false spirit, then what you are getting is the message of a false prophet. The false prophet delivers a message—doesn't matter how good it may be—it does not originate from God. A true prophet delivers a message that originates from God, and that's the difference between the two.

Throughout the Old Testament, we have examples continuously of a benighted people who are struggling along to give slavish observance to a hierarchical establishment in order that they may be regarded as righteous because they did what they were supposed to do. Their garments had the appropriate hem; they killed the right animal at the right place at the right time. If you're a woman on your period, you were unclean, and you respected that, and you stayed away. If you were a man and you touched something dead, then you were unclean, and you had to go and take care of that. Every bit of these details were part and parcel of becoming "righteous," and they did them. And standing apart from all of that, God sent messengers that said, "I have enough of your sacrifices. I am sick of the blood of animals. What I desire is in the heart. Bring to me that heart." And they kill these people because they're unorthodox, offensive, and they're preaching a false gospel—because everyone knows that if you're not adhering to the ordinances that had been established in the law of Moses, that you could not be good. You could not (certainly) be righteous.

The colloquy between Christ and the tension between those established authorities that come through in the Joseph Smith Translation of the New Testament really are stunning.

I have to admit, the Joseph Smith Translation has been so difficult to access, and the online version of the Scriptures are so... I can read on a computer screen 50 times, and it doesn't sink in. But you give me a book and let me read it, I'll be able to tell you something. I can remember the place on the page where it's located. I knew where to look in 18 'cuz I've seen it. I know where to look in 20 because I've seen that too. I can't do that on a computer screen.

So, the only place that I was aware of in all of the Scriptures where it was clarified that a new dispensation mandates a new baptism, the only place where I knew that existed was in the Testimony of St. John in the exchange between Nicodemus, on the one hand, and Christ—where he's making inquiry, and Christ essentially says, "Your ordinance work..." (Because they were practicing baptism—no one went to John the Baptist and said, "Why are you baptizing?" They went to John the Baptist and said, "Why are you... What authority are you using to do your baptism?" Because baptism was a common thing.) When Nicodemus went to Christ in the Testimony of St. John, Christ clarifies that new dispensation mandates new baptism. That shows up in the Teachings and Commandments as a revelation, where it says your dead works under your old law won't cut it; new baptism is required, even if you've been previously baptized a hundred times. It also shows up in the Joseph Smith Translation with a change that clarifies baptism, once His dispensation begins, mandates that there be a new baptism that take place. So, there are details that creep in (in the new Scriptures) that are completely missing from the existing canon of Scripture, other than these.

On Friday evening, I was talking about the Lord's acceptance of the Scriptures in the Answer to the Prayer for Covenant, and in the Answer, He says that the Scriptures (as they're presently being presented to Him for acceptance) are adequate for His purpose, meaning that it's really not a glowing endorsement: "These are the best; these are the best of the best! I'm shocked that you guys are so good! You've really impressed the hell outta heaven!" Instead, what He says is, "This is adequate. We can work with this. We can get what needs to be done, done with the text that we now have."

The text is revolutionary, and you may have to search it to find all of the threads to pull them together to have it all add up to the picture that the Lord wants to have emerge, but what He's given us, He tells us is the Scriptures as they exist in the bosom of God. It may be that every single one of the texts omits some important stuff. But whatever is omitted from one has been picked up in another. And if it cannot be fixed through any other means—not through the Joseph Smith Translation, not through restoring the Lectures on Faith, not through going back and getting the original text of the Teachings and Commandments instead of the perverted text that has been put in the Doctrine and Covenants—if it can't be fixed through any of those means, then the rest of it has been fixed by filling in with new information that exists nowhere else other than in the Teachings and Commandments. There are things in there... Two portions of the Doctrine and Covenants that are thrown out are replaced by two insertions into the Answer to the Prayer for Covenant. And so, all the things that are necessary to round out the basic understanding required of people—in order for the Lord to move forward to the conclusion of the Restoration and the establishment of His city of Zion—has been adequately put into the Scriptures and are acceptable for that purpose (to both God and to us). And they more fully reflect the bosom—what is in the bosom—of the Lord, His intent with these Scriptures than anything that we have had heretofore.

So, if anyone has any questions, I'd be happy to answer them. But I think I've managed to keep it under one hour, which was the objective. And we'll get out of here before the sun gets any higher and any more of you are in the sun than are presently.

AUDIENCE MEMBER: Your T&C, where is that?

DENVER: It's floating around somewhere... Oh, she's gonna be making covers. She's measuring them/came today to look at them and measure them. She's gonna make covers so you can carry them and look rather LDS-like. [Laughter]

AUDIENCE MEMBER: I have a question.

DENVER: Yeah, yeah...

AUDIENCE MEMBER: When you were talking about John the Baptist, Vern and I had a discussion (about Nicodemus and Christ and the conversation) on the way up here. John the Baptist is an Elias, correct? He's the messenger for Christ.

DENVER: Yes.

AUDIENCE MEMBER: So, wouldn't he have had the authority to do baptism? Obviously he had the authority to do baptism...

DENVER: Yeah, yeah. He was ordained by an angel when he was eight days old. John the Baptist had authority. Look, when you are dealing with dispensations... It's not abundantly clear in Scripture, but there's enough there to be able to understand what I'm about to say. When you're dealing with dispensations, you almost always have a beginning of a dispensation, and then a take-down of that dispensation at the end. Moses established the dispensation of Moses, and John the Baptist came under the right lineage to the right family to a priest who was ministering in the temple immediately before his conception, who was named by an angel and came into that lineage in order to close down the dispensation of Moses. And so, you have two people. You have the beginning (which is Moses), and you have the end (which is John the Baptist). And they both belong to the bookends of the dispensation.

The Mount of Transfiguration, when Christ began yet another dispensation immediately in the wake of that, had appear to Him the beginning and the end of the prior dispensation. The beginning with Moses; the end with John the Baptist, who appear on the Mount of Transfiguration—and at that point, Christ's then the sole authority—the sole governing authority—presiding appropriately over the kick-off of yet a new dispensation. He would then commission Peter, James, and John, and you can argue about how long it took for that dispensation to lapse into apostasy. But no matter when your argument is, there is no question that John was around. So, it began with Christ, and John was around at least to the end. And among those that came to minister to Joseph Smith were Christ (in the First Vision) and John is mentioned also (in the letter of September 1842, while Joseph's in exile—D&C 128—I have no idea what the number is in the T&C, but I will one day be able to say, "T&C so-and-so").

AUDIENCE MEMBER: So where'd the... I have a follow-up question. The people that were baptized by John the Baptist...

DENVER: Yeah.

AUDIENCE MEMBER: ...would have needed to be rebaptized under Christ's new dispensation.

DENVER: And they were.

AUDIENCE MEMBER: 'kay.

DENVER: They were. They were heeding the words of a Mosaic dispensation prophet by going to John and being baptized. And they were accepted and justified, and they pleased God because they submitted to the forerunner. But as soon as Christ's dispensation kicked off, people were baptized anew. And that's why it says that Christ's disciples and Christ Himself were busy doing baptisms—only the disciples did more than did Jesus, but they also baptized.

But there was a hand here first... Yeah?

AUDIENCE MEMBER: So, I... what is the end of Joseph Smith's dispensation? Or is it on a hiatus?

DENVER: Well, it depends upon the view that you take. And so, one view that I think can be reasonably justified is that the death of Joseph and Hyrum ended it—just ended it. However, at the time, Hyrum Smith had a son who was five years old who had been blessed by Joseph, and that son would ultimately become a Church President, Joseph F. Smith. And he would've had, if not the priesthood, he would've certainly enjoyed the blessings of the priesthood that had been conferred upon him because those blessings persist even when the one from whom they came is gone; the blessings persist. You can argue that it persisted until then, or you can argue that—based upon the language of the January 1841 revelation (D&C 124; T&C "I have no idea")—based upon that, the dispensation in one anemic form or another persisted until either the release in '75 (I think... '78?), either the release or the death of Eldred G. Smith. But at that point, it's clearly been abandoned. And so... I mean...

My personal view is: didn't matter how much good faith and well intentions there were, the death of Joseph and Hyrum brought to an end something that was irretrievably compromised at that moment. There was no way to land on their feet. And it didn't matter that there were...

Heavens, by the time Joseph F. Smith gets access to the Church Archives, they've been altered deliberately by Willard Richards as Church Historian and the Kabal that were working in the Church Historian's Office. I mean, you see evidence of the manipulation of the texts in the photocopies that they put online of the Joseph Smith Papers. You know, you remove Joseph and Hyrum, you literally...

If you take a more kindly view of Emma and her son—her sons—and the people that remained behind and rejected the leadership that the Quorum of the Twelve (at first) and Brigham Young (ultimately) offered, it's really apparent that, conceptually, Joseph's immediate family got something out of the Restoration very different than what Brigham Young, the Twelve, and the Kabal that followed him got out of the Restoration. And then, based upon what the most successful group (the LDS group in Salt Lake City) then did, they magnified, they amplified, and they successfully grew this different view of the Restoration into something that to this day has become one of the biggest enemies of understanding the truth that there is.

And the family of Joseph Smith did a good job of portraying the very big differences in the heart and in the mind of those that were most immediately connected with Joseph at the time of the Restoration. But as that group has gone along, they've gone adrift and become... Well, they became vulnerable in numbers, and then vulnerable financially, and then vulnerable in popularity, and they made accommodations all along the way in order to try and scramble and to become more popular in the world—something that the Book of Mormon absolutely advises everyone against—and the LDS Church seems to be tracking pretty much what the RLDS Church/Community of Christ did. They're only right now, oh, 60 years behind. Well, they're about in the 1960s, I think. But they'll get there. Based on where they're going, they'll get there.

Yeah, yeah, yeah... You had a hand up.

AUDIENCE COMMENT: Do you see a correspondence between in Third Nephi when Christ came to the Nephites and, of course, they were all baptized, you know, with that, at that point. And... But just previously, maybe a year, maybe even less, or at some point or that they'd all been baptized as well. Is that the same correspondence?

DENVER: I think it's exactly the same thing. All of those people that came to Bountiful were faithful, believing, and they practiced baptism openly in the Book of Mormon. So, they would've been baptized. Christ comes, and He gives authority to baptize, and they all get baptized again. And all of the baptized people are baptized again because it's the same phenomenon you see in the Testimony of St. John, Joseph Smith Translation, and in that revelation in the T&C about "your old baptisms don't matter; there's a new thing afoot." And once the new thing's afoot, then you have to be baptized.

So, one of the reasons why I think after September 2017 Covenant Conference—Covenant of Christ Conference in Boise—probably there's nothing wrong with being baptized again. Might be advisable. And if it's a hot day, and it's cold water, it's refreshing.

What? What? You don't have any questions! You got answers! What are you talking about?

AUDIENCE MEMBER: So, my question is about the covenant that the Lord offered. There's individuals that have been rebaptized but aren't sure about taking the covenant. Do you have any thoughts on that?

DENVER: Good for them. Whatever they're willing to receive, welcome them, and love them for what they're willing to receive. And whatever they're not willing to receive, bear with them in patience. Because, literally, we aren't through the Restoration yet. You don't even know what you're gonna reject yet because as it continues to roll-out, everyone gets offended at some point about something! It just is the way things work. Tim—

AUDIENCE MEMBER: Ok, so I have a question about the new Scriptures...

DENVER: Yes...

AUDIENCE MEMBER: ...And my question's a little long, so please bear with me. So, my understanding of the new Scriptures is that we're supposed to, you know, we're supposed to read these Scriptures, we're supposed to internalize the lessons so we can develop into the kind of people that can have a temple and receive more.

DENVER: I think that's part of it. Yeah, I think that's part of it.

AUDIENCE MEMBER: Well, my understanding of the actual changes to the new Scriptures is it's mostly minor things, like changing verse—not order—but verse length and other things. So, my question is: how do the changes to the Scriptures bring us to where we need to be when compared to the Scriptures we've had forever?

DENVER: It's a good question. This is a handout about the Scriptures and where you can order them that someone brought. Here—do you want to start passing those around?

The differences are not minor. The differences are not just formatting. There are substantial changes that have been made. Just last night in reading the new Scriptures, I put up a post after reading the content of T&C section 59. Part of the content of T&C 59 got lifted out and put into something that is in the Doctrine and Covenants as section 107. Bruce R. McConkie called Doctrine and Covenants 107... I probably shouldn't do this; you know, apologies to Matt—to Sarah, really. [Mimicking Bruce R. McConkie's voice]: "The great revelation on the priesthood, Doctrine and Covenants section 107, beside which there is nothing greater that has ever been given by the voice of God to man to explain the function, office, duties, and privileges of the priesthood..." except Doctrine and Covenants 107 is a mess. It's not a revelation; it never tumbled out as a text. It's an amalgamation of a quilt work of stuff that got woven together and palmed off as if it were, in fact, a revelation, and it's not! But some of the material within it does exist in revelations, including what I was looking at last night in T&C 59, which is now a post on my website.

In T&C 59, it's clear; it's talking about people that are gonna have positions of authority within the Church, and it mentions the president. Then it says, the president... This is his responsibility: to be a seer, a revelator, a prophet, a translator; and then immediately after that it says, "and anyone that's in any of these positions better learn their duty and show themselves approved, or else they're to be removed from office." In Doctrine and Covenants 107, that same kind of language appears with something about the president who holds all the gifts and him being a prophet, seer, and revelator. And then it goes on to talk about Seventies and about a bunch of other people, and then there's this stern warning that follows after all these other offices; it says, "And everyone that stands in any of that, they better show themselves approved and learn their duty; otherwise they're gonna be removed." Putting so much in between the president and the duty that he has to the point that it gives the warning, that you can altogether miss the fact that the warning is being given to the president.

The warning is: You better rise up, and you better become a seer; you better become a prophet; you better become a translator; you better become a revelator. And if you do not, you do not stand approved in your office. Get out of there. Now, can you imagine if that were the way that the Scriptures had been worded all the way back in the beginning. These are seismic changes.

AUDIENCE MEMBER: Okay, so you're saying there's these stumbling blocks in the old Scriptures, and this removes them. So...

DENVER: Innumerable.

AUDIENCE MEMBER: ...in 107, they took a Scripture of responsibilities that the prophet has to us, and they twisted it around to privileges that the prophet has...

DENVER: Over us.

AUDIENCE MEMBER: ...that we need to honor him.

DENVER: Yes, "privileges over" verses "duties required."

AUDIENCE MEMBER: Yes, so it's a complete 180.

DENVER: There's a lot of that in the Scriptures. There's a lot of that. In fact, in reading... As I've been reading the new Scriptures, I'm actually reading all three volumes at once. Right now I'm in... I think I'm in Numbers; I'm in Luke; and I'm in T&C 59, which is where I got last night. Reading them all at the same time. It's amazing how they fold over into one another, how they all move together, how they all express one central common idea.

Yeah, what's wrong with you this morning?

AUDIENCE MEMBER: There seems to be a real parallel with Abraham and with Nephi in recovering the brass plates, Abraham having the records of the Fathers, and what's happening today. The emphasis on "the word," rather than some outward show with a building or whatever, a pomp and circumstance. It's curious to me that in my conversations with believers over the years, there's one person that was an instigator for what's happening now, and that's Hugh Nibley, and at least in people's studies. And I'm wondering if maybe he was a forerunner. 'Cuz you've taught that he is almost solely responsible for the Book of Mormon being finally in our consciousness.

DENVER: Yeah. Yeah. When Hugh Nibley died, Tom Nibley spoke at the funeral in the Provo Tabernacle. The First Presidency sent a letter. Dallin Oaks was there. Bateman was there. Jeffrey Holland was there. I believe that Dallin Oaks read the letter from the First Presidency. And there was a lot of nice things that were said, but it was Tom Nibley's comments at the funeral of his father that sort of got a murmur in the crowd—about how his father had now completed his assignment on earth and could rejoin the council of the prophets in the heavens now that he'd moved along. And the reaction of Bateman to that was like someone had just poked him in the groin with a broom handle. Dallin Oaks and Jeffrey Holland suffered those comments graciously, but it was really problematic to have a mere professor who'd never been a general authority be held in such regard.

When David O. McKay asked Hugh Nibley to prepare the priesthood manual on the Book of Mormon and Hugh Nibley took the Book of Mormon seriously—as if it were right out of the 600 BC timeframe, that it fit absolutely hand-in-glove into that time period—up until then, people weren't even taking the Book of Mormon seriously. Whole Stake Presidencies, High Councils, Bishoprics had never even read the Book of Mormon. And then it turns out to be a manual on—a Melchizedek priesthood manual—on the Book of Mormon because of the work of Hugh Nibley.

Yeah, he was perhaps a lone voice crying in the wilderness about something that had been pretty much neglected. To his credit, of all things, Hugh Nibley took the mission, the ministry, and the life of Joseph Smith seriously and searched long and hard to find how to make everything that he learned and understood fit comfortably within the message, the ministry, and the life of Joseph Smith and the revelations that came through him. Hugh Nibley was singular in that respect and was a formidable—a formidable—force.

He used to come over to the law school when I was a law student at BYU. He hated lawyers; he thought it was just a vocational school and that we were wasting our time. But he'd come over to talk to the law students in the moot courtroom, and he'd walk in mumbling about something and get upfront and just start talking. And he said he was just over at the math building or the history department or—depended on which occasion it was—he was just over... And he said, I went there to talk to them about "this," and we never got time to talk about "this," and what I was gonna say to them was... And he goes on, and he gives the talk that he was supposed to give the preceding hour. We ran out of time, and he left, and I thought, well, someone at the law school oughta follow him to hear what in the hell he's gonna say to the lawyers, 'cuz that's coming out at the next talk he's gonna give!

"Oh Lord, forgive us for being assembled here in the robes of the apostate priesthood to bestow upon ourselves the honors of men, which are nothing in thy sight," was Hugh Nibley's prayer at the commencement when they asked him to give the prayer. And then a few years later, he came back to give the commencement address (imagine inviting him back after that), and he explained why he prayed that way in the commencement prayer, and that talk ("Leadership to Management: the Fatal Shift") is in The Collected Works of Hugh Nibley, and it is a sobering, sobering assessment using government, education, and business to tell you what's happened to the Church.

Hugh Nibley never approached it directly; it was always with guile. And that's the best way to deal with egomaniacal leadership.

Well, okay, now we're well past an hour. K, so, dude, we're done. Except I need to take at least one Old Covenants (buffalo skin) and then a New Covenants and T&C (calfskin). This is two of them. No, no, they all got mixed together. All I need is a T&C in goatskin.

Thanks for coming. Good to see you all.

2020.09.06 Ether 3 Discussion

"The Sermon on the Picnic Table"

September 6, 2020

Living Waters Ranch, Challis, Idaho

From Vaughn Hughes, via text message to Reed Larsen on September 8, 2020 in response to a request for context and a general explanation regarding what was discussed prior to the start of the audio recording:

Several people expressed interest in what his [Denver's] comments were, and this will be really helpful in relaying them much more accurately than I could alone. I'll do my best to personally record the main points shared prior to the beginning of this, too.

I'll have to think a little more, but I'm pretty sure that was when he discussed how the United States (it's economy, government, military, etc.) is really what is holding the worldwide conspiracy and scheming in check right now, and that this is why "the cabal" (his words) is so focused on it. He pointed out that they only need to succeed in getting someone evil in place one time in order to remove the obstacle of the US from its plans. Then he began discussing how they have attempted to do that in the past versus what they are doing right now...

Denver: ...then the game is over entirely, the effort is to compromise the way so that the voice of the people are not allowed to choose. You have to substitute for the voice of the people something other than the voice of the people.

Now, one way in which they attempted it (during past national elections) was to use the words of "virtue," to use the words of "goodness" to sell a lie. They're not saying, "Hey, come do something evil." They're saying, "Hey, come do something good."

[Directed to Stephanie] I'm answering a question about the Book of Mormon.
[Crosstalk.]

So, the method of selling falsehood through propounding a lie can only get you so far. No one's gonna say, "Yeah, yeah, I'm all in for that evil stuff." They're gonna say, "No, no, I'm in for virtue. I want tolerance." Well, "tolerance" is another way of concealing permissiveness, which is wickedness.

Vaughn Hughes: Packaging.

Denver: We're not going to sell you permissiveness, which is wickedness. We're going to sell you tolerance, which is virtue. That only got you so far. Right now, the new scheme is: find a way to get rid of the voice of the people altogether.

We choose who we choose to lead. And the Teachings and Commandments warn you that when the voice of the people uphold wicked men in high places, then the people mourn because of wickedness in high places. We don't generally do that. As people, we generally say...

And it doesn't matter how many perverted people there are in the country, the majority of people are fundamentally sound, fundamentally moral, and fundamentally know the difference between good and bad. They're governed by the light of Christ; it's still present. It's still influencing people, and they're still willing to do that.

So, when the voice of the people were heard in the last general election (and there's only one office where every single person gets to vote), they elected a guy who had never been in Washington—because Washington has become odious.

The reason Barack Obama got elected is exactly the same reason that Trump got elected. They may come from two way different places, but it's exactly the same. Here's a Black outsider that talks about re-doing things. He is not part of the cabal in Washington. We want that outsider to have an opportunity to fix it. He got elected, but in fact, he was not who he presented himself to be.

So, the next president after him was an outsider that said, "I'm gonna drain the swamp." And everyone agrees, "It's a damn swamp; let's drain the thing. Let's get rid of..." So, he gets elected. And the swamp now has been very vocal in opposition to him for years. If you listen to his Inaugural Address, everyone that was standing there in the podium was shocked at what they were hearing. They were offended by this guy.

Vaughn: Both parties.

Denver: Both parties. The outgoing president and the one before him thought this was a complete maniac that was at the podium. We don't get... We don't get what he was doing.

[Directed to audience member] You're cold? [Crosstalk.] You were supposed to open your mouth. It's like Benihana's; we're flipping shrimp... [Audience laughter.]

Okay. So, we elect the outsider, and what does he say? He's not talking to anyone that's on the podium. He says, "You—out there, you folks—you have now taken back this place." If you listen, it was a radical, radical statement.

Now we've had nothing but pissing and moaning for four years going on because he's actually trying to accomplish that. You may think he's a barbarian; you may think he's uncouth. He's a New York construction... building... I mean, with all that that implies, that's all you've got. You listen to Bloomberg, you listen to any New Yorker, and you listen to Trump—you're getting the same personality. They're coarse; they're rough; they're vile—in many respects. But he's all about "the people."

Whoever gets elected next is going to be for the exact same reason that Obama got elected and Trump got elected, because the voice of the people is gonna want someone that is not part of that cabal. They want something different. We don't trust Washington. The government's broke. All you have to do is convince them. Sooner or later, there is gonna be some smooth-talker who will come along and say, "Yeah, let's drain that swamp." And he's gonna be right there among them; he's gonna be part of the same cabal.

Vaughn: The swamp.

Denver: If they can get the system reworked so that the voice of the people is not heard—okay?—that they "get above you"... If they can get it so that your vote, and my vote, and his vote, and the vote of the people (in general) no longer matters, but the system itself is compromised so that it is not what people want, but it is what the cabal wants... If they can get this Vote By Mail (cheat by mail)... If they can get a system in place that allows them to substitute fiction for the voice of the people, at that point, at that moment, the game's over.

Vaughn: And is that where we've "suffered them to get above us"?

Denver: Yes. At that moment, the game is over. Because as soon as you can get...

It does not matter what the words of the Constitution state. If a corrupt judge can say those words mean something other than what those words say/that it means whatever... I mean, one theory of constitutional law is that "law" means what judges say. As soon as you adopt the theory that law means what judges say, you no longer have anything except what the judge says.

Vaughn: You're unanchored.

Denver: You're completely unanchored. It becomes whim. It becomes...

Male Comment: It's what happened in the Communist regime. That's what Solzhenitsyn points out in his book.

Denver: Yeah. They have elections in the Soviet Union, but they mean nothing. They have elections in Banana Republic, but they mean nothing. And the reason they mean nothing is because the voice of the people is not heard.

Vaughn: So, how do we not suffer...

Denver: In this context of this passage [Ether 3] warning the Gentiles... At this moment, the plan is not to get a liar to tell you smooth things that mean something other than what those words he uses mean (because he's redefined them). He's telling you a lie because he's motivating you.

What it means at this moment... Because they've attempted that, and it hasn't worked. The new attempt is to say, "Okay, we simply need to subordinate the voice of the people into something else." That's this moment. If this doesn't work, because eventually...

I mean, voter suppression is now viewed in terms of, "Let anything-that-pretends-to-be-a- vote in, because otherwise, you're discriminating." If instead, it turns around (because of judges) to mean, "Voter suppression means your vote needs to count, and your vote needs to count," and if what we're doing is we're taking something that is unanchored in an actual citizen voting, then I am depriving you of a vote, and I'm depriving you of a vote and you of a vote because I'm counting fiction instead of the voice of an actual citizen—and that ought to be the standard that gets applied, and it's still possible that that is going to be the outcome.

The one thing that everyone ought to be absolutely sure of is that God knows what's going on—everywhere, among all people, at every moment, from second to second. He knows everything that's going on down here: what's going on in Pakistan; what's going on in China; what's going on in Alaska; what's going on in Nicaragua is every bit on the mind of God as much as what's going on right now in Challis, at this moment, here. He takes it all into account. He knows how the reverberations at some obscure corner of the world affects what's going on everywhere. He's got everything in mind. He knows the hearts of people.

Conspiracies always have the same objective—that is, to "get above" and to dominate and to subjugate and to have power so that free agency is abrogated, and with "blood and horror," you manage to reign and compel people to accomplish evil purposes, to frustrate the ends of the salvation of man. It's always been the same.

However, the Lord is capable of frustrating the plans of the adversary in order to fulfill covenants, promises, fulfill prophecies to accomplish His objectives. Nothing that is going on is going to succeed (on the adversary's side) that will frustrate the fulfillment and vindication of the covenants and the promises and the prophecies that have been made on the Lord's side. So, whether we suffer this to happen or not depends not just upon our own steps that we take, but it depends also upon how the Lord is gonna go about vindicating His word, accomplishing His will, and doing what He promised the Fathers that He was going to have done. But I can tell you that if we get Zion, even if it is an absolutely minimalist accomplishment...

You look at the vindication of all of the prophecies about the coming of the Lord into the flesh that were given from the days of Adam down to the time that Jesus got here, and when Jesus appears on the stage, it is an extraordinarily local, modest, almost inconsequential event—so much so that from the vantage point of Rome (or the vantage point of the Chinese Empire or the Huns or Egypt—because Egypt was still, though Ptolemaic at the time, still an empire of sorts), Jesus was inconsequential. But He fulfilled all of the promises and the prophecies.

It may have taken a third of a century before the significance of that life found its way into the Roman Empire. It may have been a long time before its significance was recognized, but it accomplished exactly what the prophecies said would happen. To think that in order for Zion to be vindicating what the "Lord has promised will happen" must be front-page headline news is actually kind of silly. I mean, how many people heard Noah's warning?

[Directed at Stephanie] Hey, I'm glad you brought a book, but it's too dark to read, hon.

Stephanie: I have a phone flashlight!

Vaughn: She's ready for the long haul.

Stephanie: You've got about ten more minutes, and then we're...

Denver: ...we're outta here!

So this... I mean, it morphs. It changes. When they get frustrated in one direction, they go in another direction. The direction in which it was once headed was "lies." The language of "virtue," the vocabulary of "goodness" (in order to conceal the corruption and the desire for power, control, and compromise) now has turned into a new program. And the new program at this moment is fraud and deception—that allows the voice of the people to be suppressed while the pretense of "open voting" and "voting rights" is exalted. And whether that will be the flavor of the month that the adversary employs in the next election (or six months from now or five years from now) depends upon how things morph. Everything changes from moment to moment. Everything worldwide changes from moment to moment.

There was literally a time (it's actually in the new T&C)... There was literally a time when our Lord was more focused on events going on in Baghdad (because what would happen there would affect/it would reverberate all the way to right here)—more focused on that than He was on anything else that was going on in the entire world. I mean, it's in the T&C, but at the moment...

Vaughn: So, it's a point in time description...

Denver: That's a point in time that literally, I was so surprised by that, that my reaction to Him was, "Does the God of the whole world care about Baghdad?" I mean, I'm in my own mind... I grew up in Idaho. I mean, I'm kinda... It's like, "Are you shitting me?" [Audience laughter.] But you don't say that. I mean...

Vaughn: It's not the right comment.

Denver: "Does the God of the whole world care about Baghdad?" He's a lot more somber and careful a character than am I.

Female comment: He cares about the whole world.

Denver: But yeah, the Lord cares about everything, everywhere, all the time. And we are in an extraordinarily delicate balance—everywhere, everything that goes on. You may think your life doesn't matter. Your life reverberates everywhere—what you do, what you choose, how you live. Sodom would have been spared had there been a handful more to leaven. You're supposed to be the leaven! You're supposed to be the preservative/the salt. What you do, how you fight against individual compromise, what you do to hold on within yourself—however faint and flickering that candle is—everything you do to hold onto that matters! Everywhere—in the whole world!

This place is a dark, horrible, difficult, challenging place. The father of lies has as his objective putting a chain around the entire world, based upon people acting in reliance upon lies. And every time you permit a lie to govern the choice you make—every time you permit a lie to motivate you to go do or say or think something—you've become yet more part of submission to the father of lies. We're supposed to be fighting that.

And every time you manage to pierce through the lie and to see something that's true, you've done something to preserve this world. Not just yourself—this world. This is a very delicate ecology. And that little bit of light that you have within you? Do everything you can to preserve it. Do everything you can to hold on to it. It matters in the ecology of this world, in the preservation of this world, in your status as salt/as leaven/as something that is a preservative. Because that battle that's going on...

Vaughn: That's "His commandment to us" is what you're saying?

Denver: Yeah.

Vaughn: That's the "suffer not" is what you're describing.

Denver: Fight against it. Fight against it. I mean, we don't have the ability to keep it all intact. But He will preserve it—in order to vindicate His promises—for so long as we still need His preserving hand to give us the opportunity to vindicate the promises/to vindicate the prophecies.

And so, that was my introduction for the act that will follow: Kirk Strong who's got a... [Audience laughter.] He's got a great stand-up comedy act.

Hey, my wife told me that I have to be out of here. So, Kirk, carry it away! [Audience laughter and banter.]

Vaughn: Thank you, Denver. Thank you.

Stephanie: You don't have to leave until [indecipherable]. [Audience laughter.]

Kirk Strong: The funniest thing is you said after... [indecipherable]... Well, we don't use your name until you're dead! [Audience laughter.]

Vaughn Hughes: Wow. Wow. That is beautiful.

[Addressing those who came late] Ether chapter 3 is what we were talking about. There's an admonition that Moroni gives to us as Gentiles about "suffering not" that certain things happen. And that was my question—is, "What does this mean? What does it mean for us to do—individually?" And it's very individual; it is not something where it's...

Denver: It is. It is.

2020.10.04 The Search for Truth

Worldwide Zoom Conference

Sunday Main Session

October 4, 2020

Kurayoshi, Japan

Greetings to Nihon, the Land of the Rising Sun.

I am grateful you have come to this conference. It is about "The Search for Truth" because we seek to find and understand all truth. The people who organized and speak at this conference are not part of an organization or church, but let each person search for truth with us. We welcome anyone who also seeks for truth.

Religion should be truth. But while all religions do have some truth, every religion has lost many truths and therefore are all incomplete. We are a small group of people on a quest for truth. We welcome all truth we can find, for truth is our religion.

Across all the world's nations and cultures there are stories about the earliest times when gods created this world and put mankind here. Those stories tell us that in the beginning there were great truths taught to the earliest fathers by gods. But records written at the beginning do not exist, therefore our memory of the beginning is incomplete.

You live in an ancient land, but the name Nihon for your island-nation was first given your land at the same time Moses was leading a group of Israelites to freedom from Egypt. Before Moses, the Israelites had only oral traditions about the gods and the earliest times. But the gods revealed themselves to Moses and taught him about the creation of this world. Using what he was taught by the gods, Moses wrote five books called the Torah, telling about the creation of this world and the gods' commandments for Israel. Those became the first five books of the Bible.

After Moses, generations of Israelites had men who also wrote sacred books in which they recorded that the gods continued to speak to them and reveal truths. For more than 1,000 years Israelites added more books to the five written by Moses, which together became the Old Testament of the Bible.

Like the Israelites, your ancestors had only oral traditions about the creation of this world handed down for generations. The Emperess assigned imperial court scholar Ono Yasumaro to write down the traditions that became the first record, Kojiki, Nihon's oldest book. At nearly the same time the Kojiki was written, an Israelite prophet named Isaiah was adding his sacred book to the Bible.

Isaiah's record was added as the 22nd book of the Bible. He foretold of a time in the distant future when people who love truth will be gathered together from all over the world, including some "from the islands of the sea. And he shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts ... from the four corners of the earth." (OC Isa. 5:5) We believe Isaiah wrote about what is happening now and we will see this gathering of people happen. We believe that Nihon is one of the islands of the sea from where some will come to be gathered. People from Nihon will bring truths with them that we want to gather. We believe the gods want all of us to search to find truth.

After writing down the Kojiki or 'Records of Ancient Matters' Ono Yasumaro assisted in recording a second record book, Nihon Shoki. Both the Nihon Shoki and the Kojiki are to followers of Shinto what the first five books of the Bible are to the Israelites.

All these books, the Bible, Kojiki and Nihon Shoki tell of the earliest history of the creation of this world, at a time when gods made this world.

The Bible tells the story of the first seven generations of mankind, or the patriarchs. The first man was named Adam and in the seventh generation from Adam was his descendant named Enoch. The Nihon Shoki tells the story of the first seven generations of the gods. In both of these accounts of the creation, this world and the people in it all are created by, or descended from, the gods.

The records of the Israelites were important to prove that the Israelite people were specially chosen by the gods to help the world understand the truth. The records of the Kojiki and Nihon Shoki were important to establish that the emperors of Nihon were descended from and chosen by the gods.

Like the genealogy used to prove the authority of the emperors, the genealogy of Jesus Christ in the Bible is used to show that Jesus Christ was chosen by the gods to be a 'second Adam.' The Bible reports that the first man, the father of all mankind, Adam disobeyed God. Because of his disobedience the gods decreed death for him and all his descendants as punishment for that disobedience. The gods sent Jesus Christ, a son of god, to repair Adam's disobedience.

The record of the life of Jesus Christ was written in four books that began a series of 27 books comprising the New Testament of the Bible. All 27 of these were written by a single generation of writers.

The Bible tells us that unlike Adam, Jesus Christ obeyed all the commandments of the gods, and therefore He did not deserve to die like all others. Adam's punishment of death was just, but Jesus Christ's death was unjust. Therefore, death could not hold Jesus Christ in the grave. He rose from the dead, and broke the power of death.

After Jesus Christ rose from the dead, He commanded that everyone everywhere be told the story in the Bible, and that they learn He rose from the dead so that all people who have ever lived will also be brought back from death and live again. It was no longer important for people to be Israelites. All people, in every land, are invited to come and learn about their salvation from death, disobedience and error by learning of Jesus Christ and following Him. Teachings of Jesus Christ are the basis for the religion of "Christianity."

Old Testament Jews are divided into dozens of different sects and disagree with one another about many things in their scriptures. Christians are divided into 34,000 different sects and disagree with one another about many things in the New Testament. The same words are used to define these faiths, but believers understand the same words very differently. There have been wars fought over these disagreements in understanding.

Buddha lived and taught 200 years after the Nihon Shoki was written down. His teachings have also come to Nihon and both Buddhism and Shinto beliefs have become part of your belief systems.

Like Jesus Christ, Buddha taught how to live a peaceful life, with harmony between people. The Bible and Christianity teach mankind to value one another and care for each other. Buddhism also teaches mankind to pursue a path to peaceful existence in harmony with others.

At about the same time Buddha's teachings came to the people of Nihon, two families and a servant led by the gods left the people of Israel and traveled by boat to the Americas. For a thousand years they also kept sacred records of their history and contact between them and the gods. The story of those people is told in the Book of Mormon. Their record was carved into metal, buried in the ground, and hidden for over a millennium and a half.

Beginning in 1820 the gods started to restore the lost truths from the beginning. A young man was shown where the sacred record of the ancient Americas was buried in the ground. With the help of the gods, that record was translated into English and printed in 1830 for the first time, so we can now read it. Like the Bible, this record is also scripture.

People who believe the Book of Mormon to be scripture are called "Mormons." But, like the Jews and the Christians, Mormons also disagree about many things in scripture. There are over 80 different Mormon churches making competing claims to be the one that is true.

No Jewish sect has all the truth. No Christian church has all the truth. No Mormon church has all the truth. I can say that for certain because the Book of Mormon confirms that what every religion on earth has is also only part of the full truth, and the Book of Mormon promises that more will be given to us by the gods, so we can increase in knowledge and wisdom.

The most correct book about this creation is the Book of Mormon. It is the standard of truth for today. All truths from any source should be measured by the standard of truth in the Book of Mormon.

But the things recorded in the Book of Mormon were written nearly 1,500 years or more ago. One book recorded events that took place more than 4,000 years ago. We can read the record of the Book of Mormon today, but to understand a different people, different culture, different society, who wrote in a different language makes understanding the Book of Mormon challenging. Because one person sees and understands words from one background, and another person sees and understands the same words from a different background, the words of holy books should be able to help us agree with each other. But instead the words have been used to make disagreements, conflicts, and even violence. It is not enough to have true words in a book. We must also allow the truth to be seen.

Sometimes we see only darkly because of what is inside us. We have a story about how we see only what we want to see, and understand only what we choose to understand. That story is "Hope and Tarwater" and I will tell it to you:

HOPE AND TARWATER

Two towns bordered a woodland. Each of the towns had a tradition about the woods. In the one it was said: "the woods are dangerous, and many things there can hurt you. The animals include the mountain lion and wild boar, which have been known to injure many a man; and the bear, which has killed many a man."

As the course of civilization develops the woods are always subdued and tamed. The wild things are domesticated and the dangerous are killed. In time the woods become a backyard, no longer threatening to humanity.

In the other it was said: "the woods are beautiful and many things there can surprise you with their loveliness. The animals include the bluebird and chipmunk, which have been known to sing for hours; and the wild deer, which has inspired many a painter and poet."

As the course of civilization develops, the woods are always subdued and tamed. The wild beauty is domesticated, and many lovely creatures are killed. In time the woods become a backyard, no longer providing humanity with rare scenes of wild beauty.

The first town was named Tarwater for an explorer who had survived there against all odds. He came in winter, and had to find warmth, food and shelter while battling the elements. He felled trees, built a cabin, and burned trees for warmth which he cleared from around his homestead. He slew animals to eat and kept their hides for clothing.

The second was named Hope for a woman who raised her children there against all odds. She came in summer, settled in a meadow, and found everything she needed to survive in or on the land. She placed her tent beside a hot spring, which provided her warmth in the cold weather. She ate berries and wild fruit, and found pine nuts plentiful. She was able to weave the flax growing wild beside her stream and make linen clothing for herself and her children.

The children of Tarwater never entered the woods unarmed. They expected to find danger, and were prepared to meet and oppose it.

The children of Hope never entered the woods without a basket or bag. They expected to find food and flowers, and were prepared to gather them in gratitude.

Lance was a son of Tarwater. James was a son of Hope. They each entered the woods on the same summer day.

Lance entered quietly, expecting to give any lurking danger no notice of his presence. Stealth was one of his weapons. Lance brought a bow and arrow.

James entered singing, expecting to greet the forest's beauty with the joy of his song. Music was his often companion while in the woods. James carried a scroll.

From Tarwater there were no paths into the woods. Those who entered always took their own way, fearing to leave a trail to teach predators there was a place frequented by men. Lance crept about in the shadows, watching for prey and hoping to avoid anything which might cause him harm. From Hope, however, there were paths which led to the meadows and berry patches known to bloom in the woods. James walked along a path from Hope which led into the woods, hoping to find new food to gather and share with his family.

Many bears lurked in the woods near Tarwater. Near Hope, however, the frequent human visitors along well known pathways made the bears leave, for they did not like the company of mankind.

Lance moved with care. His bow ready to set in flight his arrow. He intended to bring meat back for his village and hoped to encounter prey without a long hike. He knew every step he took away from Tarwater would be a required return step while he carried his game. He moved in cautious arcs spreading his search ever wider with each arc that penetrated into the woods. He passed the morning searching without success. Just after mid-day the sky began to cloud. To Lance this meant the shadows may be leaving and could not be used to orient him for the return hike. To mark his way, he took out his hatchet and stripped the bark on one side of a trunk to maintain his orientation using what may be the last shadows.

Now, because of the clouding sky, Lance's journey was changed from arching to a straight line. When the mark on the trunk was still faintly visible from the distance, he cut another mark on the same side of a new tree, and after stripping the bark cut two ax-marks below it to signify this was the second of his marks. When he was six marks away from where he started, he stopped and waited for such game as may cross his path.

It began to rain. Animals would settle down in the rain, and would not wander into his concealed position. It was an unfortunate development, which meant hunting this day was coming to an end. Reluctantly Lance began his walk back to Tarwater.

His return was less cautious than had been his advance. The sound of the falling rain concealed his footsteps, so he needn't take care for his footfalls. Now he was alert for only danger, and not for hunting game.

Bears do not need sounds to help them hunt. But the intermittent sound of the chopping was what originally caught the great bear's attention. It was not familiar to him. He had closed in to site Lance from the sound. But he waited to begin his hunt of the young man until after the rain began to fall. The sound of the rain would conceal the bear's steps until he was close. Then a charge would allow him to attack Lance before the young man could repel the charge.

Over the sound of the falling rain, Lance heard a distinct "crack" from behind. He knew in an instant it was not rain, but the sound produced by some much heavier object breaking a twig or branch. For the son of Tarwater, instinct took over. He turned behind a tree while loading and drawing back his bow in a single movement. The charging bear was more than his bow could kill. But Lance was taught how to respond to danger of this kind.

He knew bears could run fast uphill, but could not run fast down. Their legs were built for uphill speed, but downhill they were awkward, even clumsy. There was a depression to the left of him, but Lance was unfamiliar with this part of the woods. He could not know if the depression was a bowl inside of which he could be trapped, or a hill, which would put distance between him and his predator. He also knew that his arrow would do the bear no harm if it struck his head, but it might be of great advantage if it were lodged in the front shoulder. It would take some luck, as well as skill, to place the arrow in a spot which could rescue him. So Lance took careful aim before letting his arrow fly.

Immediately upon releasing the arrow, Lance took flight. He could not afford the time it would take to see it hit. His aim had been just to the left, so that as Lance sprinted away toward the depression the bear's changed route would intersect the arrow.

Luck was with him, and Lance's arrow had some effect. When he glanced back over his shoulder, Lance caught the view of a bear tumbling forward. That could mean only one thing: the arrow had struck a shoulder and momentarily caused a front leg to fold. This would add time for his escape.

To his relief, the depression was a hillside. Lance flew to the bottom, then cut sharply downwind and looked for a way to retreat in secret. He needed to find a place where he might not be seen before the bear reached the hilltop. If he was seen, then concealing his scent with the wind wouldn't matter.

He found a rock outcropping that allowed him to change directions yet again, and was certain his dart concealed him before the bear reached the hilltop. This was very hopeful.

The bear took time to bite at the pain in his shoulder. It stung him, and had momentarily cost him the use of his arm. Arrows do not dislodge by pulling at them, and so the bear could only break away the arrow. He could not dislodge the arrowhead.

Ever since God taught Nimrod the secret of making arrows mankind has benefitted from a weapon which always drives deeper after striking its target. The shape takes advantage of muscle movement, and pushes deeper and deeper into the animal once hit. The bear's arrow sank on impact into the shoulder, and his struggle to remove it dug it deeper. In his anger at the sting, the bear recovered his senses and returned to hunt his prey. This time not just for food, but also to vanquish a challenger to his territory. When, however, he reached the spot from which the young man had been lost to his sight, the young man was nowhere to be seen. He studied the area below, but could detect no hint of movement or scent. The bear moved cautiously into the valley.

Lance, however, was moving quickly beyond the valley, changing directions to conceal his retreat. It was many hours later before he rested for the first time. By then the rain had stopped, and he could listen again for the sound of any movement behind him. He was well, alive and perhaps even now safe from his dangerous pursuer. But he was lost. And it was getting dark.

Most predators fear fire. However a wounded bear pursuing an attacker would not. Lance knew if he built a fire this night he would announce his location to the bear. So he would remain wet, cold, lost and on guard throughout the night. The cloud cover remained, though the rain had stopped.

At first light Lance searched for a clearing from which he might see the horizon. When he finally discovered an opening it must have been mid-day, he thought. He studied it carefully for any sign of a threat both within the meadow and around its perimeter. He thought he saw a man carrying something moving away at the far end, but his view was distant and he could not be sure. When satisfied, he entered quickly to the center, then scanned the horizon for the highest point. He memorized the scene and left quickly and quietly in the new direction. It was half a day's hike to the highest point. On the way he found water, and killed squirrels for a meal.

It was dark when his ascent ended. He would have to await daylight to reorient himself again. Overnight the clouds finally cleared while he slept for the first time since entering the woods. In the morning, from the highest point of the horizon, Lance knew the east from the rising sun, then studied the direction from which he began for anything familiar. Shortly after sun up he found what he was looking for: a small plume of smoke rose in the distance. This would be Tarwater. From where he was standing Lance estimated it would be a day and a half to walk back to his village. He would wait to hunt again until the second day. Until then he would only be journeying toward home.

When James entered the woods from Hope he followed the main path until its first fork, where he followed the path to the right. This he knew would lead to the great meadow deep in the woods. He intended to gather a full load of pine nuts which the sun had dried along the meadow's perimeter. His mission served two purposes: first, to gather food; second, to prevent new seedlings from encroaching on the meadow. By turning these seeds to food, the people of Hope preserved what was a valuable, large meadow in their woods.

When he had hiked half a day, clouds began to gather. James was in no hurry and determined if it started to rain he would take cover off the path. It did rain. He took a forked branch, along with a straight branch. With the straight branch he lifted a dense patch of ferns, propping the branch at one end with the forked one. This made the rain drain away from the raised center, where he sat and waited. It rained until nightfall, and so James determined to sleep on his dry spot beneath the ferns. As the last light of day lingered, he wrote his thoughts upon his scroll.

Early the next morning he set off again in the direction of the meadow. When he arrived he walked the perimeter until he found where pine-cones remained un-harvested. He took out his bag and began to remove their seeds. When emptied, he threw the pinecones back into the trees and off the meadow perimeter. The process was slow, but not monotonous. He enjoyed the work.

James was nearby the fawn for hours before he noticed it lying there. Fawns have only one defense: to lay motionless and hope to escape detection. When he noticed it, James knew by its stillness it was hiding from him. He watched it for a moment to confirm it was breathing. Then he withdrew in reverence. He walked along the perimeter until he found where the pinecones started again in the other direction. Then he resumed work.

Although he intended to leave the fawn alone, he noticed its mother did not return that day. It was late in the evening when his bag was filled, and so he thought it would do no harm to spend the night and see the fawn was taken care of by its mother.

In the morning James checked to confirm the fawn had not yet stirred, then retired to a hiding spot on the meadow perimeter. By mid-day the fawn was moving, and stood. This was a sign to James that the fawn was now in danger, and its mother was not going to return. He walked to it, and it did not flee. He took it in his arms and returned to pick up his bag. As he left the meadow a man with a bow entered the far end.

James' return to Hope was slowed by the load he carried. But the fawn needed care and so James was grateful to repay a debt owed to the forest.

When Lance entered Tarwater many gathered to find out what had taken him so long. He told them the tale of his days of danger and flight in the woods. Tarwater was reminded again that the woods are dangerous, and many things there can hurt you. The wild still needed to be subdued, and its dangers overcome.

When James entered Hope many gathered to find out what had taken him so long. He showed them the fawn and told them the story of his walk. Hope was reminded again that the woods are beautiful, and many things there can surprise you with their loveliness.

Our ideas control our perceptions. We interpret everything through our own filter, our personal point of view. Our cultures tell us what ideas we should value, and therefore because we come from different cultures we hold different ideas.

Today the gods have spoken again to us, and we have also been given more truth from heaven. We have been told we must search to find all truth here on earth, and gather it together into one complete set of beliefs.

Your first ancestors had messages from the gods taught to the first generations by holy men sent to teach truths. The Book of Mormon records, "And the Lord God hath sent his holy prophets among all the children of men to declare these things to every kindred, nation, and tongue, that thereby whosoever should believe that Christ should come, the same might receive remission of their sins and rejoice with exceeding great joy," (NC Mosiah 1:15) We believe anciently your ancestors were given truth from the gods.

We come here to Nihon to tell you about how the gods have been working to return truths to the earth. But we have also come to learn truths from you. Your history, your traditions, your rituals, and even your culture have truths we seek to understand.

The people of Nihon on average live more than 5 years longer than people of the United States. There are many reasons for this, and some of them are based on truths we hope to understand and add to our own.

Truth is not always welcome. The truth can require us to change our minds, acknowledge our mistakes, and do things differently. But truth is compared to light in the scriptures. Errors are compared to darkness. We are promised that if we welcome the light, then the light will grow. "And that which does not edify is not of God, and is darkness. That which is of God is light, and he that receives light and continues in God receives more light, and that light grows brighter and brighter until the perfect day." T&C 36:4.

Of all people in the world, you who live in the Land of the Rising Sun should understand how growing light is a blessing from heaven. The light of a perfect day is when you have all truth, and no darkness remains in you.

We plan to build a temple where mankind and the gods will associate with each other, like it was in the beginning. We know that the gods expect us to accomplish this, and we are now preparing to do this. When that temple is built, it will be the "ensign" Isaiah wrote about when he described today. People will come from the four corners of the earth, and from the islands of the sea, to assemble in that temple. Isaiah said those who come to that temple will learn about the gods and truths of this world. Isaiah wrote, "But in the last days, it shall come to pass that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills, and people shall flow unto it. And many nations shall come and say, Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord and to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths." OC Isa. 1:9.

We believe the gods intend to keep every promise they made to mankind. We believe Jesus Christ will restore all of us to life. We know that Jesus Christ died, was buried, and rose from the dead. He has instructed us to be baptized in His name as an initiation to follow Him. Baptism is a ritual to symbolize death, burial and resurrection. We are put under the water, to symbolize being buried in the ground. We are brought back out of the water to symbolize rising from the grave or returning to life following death. We have authority from Jesus Christ to teach about Him and to baptize any who choose to follow Him.

Baptism begins a new life. It is sometimes called being "born again" because it represents living a new life, laying down the old life. When we begin to follow Jesus Christ, the light begins to grow. Increasing light comes as a blessing from the gods to those who follow the path of Jesus Christ.

Increasing light inside our spirits lets us understand this creation. The search for truth is the search for light. In a dark room, many things are hidden from our sight by the darkness. Eyes cannot help you in darkness. You can feel carefully, and slowly with patience and effort, you can discover chairs, and bookcases, and other things in the darkness. Yet you will not understand any colors, nor fully comprehend what is hidden in the darkness.

But in the same room, with the help of light, you can see everything. Even the colors of the objects are easily understood. There are many reasons why we do not see this creation clearly. There are many forms of darkness.

The standard of truth for today is the 1,000 year record of the people who migrated to the Americas. That record was revealed and translated in 1830. All truth from every part of the world should be measured by that record.

Having a record does not mean you understand it. Like Lance who saw only what he expected to see in the forest, and like James who also saw only what he expected, we also read the Book of Mormon to see what we want to see.

You have different minds, a different culture, and different ideas in you. When you read our sacred books you see, understand, and interpret them from your vantage point. You can see what we do not. In the search for truth, we can help one another to see more of what is really there and to notice what is hidden from one point of view. The most accurate book of truth is still not fully understood.

We must all be willing to accept light when the gods offer it to us. The Book of Mormon tells us: "he that will harden his heart, the same receiveth the lesser portion of the word. And he that will not harden his heart, to him is given the greater portion of the word, until it is given unto him to know the mysteries of God, until they know them in full. And they that will harden their hearts, to them is given the lesser portion of the word until they know nothing concerning his mysteries;" (NC Alma 9:3)

The Book of Mormon tells us that the gods have given every nation some part of the truth. We are looking to find and gather again truths from every nation. We are taught: "the Lord doth grant unto all nations, of their own nation and tongue, to teach his word, yea, in wisdom, all that he seeth fit that they should have;" (NC Alma 15:13) We have been told: "There will yet be records restored from all the tribes, that will be gathered again into one," (T&C 157:47)

According to the Book of Mormon, your nation has been given words from the gods. They are wise words to guide your nation. Even if the original words have been lost or changed, the ideas from above remain as part of culture, tradition, and attitudes. Help us to understand your greatest wisdom, and we will share what wisdom we have with you.

Our scriptures declare: "Truth is Mormonism. God is the author of it. He is our shield. It is by him we received our birth. It was by his voice that we were called to a dispensation of his gospel in the beginning of the fullness of times. It was by him we received the Book of Mormon, and it is by him that we remain unto this day." (T&C 138:24.) If you have truth, then it is part of our religion.

This is the time that was promised thousands of years ago when God "might gather together in one all things in Christ (both which are in Heaven and which are on earth), in him." (T&C 140:4)

To keep the promises, God will lead faithful people from all over the world to be gathered into one body of believers who will be commanded to begin: "building up of the New Jerusalem, which is hereafter to be revealed, that my covenant people may be gathered in one in the day that I shall come to my temple." (T&C 26:8)

If you want to follow Jesus Christ and receive light and truth that He offers, the first step is to repent and be baptized. He has commanded that first step for everyone. There are people in this conference with authority given to them by Jesus Christ to baptize you.

Even if you do not want truth that we offer, we will accept any truth you can share, because our religion is truth.

We believe Jesus Christ was sent to this world as a savior, and that He will bring all mankind back from the dead to live again. And we believe He is the judge of the world. We practice our religion in His name, and testify of His Divine status.

Thank you for listening. I close this talk in the name of Jesus Christ.

2020.10.10 Youth Presentation of Steel Plates

October 10, 2020

Sandy, Utah

DENVER: So, tell me about the plates you've brought.

YOUTH: They're awesome. [laughter]

YOUTH: They are awesome.

YOUTH: They're silver.

DENVER: Yeah...

YOUTH: Metal... We made them.

YOUTH: 13 plates.

YOUTH: 26 sides.

YOUTH: They're also not silver; they are stainless steel. But...

YOUTH:: K, I was talking about coloring; the coloring is silver.

YOUTH: Yeah, we lasered... So we... It was actually really cool 'cuz we had to, like, sand them all down and get rid of the...get rid of, like, the finish, so we could laser on the words. And it was really cool to see the difference between when you sanded it and when you didn't sand it—'cuz, like, you really could not read it if you have that original finish on it. And so, it was really cool to see, like, the hard work that we put in and see, like, see the difference if we didn't put, like, the hard work in. So, I thought that was really cool.

ADULT: Why don't you (we did a fellowship with them right after) tell them your thought on destruction.

YOUTH: Oh, so on the way up to Idaho, it was really cool 'cuz we were driving up, and we saw this, like, sunset, and it was super red, and that's because of all the smoke and the fire from California. And we're just talking about how through destruction, there's beauty and all that stuff. So, then we come up here, and we were given these, like, beautiful stainless steel plates that we still had to destroy (practically) to put on the Word of God. And so, through—again—through destruction, there comes beauty, there comes... And so, like, I was kind of, like, realizing how much beauty comes through, like, this destruction. Even in, like... We can even, like, look in ourselves, where, like, we kind of have to destroy our past selves to, like, improve ourselves—things like that. So, I thought that was really cool.

DENVER: That is cool. So, Christian told me that you guys actually burned the laser print on.

YOUTH: Yes.

DENVER: Who operated that?

YOUTH: Cameron.

YOUTH: So, Cameron was kind of supervising over there, but his daughter actually ran a lot of that.

ADULT: But these guys were all in...

YOUTH: We all took turns.

YOUTH: We were all kind of the helpers. We would, like, clip them all together, put them in there, line it up perfectly—because pretty much you just have to, like, push "play" then.

DENVER: What surprises me about the plates is that in bright sunlight, the more light you have, the easier they are to read. You don't even need anything to magnify them if you look at them in bright sunlight—which is another one of those symbols like "the more light there is, the more you comprehend."

There's about anywhere from a few inches to a few feet of organic material on the surface of the Earth that is possible to farm, possible to grow things in. That's because that few inches to a few feet consists of life that passed on and left behind organic material needed for life to continue. It's a constant cycle: life and death.

How heavy are they?

YOUTH: I think we weighed one of them [one set of plates] at 13 pounds...

DENVER: Wow...

YOUTH: ...and then the other one—a little bit less, because it's a little bit less [fewer plates in the set].

DENVER: Yeah, wow.

ADULT: A pound a plate—1lb, 1oz.

YOUTH: 1.1 pound, right?

ADULT: And so, there's 13 plates in the Book of Mormon. Seven in the other, or eight in the other.

DENVER: Wow, very cool. And there's cloth in between so they don't rub. Yeah, very nice. Thanks for the work; thanks for doing it; thanks for volunteering.

YOUTH: We loved it.

YOUTH: Yeah, it was great.

YOUTH: And there's, like, also a pair of gloves in each of these because...

DENVER: Oh, right...

YOUTH: ...they don't want the fingerprints on them because that will also make them hard to read.

DENVER: Even though it's stainless steel, you, yeah... You can crud up the surface of it.

Your description of what they looked like before you polished them reminds me of something I was explaining about the liahona. We tend to think of the liahona as something like this [held up mobile phone]...

YOUTH: Right.

DENVER: ...'cuz messages showed up, and the message would change from time to time. And we think, Oh yeah, that was God inserting a "handheld" earlier in history, and of course, it was magical to those people... It's a bunch of crap; all that is just nonsense. I want you to think of the liahona as something that had numerous facets on it, deliberately put there but small, and it was just not a consistent surface. And if the light struck it from a different angle, different facets would reflect the light. And you could see (from whichever angle it was being illuminated from) letters—a message. It was absolutely natural, absolutely... I mean, when God wanted them to have a lesson or to understand something, it just required different atmospheric light/reflective properties, and oh, it's a new message on here! And if there was nothing to be said, it was just a disorganized bunch of small irregularities on the surface of things. We tend to impose our own environment onto places where our environment doesn't belong to try to make sense out of things.

Okay, so I thought about the season we're in/what's going on right now, and I thought about making a few comments about this political environment/the nonsense that's going on to you guys—'cuz it's spilling over into your life. You're hearing all about bad, orange man, and you're hearing about hair-sniffing, senile Biden, and...

I mean, some of the nastiest, ugliest, most degrading political fighting-during-campaign happened really early in the history of the United States. What's going on now is not unprecedented or particularly more degrading than what has gone on before. And the people that are running for office are no less-honorable than the crooks and cats and idiots that we've elected to be the leaders of the country in the first place. We've had very, very, very few noble, wise leaders in our country. It's the extraordinary exception; it's not the rule. So, I want to read you something from our Scriptures:

And now verily I say unto you concerning the laws of the land, it is my will that my people should observe to do all things whatever I command them, and [the] law of the land which is constitutional, supporting the principles of freedom in maintaining rights and privileges belonging to all mankind, is justifiable before me; therefore, I, the Lord, justify you and your brethren of my church in befriending [the] law which is the constitutional law of the land. And as pertaining to law of man, what[so]ever is more or less than this comes of evil. I, the Lord your God, make you free; therefore, you are free indeed, and the law also makes you free. Nevertheless, when the wicked rule, the people mourn. Wherefore, honest men and wise men should be sought for diligently, and good men and wise men you should observe to uphold; otherwise, whatever is less than these comes of evil. (T&C 98:2)

So, that's a enormous endorsement by God of the Constitution. But here's the real secret behind our Constitution: The Constitution absolutely assumes you will not have wise and noble and honorable people running this country. It assumes you're gonna have vile, self-interested, proud, arrogant, selfish, even mean-spirited people in charge of our government. And it has made provisions for that by dividing things up into three different branches:

- you have the Executive,
- you have the Legislative, and
- you have the Judicial.

This separation was done so that this office [pointing to "executive"] and this office [pointing to "legislative"] are in conflict with each other, and these people [pointing to "judicial"] are supposed to act as a referee of that ongoing fight.

There's been a trend to do some things which (I'm hoping, in a case pending before the Supreme Court) may nullify a lot of what's going on. The legislative people have given over rulemaking authority to the Executive Branch. They authorize something, and they send it over to the Executive Branch, and they say, "Okay, we're gonna have an Environmental Protection Agency; you make the environmental rules." That's really a legislative responsibility. Securities and Exchange Commission, taxes... Authority is given here [pointing to the Legislative Branch], and then the rulemaking is made over here [pointing to the Executive Branch]. And that means that the Executive Branch is also assuming some legislative power that was never at first intended. And we finally got a case that's going up that says, "Wait a minute, this is a confluence of authority that the separation of powers was intending to keep apart." And if that happens, then an enormous amount of regulatory rulemaking (that every one of us suffer under) goes away, and the legislature has to pick it up and deal with all kinds of little legislative issues. The division of this authority and the three branches was done precisely to protect you and your rights from evil, wicked, stupid people that wind up—you know—evil, maniacal people who say, "Hey, hey, vote for me! I want this power; I want this authority," so that when they get there and they have that authority, there's not much evil they can do to you—because they're fighting with one another.

But this thing was intended to be the primary repository of power because this legislature is where all of the initiative gets taken to accomplish things. And they took this power, and they divided it into two halves.

One half is elected based upon the amount of the population that you have for... The reason the census is important is because ~~every year~~ or every 10 years they reapportion, and as the population grows in one area, they get more members of the House. (And so, if Utah's population is growing and California's population is shrinking, Utah gets another congressman, and California loses one—'cuz it's based upon population.)

But on the Senate side, every state gets two senators. And so, the Senate is intended to represent the interests of the state, and these guys are supposed to slow everything down that these people [Congress/House] want to do (they're [the Congress/House] elected for two years; they come and they go; they have the power to initiate taxation; they do a lot of things/they have a lot of authority). The Senate is supposed to be the place where they're elected for six years; things slow down. They ratify treaties; they have a whole bunch of authority that doesn't exist over in the House.

When our constitution was first established and before an amendment was passed, the Senate was not elected by you and me. There's no such thing as a Senate running a campaign to be elected. The senators were chosen by the state legislatures. In order for someone to become a senator, the legislature of the state had to choose them so that the senator (who's sitting in Washington, D.C., chosen by the legislature) has to be amenable to whatever the state legislature wants. That means state legislatures become considerably more powerful. We passed an amendment, and we got rid of that—these people are elected directly. I gave a talk about how much that compromises the original intent. In fact, if this [senators chosen by state legislatures] were still around, there's a lot of legislation that gets passed in Congress that could never be passed—because senators chosen by state legislatures would never vote for it. It could never be done.

The talk is called "Constitutional Apostasy." I think it's recorded. I know that there's a transcript of it; it's on the website. At the time the talk was given, I was really talking about two things:

- I was talking about the history of this "erosion of power" by the change of the election of the Senate, which is a very real thing. And if you're trying to understand how befriending the constitutional law of the land was a revelation that was given back before this change was made, this change is "come of evil," and it's eroded a considerable amount of constitutional protection.
- But that talk was also about the change of affairs in the LDS Church. It was just an analogy for what went on in the LDS community.

When, originally, you had the First Presidency, you had the Twelve, you had the Seventy, and you had the high councils, and every one of these were (according to revelation) equal to one another in authority—every one of them were equal, which means that no one could consolidate authority.

- Joseph Smith had a number of vacancies in the First Presidency; he never once took a member of the Quorum of the Twelve and put them in the First Presidency. This was separate. It was never to overlap.
- Members of the Quorum of the Twelve (the first ones) were chosen by the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, meaning that the First Presidency didn't put their fingerprints on the selection of these people. They were an independent body.
- The Seventy got chosen, and they were supposed to be independent.
- And the high councils of the church were locally-elected by people.

All of these were power centers, equal in authority, intended to create potential conflict and impasses, and you couldn't get anything done. After the death of Joseph Smith, the Twelve assumed all authority—and everything changed, and everything went downhill. Anytime you begin to alter a balance of power, you wind up in a position where people that can project power and control and dominion and influence are always tempted to use that inappropriately; it's just the nature of men. It's just the nature of mankind.

We have probably had one (in the history of our country) president who didn't feel that way. He viewed his time as President as public service, and after he had served two terms, he resigned, and he went away—just like when he won the Revolutionary War and he could have been king, he refused to do that; just like when the Articles of Confederation failed and everyone looked to him to just take over, he refused. He walked away from power consistently throughout his life. Our founding first president (and the presidency was written for George Washington) was the only guy that didn't have that kind of ambition to have power, control, and authority. That example set a two-year term limit on the presidency until World War 2. And then, following FDR's death, a constitutional amendment was passed to enshrine, as a matter of law, the example of George Washington: two terms and you're out, can't be re-elected.

Anytime you get power and authority based upon office or position—anytime you've got that—the only thing it takes to corrupt everything is to have the wrong person in that position. One person can cause the whole thing to collapse. Joseph's original structure was intended to avoid that concentration. This system: it's been damaged, but it still intends to divide the power, divide the authority, and protect you.

In our particular (whatever it is we are...) movement/group, there have been two different occasions where people organizing conferences have asked me if I would be willing to let them "sustain me" in a conference as (I don't know...) "something." And both times I've said, "No, absolutely not. You don't do that. It will not achieve what you think it will achieve. It will hurt you, and it will hurt me." I have to be no more than you are. I have to be on the same level. Because as soon as you get this, it doesn't matter if you've got George Washington in that position. Sooner or later, you have Bill Clinton in that position. Sooner or later, you're gonna have someone who's intending to use that to gratify their pride, to cover their sins, to exercise control and compulsion and dominion over the souls of men in some degree of unrighteousness. And at that point, this is no longer a blessing; it's something that corrupts and corrodes.

You are the beneficiary #1: of a constitutional system that limits and fractures the power and that protects your individual rights. But you are also, right now, the beneficiaries of a group of believers who have rejected the idea of office and control and authority. And for so long as I'm around, I have no intention of rising above you/of being any different than you/of being any better. If I can persuade you, if I can teach you something that tastes good, that makes you say, "That is desirable; that's light, and that's truth," then I will do my best to accomplish that. But as soon as you hear me say, "Do it because I said so ('cuz, dude, I matter)," rest assured, I no longer matter.

The only thing that matters is truth. The only thing that matters is the religion that belongs to Jesus Christ, the faith that Christ taught, the example that He set. He didn't come to be an emperor. He didn't come to become a centurion. When they asked Him what authority He had, He said, "Okay, okay. I'll talk to you about authority. First, tell me what you think the authority of John was when John baptized."

And they huddled among themselves and said, "Crap, if we say he had no authority (which is really what we want to say because we want to say you don't have any authority; John was popular, and he was martyred, and people really respect him now that he's a martyr...), we're gonna get in trouble with the people."

So, the response is, "Well, we can't answer your question."

And He said, "Well, I'm not gonna answer your question. You won't answer mine; I'm not gonna answer yours."

What was the authority that He had? I mean, we say this was the Son of God. And what did the Son of God do? He knelt down, and He washed people's feet (which was the menial job of the servant, to clean the feet of the houseguest). He turned himself into the lowest servant—and this is the Son of God! So, why would any of us want to have something that makes us honorable when the Son of God made Himself subservient, servile, and (essentially) dishonorable in the eyes of people?

He went about doing good. Go about doing good. The good that you do will be noted; the things that you bring (that are light and truth) into the world will be valued, will attract the right kind of spirit by the right kind of people. But chest-thumping and bragging and asserting control... There's only one way that ends, and it always ends in a very, very bad way.

Hopefully, you will be able to continue the tradition of saying, "If it's light and if it's truth and if it appeals to my heart, that's what I want. It doesn't matter who it comes from, I want light; I want truth." But if we're trying to organize ourselves into a community that's a beehive—with someone at the top that gets to run things and collect tithes and support himself off of that (or herself)—that's headed towards the same end of all the Christian churches that the Lord said to Joseph Smith, "They're all corrupt. There's not any of them that I can call mine." In fact, right now, everything in Catholicism, in the Greek Orthodox traditions of the East, in Protestantism, and in Mormonism, everything has either been rejected or condemned by the Lord except for one tiny group of people. And that's a group of people with whom the Lord has said, "I'm gonna call you Mine. I'm gonna work with you. You're not what you need to be yet, but I will call you Mine," the only group that doesn't stand condemned. Part of the reason why I believe that He treats us so is because every one of you are equal to one another in this community. And I'm no better than you; I'm no greater than you; I'm no lesser than you; and I'm doing everything I can to help elevate you. And as long as I'm here, that will be the only role that I find acceptable.

In the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

Thanks for coming, and thanks for the plates.

2020.12.20 Christmas Fireside

Lehi, Utah

As I understand it, there are some people who are joining us from a distance, and I wanted to start on time to be courteous for them. This is about the Christmas story, but we're gonna back into the Christmas story.

When Joseph Smith was in the Liberty Jail, given the frantic pace of everything that had gone on in his life up until the time of his arrest and incarceration, Liberty Jail really constituted the first time that Joseph Smith had an extended opportunity to think. He would lose that opportunity as soon as he got out of Liberty Jail. And by the time you get to Nauvoo and the things that occur there:

- He becomes the postmaster—because they were afraid that the prior postmaster was stealing money that was being sent in through the postal service that was intended to help fund the temple, and it was being misappropriated.
- He was the Mayor—because the Mayor of Nauvoo had proven himself to be a liar and an adulterer and, ultimately, got excommunicated.
- He was the Major General of the Nauvoo Legion—because the predecessor had been caught in a compromising position, and he had to go.

And if you read the journals and diaries of what Joseph was going on, that's just a short list.

- He was also trying to manage the affairs of the Church.
- Oversee the people (that should not have required being overseen) in handling financial affairs.
- He was corresponding.
- He was sensitive to the issues that created political conflict when the Mormons tipped the vote in a state (because of their sizable population). And one way to neutralize that animosity was to run for the Presidency. And so, if the Mormon vote got canceled out because they were voting for Joseph Smith as President, that would leave the other parties to decide the popular vote, and no one could be offended by how the Mormons voted.

He was managing a mess. And it took all his time and more.

But in Liberty Jail, he had a brief opportunity between the mess that had happened in Kirtland that resulted in people conspiring to kill him who were members of the Church... (They wanted him dead because of the failure of the bank. He was chased out of Kirtland, and he left in the middle of the night to try and get out of there with himself still alive. He was followed for about 200 miles by people that were trying to kill him.) When he arrived out in Missouri, there was a mess underway there. Ultimately, they wound up with the siege at Far West and the surrender of Joseph Smith into custody. And then there was this respite (for nearly six months), in which Joseph Smith was confined to prison. Now, on occasion, he was brought out, and paraded around, and shown off as the prisoner, and ridiculed and laughed at. But for the most part, he had peace and quiet.

What's interesting about how he used that time is that at the end of the incarceration, without knowing when he would be released, he wrote a letter. (It's a single letter, but it came out in two installments. So, it constitutes two sections of the Teachings and Commandments. In the LDS Doctrine and Covenants, it comprises Doctrine and Covenants sections 121, 122, and 123. But those are just excerpts from the letter, and they're not even continuous excerpts. They are excerpts that grab and mix together and miss the discussion that ties together what went on. In the Teachings and Commandments, the entire letter—in its two installments—is reproduced.) And this is some of what was on Joseph Smith's mind when he finally had the opportunity for reflection and thought.

A fanciful and flowery and heated imagination be aware of, because the things of God are of deep import, and time, and experience, and careful and ponderous and solemn thoughts can only find them out. Your mind, O man, if you will lead a soul unto salvation, must stretch as high as the utmost Heavens, and search into and contemplate the lowest considerations of the darkest abyss, and expand upon the broad considerations of eternal expanse. You must commune with God. How much more dignified and noble are the thoughts of God than the vain imagination of the human heart? None but fools will trifle with the souls of men. How vain and trifling have been our spirits, our conferences, our councils, our meetings, our private as well as public conversations: too low, too mean, too vulgar, too condescending for the dignified characters of the called and chosen of God, according to the purposes of his will from before the foundation of the world... (T&C 138:18-19, emphasis added)

This is what Joseph contemplated in the quiet opportunity of confinement in prison: We've wasted too much time because our minds have been too frantic to consider carefully and solemnly and deeply the things that really matter. And if that was a problem during the confinement in 1838 and '39 in Missouri, think of what the problem is with minds today (with the Internet, with social media, with hand-held opportunities to text and communicate—beginning at 10 years old). How badly have we damaged our ability to engage in "time, ...experience, ...careful...ponderous...solemn thought" that is required in order to understand the things of God? What a wreck has been made of your own minds as you've been exposed to this current environment.

Joseph is talking in a rural, agrarian, quiet society, where you couldn't even hear a train in the distance. Shortly after I was baptized, a friend of mine (Steve Klapproth) came to Mountain Home, Idaho where I happened to be at my parents' house. And he and I were out in the backyard late at night, and he commented, "It's so quiet here." The only sound you could hear were the crickets that were nearby and a train, miles away on a railroad track, giving out its hum and its churn as it moved across in the distance. Today, people spend money to get white noise to allow them to flee from the racket, from the cacophony inside of which we live! So, one of the challenges that I face in coming here is: What can be done in these circumstances to get us to focus, carefully and solemnly, for just a moment on things that really matter?

When Christ came to visit with the Nephites, after He had done the Sermon at Bountiful (which is a mirror of the Sermon on the Mount) and after He had spent the day with them, He makes this observation to them:

I perceive that ye are weak, that ye cannot understand all my words which [I'm] commanded of the Father to speak unto you at this time; therefore, go ye unto your homes, and ponder upon the things which I have said, and ask the Father, in my name, that ye may understand and prepare your minds for the morrow, and I come unto you again. (3 Nephi 8:1 RE)

He would come unto them again. And the next day, He would pick up, and He would teach them further. Same people, same audience, same Lord minister, but their minds were unprepared to take in what it was He had been commanded to tell them. And so, He had to take a hiatus, interrupt what He was going to do, and tell them, "Go and ponder what you've heard so far, and come back tomorrow. Maybe we can get somewhere because..." careful and solemn and ponderous thought can only lead to the understanding that's required in order to focus the attention of the mind so that they can grasp what the Lord is trying to convey to them.

My wife told me that she saw where chess champions in a chess match (sitting down and studying a board and focused on the chessboard) will burn six thousand calories in the course of a game because of the mental exertion that's required to look at the board and to see when this piece is in this spot and all of the options that are available, how that interacts with the other pieces and the other squares, and how they multiply—until the study requires you to take a risk and guess what your opponent may do, to try and force the advantage by the choice that you make. Six thousand calories! There are professional football players that don't burn that many calories in a football game, and they're out pushing and shoving and running and jumping and hitting and tackling. And all the chess player's doing is sitting at the table and focusing his mind.

As the prophet Joseph was called upon to render a new translation of the Bible, in the course of looking at the Gospel of John, it became apparent that there had to be more than one condition in the afterlife. And so, they prayed to try and understand what the afterlife included, and (it's Doctrine and Covenants section 76, but it's in the Teachings and Commandments as section 69) something comes out by revelation to help explain some of what goes on in the afterlife. And as that vision is wrapping up, the conclusion of that has these words:

But great and marvelous are the works of the Lord, and the mysteries of his kingdom which he shewed unto us, which surpasseth all understanding, in glory, and in might, and in dominion, which he commanded us that we should not write while we were yet in the spirit, and are not lawful for men to utter, neither is man capable to make them known, for they are only to be seen and understood by the power of the holy ghost, which God bestows on those who love him and purifieth themselves before him, to whom he grants [this] privilege of seeing and knowing for themselves, that through the power and manifestation of the spirit, while in the flesh, they may be able to bear his presence in the world of glory. (T&C 69:29)

...understood by the power of the spirit, which surpasseth the ability of the tongue of man to communicate it so that what you take in can be far greater than what the tongue of man is capable of conveying to you, far greater than what you are able on your own to either articulate or to hand to another. But what you can do by your presence is to invite a shared experience, through the spirit, to gain light and truth—which is why the same Lord, talking to the same audience that He would see the next day, tells them, "I perceive that you're weak, and you cannot understand the words I'm commanded to tell you."

So, let me see if I can put out a picture that, if you'll take it in and entertain the picture, may help you grasp that there is something immensely bigger standing as a barrier between "us" and "understanding" that can be overcome, that can be lifted, if you will. I'm not gonna use a "pillar of light," because the pillar of light descending is something you've probably seen portrayed in First Vision video stuff, and that'll wreck it for you (just like Peter Jackson's "Lord of the Rings" trilogy wrecks the excitement of what you would get right now by reading Tolkien's book for the first time)—it's now been packaged, and you can't see it without that interfering. So, not a pillar of light.

I want you to instead imagine a wall of light so bright that it hurts you to look at it. It's like snow-blindness. And the wall of light then moves and encompasses you, and you are now inside it.

There are times when the pupils of your eyes struggle to shut out the light, and you get a sharp pain in your eye because you can't get that pupil narrow enough to exclude the light that is all around you. And you can see nothing. You can make nothing out except you're in the midst of this blinding, brilliant light. And it is incoherent. It's so bright that you're blind—because all you see is the brightness of this light.

And after a moment, you begin to make out, vaguely, a figure. And you realize that the light is emanating from this figure. As the presence of this figure becomes more stable before you, you begin to behold features: the hair of His head is as white as the snow, His eyes appear to be a flame of fire, His countenance is like lightning, and below His feet, a paved work of pure gold. And it is altogether beyond you. Frightening. Intimidating. You want, like Isaiah, to confess, "I'm unworthy. I'm a person of unclean lips. I dwell among people of unclean lips, and I'm not worthy to be here."

But then the Personage speaks and says, calling you by name, "Your sins are forgiven you," and your guilt is taken away, at which point, something more remarkable altogether happens. You begin to see this person has color in His eyes and color in His hair, and beneath His feet is no longer a flaming, golden surface, but there's life beneath Him, as well. And now this glorious Personage is something that you can, at last, take in because He's made Himself known to you. Your guilt was removed because of a word from Him—that God who you know cannot lie. The difference between coming into the blinding wall of light and now beholding that this Person has a normal color of hair, a normal color of eyes is the removal of your guilt by the words of this Person.

Imagine (as you're standing there, before this Personage) that there are colors you've never seen, and if you got out your 96-crayon box and you searched through it to try and locate a color, there just isn't one. And so, if you had to identify a color you've never seen before, you would use a word like "joy" or a word like "love" or a word like "warmth," "care"—colors that animate you to the very core.

So, if you'll take that picture and ponder on it, and then consider that the stories that we've got in our Scriptures are not necessarily perfect/are not necessarily complete/are not necessarily even the best way to put something, but they have been approved by God because they are adequate for His purposes, at this point, to get "what needs to be done" accomplished. They are the best that anyone has, and they ought to be the anchor that we use in order to take our own minds and to ponder—carefully, solemnly—and to try and reach through to see what it is behind these words that the Lord is trying to convey into our hearts, into our minds, into our understanding.

Well, the account that we get by Paul... Luke wrote the story, undoubtedly after having come into contact with Paul, because it's clear from the text of the Book of Acts that Luke wrote it and that Luke would not encounter and join up with Paul until some time, years later, in the events that took place. And so, Paul had to report to Luke, and then Luke had to write the account, and...

Paul—on Mars Hill—goes up to preach a sermon to try and get them to understand that there was a God who came and lived among them and died and was resurrected—and his point is preaching Christ to the people of Athens on Mars Hill. And this observation is what's made about those people on that hill, after identifying that they were philosophers, epicureans, and stoics on the hill (who debated endlessly). This is what is said about the Athenians:

For all the Athenians and strangers who were there spent their time in nothing else but either to tell or hear some new thing... (Acts 10:13 RE)

That's not how one gains access to the truth, to be continuously titillated with some new thing. Thinking and pondering carefully and solemnly does not involve the kind of robust voyeurism that oftentimes permeates our councils, our conferences, our conversations, our meetings. We're like these people, and that's too low, too mean, too vulgar, too condescending for the things of God. The things of God aren't titillating. We go about as if we've achieved some new and highly satisfactory result when we've had a good gospel conversation when, in fact, what we lack is more of the heart and character than it is of "hearing some new thing."

Now, as it is written, the birth of Jesus Christ happened this way (Matthew 1:5 RE). This is Matthew, okay? Matthew's gonna tell you a story, but what's the story Matthew's going to tell?

Now, as it is written, the birth of Jesus...happened [on] this way.

Where was it written, Matthew? Because I'm reading your account, and I don't have another account.

After his mother, Mary, was betrothed to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the holy ghost.

So, who is this Mary character? What does it mean to be "betrothed"? Why was the betrothal to Joseph? Who was he? How do these people emerge into the story?

There's a lot of evidence to suggest that Mary was someone that worked in the temple itself, among the priestly class—that she was someone who wove the veil. I don't know if those stories are true or reliable. But think about the symbolism of what it would mean to have a young woman weaving a veil, engaged in the act of creation. See, the veil in those days was made of four colors, and the four colors symbolized the four elements looked over by the four great guardian angels of the four cardinal directions. And here is a young maiden who is managing the weaving of the veil—whether it be literally the case that she did or not, the symbolism of it all suggests something very profound about a very young lady.

Well, we have... (I mean, I don't know how to talk about these things in a way that is delicate enough so as not to offend.) But in the law of Moses, one of the reasons why a menstruating female was considered unclean was because... In those days, they did not have the same kinds of hygienic capacity that we have today. And so, when Mary (working among the priests) had her first period, the priests would have known that. It (because of various issues) would not have been concealable, and she would not have been permitted into the ceremonially-clean places, and she would have necessitated performance of sacrifices for ritual purity in order to return/in order to continue on in the service that she gave. And it also marked the moment at which she needed to be married.

Tradition has it that it was the priests who arranged for accomplishing the marriage—because she needed to be married. If she was now "of age," then the circumstances required marriage. And there were, apparently, several people approached by the priests to marry her, and they uniformly declined. My suspicion is that there was a reason why she was declined by those first approached. My suspicion is that even though she was a child, she was intimidating. She frightened these older men. And Joseph was someone (perhaps third, fourth, maybe fifth on the list—an older man) who had already raised a family who was asked, widowed Joseph, to marry this young maid. Estimates of his age vary—I've seen, generally, someone in their 70s being the guess for how old he would have been; we don't know. I mean, those sources... Certainly, that's not the way that the story is shown in theater, in movies, and in storytelling.

Yeah, so, you've got a woman at the very commencement of fertility and a man who has already raised a family, and you've got a relationship that is primarily motivated by religious concerns. And so, the bargain is reached, the commitment is made, and now Mary is found with child.

Then Joseph, her husband, being a just man and not willing to make her a public example, was minded to put her away in private. But while he thought on these things, behold, the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a vision, saying, Joseph, you son of David, fear not to take unto yourself Mary your wife, for that which is conceived in her is of the holy ghost. And she shall bring forth a son, and you shall call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins.

Jesus is the Greek version of the name Joshua, in the anglicized version of the Hebrew name, which would have been Yeshua in the Hebrew tongue, and the name itself would have had meaning.

Now this took place that all things might be fulfilled which were spoken of the Lord by the prophets, saying, Behold, a virgin shall be with child and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Immanuel — which (being interpreted) is, God with us. Then Joseph, awak[en]ing out of his vision, did as the angel of the Lord had bidden him, and took him his wife, and knew her not [un]til she had brought forth her firstborn son. And they called his name Jesus.

Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea in the days of Herod the king, behold, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem, saying, Where is the child that is born the Messiah of the Jews? For we have seen [a] star in the east and have come to worship him. When Herod the king had heard of the child, he was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him. And when he had gathered all the chief priests and scribes of the people together, he demanded of them, saying, Where[s] the place that is written of the prophets in which Christ should be born? For he greatly feared, yet he believed not the prophets.

Well, isn't that just typical: The Scriptures scare the hell out of me, but I don't believe 'em. So, if there's gonna be this Messiah, I really need to rid myself of him, because the Scriptures predicted He would come, and if He comes, then that means the Scripture's been fulfilled. And if the Scripture's been fulfilled, that means the prophets knew what they were talking about. And if the prophets knew what they were talking about, that means that God spoke to them. And if God spoke to them, that means God exists, and

He will judge things, and I just don't want to think about it. So, how do I go about killing this Messiah?

And they said unto him, It is written by the prophets that he should be born in Bethlehem of Judea...

So, I went through that to show you how disbelief requires a great deal more mental energy than believing. It requires a phenomenal amount of effort to summon the faith to reject the prophets. It requires constant effort to defeat the evidences that God continuously [phone dings] puts before us. (Hey, hold my calls, will ya? I'm doing something.)

...for thus have they said: The word of the Lord came unto us, saying, And you, Bethlehem which lays in the land of Judea, in you shall be born a Prince who is not the least among the princes of [Judah]; for out of you shall come the Messiah who shall save my people Israel.

Then Herod, when he had called the wise men privately, inquired of them diligently what time the star appeared. And he sent them to Bethlehem, and said, Go and search diligently for the young child. And when you have found the child, bring me word again, that I may come and worship him also. When they had heard the king, they departed.

And behold, the star, which they saw in the east, went before them [and] it came and stood over where the young child was. When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceedingly great joy. And when they had come into the house, they saw the young child with Mary his mother and fell down and worshipped him. And when they had opened their treasures, they presented unto him gifts: gold, and frankincense, and myrrh.

And being warned of God in a dream that they should not return to Herod, they departed into their own country another way.

And when they had departed, behold, the angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph in a vision, saying, Arise and take the young child and his mother and flee into Egypt, and remain there until I bring you word, for Herod will seek the young child to destroy him. And then he arose, and took the young child and the child's mother by night, and departed into Egypt, and was there until the death of Herod, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, Out of Egypt [I have] called my Son.

Then Herod, when he saw that he was mocked of the wise men, was exceedingly angry, and sent forth and slew all the children that were in Bethlehem and all the region thereof, from two years old and under, according to the time which he had diligently inquired of the wise men. Then was fulfilled that which was spoken of by Jeremiah the prophet, saying, In Ramah there was a voice heard, lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning; Rachel weeping for the loss of her children and would not be comforted because they were not.

(Matthew 1:5-11 RE)

See, there's more than one statement in Scripture about the coming of the Messiah into the world. One of the others that would have been expounded upon as Herod continued his insecurity over the potential loss of his kingdom at the birth of this Messiah would have undoubtedly continued to plague them, and they would have continued to read from the Scriptures the things that speak of this coming Messiah. Isaiah wrote:

The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light; [and] they that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them has the light shone. ...For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder. And his name shall be called Wonderful Counselor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. Of the increase of government and peace there is no end, upon the throne of David and upon his kingdom, to order and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even for ever. (Isaiah 4:1 RE, emphasis added)

If you're Herod and you hear those words, what you realize is: taken at face value, this child is about to displace you, take over that kingdom, and there will never come a generation after this in which a descendant of Herod's is gonna be on the throne, because this Messiah (and those that come after Him) will have the "government upon their shoulders." So, Christ is born in circumstances in which there is a local suzerain king, subordinate to a Roman empire, ruled over by a fellow who has the authority and the ability to send out soldiers and murder children—all of the children in Judea—and yet, Christ is coming into the world to establish a government, the increase of which will never end, in the most improbable of moments, in the most improbable of circumstances, with the smallest of reasons to say that the Wonderful Counselor, the Mighty Prince, the King of Kings, the Lord of Lords, the Everlasting Father accomplished exactly what the Scriptures say He was to accomplish.

From Herod's vantage point, Christ was a mere inconvenience. The slaughter of the children was another day at the office. And when that miserable, syphilis-ridden monarch would die a few years later in his madness (because that's one of the things syphilis attacks is the brain), he knew no one would mourn for his death. So, he had representatives of all the chief families in the land brought, when he was on his deathbed, to a single place, where he ordered all of them killed when he died so that there would be mourning throughout the land at the death of this great king. This is the guy that set out to slaughter the child that Joseph—being commanded in a vision, being awakened at night—took into Egypt in order to secure the Lord there.

Well, there's another story; I did not read it. It's really the opening of the New Testament. That occurs in the Holy Place. The priest Zachariah goes in to offer a set prayer on behalf of Israel. He's not in there offering a prayer so that Elizabeth will conceive and bear a child; the set prayer that he would have recited included words asking that the "light of God's countenance would return again to Israel." And so, when the angel stepped out... (And the description of how the angel emerges on the right side of the altar in the Holy Place is exactly the location that you would have to emerge if you were in the Holy of Holies and you moved through the veil to emerge into the Holy Place and speak.) And so, the Angel Gabriel's presence conforms with the divinely-established pattern for the temple layout and the temple choreography, and he announces to Zachariah that his prayer had been heard, was being answered, and that God would send a son to him (Zachariah), and that son would go before the face of the One who would return the light of God's countenance to Israel; he would prepare the way.

This isn't Zachariah in the Holy Place trying to arrange family relations and secure a child. This is him, in the priestly office, asking that the nation that he represented receive a blessing to the nation from God, and it's not a personal prayer. It's an institutional prayer; it's a prayer on behalf of the people. And the answer that he is given is on behalf of the people. And so, Gabriel (who announces his name and that he stands in the presence of God) has come to say the light of God's countenance will return, and he's gonna have a son, and that son is gonna go before the presence of God to prepare the way before him.

So, the story that we get in Josephus (who's considered reasonably reliable about these things) has, at the time of the slaughter of the children in Judea, Herod's guards going to Zachariah and asking where his son was. Jesus' birth was obscure; the only people that learned about it (which Luke records) are shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over the flock by night, who have angelic ministers that tell them that the King has been born, and they go to find that out. John's birth was an extraordinary publicity stunt. Zachariah praying (as was his drawn-by-lots course to perform) comes out from his prayer, and he can't speak. And the people perceive that he's seen an angel. This is in the temple. This is in Jerusalem. This is in the capital. Can you imagine the buzz? I mean, think about it!

An angel appearing in the temple, and it was Zachariah, and now he's struck deaf and dumb, and he has to write in order to tell them. And he goes his way. And then Elizabeth conceives. And then the son is born, and the son is brought to the temple, and he is presented for the sacrifice and the circumcision, and they're debating: None of his family has ever been named "John"; what is Elizabeth talking about? And they turn to Zachariah, and he writes "His name is John"—not given by Zachariah; not given by Elizabeth. Gabriel named him. And when he does that, his tongue is loosed!

Well, he's spent nine months all quiet. Who knows what erupted on that day out of the mouth of Zachariah! The notoriety of this child would have been immense. William (born to Dian[a] and that funny-looking fellow with the big ears, Charles—"Charles" [said with a British accent]), William didn't have as much notoriety as would have John at his birth. So, if you're Herod, and you want to make sure that you kill the right child...

I mean, he kills every child two-years-old and younger. Based upon the account given in Scripture, the conception of John and the conception of Christ were six months apart.

Christ would have been born at one season of the year; John would have been born exactly six months earlier, in the opposite season of the year. John came into the world to close down a dispensation; Christ came into the world to open up a new dispensation. The birth of Christ would have—in all likelihood—have been in the spring. All of the debates that have been made about and all the reasons that have been given, based upon the festivals, notwithstanding, Christ would have been born in the spring, and John in the fall (John having been born first and would have been six months older than his cousin).

So, when the slaughter took place, what that would mean twelve years later, at the Passover—when they would have come to be presented—is that the 12-year-old kids arriving would have been from Galatia and Athens and other communities. But locally, hailing out of the immediate vicinity of Jerusalem, there would have been two, and they would have been cousins. It makes me wonder if the conversation that they interrupted and started asking questions of Christ didn't begin as a conversation among two cousins before the doctors of the law intervened and began to question the Christ themselves.

And it came to pass in those days that there went out a decree from Caesar Augustus...

Caesar Augustus is Octavius (of the recent killing of Marc Anthony and the suicide of Cleopatra—after the conspiracy to kill Julius Caesar and the triumvirate that resulted in the group turning on one another and Octavius winning in the subsequent fighting—and upon ascending to being emperor, changed his name to Caesar Augustus). That's not a pompous name at all, is it?

...all his empire should be taxed. This same taxing was when Cyrenias was governor of Syria.

Cyrenias is the Greek version of a Latin name, and turns out, we know a lot about that Latin fellow: He was actually raising the chosen heir to Caesar Augustus as the mentor-leader (because he had been such a successful leader in battle and administrator). Caesar Augustus opened up opportunities for common people to rise up in the ranks in a way that they never had before because he was trying to displace the Roman Senate. And in the process of displacing the Roman Senate, one of the beneficiaries of that was this Cyrenias. And he was so close with Caesar that his heir was entrusted to him as mentor. They went off to battle, and the heir got killed—oh, he got wounded, and he died, subsequently, back in Syria—but Augustus didn't hold that against Cyrenias. In fact, it didn't trouble their relationship at all. He named a new heir, and that would be Tiberius (who would destroy the temple).

And all went to be taxed, everyone in his own city. And Joseph also went up from Galilee, out of the city of Nazareth, into Judea, unto the city of David which is called Bethlehem — because he was of the house and lineage of David — to be taxed with Mary his betrothed wife, she being great with child. And so it was that, while they were there, the days were accomplished that she should be delivered. And she brought forth her firstborn son, and wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger because there was none to give room for them in the inns.

And there were in the same country shepherds staying out in the field, keeping watch over their flocks by night. And behold, an angel of the Lord appeared unto them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them, and they were sore afraid. But the angel said unto them, Fear not, for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a savior, who is Christ the Lord. And this is the way you shall find the babe: he is wrapped in swaddling clothes and is lying in a manger. And suddenly there was, with the angel, a multitude of the Heavenly host, praising God and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth, peace, goodwill to men. (Luke 2:1-2 RE)

...and the shepherd said, "Let's go see this!" And so, they went and found the child.

We have promises that God is up to something and intends to accomplish some things (at a time when it appears unlikely that God is going to vindicate all that He has purposed to accomplish) in a single generation at some late date in history. But the purposes of God in bringing Christ into the world occurred in far less likely circumstances for the Savior to have been born and survived, grown to adulthood, and been able to minister as he was able to minister. Now, it's true that the people misapprehended what God was doing, and they misapprehended what the first mission of the Lord would be—but people misapprehend what the Lord is doing and how the Lord is going to accomplish His purposes now, at the end of times, as well. The ability of God to accomplish a matter (while He is also concealing the matter from the understanding of the world) should never be questioned—because that is exactly how He has accomplished, over and over again, the things that He said He intended to do.

I'm getting ready to give a talk at a conference in the spring, and I've been going back and looking carefully at the revelations that have rolled out in our day, speaking to us. One of the things that is very apparent is that the statements, the guidance, the commandments, the instruction, the lessons that we've been given are not given to individuals; it's given to the people. Right now, the biggest challenge that remains as an obstacle to the accomplishment of what God has told us that He intends to do is the rising up of a people—not as those who can cleverly parse Scripture or who can endlessly go on about minutia related to the gospel—that's not the challenge at all. The challenge is to have us regard one another in a way so that we can live in peace with one another, and we aren't a threat to one another.

I'm hoping he doesn't mind me mentioning this, but in a recent conversation I had with a friend, Rob Adolpho... He and his wife are living on an Indian reservation, and she's a Tribal Chieftain leader; he's Polynesian. But the two of them and their children have actually performed Indian dances in full garb, dancing at various locations, celebrating Native American culture, history, and peoples. (I think they performed at the Calgary Stampede in full garb.) And we were having a conversation, and Rob was frustrated because he'd been talking to someone who wanted to do some work in an outreach to try and approach Native Americans with the continuation of the Restoration and bringing them the Book of Mormon and bringing them to a knowledge that God is actually up to something and that the native peoples matter. And the fellow who was talking to Rob said, "It's just too bad we don't... We need someone that can bring that Native American point of view and can..." And Rob was frustrated, because he's on the phone, and he's what they're looking for. And I said, "Rob, Rob, the next time you come down, bring all your dress and your garb and do a dance, and maybe they'll figure out who they're talking to." We had a good laugh.

But the problem and the challenge is to take and bring people together—not because you have subdued me with your arguments or because I have subdued you with my arguments. There shouldn't be any arguments. You know, the cure for disagreement is "time and patience and careful and solemn and ponderous thoughts." We don't hear one another because we don't have the patience to allow the issue to unfold. We are in a hurry, and we want to get the result.

It's obvious to me from reading the revelations that have been given to us that the Lord is far more interested in the process than He is in having us present a result. The process of working together and learning to cooperate, respect, and deal with one another is far more valuable and meaningful than is knocking out a result in a hurry.

Look, use the Scriptures as the starting point. The Book of Mormon, in particular, was given to us in our day as something from which to pry open and look into things that are real, that are beyond the veil. I was going to read (but I'll just commend to you) the account of the condescension of God given by Nephi when he's talking about the tree of life. In the new Scriptures, it's First Nephi chapter three, really beginning at paragraph six—but paragraph seven and eight and nine make it clear that the condescension of God begins with Mary. I've talked about that in "Our Divine Parents," but you should re-read that as part of the Christmas story, as part of thinking about this season—because it took an enormous effort on the part of heaven to bring to pass the coming of the Savior into the world. And although He wasn't born on the winter solstice or near it, we celebrate His birth at this time—and we look a little nutty if we don't celebrate it at this time, so... (We're regarded as nutty enough, already.) We celebrate it now, and so now is the time to think upon, reflect upon, and to look carefully at the Scriptures. If you will allow careful and solemn and ponderous thought to inform you as you read those verses of Nephi's, you may be shocked at the things that the Lord has been willing to tell us, in plain language, if we were willing to hear it.

God lives. The prophecies are true. The Scriptures that we have are adequate for God's purposes in our day, and we really needn't go too far away from them to find our way back to what we need. And the most important material of all that He has given us, is the Book of Mormon as a covenant and the revelations and instructions that have been given as commandments to us in our day. They are a blueprint for the establishment of Zion, if we'll just give heed to them.

We don't need to be like the folks on Mars Hill, always wanting to hear some new thing, when what we have heard already from the Lord challenges us to our core to become more united as a people, to be more patient with one another, to listen to what each of us have to say. We're too busy coming up with our own response to hear what the other person has to say. Maybe, taking time to listen (and then waiting a day or two to figure out what the right response would be) would be the best form of a conversation, instead of how quickly and how rapidly we want to have things take place now—in an instant, suddenly!

When God says things are going to happen quickly... There are watches; there are calendars; there are glaciers; and then there's tectonic plates. God moves them all. And so, for Him, the movement of a tectonic plate may seem quick. So, don't think that you have to hurry up, because the opportunity, it's here; it's now. It's given to you. But it's the process, not the result. God will take care of the result. The only thing we can engage in is the process itself.

In the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

Denver C. Snuffer, Jr.

I'm actually using a new set of the Scriptures that came as a sample set. The ones that are finishing up now will be slightly better than these sample sets because the spine on this one is not reinforced; they missed that step. So, these have floppy spines, but they are (other than that) exactly like what the finished product will be. And I get to use them today.

Can you hear me in the back? Is there a problem? Okay, good. I think the time's arrived, shall we start?

I've written a word up on the board—"glory"—and tried to illustrate that with some coloring. There's a verse I wanna read to you out of the book of Ezekiel in the Old Testament (in the new Scriptures, it's chapter 21 verse 27):

Afterward, he [this being the angel of God] brought me to the gate, even the gate that looks toward the east. And behold, the glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east, and his voice was like a noise of many waters, and the earth shined with his glory. And it was according to the appearance of the vision which I saw, even according to the vision that I saw when I came to destroy the city. And the visions were like the vision that I saw by the river Chebar. And I fell [on] my face, and the glory of the Lord came into the house by the way of the gate whose prospect is toward the east. So the spirit took me up and brought me into the inner court, and behold, the glory of the Lord filled the house. (Ezekiel 21:27 RE)

That's a description of an event involving the prophet Ezekiel, in which he's in the presence of God; but what he refers to is the glory of God, not the person of God. The Scriptures in many places refer to "the glory of God" as a substitute for God Himself.

I went on a hike; it had been snowing earlier that day, and the ground was covered with snow. And it just so happened on this particular day on this particular hike, I wore my sunglasses for no particular reason (because I never wear my sunglasses when I'm hiking). And a break in the clouds happened, and the sun shone down on the snow, and it was blinding if you didn't have your sunglasses on. But on this occasion, I just got lucky.

Sometimes when you've been in a dark place and you step into a light place, the light is blinding. Oncoming headlights at night when you're driving (particularly if the driver coming toward you has their lights on bright) can blind you. Light can prevent you from seeing what is past the light.

The glory of God doesn't allow you to see God; as the Scripture tells us, no man hath seen the Lord except he be quickened in the spirit. You have to get your sunglasses on in order to not be blinded by the glory of God.

So, the "glory" of God is a substitute for describing the person of God Himself (even though that passage in Ezekiel is about God coming and going into a specific place in the temple). We have a definition of the glory of God in Teachings and Commandments section 93, paragraph 11: The glory of God is intelligence, or in other words, light and truth.

Intelligence is the glory of God. Keep that thought in mind for a moment while we look at another couple of Scriptures about where we find ourselves right now, today—living in these tabernacles of flesh that are made of the dust of the Earth (and after your life ends, these tabernacles will turn back into dust eventually). This is what it says about occupying these "things": Men have become carnal, sensual, and devilish, and are shut out from the presence of God (Genesis 4:7 RE). Well, that doesn't sound good: carnal, sensual, devilish. Those words sound like we're just inherently bad.

- But the word carnal means that the body has appetites. You get hungry. You get sleepy. You get tired. You get sick. You get weak. You get sore. All of those things are carnal.
- Sensual means "indulging an appetite." You oversleep. You overeat. You do things that satisfy the appetite of the body, and you do it in excess so that you become addicted/subordinate/a slave to the appetite.
- And devilish means you're at odds with God.

So, when you look at the words and you realize what they're describing, it's not that we're all really, really corrupt; it means we are all vulnerable. Every one of us is weak and vulnerable and can be compromised if we don't work to protect ourselves against that compromise.

See, that word "natural" is actually used in a lot of advertising as something really good. You want natural hair color (or at least natural-looking hair color out of a bottle, which is not natural at all). You want natural-healthy skin. You want natural-looking eyes, and therefore, you use something artificial to put over your eye in a contact lens. But everything is supposed to look natural. "Natural" is advertised as the great wonder product of whatever it is you're doing or selling; it's natural.

For the natural man is an enemy to God, and has been from the fall of Adam, and will be for ever and ever but if he yields to the enticings of the holy spirit, and putteth off the natural man, and becometh a saint through the atonement of Christ the Lord, and becometh as a little child: submissive, meek, humble, patient, full of love, willing to submit to all things which the Lord seeth fit to inflict upon him, even as a child doth submit to his father. (Mosiah 1:16 RE)

"Enemy of God" means the same thing as devilish. It means you are at odds with God. You're not in sync with Him. If you're not in sync with Him and you're out of the way He would like you to live, you're at odds with Him—and He's inviting and enticing you to change what you're doing and to become more like Him.

Well, there are two parts to you. This is in Teachings and Commandments; this describes the two parts of you: ...and the spirit and the body is the soul of man (T&C 86:2). The soul consists of two parts: the spirit and the body. Everything that I have read from the Scriptures talking about being carnal, being sensual, being devilish, being at odds with God, being an enemy to God, all of that is a description of the condition of the weakness of the physical body.

The spirit isn't that. The spirit is called "intelligences" that are organized by God (see Abraham 6:1). Intelligence or the glory of God (the Scriptures tell us) cannot be created or destroyed; it is co-eternal with God Himself. So, when God becomes God and is a Being of Glory (or intelligence, or light and truth), that intelligence coexists with God. He emanates that. From the moment He is God, He emanates intelligence. But that "light and truth" can be organized itself into "intelligences." Your spirit—that that is inside you, that which is eternal in you—is made of the glory of God, it is co-eternal with God, and it is filled with light and truth. That's one part of you.

The other part of you is a body made of dust, which—in the book of Genesis (I won't bother reading it; it'll go quicker if I don't)—in the book of Genesis, describes how God created man, organizing him out of the dust of the Earth. He made man, and then He made a companion for man. And He called the man "Adam," and the man Adam called the woman "Eve." And the description of the Creation is: ...in the image of [God] created [He] him. Male and female created [He] them (Genesis 2:8 RE). So, this is the image of God that was created after the same pattern as God, and therefore, the image of God is Adam and Eve in their physical bodies modeled after God (male and female). God the Father and a female counterpart to Him created mankind after the image of God Himself.

Well, we have a description of what the body is like and what its characteristics are like. And we also have a description of our spirit and what our spirit is like and what its attributes are. This was written by the apostle Paul: Now the works of the flesh... (that's this body of dust that has all these weaknesses)...

...the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these: adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revel[ing], and such like.... (Galatians 1:21 RE)

So, what you've got in the body of flesh is a lot of weakness, temptation, and what I will just call generically "sin"—because all of those things are simply at variance with/contrary to/opposed to God and what God would want to you. So, that sounds rather pessimistic.

There's another part of you. Your soul does not consist merely of this weak body. Your soul also consists of a spirit.

The fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance. Against such there is no law. And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts. If we live in the spirit, let us also walk in the spirit. Let us not be desirous of vain glory, provoking one another, envying one another. (Ibid., ¶22)

So, the fruit of the spirit: love, joy, kindness—in a word, "godliness." And why is it that your spirit is like that? It's because your spirit is composed of something that is natively already inclined to this.

Look, when you came into this world, when you were born here, the spirit was fused into the body. Admittedly, that's not gonna last forever. That body of dust is gonna wear out. It's gonna fall apart. It's gonna droop and sag before you get to the end of the finish line. You're gonna find stuff you don't like. It's gonna start to creak and groan and complain. And eventually, if you live long enough, you'll say, "Hey, death is kind of merciful, really. I get to vacate this crappy apartment built out of dust that I'm living in." Now, if you die young, of course, you die in health and vigor, and you don't wanna vacate that particular body. But eventually, all of us are gonna wear out, wear down, and it's gonna lay in the dust.

Because your spirit is fused into that, the only way in which you, in this life, gain any understanding is through the brain that operates this mechanism. But the brain is exceptionally literal, vulnerable, and all of these things. If you watch a TV show and you see a murder, your brain cannot tell that that's just story-telling. If you play a game in which you shoot and kill other people or Walking Dead or you hash off the head of a zombie in your game, to your brain, part of your life's experience is shooting and killing, chopping and destroying, and so far as the body is concerned, every bit of that that you take in is real.

Now, your spirit knows the difference. But there are actually two voices going on within your soul at any given moment. At any given moment, your brain has the capacity on its own to gen up all kinds of foolishness, mistakes, improprieties, submission to the lusts of the flesh. Your brain can do all that on autopilot. And if you catch yourself doing that, you also have the ability, in the spirit, to say, "I hate that thought; I reject that thought." In fact, if you take any of the wretched, sinful thoughts that come into the mind and you allow your spirit to ask the question, "Well, what's the consequence of pursuing that? What's the consequence of doing that? What's the consequence of acting on that impulse?" within your soul, you have the ability to discipline the body, to call it back into a form of godliness in which the acts that you commit are governed by the light and the truth that is the glory of God or intelligence.

If you have a bad thought, that's pretty normal. In fact, with the entertainment that we watch, with the games that we play, with the social media that is out there, everything is designed to stir you up to envy and jealousy and ambition and carnality and to look for sensuality and to be at odds with the will of God and, therefore—because of your odds to the will of God—to make you, by definition, "devilish." And your spirit has the capacity to interrupt that and to say, "Not so! I'm not that. I don't do that. I don't believe that. I don't act on that."

Inside of that approach of the spirit, there is peace, there is joy, there is happiness. King Benjamin said wickedness was never happiness. But wickedness is really the playground in which, because of this environment, our bodies are naturally vulnerable and inclined to those failings. Your body gets tired. Your body gets sleepy. You have to go to sleep at night in order to give this frail body an opportunity to rest. Does your spirit need to sleep? Does your spirit get tired? Does your spirit wear out? It's co-eternal with God. Very often, what's going on at night when you're having dreams is not your body—but it's the fact that your body can't contain the activity of a spirit that never sleeps. There are numerous instances (in the Scripture) of God communicating a message to someone in a dream. There are numerous instances of God appearing in the night vision.

The apostle Paul talked about how he was caught up to the third heaven. And when he was caught up to the third heaven, he makes the observation: ...whether in the body...or...out of the body, I cannot tell (2 Corinthians 1:41 RE). But he was caught up to the third heaven because the bodies of your first parents (Adam and Eve and all of us as descendants of them) are made in the image of God. If you are in the presence, caught up to the third heaven, all of the things that you have now—fingers and toes, a body composed of intelligence and made of light and truth—appears to be the same thing that you're walking around here that's composed of dust. You can't tell the difference between the two. Everything about that is just as physical in its appearance/in its experience as is what we experience here in these bodies of dust.

But he was caught up, and he experienced the presence of God, and he saw and he heard unspeakable things. Well, why are they unspeakable? They're unspeakable for largely the same reason that Ezekiel describes the "glory of God" instead of "God"—and the glory of God inhabiting the place in the temple that God went into. Because it's hard to get past the limitations of this dust in order to get your hands around and to describe what it is that gets experienced there. It is "unspeakable" because the only way I'm able to communicate to you today is either using my mouth or writing letters on a board. That's pretty limiting. What Paul experienced was not limited in that way. You have the same capacity as Paul. You have the ability to take into you, through the spirit, the light and the truth or the intelligence that is coequal and coexistent with God Himself.

In your physical body, there is one and only one organ that allows you to see. Now, you get a side-by-side in order to have depth perception—because the only way you can perceive depth is if you have two points of origin in order to see that you're closer and you're further away, and depth comes from the triangle. It gets used in order to triangulate to figure out distance all the time; computers do that for us all the time. But in this physical body of dust, the only way you can see is through your eyes. If we injure your eyes, we can blind you. Do you think that your spirit can only see with eyes? Well, the answer to that is your spirit can see as a native part of every bit of the person of intelligence or light and truth. If you were in the spirit and you could behold God, and God were at your side (or above you or behind you)—in the spirit and quickened, so that you weren't blinded by the body, but you could behold—you would not need to turn your eyes or to turn around; you could behold the presence of God in the spirit from every source. All of the powers of the body that are limited to the particular organs are a function of this organization [referring to the body]. The spirit has capacities far, far greater than the body.

When you say (assuming you sing that old song) that you are a child of God, you are literally that in the sense of your spirit. It was and it is connected to that couple who created you, that image (male and female) that organized the first parents—it's part of them. It resides within you. It was organized to exist and to experience things to help it grow and increase in understanding. You have to come down here and to live in a body of dust in order to spend a time experiencing things that let you comprehend the difference between light and darkness, goodness and badness, weakness and strength, eternal life and mortality. This body is going to go (that you occupy), it's going to go through not only a lot of changes, but it's also going to be riddled with mistakes and errors, some of which are going to be relatively serious. That body is going to experience a lot of regrets. Well, the regrets are because the spirit has learned something from the error or the mistake that got made and will wish that it had not happened, it was not done, you did not fail. But you did. So, how in the eternal scheme of things does God's will play out in your life, in my life, with this body of dust that has made mistakes and made errors? Temporarily, while we're still here, we have the opportunity to repent and return to God and be forgiven.

There's a book (...has a great title), and the title really does profess a profound truth; title of the book is The Body Keeps the Score. You simply, within your body, keep the score of all this. The spirit can forsake, repent, and be forgiven of that, but the body still keeps the score. A merciful God allows that body, at some point, to be laid down, and all of those weaknesses and all of those frailties and all of those appetites and all of those mistakes and errors to dwindle into dust and to be put behind you. And what your spirit takes from that is the wisdom, the understanding, and the intelligence to go on, to look back, and to say, "From that experience, I have gained. From that experience, I understand."

Throughout your life, you're going to encounter problems, dilemmas, challenges, and thoughts (some of which are going to be not just challenging but quite ugly). You still have within you something connected directly to God that can extract itself, that can call you back to repentance. Don't think the thoughts that come to you, if they are offensive to God, originate in the mind of the spirit. Much of the fight that you're going to undertake in this life is a fight that will be inside of you. Overcoming the weaknesses of the flesh and gaining experience to understand the difference between "carnal, sensual, devilish, and an enemy to God" (at odds with Him) and "love, joy, kindness, mercy, forbearance, goodness"... You see examples of the difference between these two in the Scriptures.

Jesus went into the Garden of Gethsemane preliminarily to being crucified and struggled in the Garden of Gethsemane ~~with~~ the dealing with the sins of mankind. He asked three of the apostles to accompany Him a little further. And then He asked them to stay there and to keep watch with Him while He engaged in this struggle. He went and separated Himself from those apostles, and He came back, and they were all asleep. And He woke 'em up, and He asked them again, "Please, keep watch with me." And he makes this statement to them: The spirit...is willing, but the flesh is weak (Matthew 26:41 RE). "I know you guys want to do this," Christ is saying to Peter, James, and John, "I know you would like to be able to stay there with me, but I recognize you're weak, and your body's weak." And when He came back again and He saw that they were asleep, this time he said, Sleep on (Ibid.), and He returned to the task of the atonement.

When mankind submits to the weaknesses of the flesh and are controlled by these appetites, the Scriptures call this "a beast." Ecclesiastes talks about how this is a beast or, in our vernacular, an animal. Well, why is the body of man (when he submits to this side of his soul) considered an animal or a beast? It's because man's doing the same things that animals do: They eat, they sleep, they mill around, they fight, they reproduce, they do animal things, much of which is done thoughtlessly. When a man does not awaken to the spirit within him, the Scriptures regard him as a beast or as an animal. You are not a man (and man includes both male and female), you aren't that until you awaken to and submit to the spirit and the inclinations of the spirit. Until you do that, you're regarded as an animal or a beast.

Thoughts originate both in the dust, and thoughts originate in the spirit. And when you allow the spirit to control and lead you back towards God, that's often referred to as "the heart of man" in Scripture—the heart of man where these things originate or "the bowels of the spirit." We don't tend to view the heart as anything other than an organ that pumps and the bowels as anything other than something that processes food. But in the Scriptures, referring to the heart and the bowels very often is referring to the inclinations of the spirit—because the spirit is filled with intelligence. And the reflection of what the appetite of man is—if he submits to the spirit—is a reflection of the will of the spirit.

Now, there's a couple of points I wanna make, and then I'm hoping some of you young people have questions. And if so, we can talk for a few minutes on that (but we wanna get out of here on time).

There was a fellow from the East who came to actually set up shop in California—Yogi Bhanjan—who was a very successful spiritual teacher who came here and began teaching in the 1970s in California. He taught until 2004 when he died. And after he died, it now appears beyond all dispute that he was involved with sexual, physical, emotional, and financial abuse. And a lot of the accusations against him appear to be proven at this point.

So, here you have someone who is enlightened and has some great spiritual truths to share, but he gets into a position of influence, and he succumbs to the appetites of the flesh. Why is it that you can have someone who has absolutely astounding spiritual capacity who winds up submitting to the appetites of the flesh? Well, it's because the spiritual capacities were developed in isolation. Going alone in a mountaintop and meditating and having profound spiritual breakthroughs doesn't make you a good neighbor. Going out and dealing with God in reflection and meditation does not equip you to live alongside other people. Living with other people is a challenge all its own.

There are so many profound, great, spiritual leaders who succumb to adultery. Why is that? It's because their spirituality was developed in isolation and not in community. That's one of the reasons why we need fellowships so that we labor alongside each other to become civilized, both body and spirit, among others.

I think it is an absolute distortion of the record of the history to say that Joseph Smith succumbed to adultery. I've studied his life. I've read all of the accusations. I've gathered all the material that exists to this point in publication, and I'm satisfied that Joseph Smith was a virtuous man who was surrounded by men who were incapable of disciplining their bodies.

Well, there's a Buddhist story that I think's worth telling about an enlightened monk who lived near a city that had a lot of infighting, conflicts, and difficulties in the city. People from the town asked the monk to come into town and to guide them so they could resolve their conflicts, but he refused to go. He preferred living alone and meditating. The town sent more representatives to ask again, and the monk refused again. Finally, a great crowd of people went to ask the monk for his help because, without it, they could never reach peace. He at last relented. On the way back to town in the joyful crowd, an old woman stumbled into the monk and pushed him to the ground. This made the monk very angry.

It's far easier for a hermit to live in quiet meditation than for the same hermit to live in harmony within a community. We're not called into a dispensation of only individual salvation. For the salvation of souls today, the primary focus of God's religion is to gather a community. God's purpose for the end-times is focused on making people of one heart and one mind. In order to do that, your soul needs to be disciplined by, subordinate to, controlled by the glory of God or the spirit or the intelligence that is inside every one of you.

In the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

Do any of you kids have any questions that...? Yeah, yeah!

[Youth Question]

It can be, but...

The question is: Is being quickened in the spirit like the baptism of fire?

It can be, but what you're talking about in "no man hath seen God at any time," you can have the baptism of fire and the Holy Ghost and have your mind opened up so that you comprehend things that were not comprehensible.

One of the best descriptions that we've got of this in the Scripture is what happened after Joseph and Oliver went out and baptized one another based upon the commandment that they were given by John the Baptist. Afterwards, Joseph makes the observation in his history, T&C 1: "Our minds being enlightened, we were able to comprehend the more mysterious passages of scripture in a manner we could never previously attain to" (see Joseph Smith History 14:4). What that meant was: Having been quickened by the spirit, having been enlightened by the baptism of fire, having received the Holy Ghost, this awareness came to mind.

See, the Scriptures become an extraordinarily valuable basis for unlocking (with the power of the Holy Ghost) the understanding of eternity, whether it's opened up in a vision or simply comprehension as you read the Scriptures. Scriptures got composed by people under the influence of the Holy Ghost. And so, they reduce what their understanding, comprehending, or "having opened to their mind" to words on a page. But the words on the page are not the content. The content was what the spirit inspired. So, if you read with the power of the spirit like Joseph and Oliver were doing, then what comes alive in these passages is the same extended view, comprehension, light, and truth that extended knowledge as a result of that.

But being "quickened in the spirit in order to behold God" is actually dealing with an impediment that we have in this [the body] because the glory of God in a fullness is actually dangerous to this body. It's toxic and destructive. It would be like stepping in front of a—you know—a thermonuclear explosion. I mean, God is capable of occupying everything within His creation. He can occupy any of it. Temperature at the corona of the sun is what? Twenty million degrees? God is not damaged by that. Well, if He were to unveil all His glory (which He intends to do at some point around the Second Coming), it will be destructive of anything that He doesn't pick out to preserve and to save by quickening—which is the same thing as wearing sunglasses in the bright, sunny, snow-filled terrain.

I think we've got time for maybe one more. Does any... Yeah?

Why is God displeased with premarital sex?

The commandment—the first command that was given to these two [Adam & Eve]—was to multiply and replenish the Earth. Therefore, it's an obligation to marry and to multiply. But the obligation to marry and to multiply does not attach until the union of the male and the female has been put together by an oath or a covenant of marriage. That's because the effect of sex is reproduction.

Every child that comes into this world is entitled to have the image of God (or the father and the mother) be the one that introduces them into the world—because every child enters this world very much like Adam and Eve entered this world: innocent, without sin, in a physical body, but protected and guided and insulated against the dangers that attach.

There's no more vulnerable creature in nature than a human baby. A giraffe—moments after the giraffe is born—can run. The same would be true of a horse. I mean, human babies are exceptionally vulnerable. Therefore, if you're going to take an innocent and vulnerable new life and introduce them into this world, you need to introduce them like Adam and Eve were introduced into this world: in a state of innocence that's protected and watched over (in the biblical analogy, it's called the Garden of Eden). But every child comes into this world cuddled, held, warmed, protected, fed, clothed, kept dry, kept warm by parents—much the same as the Heavenly Parents watched over and protected Adam and Eve in the Garden. If—contrary to that model—a child gets introduced into a bickering, uncertain, unstable, warring couple that extends outward to parents that are offended on both sides, then you have not followed the divine pattern of introducing life into this world.

(And in case the thought occurs to the body that there are ways to prevent conception, I can tell you that there is no such thing as a foolproof—doesn't matter which option is chosen—nothing's foolproof in terms of preventing pregnancy.)

And therefore, the model that was set by God in the beginning (which is the model that ought to be followed, the one that will bring joy and love, kindness, peace, and represents godliness) is to refrain from premarital sex but to get married, in part, in order to have sex and to produce offspring and to introduce them into the world and to care and nurture and raise them.

I can tell you that children... They're maddening. They're frustrating. They're delightful. They're hilarious. They're funny. They're stupid. They're an experiment. They're extraordinary... Children make the life of parents ten-thousand times richer, experiencing joy that comes from no other source in as great a magnitude... and pity and anger. It's just... It's a rollercoaster ride. But your children create in you, as parents, a whole new life. It's the most marvelous undertaking that you can have, to produce children. And there is nothing that will matter more to you in your old age than your posterity.

Thank you for coming. We've about used up all of our time. What?

Audience Member: Can I ask a question?

Denver: No, you're not a kid! [Laughter.]

Audience Member (continued): I know. But I think it would be interesting.

Denver: You think it would be interesting? [Laughter.] Well, he doesn't. He doesn't want to hear anything about that. What is it?

Audience Member (continued): When the Book of Mormon says that God put a curse of the skin of blackness on someone, what would that be in terms of the body or the spirit?

Denver: Yeah, okay, so now we've got the question that comes up forever about, oh, what's the curse of the skin of blackness?

Look, these guys were (for lack of a better word) Bedouins. K? They're Bedouins. How does one dress? I mean, essentially, you wear a headdress, and you wear a robe. And how did the rebellious Lamanites dress? Well, they wore a loincloth made out of lambskin. And when they weren't decorating themselves with blood, they were otherwise naked.

What happens to you when you strip down to a Speedo and you hang around outside all summer? It's cultural. It's behavioral. It's... You darken. It just happens.

And the Nephites didn't dress that way. They didn't behave that way. They kept the culture from which they reckoned. And their [the Lamanites] behavior reflected that they'd gone back to the natural man, and they indulged what the natural man indulges—which is generally at odds with God and, therefore, an enemy to God.

So, see, he wasn't interested. He didn't care about that. [Laughter.]

Thank you for coming, and I hope this made sense over the Zoom. I could see the reflections coming off the board. They probably... You should take a picture of this and put that up so that they can see what was written. Thank you.

2021.03.06 Understanding Your Soul, Part 2

Transcript of a Youth Talk and Q&A
Denver and Stephanie Snuffer
Highland, Utah
March 6, 2021

Denver: Why don't we go ahead and start? And we'll just spend the first few minutes doing a review. I've written up on the board some of the same kinds of information that was up there last time. I hope you listened to that so that the continuation of that makes sense.

The definition is given about what the soul consists of, and there are two components to the soul of every individual: The body and the spirit are the soul of man. And we talked last time about how the body has a variety of weaknesses that are associated with the body of flesh that's essentially appetite-based.

- Every body has to be fed. If you deprive the body of food, its weakness and need for food will become readily apparent: first, by hunger; later, by starvation; and ultimately, by death.
- The body has to have rest. If you deprive the body of rest, it will experience exhaustion. Ultimately, if you don't allow a body to sleep, it will eventually lose sanity, and eventually, you can die from that, as well.
- The body requires a whole lot of periodic maintenance.

It's like buying a 1945 Ford and expecting that thing to run for an indefinite future. With modern oils, you might keep it going (maybe even a '45) maybe even 150,000 miles, but eventually that '45's gonna wear out; it just isn't gonna hang around. That's what you're walking around in right now: vulnerable, weak, filled with appetites, and susceptible to anger, rage, a whole lot of problems that are associated with the body of dust. And I've written a list of some of the things that the Apostle Paul includes in his letter that describes what the flesh is all about [adultery, uncleanness, idolatry, hatred, envy, drunkenness].

Then there is a spirit which has a coexistence that goes right back to God Himself. That spirit is composed of intelligence or light and truth, which is a big deal as we get into the topic again today. The spirit does not have the same kinds of vulnerabilities as does the body. Therefore, if you can link up to the connection within you of the spirit, you will not be vulnerable to many of the weaknesses of the flesh—because the spirit is fortified and capable of enduring through all kinds of things that the body would succumb to.

As it turns out, in the religious and intellectual traditions of the world, Christianity and the West have largely focused upon the body. But in the East, the religions and the philosophies have largely focused upon the spirit. Buddhism does not claim to be a religion; it claims to be a way of life and a way of understanding life. Its focus is primarily upon overcoming the weaknesses of the body and getting into connection with the spirit.

Assuming I can impose upon her to do so, I'm gonna ask my wife to talk a little bit about that topic as I finish up today.

But if you were to look at—carefully—at both the teachings of Christ and the T&C revelations given through Joseph Smith, what you would find is that Christ's doctrines and the teachings of the Restoration marry together both the body and the spirit. It is a kind of religion that Christ taught that expected you to come into the flesh, do battle with the flesh, overcome those temptations, subdue the appetites, and ultimately, win a battle so that you are not tempted to do, succumb, or submit to the appetites of the flesh, but instead, you make the flesh rise up to live and contemplate, exist, and enjoy the fruits of the spirit. Because few things are as rewarding as having the opportunity to have spiritual experiences while occupying a body of flesh. It is enlightening. It is enlivening. It is (according to the description given by both Nephi and Alma) a fruit that is most white and most delicious and more to be desired than anything else that there is. There is no thrill that you can have in the body that is equal to the thrill of overcoming and connecting with the things of the spirit. It's called the "search for enlightenment." It's called "attaining to the Church of the Firstborn." It's called "enjoying the fruits of the spirit." That's the religion that Christ taught. That's the thing which Joseph Smith was in the process of restoring.

Unfortunately, the converts that came aboard the Restoration while Joseph Smith was alive were drawn largely from Protestant Western Christianity and Catholicism (largely Protestants, but some Catholics). The problem with that is their basic orientation (when they came aboard) was: "If you can circumscribe your physical appetite, then you're a good guy. And if you're a good guy, you get to feel proud of yourself, and you get to look down your nose at everyone else that succumbs to that." It kinda worked, and it kinda held together—until you got to Nauvoo, and then:

- They discovered the whole imported "spiritual wife" system,
- Which gave rise to adultery,
- Which, in turn, gave rise to conspiracies to commit murder (which succeeded in the case of Joseph and Hyrum),
- Which, in turn, gave rise to lying and deceit and ambition and the desire to displace Joseph and to engage in submission to the appetites of the flesh.
- And after that, the vote was held. The Twelve ostensibly won the vote, but in fact, it was Brigham Young. They come west, and it turns into a religion that is holding up adultery as a sacrament, and
- It's all downhill from there.

You're emerging from, basically, either Mormonism or Christianity into a continuation of the Restoration which has extraordinarily high ambitions for what you are supposed to be. One of the reasons why I wanted to talk about this subject with the youth is because if you can figure this out early in life and if you can engage in this struggle early in life, you stand a far better chance of developing into the "full measure of the person of Christ" than does someone who has basically spent their life looking at things through the lens of basic Western-orientation without understanding the difference between the body and the spirit and the significance of connecting to the spirit.

So, with that introduction and brief reference back to what went on before, I want to take a look at a statement that is made. (This is actually Enoch, but it's found in the book of Genesis.) Enoch recorded this about Father Adam. So, he's describing Father Adam's experience accompanying the baptism of Adam, okay?

You are baptized with fire and with the holy ghost.

...is stated to Adam. This fire in the Holy Ghost,

This is the record of the Father and the Son, from henceforth and for ever. And you are after the Order of him who was without beginning of days [and so on]... (Genesis 4:10 RE)

It is given to abide in you: the Record of Heaven, the Comforter, the keys of the kingdom of Heaven, the truth of all things, that which quickens all things — which makes alive all things, that which knows all things, and has all power according to Wisdom, mercy, truth, justice, and judgment. (Ibid. vs. 9)

That's what the spirit includes. So, among other things, it is the Record of Heaven; it is the truth of all things; it is that which maketh alive. That's the spirit.

How on Earth can the Record of Heaven and the truth of all things be embedded in you [pointing to audience members]? You are walking around with that in you! And think about that for a moment: how on Earth can it be that you possess something that reaches back into "the truth of all things"?

Well, before you got here, you lived somewhere else in something that is called a "first estate." It's called the first estate because it was "before this one." It may not have been your first estate: It may have been your 100th; it may have been your 10,000th; it may have been your 100,000th. But as to here, it was first—before here. How much went into that beforehand? It's not important; we aren't told about that. It's not included in the Scriptures, and it's anyone's guess. However,

...the Lord had shown unto me, Abraham, the intelligences that were organized before the world was, and among all these there were many of the noble and great ones.

"Intelligences" are spirits, and it includes you—because if you got here in this cycle of creation, the only way you got here to experience this life is because you were part of that group there. And within that group there (which were organized before the world was), within that group, there was another group:

And among all these there were many of the noble and great ones. ...God saw these souls... (Abraham 6:1 RE, emphasis added)

So, these "souls" [the noble and great] were good. Intelligences are spirits. What are souls? The vocabulary that Joseph Smith was using by the time he translated the Book of Abraham already had acquired the definition of what it meant to be a soul. So, among the group of people (the spirits that were there), there was a subgroup from among that group that were "souls." If they were souls, then they have already been through an experience that involved this kind of an existence. And they were good.

How do you know someone is good? Because as Alma writes, "In the first place, they were allowed to choose between good and bad, and having chosen good, they were foreordained according to the foreknowledge of God" (see Alma 9:10 RE), so that those souls would come down, and they would exhibit goodness—so that people could look at their example and understand the kind of example that would be set by the Savior. (It's in Alma. It's the old Alma chapter 13, verse...which I would have to look up in order to tell you where it is in Alma in the Restoration Edition, but it's the chapter about Melchizedek priesthood and who gets chosen in order to be an example.) They were chosen according to the foreknowledge of God, because God knew—based upon their past experience—that they had already stepped behind a veil; they had already been tested and proven, and they had already risen up to the point that they could be trusted. But now, we're all the way back to preparation for another cycle of creation—in which we're organizing a creation, and we're determining who will be born when and where, and how this cycle of creation is gonna go down.

...the Lord had shown unto me, Abraham, the intelligences that were organized before the world was, and among all these there were many of the noble and great ones. And God saw these souls, that they were good...he stood in the midst of them and he said, These I will make my rulers. For he stood among those that were spirits, and he saw that they were good. And he said unto me, Abraham, you were one of them; you were chosen before you were born. (Abraham 6:1 RE)

The word "ruler" doesn't mean king, and it doesn't mean president, and it doesn't mean boss. Abraham was chosen to be one of them: Abraham lived and died with almost an insignificant number of people who gave heed to him. He lived, essentially, as a family man, but he was going to be made a ruler [Denver drew a ruler on the whiteboard—a measuring stick]. He would set a standard; he would be someone by whom you could measure the truth. In the Book of Mormon, the word "ruler" is equated with "teacher." That's who Abraham was. That's the rule that Abraham marked out as the plan or the pattern, the example, the baseline—the very thing that, if you follow, will bring you closer to God.

So, go back now in your mind to the idea that the spirit, the holy ghost, the thing that you possess (in particular, when you connect up with it following baptism) includes the Record of Heaven or the truth of all things, and realize that that is connected to what went on before this world was.

- You're standing there when this Creation was planned.
- You saw, and you heard what went on in the Councils of Heaven preliminary to the commencement of the Creation of this world.
- You knew what the plan was.
- You knew who the Redeemer would be.
- You knew who the opponent of that was.
- You knew about the rebellion, and you chose not to participate in that.
- You elected to come here and to take on all of the risks and vicissitudes, the troubles and the trials of mortality because you trusted that Christ would deliver on His promise to come here and to redeem and reverse from the blows of death that are inflicted through the fall of man by Adam and Eve, our first parents.
- You trusted that you would get out of the predicament that you're in presently because the Savior stood up and said He would go, and He would do as the Father commanded.
- And another one argued that, "Not so fast! Let me go down. I will destroy the agency of man, and I will make it possible for everyone to be saved without regard to whether they are good or bad, virtuous or unvirtuous, whether they are kindly or whether they are murderers. I'll just redeem them all, and we'll repack Heaven with that same crew that goes down (after they go down, and they indulge themselves in the flesh)."

Kind of a messy plan. It might get everyone back there again, but once you brought them back there, they're even less suitable for occupying the halls of Heaven than they were before they came down here in the first instance. And the objective is to come down here to be added upon—that is, to experience things and to make war against them; to let your conscience control your fleshly appetites; to reign in, not to give vent to licentiousness and worldliness and body-ness and ambition and hatred—all of the appetites that drag you down. And every one of you who's here, if you've ever engaged in an internal debate in which you were tempted to do something and you held yourself back from doing so, every one of you have been added upon. And the more you do that over the course of a lifetime and the more you connect to the Record of Heaven, the more you are able to understand and see and comprehend the truth of all things. It's what you're here to experience. It's what you're here to do. And every time you make a move in that direction, you're added upon.

This gives definition to what Christ was telling His apostles about when He described the coming Holy Ghost that would fall upon them. He says,

But the Comforter, who is the holy ghost whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance... (John 9:9 RE, emphasis added)

How can you possibly remember the truth of all things? It's because it resides within you, and you can access that by your heed and diligence. Those are the very words that are used to describe how it was that Christ overcame the world: by His heed and diligence. The more heed and diligence that you give to the commandments of God, the more the light within you grows. It's already there. You're just permitting it to invade the body of flesh and to inform you by triggering your memory.

Now, before I got here today, a fellow who's a student up at Boise State University sent me an email that asked about a series of Scriptures (Ether 1:13, T&C 86:4, and T&C 93:10) about... Essentially, he's a physics student at Boise State University. And Dallin provoked some thoughts that I thought were worth repeating here. So, indulge me for a moment about...

It also fits in with what's on the board because you might be asking yourself, How can a soul—already has an experience—how can a soul then revert back to being a spirit? (...which is one of the things that Christ says in that Ether 1:13 verse when He appears to the brother of Jared, and He's talking about, "Hey, that same body that you see me in is the kind of body that I will appear in in the flesh when I come into the world"). Okay? It also ought to make you think about the virgin birth and about how if Christ was a soul, then He already had the capacity to come into the flesh with a body. On occasion in the Scriptures, you find barren women conceiving and having children. Mary's example is the most astonishing because, in the case of Christ, it's a virgin birth. But it's no less improbable a pregnancy than Samson's or John the Baptist's or Isaac's. If a woman cannot conceive a child and yet she bears a child, it's a pretty strong indication that this is one of the souls that were sent into the world that had proven themselves before. And in each instance, they performed in this world in a way that justifies capturing their story and recording it in Scripture as instruction, as a lesson, or as a parable for us to understand how to choose the right and avoid the wrong.

Well, if you were to draw a graph of the hottest temperature that we know about... In our neighborhood, it's not the hottest that there is—but there's a 20 million degrees temperature in our local neighborhood on the corona of our sun. If you go into space, there is a temperature at which you reach absolute zero, which means that atoms and molecules turn solid, and they cease to be moving. That is called absolute zero. And absolute zero is something like, I don't know, something less than 400 degrees below zero, okay? So, in the universe, we have temperature variation from 20 million degrees to -400 degrees in our little niche of the Milky Way. Mankind can only survive in a little place (I've been really generous in drawing the little red line there) in a little place that is capable of sustaining life. If you get too much colder than that, we die. If you get too much hotter than that, we die. But here in the temperate zone (that's what it's called)—in the temperate zone, we can live and move.

Well, one of the differences between what's going on at 20 million degrees and what's going on at -400 degrees, the difference between those two is how animated the elements are or how fast things are moving or how quickened the things are moving in this Creation. "Quickening" is the word that gets used in Scripture, and oddly enough, quickening is actually a pretty good word to use to describe what happens when something approaches such power, such glory, such temperature, such heat that if you and I were exposed to it for even a second, it would destroy us—because we're living at a level in which we're tangible, we're hard.

So, when you hear a dialogue in an LDS Temple Endowment (which some of you have probably been through, and some of you may never go through), there's a colloquy that takes place behind the veil in which angelic ministers are gonna come and check on the man Adam and the woman Eve, and they say, "Come, let us go down" [Denver points to "decreasing temperature" on the thermometer he has drawn on the whiteboard.] Going down and engaging in physicality is a way of reducing the glory, reducing the temperature, reducing the elements so that it assumes a physical form. Those souls who have been here before have acquired the competency, through a physical experience, to know how to exist in this solid form. Solid, liquid, gas, plasma—at some point, what happens to the elements in the quickening is that they become pure energy, or they become a glorious being of such capacity that they approach (ultimately reach) infinite. If you had the ability to be quickened beyond the speed of light, all of our mathematical formulas suggest that, at that point, the amount of energy involved is infinite (meaning: it wouldn't be but a small exercise for you [pointing to the audience] with infinite power to move planets around).

All of the Scriptures where Christ is talking about "the body you see me now have is like the body that I will get when I come into the flesh" is Him explaining that "There won't be much difference, but I won't have to quicken you in order to abide in the flesh. I'm going to lay aside My Glory, and I am going to descend into the world, and I will take up my abode in the flesh—with all of the weaknesses that are associated with living here in this environment—and I will dwell among you. And while I'm here, I'll pray to the Father, 'Father, let Me come back to the glory I had with You before the world was,'" because He longs to get back into that state.

Well, all of those Scriptures are talking about this kind of subject. We get a kind of peek into it with what we know about the physical Creation, so far as we've been able to calculate it, examine it, measure it, and look at it. But everything that physics is attempting to talk about is already built into and embedded within the language of Scripture, and it's describing not just spiritual phenomenon. It's describing actually what God is up to and how this Creation reflects those kinds of realities.

Now, one of the challenges that we all face is trying to get in touch with this [the spirit] in order for that to subdue and to control what's going on in the body. You never want to wind up in a position in which this side [the body] is controlling that side [the spirit]. But you have the ability to check that from time to time and to reel in the body and to say, "Not so, I won't go there. I won't be that. I will submit only to the counsel of the spirit."

There's this saying that mental health folks have that if someone comes and tells you "they're God," they're probably crazy. But if they tell you "they're God, and you're God, and you're God, and you're God, and everyone's God," they're probably not crazy; they probably just caught a keen insight into what it means to have dwelt in the presence of God at one time and to bring with you from His presence the Record of Heaven and the truth of all things. You already know it. The purpose of the Holy Ghost is to bring that into your remembrance. The purpose of that is to search for and to find a connection to God, and that connection is not on the other side of the world, up a mountain in Tibet. It's here, it's now, and it's accessible by you. But you have to give heed and diligence in order to find that.

In a very real sense, God the Father and God the Son have a mind that you share with them. That mind you share with them is the Holy Ghost, and that Holy Ghost, as far as each one of you is concerned, is the third member of the Godhead who dwells within you and can be accessed by you. And when you do that, it will lead to companionship with angels, and ultimately, it will redeem you from the fall and bring you back into the presence of the Beings from whom you originated.

That ends my part of this. I've asked Steph if you'll [directed to Stephanie] come up and say a few words about ideas that may help you connect to the spirit. I'm gonna stand up here, but you come join me.

Stephanie: If you want that [the notes on the whiteboard], take your pictures now, 'cuz I'm erasing it. [inaudible]

Denver: Oh, I should probably get out of the way.

Stephanie: I thought about just erasing it, but then I know, "No, Steph...!"

Denver: I'll erase everything except this. I wanna keep that up here.

Stephanie: The -400?

Denver: Yeah.

Stephanie: Okay. So, I am a "how" person. All of this stuff is great. And then there's this gigantic disconnect about, "Okay, yeah, it all sounds really good. Now, what are we supposed to do?"

I'm not an expert, by any means, but I have recently embarked on a new journey which is full of all kinds of interesting and edifying things. And one of them is that the language of "good mental health" is basically just Scriptural, written in secular terms—so people who are not religious can understand the same concept. There is a universality about God and about connecting to God. And so, if the soul is the body and the spirit, then you want to connect with the spirit, right? Okay. Connecting to the spirit can be accomplished by learning about and practicing mindfulness, okay? So, I'm gonna give you a few things to think about so that as you think about his talk and start reading the Scriptures again from a new paradigm, you have in your mind this idea of mindfulness.

So, at our basic level, human beings are down here to do five things, pretty much consistently. We are down here...

Audience Member: Can you use the black [marker]?

Stephanie: Oh, yeah—oh, I like color! Okay, we are down here to:

1. Seek pleasure,
2. Avoid pain,
3. Increase our social standing, self-esteem (or in the words of social media), "be liked," okay? We like to be liked, right? and
4. Protect our loved ones, and
5. Think constantly about how to accomplish 1-4, okay?

Does that sound about right? Okay, these five things are pretty much the reason all human beings suffer—okay?—'cuz we do; we suffer. It is why and how we find ourselves emotionally upset, emotionally dysregulated (these are therapy words; sorry, I got a new job), and there are a million reasons why we do this, okay? These are the basis upon which we do this (I'm not gonna write these down). So, here are a few of the ways we suffer as human beings:

- We worry about the future—yeah, all of the time, right?
- We regret our past: "Oh gosh, shoot, I shouldn't have done that! I can't believe I did that!"
- We are angry or we're sad for any number of reasons.
- We suffer from guilt and shame because of the things that we do.
- We enjoy physical pain: hips, knees, joints, gallbladders, kidney stones—you know, whatever.
- We find ourselves often bored and stressed.
- We have anxious thoughts, or we're depressed, or we worry all the time, or
- We engage in addictions or other kinds of things that really bring us down.

So, lesson number one: "Being human" is really hard; "being human disconnected from our spirit" is even harder—it makes everything harder. So... Just I'll get this out here; this is words to live by: Pain is inevitable, okay? You are down here in your human form (dust, flesh)—you are going to be in pain. Any number of these things are gonna cause you pain, just like I said. But suffering is optional, okay? We do not have to make our pains worse by making them our focus. We can let go of some of this. So, the question then is: How do we avoid suffering when we are in pain?

So, the way to do that is to connect to your spirit and set aside our preoccupation with our bodies, okay? That stuff that you took a picture of [on the whiteboard before Stephanie started talking], that's exactly what I'm talking about: body, spirit, all right? So, we want to separate ourselves from that.

So, here's a couple of definitions of mindfulness. Mindfulness means "relaxed, embodied awareness." (Whatever.) It means "paying attention—on purpose—in the present moment without judging (as if your life depended on it)," okay? So, what does all that mean? Well, at the root of mindfulness—which is not sitting cross-legged in a room on a cozy cushion with your legs crossed, ohming and ahming or whatever—mindfulness is awareness, okay? It is being aware of the present moment.

So, you're all sitting here, and I would venture to say that most of you are thinking about something else other than what's going on here, okay?

- "Crap, I can't believe I was late."
- "I wonder if I'm gonna get out of here soon enough to do something with my friends."
- "I think there's food in the kitchen."
- "It's Friday—is it Friday?—I don't have homework on Friday."

Denver: It's Saturday.

Stephanie: "Oh, it's Saturday. Holy crap! I've lost a whole day!"

Denver: That's life.

Stephanie: "Oh, my gosh! I'm stressed out." Right? Yeah, okay, exactly. I can't remember what I was thinking over there... Oh, I do know: I was thinking, "Pretty good! That was pretty good."

Denver: You were here "in the moment"??

Stephanie: I was! That's what I was thinking.

Okay. So, there are some very specific things you can do to bring yourself into the present moment—whatever that present moment is—because "present" is now.

Oh, it's gone.

Oh, nope—it's now.

Oh, it's gone again.

See? You only have one moment—ever. Anything in the past is gone, anything in the future hasn't happened yet.

Oh, there we go! Another one's gone. (See? It's kind of mind-blowing, actually.)

So, there are some actual skills, exercises, and things you can do to bring yourself into the present moment. There's something called breath awareness, okay? Breath awareness is literally exactly what it sounds like: you just pay attention to your breathing. You don't have to "not think of anything," because your brain is absolutely incapable of not thinking of other things—but you can, "In, out; in, out," and just pay attention to your breathing. You'll be doing that, and you'll get one breath in, and you will think about whether there's food in the kitchen. You will get two breaths in, and you will think about, "Shoot, I didn't text that kid back!" You will get three breaths in, and your little "puppy brain" will be all over the place. And that's fine! Notice your puppy brain, and bring him back, and go, "In and out..."

My favorite breathing exercises go like this ([picking up a red marker and then changing to a black one] Okay this... Fine, fine, fine). There's visuals you can do. This is actually called "square breathing," but I prefer to turn it into a baseball diamond. And I go home to first (and I breathe in), and then I go first to second (and I breathe out), and then I go second to third (and I breathe in), and I go third to home (and I breathe out). And in my mind, I have this little diagram where I go up and over and down—and that helps me keep my brain at least focused on something else. Okay?

There's another one called "infinity breathing," and if you start to pay attention to your breath, you will notice that you breathe in, and you breathe out—and in the "in and out," there's a hitch—okay?—[breathing in...] and you kind of pause, and then you breathe out. Infinity breathing is working on breathing in a way where there's no hitch, so your breath looks like that [infinity sign] instead of like that [infinity sign with straight lines]. Okay? It's a really kind of interesting exercise because when you get here [to the pause] in your breathing (I'll just leave this to you to figure out), you want to make it smooth.

Now, I don't really care how you breathe. I mean, the object is not how you breathe; the object is to give your mind something to think about for the breath awareness. If this doesn't work, fine; whatever. Say "in and out," picture a tide, blow up a balloon, whatever—you know, just get something going in your mind so that you're focused on breath awareness. It actually calms you down, it changes the way your amygdala is activated, it puts you back in your prefrontal cortex, and it makes everything better immediately—even if just for a short time.

The other awareness is a body-scan awareness, where you literally sit in a chair, and you start at the top of your head, and you think about your head: "Can I feel anything in my head? Do I have a headache? No, I feel pretty good. What about my neck, my shoulders..." Just go all the way through your body, however you want: arms, elbows, fingers, toes. And then, when you get all the way down to the bottom, you come back up to the top. And your mind is all over the place, and pretty soon you forget that you were at your elbow, or you don't realize how you got to your abdomen, or whatever. And you just bring it back, and you just do it again.

All of this is designed to do is just keep you aware of what's going on without being everywhere in your puppy mind or monkey mind, which is what we also call it. "Sensory awareness," same thing. Finish your body-scan awareness or finish your breathing meditation or mindfulness, and then say,

"What do I hear?" A kid. A fan. I was sitting by Chris; I could hear his thing go in and out, his... Okay? So, literally, what are [do] you hear?

What do you see? I see people. Pink. Just that simple.

What do you smell?

Can you taste anything?

I meditate in my car right after I get a Diet Coke. You would be shocked at how noisy Diet Coke is—just bubbles like crazy; carbonated Diet Coke. Very noisy.

Denver: Devil's brew.

Stephanie: ...very noisy when you're listening to it in your car.

Emotion awareness. This is... We don't like this one, nobody likes this one because nobody likes to think about how they feel! 'Cuz sometimes we don't feel very good. Sometimes we're sad. Sometimes we're scared. Sometimes we're angry (which is usually because we're sad or scared). Sometimes we're, you know, we feel depressed. Sometimes we feel like school sucks. Sometimes we feel like, "If I have to put a mask on, I'm gonna rip someone's freaking eyes out!" Okay? We feel ways that we are uncomfortable with because we're not good at feeling our emotions. So, emotion awareness is exactly that: being aware of how you feel at any given time, okay?

All of this is designed to keep you in a present moment. I'm gonna say it again: The present-moment awareness takes us out of what we call our monkey mind or our puppy mind (the part of us that is usually disconnected from our spirit). That's what disconnects us from our spirit. It disrupts our connection with the Divine or the Heavenly because it's all over the place thinking of things that are not divine. "Oh, I think there's food in the kitchen." "Damn, I'm not gonna get out of here before it's...in time to do anything with my friends," okay? The present moment is all we ever have because the past is literally gone, and the future has not arrived. It's pretty mind-blowing, actually, when you start to think about it.

So, mindfulness is the antidote to being consumed in mind and heart by the natural man (the part of us that creates our suffering). This is an element of Eastern religious practices that focus on the soul and the spirit (or the spirit instead of the body). At its highest and best, mindfulness practices are designed to create a path for us to experience enlightenment, which is the connection to God ([addressing Denver] you used a whole bunch of different phrases)...

Denver: Oh, the truth of all things, the Record of Heaven...

Stephanie: Yeah, that's what it is. And if you read other things, honestly, like mental health books, the language is all over the place: Christ consciousness, enlightenment, they call it a mil... Oh, connecting with the universe, you know. I mean, there's a lot of non-godly words used to describe exactly the same thing, okay? This journey includes yogic traditions, as well, because yogi (or yoga) is not just stretching and contorting our bodies, okay? The word "yoga" actually comes from the Sanskrit root yuge or yuj (y-u-j), which means "to yoke or unite oneself with God," okay? So, yogis are the enlightened ones; yoga is what we do when we contort our bodies, but it is also uniting or yoking with God, okay? So, it's uniting or yoking with God, and it also refers to the practices and principles that are used to create this union.

So, mindfulness practices and yogic traditions have many benefits, the most important one being the ability to open ourselves up to higher states of spirituality, to have more direct experiences with God, and to begin to see things as God sees them. This is how we're making the connection. This is how we're moving (from his [Denver's] diagram) from the body to the spirit.

One of the obstacles of Western culture and Western Christianity is that we come from a "deficit model," meaning that Christianity in the Western world talks about mankind as deficient, all right? We are carnal, sensual, base; we have lust; we have appetite...

Denver: Enemy to God.

Stephanie: We are an enemy to God. We are a natural man, okay? And we need Christ as our Redeemer (who is the only perfect being to do all the heavy lifting, so that from our state of deficiencies, we can be redeemed). This kind of thing is offset by Mormon teachings where we learn that we are divinely created in the image of our Heavenly Parents, and we can actively participate (to some degree) in our salvation by repenting, being obedient, and living righteously. So, we can contribute to that.

The yogic tradition, on the other hand (which is the Eastern traditions), believe that human beings are whole and divine at their very core. Mormons tend to believe that, too —so Mormon teachings include the idea that we're born of Heavenly Parents, and we can live by that divine parentage—but we're down here in this cesspool of a mess pool (hah...that's funny), and we're disconnected from the divinity that is actually in us (again, which goes to the whole thing). So, the yogic tradition says that the Redeemer, our Savior, isn't necessarily pulling us from the depths of our deficiency, but He is revealing to us the true nature of God—which is the Record of Heaven, intelligence, light and truth, same thing that it says in the Scriptures, okay?

So, how do we tap into this principle of divinity and connection and awareness so that we can pull ourselves out of our natural state? Well, we begin by understanding the Scriptures. Men have become carnal, sensual, and devilish, and are shut out from the presence of God (Genesis 4:7 RE), which he [Denver] explained in the last talk (so, you can go find that). Understand this Scripture about being the natural man is an enemy to God (Mosiah 1:16 RE)—because it's not an enemy to God; it is just disconnected from

God. We are at odds with God. So, understand those two Scriptures, and then begin to practice mindfulness to quiet your monkey mind, to find the light and truth and intelligence, which is the glory of God which is in you—you just can't hear it or find it or see it because we're too busy trying to seek pleasure, avoid pain, be liked, protect our loved ones, and think constantly about how to make those happen.

So, I'm gonna end with recommending one thing—'cuz if I can recommend one thing to help you get in touch with your spirit, it would be to practice quieting your mind. Because the One whom we worship says, Be still and know that I am God (T&C 101:3).

That's my part.

Denver: Okay, now that you've heard from me and my therapist wife...

Stephanie: Who did you like best?

Denver: I liked you—because I wasn't talking. Any questions for her to answer? Any questions? Any questions at all?

[Inaudible audience question.]

Stephanie: I am a therapist.

Audience Question 1 (continued): You're certified?

Stephanie: Yeah, I am. Yeah.

Denver: Yeah, she finished her Masters and now is a licensed clinical therapist, which I think her marriage drove her to.

Audience Member: I was gonna say that, but...

Audience Question 2: Yeah, so in my studies and trying to understand the Scriptures, it kind of seems like most perfect beings are kind of identical in personality in kind of every trait that they have. Because you have to be a perfect being. You have to be just like Christ. And yet, it seems like you kind of stated that our differences should be celebrated. So, can you explain maybe how the Gods, maybe, are different and how that is?

Denver: Yeah, the question basically is "Does exaltation result in uniformity and sameness?" And I would say that exaltation results in remarkable diversity. The Creator has never in this Creation made two people that are the same. There are no two snowflakes that are the same. If God goes to all the trouble of making unique snowflakes—all of which are patterned after the same crystalline structure, and yet, no two of them are alike—then why would God expect that kind of uniformity? Now, set that on one side for a moment, and...

A lot of disagreements that exist between people are based upon their background, education, and experience, okay? If all of us read the same library, if all of us grew up in the same household, if all of us had the same basic education, shared the same friends, went through the same kind of socio-economic experiences, if all of us shared all of those things, there would be a whole lot of disagreements that would go away, and we would find ourselves agreeing on a whole lot more than we agree on now.

However, we would still disagree with one another. We would still find differences of opinion. We would still find ourselves really preferring different hues and shades, and you would buy an ugly-colored car, and I would buy a beautiful-colored car, and I would be so glad I wasn't driving that ugly thing you're driving around in. (But we would certainly all have four-wheel drive pickups; they just wouldn't have the same color.)

Christ's experiences completed a circuit that attained to the resurrection, that took him through an experience that allowed Him to attain to the resurrection of the dead. But after that experience was over—you can read it in the Teachings and Commandments — following that, the Lord was absolutely exultant, as was Mary when she met Him on the morning of the resurrection—never saw a happier being more so than the Lord on the morning of the resurrection. How He coped with that feeling and how you will cope with that feeling eventually and how all of us will cope with that will be uniquely experiential, uniquely yours, uniquely His. Even the same experiences are gonna lead to differences. No one is going to be uniform except in education, background, experience, knowledge; but their attitudes are gonna be uniquely yours, uniquely his, uniquely hers. It's all gonna be different.

Okay, so, now we're done, right? Yeah, no more questions. Go Jazz! Yeah, yeah. Okay, we're done.

Audience Member: We're done.

Denver: We're done. Now you can get the cookies!

[Crosstalk]

Denver: Why? What, what? Okay, here's someone:

Audience Question 3: Okay, so in the talk, you were kinda talking about how, like, people can develop spirituality in isolation, but that's not the same as developing it in community. So...

Denver: Right.

Audience Question 3 (continued): ...like, what would it look like to develop that in community and how can we do that?

Denver: One of the ways in which we develop in community is by sharing in fellowships, contributing tithing in order to relieve people's basic needs (shelter, food, education, medical care, transportation) and, when you are a person in need, receiving that. And in that dynamic, the giver needs to do it cheerfully (and that requires some amount of learning), and the receiver needs to do so cheerfully. And no one should think of themselves as "better than" and no one should think of themselves as "less than"—because we tend to develop unhealthy attitudes.

Fellowships in which tithing gets used locally is a vivid example of how resentments or jealousies or insecurities and feelings of inferiority can develop. And we're supposed to interact with one another in a way that puts that on display to you, internally, so that you can reflect upon why you're feeling that and whether that is godly or ungodly.

We have to cooperate with helping one another because there are all kinds of needs. There are people who are socially retarded, in that they're obnoxious, they're overbearing... They need to come to realize that, in some respects, that's ungodly. And then there are people who notice that someone is obnoxious and overbearing, and they need to come to grips with the fact that that too is ungodly. Because in a perfect society, everyone's inadequacies are accepted and noticed by that person, and tolerated and endured by the others, as they work through their deficiency. And to the extent that you can help them do so, it's a kindness to tell them so. (I tell Louis all the time about his deficiencies [laughter].) Yeah, yeah, there we go—you need to work on that, too—because he's a target-rich environment.

Yeah, there was another hand right here.

Audience Question 4: Why do you need to connect to your spirit?

Denver: Because your spirit is composed of intelligence, and intelligence is the glory of God, which is also light and truth. That's what your spirit is, all those things. It gets called a bunch of other stuff in the Scripture that I read today about the Record of Heaven, the truth of all things, and all that. That's in you. Now, if you can connect to that, God is absolutely able to talk to that on an ongoing basis (God has a real hard time talking to this [the body]). A whole lot of accommodations have to be made to talk to this [the body], including the power of God necessarily quickening the body in order to have it endure the presence of God.

But the spirit within you doesn't have those defects. Your spirit will not be destroyed by the glory of God being revealed. Joseph Smith once said that when God manifests Himself to someone, He does so precisely as if there were no body at all. Well, that's because God can do more with revealing Himself to the spirit without destroying it than He can to the body, because revealing Himself to the body requires Him to go to a lot of trouble in order to make this [the body] capable of enduring the glory of God: you have to be transfigured; if it's permanent, translated. You have to be glorified; you have to go through something. That's why when Moses descends from the mountain and the children of Israel see him, his face is glowing—because he still bears some of the glory of God on his countenance; and Israel says, "Put a mask on, and stay six feet apart from us, and hide the glory of God that's manifesting itself on your countenance." Because it hurt, it frightens; it's off-putting.

Yeah, you had a hand up.

Audience Question 5: Yeah, if your spirit left your body, would the body perish?

Denver: Yeah.

Audience Question 5 (continued): ...and is the spirit ever required to leave the body in order to be quickened or...?

Denver: Yeah, let me... I got that. The answer to that question is T&C 147:12. Someone tree that. T&C 147. This is Joseph commenting on some claim of someone. 147, oh yeah...

Audience Member: Can you repeat the question?

Denver: Okay, what happens when the spirit leaves the body? ([flipping through the Scriptures] Oh, that's 146. Now I've gone backwards.)

Joanna Southcott professed to be a prophetess, and wrote a book of prophecies in 1804; [and] became the founder of a people that are still extant. She was to bring forth, in a place appointed, a son that was to be the Messiah, which thing has failed. Independent of this, however, [we do not] read of a woman that was a founder of a church, in the word of God? Paul told [that] the women of his day "to keep silence in the church, ...that if they wished to know anything, to ask their husbands at home." He would not suffer a woman "to rule, or to usurp authority in the church"; but here we find a woman [who's founded the] church, a revelator and a guide... (emphasis added)

...and so on. Then he talks about Jemima Wilkinson, and then, in verse 13:

...the idea of her soul being in Heaven while her body was living on earth is also preposterous. When God breathed into man's nostrils, he became a living soul, before that he did not live, and when that was taken away his body died; and so did our Savior when the spirit left the body, nor did his body live until his spirit returned in the power of his resurrection. But Mrs. Wilkinson's soul (life) was in Heaven, and her body without the soul (or life) on earth, living (without the soul or) without life.

So, he's saying, "Can't happen." Just so happens that that question is in the Scriptures.

Yeah?

Audience Question 6: So, we really wanted the LDS Church in primary, we would always have the description of, like, our hand being our spirit and the glove being the body. Now, I had a question on my mission of actually pointing out Christ was resurrected—he had a physical body—but he could also basically walk through walls. He could appear and reappear. He could come and go. So, would the attaining to the resurrection be the way I see it have our soul, our spirit and body be one substance? Or will it be a temporary spirit and a body?

Denver: One. One with the absolute capacity to manifest itself in any condition—from blinding glory destructive to the physical elements, at one end, or the retained capacity to go down and to say, Handle me and see, for a spirit [hath] not flesh and bones as you see me have (Luke 14:6 RE), and then to ascend (which a body can't do... Ahh, there's some carnival acts where they use a cannon, but they need a net, or it's gonna end badly)—but it's one; it's one. But it's—at that point—it's connected in a way that all of the capacities that existed in the physical body, all of the capacities that exist in glorious exaltation are combined into one being who is a being of glory and holiness.

Unfortunately (well, fortunately—I don't know; make your own judgment on it), the Father who is sitting on the throne emanating glory that sustains the whole of the Creation (and the word "the Father" is a title which, after the resurrection, applies to Christ) in that state of glory, sustaining all things while possessing the responsibility to sustain the whole of Creation, you really can't descend. The Father has to appear in glory. And at the Second Coming (when the Lord appears in glory), it will be in part because of certain rules that apply to how things work in eternity when you become the Father. But that's neither here nor there.

What's this?

Stephanie: I have a question.

Denver: Really?

[crosstalk]

Stephanie (Audience Question 7): [reading from a text message] "What does it mean to fear God?"

Denver: Respect.

Audience Member: Will you repeat the question?

Denver: The question is, "What does it mean to fear God?" It means to respect Him, to stand in awe of Him, to recognize the great gulf between you and Him, and to realize that you're dependent upon Him.

Stephanie: Okay, one more (which you'll probably have me answer). How do you... Okay, now that you've moved out of the LDS... Oh, I'll just read it exactly: Now that I have found a new perspective of the gospel in this movement, how am I supposed to find an eternal partner that will also have the same perspective on the church/gospel as I do?

Denver: You probably don't need to. Yeah, you probably don't need to. Find a spouse that you love, find a spouse that is a good companion for you, find someone that shares the kind of values you have, and eventually develop into the kind of unity and love in which that won't matter. Values are more important, according to my therapist wife.

Stephanie: No, no. Values are more important than interests, than religion, than activities. I mean, all this stuff is nice, and it will come. But values...! And if the language of God can be spoken in all kinds of languages, the values... Let's not mention it; I don't know.

Audience Question 8: Stephanie, there's a question that came in on the chat, and it is: "Could struggles with inherited mental illness and addictions, etc. be a way to learn (for the noble and great ones) how to quiet oneself when it's biologically challenging? And how does being still work with struggles in the body?"

Stephanie: Yes, and it's... I mean, it's the same thing just...

Denver: Yeah, they can't hear you.

Stephanie: If you want to strengthen a muscle you have to lift a weight, okay? If you want to run a marathon, you have to run a block or, you know, a mile. If you want to increase your connection to the spirit through mindfulness, you have to practice mindfulness every day for some amount of time, and the distillation of the improvement will go more or less unnoticed except that you will find connection; you will find peace; you will find that you have quieted even your inherited anxious tendencies. You will find that you have risen above even your legitimate physiological/biological depressing thoughts or depression. It doesn't make it go away, it just makes suffering less interesting. That's about it

Denver: Yeah, and inherited mental illness is nothing to be ashamed of. It's something to be confronted and dealt with.

Eventually, if you're really lucky, you will live long enough to find out that you're dying from an incurable disease—that's who's lucky. Because then you get to reflect upon the transition that's coming. And you don't arrive there abruptly and without reflection. Someone contracts a disease that requires them to face the reality of coming death, you oughtta visit them, and they oughtta be cheerful, and you oughtta talk about what comes next. Because what comes next is better than what we got here.

Stephanie: "Nearly as important as the Red Sox"? [referencing something Denver wrote on the whiteboard].

Denver: Well, yeah, I was trying to talk about what really matters, although Pedroia retired, and they traded Benintendi and I'm not so sure. Today's game of the Twins—it was on the MLB channel—got rained out. I don't even know what we're doing this year. But Chris Sale's gonna be back, and he had Tommy John surgery, and in a good pitcher, that adds like five miles per hour, so we have that to look forward to. (You don't even need an offense if you got Chris Sale on the mound; just bunt a guy around until you score one, and let Sale close it out.)

Yeah, hey!

Audience Question 9: Since sacrifice is essential for part of this journey, if... Is it essential because when one is sacrificing in their right mind, it is slowly detaching them from the natural man or our carnal state? Is that why it's so important?

Denver: Yeah, you've nailed it, yeah. Because the sacrifice, it's this thing [the body]. Yeah.

Yeah, yeah?

Audience Question 10: So, when you have the baptism of fire, or like, most of the time when it's talking about, like, fire in the Scriptures is that talking... Is that like connecting to the quickening that we're talking about?

Denver: Yeah, it's talking about letting that emerge. It can emerge abruptly and suddenly. Joseph talked about how you can have come to your mind sudden bursts of insight and ideas such that, shortly thereafter, you will find the thing come to pass. So, that's the principle of revelation; that's the beginning of the path. Revelation begins with stirring up from deep within you the power of that light, that truth, that glory of God so that it intrudes into your consciousness; it intrudes into your body. You grasp things that you could not previously have attained to. That principle of revelation grows and grows brighter and brighter (as it says in the Scriptures) until the perfect day. In the perfect day, you're actually standing—although in the body—you're actually standing with the Heavens opened unto you. It... The light shines forth so that you comprehend and you find companionship with the folks in Heaven, the ministering angels, the Son. The purpose of angels is to fulfill and do the works of the covenants. Purpose of the covenants is to lead you along until you have an audience with Christ. The purpose and ministry of Christ is to bring you to the Father. And the purpose of all of that is to reunite you back to that family that you were part of before you ever got here and to become, you know, one with them again. But...

There's ice cream on the counter! We gotta close! Hey!

In the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

Now go eat, drink, and be married.

2021.03.27 The Religion of the Fathers

Aravada Springs, NV

March 27, 2021

Denver C. Snuffer, Jr.

I have to say: As time goes on, you folks look more and more eccentric. (That's just from up here, looking out.)

I want to thank the organizers for putting it together, and I want to thank them for the invite to come talk. I also want to say before I begin that there's no reason to think that I am implying anything apart from what is explicitly stated in the talk.

The name "Jesus Christ" is Greek. An Anglicized Hebrew version of the name is "Joshua the Messiah" or, more phonetically correct, "Yeshua the Mashiach." God promised Adam there would be a Messiah or Christ sent to save his (Adam's) descendants. Angels preached the gospel of the promised Messiah to righteous men and women beginning with Father Adam. Abraham was taught that same gospel. Jesus the Messiah was born in Bethlehem, lived as a mortal, and fulfilled God's Messianic promises. He was not an innovator. Instead, He restored that gospel originally revealed to the Patriarchal Fathers.

This talk is about understanding the worship of our Messiah. An 1833 revelation promised further information to be given the faithful who obeyed God's commandments:

I give unto you these sayings that you may understand and know how to worship, and know what you worship, that you may come unto the Father in my name, and in due time receive of his fullness, for if you keep my commandments, you shall receive of his fullness and be glorified in me as I am glorified in the Father. Therefore, I say unto you, you shall receive grace for grace. (T&C 93:7, emphasis added)

A prophecy of Malachi is recorded in every volume of Scripture: Old Covenants, New Covenants, Book of Mormon, and Teachings and Commandments. The prophecy promises that before the great and dreadful day of the Lord the hearts of the children will turn to the Fathers or (as stated in the JST Old Covenants): Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord. And he shall seal the heart of the Fathers to the children and the heart of the children to their Fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse (Malachi 1:12 RE, emphasis added).

Nephi quoted it to Joseph Smith a little differently: And he shall plant in the hearts of the children the promises made to the fathers, and the hearts of the children shall turn to their fathers; if it were not so, the whole earth would be utterly wasted at his coming (Joseph Smith History 3:4 RE, emphasis added).

Two versions of Malachi's prophecy have the very same interesting wording. Both the Old Covenants and the Book of Mormon twice use the word "heart" in the singular, but "fathers" and "children" are plural. It's a small change but an important and revealing one. The Fathers are of one heart, and to the extent there are to be children sealed to them, the children will also be of one (and the same) heart.

In this talk, I hope to clarify and identify who the "fathers" are. It's not your immediate ancestors from the last 20 or so generations; all of them who died without the required knowledge and acceptance of fullness of the gospel are in spirit prison. Therefore, they are damned and cannot progress until preparations are made to improve their resurrection.

Our hearts must become one. United hearts seem to be in a distant latitude from where we are now. Even then, before any attempt at "sealing" begins, the first question is the identity of the "fathers" to whom our singular heart must be sealed to avoid being "cursed"—or as Christ warned, "utterly wasted at his coming."

There is a true religion; it was revealed first to Adam. Adam not only received and practiced that true religion, it is through him that every subsequent dispensation of the gospel has been revealed. Joseph Smith taught:

Commencing with Adam, who was the first man, who is spoken of in Daniel as being the Ancient of Days, or in other words, the first and oldest of all, the great grand progenitor, of whom it is said in another place, He is Michael, because he was the first and father of all, not only by progeny, but he was the first to hold the spiritual blessings, to whom was made known the plan of ordinances for the salvation of his posterity unto the end, and to whom Christ was first revealed, and through whom Christ has been revealed from Heaven and will continue to be revealed from henceforth. Adam holds the keys of the dispensation of the fullness of times; i.e., the dispensation of all the times have been and will be revealed through him, from the beginning to Christ, and from Christ to the end of all the dispensations that are to be revealed.

...that all things pertaining to that dispensation should be conducted precisely in accordance with the preceding dispensations. And again, God purposed in himself that there should not be an Eternal fullness until every dispensation should be fulfilled and gathered together in one, and that all things whatever that should be gathered together in one, in those dispensations, unto the same fullness and Eternal glory, should be in Christ Jesus.

Therefore, he set the ordinances to be the same for ever and ever, and set Adam to watch over them, to reveal them from Heaven to man or to send angels to reveal them. (T&C 140:3,5-6; emphasis added)

God gave to Adam the right of "dominion" over the Earth and everything (correspondingly, everyone) on the Earth. That was part of the original true religion.

When the true religion was combined with the right to hold dominion or preside as a High Priest, it was called the "Holy Order after the Order of the Son of God." This was shortened to "Holy Order." It has also been called the Melchizedek Priesthood. Because of the too frequent use of the term "Melchizedek Priesthood" by the LDS Church and resulting confusion about the meaning of the term, I've redefined "priesthood" and avoid making use of that term without clarification. In this talk, the term "Holy Order" is used to mean the original priestly position conferred on Adam and thereafter passed on to the one eldest, worthy descendant in each subsequent generation, and the religion then taught by that holder was correct and held salvation.

The Patriarchal Fathers are Adam, Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahalalel, Jared, Enoch, Methuselah, Lamech, Noah, Shem (or Melchizedek), Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph. These 15 generational heads stood, like Adam, as God's Patriarchal Father and High Priest at the head of God's family on Earth. There were many others who believed in the religion taught by Adam and the Patriarchal Fathers, but the Holy Order given to Adam was always held in its fullness by the eldest worthy descendant in each subsequent generation until—skipping generations to—Abraham.

Abraham was the first precedent for "sealing" into the Order, tying a descendant separated by generations into the position of patriarchal successor to Shem (or Melchizedek). This precedent helps explain Joseph Smith's later practice of sealing others to him. Given the examples of Abraham and Joseph Smith, it becomes clear that the Holy Order does not have to be exclusively dynastic (passing in one family line) but can branch out to include any other worthy member of the line, however distant or separated by generations.

The Patriarchal head of the Holy Order is the shepherd for the faithful, husbandman for the Creation, and teacher responsible for dispensing Divine knowledge. It is more than competent gospel teaching; it is authoritatively dispensing a message from a position established and recognized by God, hence Joseph Smith's observation that there are many teachers, but perhaps not many fathers (T&C 139:12). When the Holy Order is active, these obligations attach to the position in every generation.

The first or Patriarchal Fathers learned the true religion from Adam and practiced it under his direction. Adam taught the first eight patriarchs born after him. Their religion was Adam's religion, and their understanding reached back to the Garden of Eden.

The majority of Adam's family abandoned the truth. From the time of Adam, most people who have been given the opportunity to receive the gospel in their respective dispensations have dwindled in unbelief. The Book of Mormon repeatedly describes people dwindling in unbelief. An angel foretold to Nephi (the first prophet-writer in the first book of the Book of Mormon) that all his descendants and his brothers' descendants would dwindle in unbelief.

Dwinding happens whenever light and truth are neglected, forgotten, or rejected. The term "unbelief" applies not when people cease believing, but when they hold false beliefs. Those false beliefs include incomplete, unfinished, or incorrect ideas. Unbelief comes as much from rejecting Scripture as from deleting or changing ordinances.

The truth has dwindled, and there are not accurate enough Scriptures available to know all that has been lost. Upheavals in history have produced a barrier keeping the first religion away from us. Margaret Barker has spent a lifetime studying ancient Israel, largely pursuing the First Temple religion of Israel. Her goal is modest. She's trying to reconstruct the Old Testament era from Solomon to Ezra. We are trying to reach back to Adam. Even with her more modest aim, she has concluded it is impossible for us to know what really took place. She calls the present state of all our understanding nothing more than "supposition":

The exile in Babylon is a formidable barrier to anyone wanting to reconstruct the religious beliefs and practices of ancient Jerusalem. If we are to discover any possible reason for the distinction between the sons of El/Elyon and the sons of Yahweh it is a barrier, which has to be acknowledged. Enormous developments took place in the wake of enormous destruction, and these two factors make certainty quite impossible. They make all certainty impossible, and this too must be acknowledged, for the customary descriptions of ancient Israel's religion are themselves no more than supposition. (Margaret Barker, The Great Angel: A Study of Israel's Second God, p.12, citations omitted, italics in original)

Belief is only possible by receiving the truth. It is important to have the truth in order to acquire belief. The Lord commanded Joseph Smith to revise the Bible in order to permit "belief" (or "correct understanding"). One of the corrections Joseph made was to the exchange between Jesus and the lawyers. Luke was revised to now read: Woe unto you lawyers, for you have taken away the key of knowledge, the fullness of the scriptures. You enter not in yourselves into the kingdom, and those who were entering in, you hindered (Luke 8:17 RE). Without the "fullness of the scriptures," it is impossible to have belief. Truth is the key of knowledge.

Joseph Smith's revision of the Bible was designed to restore the Bible to read: Even as they are in [God's] own bosom, to the salvation of [God's] elect (T&C 18:6). From the command to commence the corrected Bible project until the command to publish it, Joseph's inspired revision was referred to in 14 revelations. The revised Bible was quoted exclusively in Lectures on Faith. The Bible revision was essential for people to have belief. Without it, the saints would dwindle in unbelief because they lacked the truths God intended to be known and accepted by His followers. Joseph Smith knew this and warned about how crucial it was for the revised Bible (which he called the "fullness of the scriptures") to be published for believers. In an October 1831 Conference, he taught the saints: "God had often sealed up the Heavens because of covetousness in the church. Said the Lord would cut his work short in righteousness and except the church receive the fullness of the scriptures they would yet fall" (Joseph Smith Papers [hereafter JSP], Documents, Volume 2: July 1831-January 1833, p.85).

The fullness of the Scriptures was never published in Joseph Smith's lifetime—or ever by any church. The RLDS Church published an incomplete and altered version that excluded revisions made by Joseph Smith and included revisions made by a committee. A significant part of the work accomplished by Joseph Smith has been neglected by the LDS or altered by the RLDS (now the Community of Christ), and both of those groups have dwindled in unbelief. Because they have incomplete Scriptures, having rejected part of what the Lord has as "scriptures in His own bosom" (see T&C 18:6), it cannot be otherwise. All of the break-off groups that have separated from the LDS or RLDS have similarly dwindled in unbelief.

The Restoration has not been able to advance until recently when a penitent group of believers repented and endeavored to recover and reclaim what was discarded. In the inspired "Prayer for Covenant," these past failures are acknowledged, and the Lord was asked to accept our repentance. Here are some excerpts from that prayer:

We are mindful that in 1832 the gentile saints were condemned for vanity and unbelief because they treated lightly the things they had received, and they were warned by you that they would remain under condemnation until they repent and remember the new covenant, even the Book of Mormon and the former commandments, not only to say, but to do. You commanded the gentiles that they bring forth fruit meet for their Father's kingdom, and if they failed to do so, there remained a scourge and [a] judgment to be poured out upon those who claimed to be the children of Zion. They failed to bring forth the required fruit, and were judged and scourged, and then violently driven out of Jackson County, Missouri.

...Even today the gentile saints justify lying to others as part of their religion, believing you will vindicate them in their dishonesty. They seek deep to hide their counsel from others, and now deny your judgments against their ancestors, claiming you have never rejected them. They have, as you [have] foretold, spoken both good and evil of your prophet Joseph. They ascribe many of their wicked practices to Joseph, who correctly told their ancestors that they never knew him — for indeed, the gentile saints have grown distant from you because of their willful rebellion, pride, foolishness, and blindness. We acknowledge that we must distinguish ourselves from them, admit the errors of the past, and in the depths of humility, seek to be reclaimed as yours.

The neglect and rebellion of the saints during Joseph's day and thereafter included how they have treated the scriptures, carelessly inserting numerous errors and [the] transcription problems into the Book of Mormon and other commandments and revelations. The original Book of Mormon translation manuscript was placed in the cornerstone of the Nauvoo House where water and mold destroyed over 70% of the text. This was a similitude to the restoration provided by you through Joseph. Just as the original manuscript was allowed to decay, with only approximately 28% surviving, so likewise the Restoration has also decayed.

...The other revelations given through Joseph Smith have also not been maintained and transmitted to us in their purity.

...We ask to be corrected in anything we have gathered and ask to be instructed by you to discard what ought to be discarded, and inspired to keep only those things which should be kept. We were not responsible for neglecting your warnings, for treating lightly the Book of Mormon and former commandments, nor for failing to do as you asked, but have inherited that legacy and acknowledge that we also suffer under your condemnation as our inheritance.

...Though only a remnant of the original faith you established through Joseph has likewise survived, we ask to be reconnected as a people to you by covenant, to make us yours, connected to a living vine, restored as a people, and numbered with Israel. We seek as a people to honor you and...keep your commandments so that a living body of your disciples may again exist on the earth. We desire that we may rise up through your grace and mercy so that you will perform your oath and vindicate your promises to the fathers concerning a faithful latter-day body of gentiles to be numbered with the remnant of Jacob, that your kingdom may come and your will be done on earth as it is in Heaven.

...We ask that you accept these books as yours so that people of faith may then rely upon this work as your word to this generation, ...a standard for governing ourselves, as a law, and as a covenant, to establish a rule for our faith, and as the expression of our religion, so we may have correct faith and be enabled to worship you in truth. If this body of writings are not acceptable, we ask that you guide us further so we may correct, remove, or add whatever you would require for the writings to become acceptable for a covenant and [a] law, a rule of faith, as a correct expression of the religion that honors you, so [that] we may be in possession of correct faith and be enabled to worship you in truth. (T&C 156:2,7-8,10-11,15,17; emphasis added)

The prayer and the effort to recover the fullness of the Scriptures pleased the Lord. He answered by commending the recovery and accepting the Scriptures. His "Answer to Prayer for Covenant" states, in part:

(And I'm gonna add: We asked Him to tell us if something ought be deleted and to tell us if something ought be added, and He did both of those things. Things were deleted and things then were added in response to the prayer.)

But His answer included these:

The records in the form you have of the Old Covenants, given from Adam until Moses and from Moses to John, are of great worth and can serve my purposes, and are acceptable for this time.

The records of my apostles containing my New Covenants were to contain the fullness of my gospel, but during the formation of the great and abominable church, many parts were discarded and other parts were altered. False brethren who did not fear me intended to corrupt and to pervert the right way, to blind the eyes and harden the hearts of others, in order to obtain power and authority over them.

Conspiracies have corrupted the records, beginning among the Jews, and again following the time of my apostles, and yet again following the time of Joseph and Hyrum. As you have labored with the records you have witnessed the alterations and insertions, and your effort to recover them pleases me and is of great worth. (T&C 157:13-15)

Ours are the only Scriptures approved by God as sufficient for the labor[s] now underway (T&C 177:2). However, the Lord stopped short of endorsing them as without flaws.

The records you have gathered as scriptures yet lack many of my words, have errors throughout, and contain things that are not of me, because the records you used in your labors have not been maintained nor guarded against the cunning plans of false brethren who have been deceived by Satan. (T&C 157:12)

The Lord explained:

What you have gathered as scriptures are acceptable to me for this time and contain many plain and precious things. Nevertheless, whoso is enlightened by the spirit shall obtain the greater benefit, because you need not think they contain all my words nor that more will not be given, for there are [yet] many things...to be restored unto my people.

...There will yet be records restored from all the tribes, that will be gathered [together] again [in] one, and also as I have said, there is some truth in the Apocrypha, including the Pseudepigrapha and scrolls recovered at Nag Hammadi, and other New Testament texts uncovered since the time of Joseph Smith, and findings at Qumran, and there are other records yet to be recovered; [and] whoso is enlightened by the spirit shall obtain benefit by their careful study. (Ibid. vs. 44,47)

We have the best available, but they're to be understood through the power of the spirit. In another revelation, the Lord explained this about our scriptures:

These scriptures are sent forth to be my warning to the world, my comfort to the faithful, my counsel to the meek, my reproof to the proud, my rebuke to the contentious, and my condemnation of the wicked. They are my invitation to all mankind to flee from corruption, repent and be baptized in my name, and prepare for the coming judgment. (T&C 177:3)

Our Scriptures will do no good if they're not read or studied. We, like all other Restoration churches and groups, can also dwindle in unbelief.

Unlike the many existing and past Restoration believers, we must fight against falling into unbelief. Nephi warned us about the churches of the Restoration:

Yea, they have all gone out of the way, they have become corrupted; because of pride, and because of false teachers, and false doctrine, their churches have become corrupted, and their churches are lifted up; because of pride, they are puffed up. They rob the poor because of their fine sanctuaries; they rob the poor because of their fine clothing, and they persecute the meek and the poor in heart because in their pride [they're] puffed up. They wear stiff necks and high heads, yea, ...because of pride, and wickedness, and abominations, and whoredoms, they have all gone astray, save it be a few who are the humble followers of Christ. Nevertheless, they are led, that in many instances they do err because [they're] taught by the precepts of men. (2 Nephi 12:2 RE, emphasis added)

We have no fine sanctuaries, and until commanded and instructed to do so, we do not anticipate building anything other than a single temple. We do not rob the poor, because our tithes are used only to aid the poor. We do not regard one above another, and we have no hierarchy in a position to lead anyone astray. Nevertheless, we can still be proud, rob the poor by our overindulgence, and participate in abominations and whoredoms. Some foolish people among us have done these things. They must repent, or they cannot be gathered.

We have little reason to be unguarded. We can fail to study the recovered Scriptures approved by the Lord as a standard to govern our daily walk. We can fail to accept the obligations established by the Book of Mormon as a covenant and to use the Scriptures to correct ourselves and guide our words, thoughts, and deeds. We can let the lusts of the flesh to control us. And when we do, we choose to dwindle in unbelief.

You have the new Scriptures. The leather-bound copies will be shortly distributed. Use them. Study them. Show appreciation to the Lord by refusing to dwindle in unbelief.

Joseph Smith was able to revise the Bible through God's inspiration. It is important to prize the corrected Bible and do better than the saints of Joseph's day.

Despite nearly universal apostasy and rebellion against God while Adam lived, the line of Patriarchal Fathers preserved the true religion. Noah had a father who knew and was taught by Adam. Noah's living grandfather, great-grandfather, and ancestors for seven generations knew and were taught by Adam. Learning about God from His messengers and priests was (and still is) necessary to avoid dwindling in unbelief and falling into apostasy. The "angels" who ministered included mortals who were given Divine knowledge to teach.

Noah preserved the original religion of God through the cataclysm of the flood. Three of the sons of Noah were taught it, and Noah's most faithful son inherited the right. The fullness of the Holy Order was conferred upon Shem (who received the title "Melchizedek"). A descendant of Ham falsely claimed he held the Holy Order, but he could only institute an imitation of the Order.

After Melchizedek, an apostasy lasted until Abraham. Although he was raised by an idolater and lamented that his fathers offered sacrifices to idols, Abraham searched for the true God of Heaven. Abraham found God, and the covenant of the first Fathers was renewed and conferred upon him by Melchizedek. Generations of apostates were excluded from the Holy Order, but Abraham was adopted into the line by Melchizedek, thereby restoring continuity back to Adam.

Abraham represents the key Patriarchal Father prophesied of in Malachi. Abraham not only renews the covenant of "the fathers" (including Noah and Enoch), but also through the Abrahamic covenant, God established Abraham as the new head of the family of God on Earth. God told Abraham: As many as receive this gospel shall be called after your name and shall be accounted your seed, and shall rise up and bless you, as unto their Father (Abraham 3:1 RE). For us, connecting to Abraham is akin to the original Patriarchs' connection to Adam. Turning the heart of the children to the Fathers is a required part of the gospel. And after God's covenant with him, salvation for all subsequent generations is dependent on being accounted Abraham's seed.

The covenant with Abraham was renewed with Isaac, who also became the Patriarchal head and husbandman-father of the faithful. Believers thereafter likewise are numbered as Isaac's "seed" through the renewal and extension of the covenant. God renewed it again with Jacob. The covenantal relationship of these three Patriarchs in three successive generations is the reason the Scriptures use "the God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob" as one name for Deity.

Accordingly, the more we can know of Abraham, the more we can know of the covenant with the Fathers spoken of by Malachi. Any book written by Abraham should be priceless to us.

The Book of Abraham translated by Joseph Smith has become a battleground because it is so important to our salvation. On one side are those who hope Joseph has made it possible to be sealed to the Fathers. Opposing them are those who cannot believe Joseph supplied a text of any value for salvation. The fight over the Book of Abraham is now aimed at the entire Restoration and Joseph's Divine calling. Because of that controversy, I need to address the authenticity of the Book of Abraham in order to discuss God's covenant with the Fathers.

There are several threads of thought to be drawn together. The first one involves understanding the different eras of written language used at the time of Abraham.

Most scholars believe Abraham lived around 2100 BC during the 9th Dynasty of Egypt. Moses lived around 1400 BC. (700 years later, Moses lived.) Egyptian texts date back to before 3400 BC. A written Hebrew language was not developed until 900 BC, a half-millennium after Moses. Accordingly, since Moses composed the first five books of the Old Covenants, he would have used Egyptian characters. Hence, the Scriptures written on the plates of brass recovered from Laban and used by the Nephites were written in Egyptian.

The Hebrew language developed as a spoken language first and a written language added sometime later. The Book of Mormon confirms that although the Nephites spoke Hebrew, they used Egyptian characters to write their records. As Moroni finished his record his father started, Moroni explained what they used for the small, neatly carved characters on the Nephite records:

We have written this record according to our knowledge, in the characters which are called among us the reformed Egyptian, being handed down and altered by us according to our manner of speech. And if our plates had been sufficiently large, we should have written in Hebrew; but the Hebrew hath been altered by us also. (Mormon 4:11 RE, emphasis added)

The Nephites used only Egyptian "characters" for their writing and, apparently, not Egyptian language (at least not in the same way as would an Egyptian). This is at best an ambiguous point. How are we to understand it? Egyptian characters are not alphabet equivalent. A single character can mean many words, and their written form compresses language. We do not have anything equivalent to this in our common experience to make a meaningful analogy. Perhaps Pitman Shorthand would give an idea of it.

One other idea that may help is to think of Romance languages. All Romance languages use a common set of written characters but employ them for entirely different languages; the "reformed Egyptian" used "characters" to write a different quasi-Hebrew language.

For a comparison: Spanish, French, Italian, Portuguese, and Romanian are all different languages that descended from Latin. They all use the Latin alphabet. But the words they write and the meanings of those words are different from one another. Occasionally, the different languages use identical letters for different words. In English (a non-Romance language), "mesa" means "an isolated, flat-topped hill with steep slopes." But in Spanish, it means "table."

The English language descended from German. So did Icelandic, Norwegian, Danish, Swedish, and Scots. These languages also use the Latin alphabet shared with the Latin-descended Romance language. But try to imagine another language that employs pictographic and short-hand figures to convey both words and sentences. If you're moving information from such a language into any of the Latin alphabet languages, the result would be a far larger volume of translated text from the original text.

The Book of Mormon used Egyptian "characters" to write a non-Egyptian form of language to compress the material. How the Nephites achieved this over a millennium of "reforming" their written language was not clarified. However, if the actual plates of the Book of Mormon were to be examined by a modern Egyptian scholar, they would not be able to make any sense of it.

Then when I began learning the Greek alphabet, to help me remember the sounds, I would also write my name using Greek characters. But I added the letter "v" because it was the only way I could think of to make it work: "Delta-Epsilon-Nu-V-Epsilon-Rho." Because "v" is English, it would not be used by a Greek speaker to figure the word out. Therefore, it would be pronounced something like "Dener" and would mean "steward." That's also not my name.

When you use only characters borrowed from another language's alphabet but write things for your own native language, the result is a hybrid that requires an explanation. Hence, Moroni's explanation that the Nephites only employed the Egyptian "characters" (and not the Egyptian language) in etching the record. This idea will figure in later in this talk.

Also significant is the assignment given to Joseph Smith to reform the Bible text. Joseph Smith began working on a revised Bible in June 1830. Joseph used the King James Version as his source text to accomplish the revision. There were few (if any) Greek or Hebrew materials used. Nothing was rendered from one language into another. The work was based on revelation, inspiration, and insight given to Joseph Smith by the Lord. The LDS Historian's Office has correctly called the work a "revision" of the Bible. However technically inappropriate we may think it is to use the word "translation" for Joseph's work, it is always called a "translation" by the Lord in numerous revelations to Joseph.

By November the material about Adam, Cain, Abel, and the first murderer had been finished. The work advanced to include the Enoch material in December, and on 7 December 1830, Sidney Rigdon was commanded to act as scribe to "write for him." The project included correcting the Bible, as well as numerous additions. It was undertaken so that the Bible would be rewritten and, according to the Lord, to become even as they are in [God's] own bosom (T&C 18:6). The work of restoring Genesis advanced quickly. By February 1832 [1831], Genesis 1:1 through 5:12 was finished. These are eight chapters of the Book of Moses (as published in the Pearl of Great Price by the LDS Church). In these early materials, there are notable additions made regarding:

- Moses,
- The Creation of this world,
- An explanation of Satan's pre-Earth existence and history,
- The fall of man,
- Adam and Eve, and
- Enoch (among many others).

So much material involving Enoch was added to chapter 4 of Genesis that it's become referred to as the "Book of Enoch."

When the Genesis account got to Melchizedek, a flood of new material was provided. In the new Melchizedek materials, we received clarifying information about the Holy Order:

Now Melchizedek was a man of faith who wrought righteousness. And when a child, he feared God, and stopped the mouths of lions, and quenched the violence of fire. And thus, having been approved of God, he was ordained a high priest after the Order of the covenant which God made with Enoch, it being after the Order of the Son of God, which Order came not by man, nor the will of men, neither by father nor mother, neither by beginning of days nor end of years, but of God. And it was delivered unto men by the calling of his own voice, according to his own will, unto as many as believed on his name.

For God, having sworn unto Enoch and unto his seed with an oath by himself that everyone being ordained after this Order and calling should have power, by faith, to break mountains, to divide the seas, to dry up waters, to turn them out of their course, to put at defiance the armies of nations, to divide the earth, to break every band, to stand in the presence of God, to do all things according to his will, according to his command subdue principalities and powers; and this by the will of the Son of God which was from before the foundation of the world. (Genesis 7:18-19 RE, emphasis added)

From this addition, we learn that faith—not priesthood—is the power that stops the mouths of lions and quenches the violence of fire. Also, ordination to the Holy Order comes from the voice of God and is conferred according to God's will. That will of God is predicated on two things:

- Belief on the name of God in this world, and
- The will of the Son of God before the foundation of this world.

Despite the many additions and corrections to the Genesis text, very little was added in the Joseph Smith Bible revisions about Abraham. Given the importance of Abraham as a pivotal covenant Father, not adding an expanded account of his life to Genesis is a significant omission. The Lord told Abraham: For as many as receive this gospel shall be called after your name and shall be accounted your seed, and shall rise up and bless you, as unto their Father (Abraham 3:1 RE). Given Abraham's importance, we should expect that any revision of Genesis would add as much about him as Genesis added about Adam and Enoch and Melchizedek. But the JST Bible does not do so.

If the Book of Abraham materials were added to the Genesis text, it would replace and expand the text from Genesis chapter 6, midway in verse 8, through chapter 7, midway through verse 4. The Book of Abraham supplies the missing important details we need to know that were omitted from the Genesis account of the Inspired Version of the Bible.

It appears that the foreknowledge of God made it unnecessary for a JST expansion of Genesis materials about Abraham. When Michael Chandler later sold four mummies, two papyrus scrolls, and some papyrus fragments (in July 1835) to buyers in Kirtland, events were set in motion that resulted in adding Abrahamic details to our Scriptures. Three parties (one of whom was Joseph Smith) paid the $2,400 sale price. The Book of Abraham was then produced after Joseph Smith got access to the papyri. Instead of being part of the JST Bible, it is called a "translation" of a papyrus scroll.

The "translation" began in Kirtland from July to November 1835 and produced the text from Abraham 1:1 through first half of 4:2 in the Restoration Edition of Scriptures. (In the LDS scriptures it's Abraham 1:1 through 2:18.) There are three different copies of the translation made in Kirtland in existence. These have been identified as Book of Abraham Manuscript A, B, and C.

- Manuscript A is in the handwriting of Frederick G. Williams.
- Manuscript B is in the handwriting of Warren Parrish.
- Manuscript C is in the handwriting of Warren Parrish and William W. Phelps.

None of the Kirtland era translations of the Book of Abraham include the introduction to the book. That introduction attributes the text to a papyrus written "by the hand of Abraham." That statement has been the focus of a great deal of controversy. It states: "A translation of some ancient records that have fallen into our hands, from the catacombs of Egypt, purporting to be the writings of Abraham while he was in Egypt, called 'The Book of Abraham, written by his own hand upon papyrus.'" Those words are in the handwriting of Willard Richards, and there is no existing source to explain why he added them to the publication of the Book of Abraham in the Times & Seasons in March 1842 (see JSP, Revelations and Translations, Volume 4: Book of Abraham and Related Manuscripts, p. 245).

A small library of material has been written on the relationship (or lack of relationship) between the remaining Joseph Smith Egyptian papyri fragments and the Book of Abraham. It's an understatement to say that subject is controversial. But given the importance of Abraham's status as the "Father of the righteous," it is important to discuss the controversy.

If one is objective, the text of the Book of Abraham presents insurmountable problems if it must satisfy the current scholarly understanding of the Egyptian papyri purchased from Michael Chandler. If the authenticity of the Book of Abraham must be based on that, it's very problematic. That is not to say that the scholar's approach to this controversy is without its weaknesses.

The Egyptian language had two earliest forms; the first to develop was hieroglyphic and dates from before 4000 BC. At about 390 BC... Oh, excuse me: At about 390 AD, Byzantine Emperor Theodosius I closed all religious temples that he regarded as pagan throughout his empire. Because of this, hieroglyphs were no longer used. Egypt was inside his empire. Therefore, the Egyptian temples closed, and the hieroglyphic language was neglected and ultimately abandoned altogether. For 1500 years, the language was lost. Egyptian monuments remained, but no one had a clue what the hieroglyphs meant.

After being lost for a millennium-and-a-half, hieroglyphic interpretation has been recovered only in a small part through work based on the Rosetta Stone. In July 1799, French soldiers were rebuilding a fort near the town of Rosetta and discovered a stone inscribed with three scripts: hieroglyphs in the top register, Greek at the bottom, and a script later identified as "Demotic" in the middle. Demotic was a still later form of Egyptian writing and was the common form spoken at the time the Rosetta Stone was originally carved.

Using the Greek from the Rosetta Stone as a guide to decipher the hieroglyphs, an attempt has been made to understand hieroglyphic Egyptian. The Rosetta stone contains a decree from Ptolemy V (dates from 196 BC). This is at the very end of a dying Egyptian culture, religion, language, and history. This era is known as the Ptolemaic dynasty.

Greeks controlled Egypt after Alexander the Great's conquest in 332 BC. When Alexander the Great died, his empire was divided between four generals. At that time, General Ptolemy assumed control over Egypt. The likelihood that the form of Egyptian hieroglyphic language dating from 196 BC is an accurate guide for understanding the way the language was understood millennia earlier is at best doubtful. If we accept the dating of 2100 BC for Abraham's life, there would have been two millennia of time separating the language of Abraham from the language of the Rosetta Stone.

The most basic linguistic problem is to understand how language changes with time.

Imagine you had a time machine. If you are like me, there would be many times and places that you would like to visit. In most of them, however, no one spoke English. If you could not afford the Six-Month-Immersion Trip to, say, ancient Egypt, you would have to limit yourself to a time and place where you could speak the language. Consider, perhaps, a trip to England. How far back in time could you go and still be understood? Say we go to London in the year 1400...

As you emerge from the time machine, a good first line to speak, something reassuring and recognizable, might be the opening line of the Lord's Prayer. The first line in a conservative, old-fashioned version of the Modern Standard English would be, "Our Father, who is in heaven, blessed be your name." In the English of 1400, as spoken by Chaucer, you would say, "Oure fadir that art in heunes, halwid be thy name." Now turn the dial back another four hundred years to 1000 CE, and in Old English, or Anglo-Saxon, you would say, "Faeader, ure thu the eart on heofonum, si thin nama gehalgod." A chat with Alfred the Great would be out of the question.

Most normal spoken languages over the course of a thousand years undergo enough change that speakers at either end of the millennium, attempting a conversation, would have difficulty understanding [one another]. (David W. Anthony, The Horse, The Wheel and Language: How Bronze-Age Riders from the Eurasian Steppes Shaped the Modern World, p.22, footnotes omitted, italics in original)

Consequently, it would be surprising—bordering on miraculous—if the way Egyptian hieroglyphs were understood at the time [of] the Rosetta Stone proves identical to the way that they were understood two-thousand years earlier in the lifetime of Abraham.

That having been said, Egyptologists believe they have fragments of the Joseph Smith papyri translated by him to compose the Book of Abraham. They rely on their ability to interpret these fragments using reconstructed Ptolemaic Egyptian. Using their skill-set, they are confident that the fragments do not contain a Book of Abraham but are, instead, an Egyptian Book of Breathing (a sen-sen papyri). They conclude Joseph Smith was unable to "translate" the source document.

There are multiple ways apologists have dealt with this problem:

- One approach, including Hugh Nibley's analysis, is that there was an Egyptian papyri source but dispute that the papyrus fragments we have are the actual text Joseph translated. This group of apologists assume what Joseph actually translated was destroyed in the Chicago fire. The approach accepts Willard Richards' Times & Seasons introduction explaining that it is a translation of records from the catacombs of Egypt, originating with Abraham.
- A second apologetic approach is to claim there never was a source papyrus for the Book of Abraham. This position ignores Willard Richards' Times & Seasons introduction. This approach claims the source for the Book of Abraham was entirely revelation from Heaven. The LDS Church now seems to accept this view.
- A third apologetic approach is that the Michael Chandler papyri were indeed the source for the Book of Abraham, and the text can actually be recovered using the Joseph Smith Papyri. These advocates make a full-throated defense of Willard Richards' Times & Seasons introduction. Until the scholarly understanding of Egyptology challenged Mormons, this was the overwhelming position of those who accepted the Book of Abraham as Scripture. In this arena of argument, there is a belief that the hieroglyphs contained hidden, esoteric meaning encoded in their form. As Dan Vogel describes it, "...other, more spiritual, mystical, and theologically powerful messages were encoded in their pictographic etymologies" (Book of Abraham Apologetics: A Review and Critique, p.67). Vogel rejects that idea.

There are other approaches. All of them address the issue of what perspective should be used to explain Joseph's translation.

- Should we assume the illustrations were original to Abraham? If so, then to interpret them, maybe we should look to how Egyptians in Abraham's day, or Abraham himself, would have understood them.
- Or should we assume the illustrations were original to Abraham but modified over time for other uses by the ancient Egyptians?
- Or do we assume the illustrations were connected to the Book of Abraham when the Joseph Smith papyri were created in the Ptolemaic period?
- Do we need to consider what Egyptians of that time thought of these drawings to represent?
- Or should we assume the illustrations were connected to the Book of Abraham for the first time in the Ptolemaic period, but to interpret them we ought to look at what Egyptian priests integrating Jewish, Greek, and Mesopotamian religious practices into native Egyptian practices would have thought about them?
- Or should we instead look at how Jews of that area would have understood them?
- Or were the illustrations never part of an ancient Book of Abraham but instead adapted by Joseph Smith to depict the ancient text he revealed and translated?

Well, in the give-and-take following deciphering the Rosetta Stone and the research done to develop some understanding of the Egyptian languages, the apologists who think the Book of Abraham was directly translated from the Joseph Smith papyri appear to hold the weaker position. However, that's not the end of the matter.

In every case in which he has produced a translation, Joseph Smith has made it clear that his inspiration is by no means bound to any ancient text but is free to take wings at any time. To insist, as the critics do, that "translation" may be understood only in the sense in which they choose to understand it, while the Prophet clearly demonstrates that he intends it to be taken in a very different sense, is to make up the rules of the game one is playing as well as being the umpire. (Hugh Nibley, An Approach to the Book of Abraham, p. 4, emphasis added)

Since Joseph Smith did not explain how the text was "translated," that issue is left to conjecture. The entire debate between Egyptian scholars and apologists centers on the translation process. However, Joseph Smith did not use the term "translation" as would a scholar. One example illustrates the difference:

While Oliver Cowdery was the scribe during the Book of Mormon translation, he and Joseph discussed whether the Apostle John died or continued on Earth. The question was answered by a revelation. The written account in our Scripture about the answer includes this explanation: A revelation given to Joseph Smith Jr. and Oliver Cowdery in Harmony, Pennsylvania, April 1829, when they desired to know whether John, the beloved disciple, tarried on earth. Translated from [a] parchment, written and hid up by himself (Joseph Smith History 13:17, emphasis added). Joseph did not have the parchment. Therefore, there was no parchment source for the revelation. It came as Joseph Smith received it from God through the Urim and Thummim (Ibid.).

Sidney Rigdon arrived in Fayette (during December 1830) as the Bible revision was then underway. The project involved editing and correcting the Bible. That project was also consistently referred to as a "translation" of the Bible, even though it would be more correctly called an "inspired revision." On December 7th, 1830, the commandment was given to Sidney: You shall write for him, and the scriptures shall be given, even as they are in my own bosom, to the salvation of [mine] own elect... (T&C 18:6). This helped explain what the term "translated" meant for the Bible revision project. It clearly refers to something different than how the term is generally used and understood.

When Enoch's City was taken to Heaven, it is described as being "translated" or a "translation." For Enoch, "translated" meant moving someone from Earth into Heaven and changing him or her so they could survive there. This meaning can also be understood and used for the "translation" of the parchment of John. It means taking something recorded and preserved in Heaven and moving it back to Earth where it had been lost.

I think that the word "translated" as it refers to the Book of Abraham should be understood in this sense: It was something recorded in Heaven and was moved back to the Earth where it had been lost. Regardless of whether or not conveying Abraham's testimony from Heaven back to Earth required a surviving papyrus scroll, that question is not as important as the accuracy and truthfulness of the Book of Abraham account that originated with Father Abraham. Only if the text is true, accurate, and legitimately Abraham's would it be worthy for canonizing as Scripture. Joseph Smith clearly intended for the Book of Abraham to be Scripture.

Apart from using the word "translation," the content of the material bears all the indicia of an ancient record from the time of Father Abraham. The account in the Book of Abraham can be compared with Abraham's history in Genesis. The comparison shows there are over a dozen details added through the Book of Abraham account that are missing from Genesis. For example:

- The famine in the homeland of Ur,
- Haran[']s] (Abraham's brother) death in the famine,
- Terah (Abraham's father) repenting of his idolatry,
- Terah's return to idolatry,
- Believers becoming the "seed of Abraham" and inherit the blessings through him,
- Abraham held the priesthood,
- Abraham earnestly sought God,
- An angel of the Lord was sent to rescue Abraham,
- Abraham was familiar with Egyptian gods,

- Abraham was 62 years old (not 75, as in Genesis) when he left Haran,
- Abraham made converts while in Haran,
- Abraham prayed for God to end the famine in Chaldea, and
- The Lord instructed Abraham [Abram] to say that Sarai was his sister.

All these differences (related to Abraham) can be found in ancient sources recorded in non-biblical texts. If ancient sources confirm events set out in the Book of Abraham did happen in Abraham's life, it's hard to simply dismiss the validity of the book as inauthentic. It only makes the most sense to consider... The most important thing to consider is the text itself when deciding the validity of the Book of Abraham.

One might dismiss a single element found in a nonbiblical tradition that parallels the Book of Abraham as mere coincidence. However, when a large number of such elements come together from diverse times and places, they overwhelmingly support the Book of Abraham as an ancient text. There are far too many references to Terah as an idolator, Abraham as a sacrificial victim, Abraham as an astronomer, and Abraham as a missionary to lightly dismiss their antiquity. In addition, many other distinctive elements found in these traditions, though not repeated frequently, add to the overall strength of the unique elements found in the Book of Abraham. (Hugh Nibley, Abraham in Egypt, p. xxxv)

Facsimile 3 includes the comment that the scene depicts Abraham...reasoning upon the principles of astronomy in the king's court. This echoes the account by Josephus that (to the Egyptians) Abraham, "...confuted the reasonings they made use of, every one for their own practices, demonstrating that such reasonings were vain and void of truth; whereupon he was admired by them in those conferences as a very wise man, and one of great sagacity, when he discoursed on any subject..." (The Antiquity of the Jews, Book 1, Chapter 2, ¶2). Josephus explained that Abraham, "...communicated to them arithmetic, and delivered to them the science of astronomy..." (Ibid.).

The oldest written Egyptian material is the Pyramid Texts and date from the 5th and 6th Dynasties. At the time of those writings, the original Pharaonic imitative religion was already approximately a thousand years old. There is no way to know how well the religion was preserved between the first Pharaoh's initial imitation and a millennium later when the Pyramid Texts were written.

Egypt has a complicated theological development that morphed over time. The Horus stellar religion is very early. The Osirian religion (sometimes linked to lunar theology) does not arise until nearly a thousand years after the Pyramid Texts at Saqqara and, arguably, most reflects the religion of the New Kingdom. That theology differs from the beliefs of the Old Kingdom religion. It was the Old Kingdom theology that is closer to that of Adam. ~~It was the Old Kingdom...~~ (Oh, excuse me.) Finally, the Memphite religion of Ra apparently begins in the late Old Kingdom. However, Ra (as the sun god) is syncretized to Ahmon (the god of light). The figure of Ahmon is present in both the star cult and the sun cult. As Egyptian religion changed at the time of the New Kingdom, nothing remained of the star cult.

The Book of Abraham's exposition on the sun, earth, planets, and stars fits neatly into the cosmological issues perplexing the rulers of the 9th Dynasty. (And by the way, the Joseph Smith rendering of the word "planets" is criticized by a number of scholars as being not a term that was understood at the time. But the word "planets" means "a star that wanders." So, you had fixed stars, and you had stars that wandered. "Planets" simply is referring to the stars that move in the sky overhead. And so, calling them "planets" is not at all problematic. It's just someone chafing to find an argument to throw at Joseph and at the Book of Abraham. And like so many of those things, as soon as you breathe on them, the house of cards falls over.)

There are many connections between the language of Egypt and the Restoration. The hieroglyphic form of Egyptian was used primarily to record religious texts and was the more formal or sacred form of the writing. A second, less formal form developed early in Egyptian language evolution, and it's called "hieratic." This second form was cursive and was the more likely form used on the Brass Plates. It's arrogant to assume that Ptolemaic era writing is a sound basis for ciphering backward over 2,000 years to decode Egyptian hieroglyphs. In the end, the question must be asked: Do you trust scholar's attempt to reconstruct antiquity using a partial record from 196 BC when it conflicts with the revelation given to Joseph Smith claiming to be a prophet, seer, and translator? Or do you believe God could inspire a prophet to recover a lost record from an ancient patriarch? It's one or the other.

It is significant that Joseph Smith claimed that the Old Testament written on the Brass Plates, as well as the record of the Nephites, were written in Egyptian. At the time and under the circumstances, Joseph Smith had little reason to make such a claim. With what we know now, it would be an error to claim otherwise. The choice is between Joseph being prescient or prophetic.

Joseph revealed that Adam and his immediate posterity wrote the first records of God dealing with mankind. It was called "a book of remembrance" (see Genesis 3:14 RE). That record was written in a language which was pure and undefiled (Ibid.). We know these records existed during Abraham's life (thousands of years later): The records of the Fathers, even the Patriarchs, ...the Lord, my God, preserved in my own hands (Abraham 2:4 RE).

By the time of Moses, however, the original records were lost. Moses had to restore the record of the Creation based on the revelation he received directly from the Lord. Moses was commanded:

You shall write the things which I shall speak. And in a day when the children of men shall esteem my words as naught, and take many of them from the book which you shall write, behold, I will raise up another like unto you, and they shall be had again among the children of men, among even as many as shall believe.

Pharaoh's daughter raised Moses from birth. She named him and treated him as "her son" (see Exodus 1:5 RE). Accordingly, when Moses was commanded to write the record revealed to him by the Lord, he would have recorded it in the language he understood: the language his adopted mother taught him, which was Egyptian. This detail is exactly what the Book of Mormon explains about the Brass Plates. Moses replaced the lost records of the Fathers by revelation from God. That record is described in the Book of Mormon as the records which were engraven upon the plates of brass and were composed in the language of the Egyptians (Mosiah 1:1 RE). Ask yourself the likelihood of a New England farm boy in 1829 choosing to claim the Old Testament was recorded in the Egyptian language? It's a remarkable bulls-eye detail, unlikely to have occurred to a youthful swindler. (But of course, Joseph was an actual prophet, and therefore, God revealed to him the truths he recounted.)

Since Joseph translated over 500 pages of what was likely derived from Hieratic Egyptian for the Book of Mormon, he read and understood one version of that language better than any scholar, including all who have lived since the discovery of the Rosetta Stone. Because I accept Joseph's claims of being a prophet, seer, and translator at face value, it's easy for me to resolve conflicts over Egyptian texts in favor of Joseph and against the scholarly critics.

Joseph Smith Papers, Volume 4 of the Revelations and Translations has copies of Egyptian Alphabet materials produced by Joseph's scribes: Oliver Cowdery, William W. Phelps, and Warren Parrish. Teryl Givens has taken the position that these texts prove, "The Book of Abraham manuscripts, unlike their Book of Mormon counterpart, bear clear evidence of reworking, revising, and editing. This was no spontaneous channeling of a finished product by any stretch..." (The Pearl of Greatest Price: Mormonism's Most Controversial Scripture, p.201). He interprets these as proof that Joseph engaged in a very complex deciphering process to produce the Book of Abraham using the hieroglyphs in the Book of Breathing.

When I first saw the Egyptian Alphabet materials, it appeared to me to be an attempt to reverse engineer Joseph Smith's translation of the Book of Abraham by using the Book of Abraham [Breathing] papyrus. Recall that Oliver Cowdery had attempted to translate the Book of Mormon and failed in that attempt. When he failed, the Lord explained his failure to him, stating:

Behold, you have not understood; you have supposed that I would give it unto you when you took no thought save it was to ask me. But behold, I say unto you that you must study it out in your mind, then you must ask me if it be right, and if it is right, [then] I will cause that your bosom shall burn within you; therefore, you shall feel that it is right. (Joseph Smith History 13:26 RE)

Two of the three Egyptian Alphabet studies (A and B) were in whole (or in major part) the study of Oliver Cowdery. It appears that these were the result of Oliver's attempts to follow the Lord's guidance after his failure to successfully translate the Book of Mormon. When he failed in 1829, the Lord said there were other records have I that I will give unto you power that you may assist to translate (Ibid. vs. 24). It seems apparent that the Egyptian Alphabet study in late 1835 was Oliver's (and the other scribes') attempt to validate the translation process and act on the earlier promise to Oliver.

Teryl Givens' speculation that the Egyptian Alphabet is Joseph Smith's study of the papyrus is refuted by John S. Thompson in his article, "'We May Not Understand Our Words': The Book of Abraham and the Concept of Translation in The Pearl of Great [Greatest] Price." Thompson shows from contemporaneous sources that Joseph's translation was accomplished quickly and before the Egyptian Alphabet documents were created. It's clear from an examination of the historical record that the scribes did their deciphering work of the Egyptian characters after the translation of the Book of Abraham had been done. Accordingly, using the Egyptian Alphabet materials to try to understand the translation process is not likely to help us understand what Joseph did (but much more likely to help us understand his scribes' attempt to understand Joseph's translating work).

It is not possible to resolve this question. Those directly involved were never asked, and they failed to leave a clear account of what the Egyptian Alphabet documents were, why they were produced, and how they relate to the translation of the Book of Abraham. This has resulted in debate between scholar-critics and scholar-apologists.

The latest writer to weigh in on the subject, Dan Vogel, deals with the absence of hard answers by arguing the meaning and import of ambiguous details. As a lawyer, I appreciate his argumentation. However, since I care about the subject and would like to know the truth, the arguments from implication in the absence of proof cannot be fully convincing. The souls of men must not be trifled with (see T&C 138:18).

In arguing from the absence of hard historical evidence, Vogel urges his belief that:

...what is required in any treatment of the Book of Abraham is not fluency in [hieroglyphs] or a belief in Joseph Smith's prophetic calling, but a firm, clear-headed understanding of the methods of history and of the relevant nineteenth-century historical sources. Anything else is counterproductive. (Book of Abraham Apologetics: A Review and Critique, p. xviii)

He makes the argument that the Kirtland Egyptian Papers were not created after the translation but were used to create and translate the Book of Abraham. His arguments are somewhat persuasive.

However, his analysis is advocacy, and his writings betrays the assumptions necessary for his conclusions. The book necessarily reflects a scholar's caution in the absence of certainty. Although his work is interesting, well written, and attempts to make reasonable points, the information we have available does not let us resolve anything about the Kirtland Egyptian Papers. Everything is arguable. Vogel's arguments clearly belong in the debate, but in the end is only argument (like so much else involving the Book of Abraham). A few examples of how he supports his arguments are (these are quotes):

- "implies a process of translation" (p. 1)
- "This clearly implies" (p. 12)
- "implies that" (p. 14)
- "more careful analysis shows" (p. 17)
- "the simplest way to explain" (p. 17)
- "This suggests" (p. 18)
- "most reasonably explained as" (p. 18)
- "was likely due to" (p. 18)
- "may have dictated" (p. 19)
- "The details of Smith's participation in the creation of his own history are not...well known, but apparently" (p. 39)
- "were likely the result of" (p. 39)
- "Apparently, there was some hesitation" (p. 50)
- "is instructive, although piecing together what was intended is not always clear and necessitates some conjecture" (p. 54)
- "possibly from" (p. 55)
- "may have taken from" (p. 55)
- "is probably more than coincidence" (p. 56)
- "This is a problem from the theory" (p. 57)
- (and so on)

Whether I agree or disagree with his interpretation does not give me the actual historical certitude that would answer the most important questions about the Book of Abraham's creation (or "translation," as the term was used and understood by Joseph Smith). There are debaters on both sides. They all make arguments to support their desired conclusion. Familiarity with the Egyptian language (insofar as the Ptolemaic period Rosetta Stone material permits the language to be resurrected) causes the Egyptologists to be dogmatic. They speak in firm declaratives. But Joseph Smith saw God the Father, His Son, Michael, Raphael, Gabriel, Peter, James, and John, and a host of angels who declared their dispensations, keys, rights, and honors. Joseph also spoke in firm declaratives. They line up on opposite sides; we must choose between them.

The best evidence of translation authenticity is the text itself. As Hugh Nibley put it, "...it is the Book of Abraham that[']s on trial, not Joseph Smith as an Egyptologist, nor the claims and counterclaims to scholarly recognition by squabbling publicity seekers..." (Abraham in Egypt, p. 3). The text of the Book of Abraham is compelling and adds important theological information I believe to be vital to understanding the religion I accept and Abraham's role in God's plan for this Creation. More importantly, I accept the idea that it adds information vital to salvation.

I believe it is also important that Joseph Smith intended the Book of Abraham as Scripture. He wrote on March 1, 1842:

In future. I design to furnish much original matter, which will be found of enestimable advantage to the saints,— &...all who— desire a knowledge of the kingdom of God.— and as it is not practicable to bring forth the new translation. of...Scriptures. & varioes records of ancint date. & great worth to this gen[e]ration in...<the usual> form. by books. I shall prenit [print] specimens of the same in the Times & Seasons as fast. as time & space will admit. so that the honest in heart may be cheerd & comforted and go on their way rejoic[ing].— as their souls become exp[an]ded.— & their undestandig [understanding] enlightend, by a knowledg of what Gods work through the fathers. in former days, as well as what He is about to do in Latter Days— To fulfil the words of the fathers.—

In the penst [present] no. will be found the Commencmet of the Records discoverd in Egypt. some time since. as penend by the hand. of Father Abraham. which I shall contin[u]e to translate & publish as fast as possible till the whole is completed. (JSP Documents, Volume 9, p. 206-7)

That accompanied what got published. He wrote, and the first installment of the Book of Abraham in the Times and Seasons followed.

If Joseph Smith regarded the Book of Abraham as Scripture, I do not want to dismiss it because an Egyptologist cannot read it in the remaining papyrus fragments some claim as the source for the book.

It is not at all clear that Egyptology is even relevant to an analysis of the Book of Abraham. The narrative text begins in a location named Ur of the Chaldeans. The book states 32 times it does not cover events in Egypt. There are 13 times the location is Ur. Another 16 times the events happen in Haran, Jershon, Sechem, Morah, or Canaan. Then before ending, it clarifies 3 times the account is not about events in Egypt. Here is a brief review of the many times it clarifies it is NOT an account from Egypt:

- Facsimile No. 1 illustrates an event that took place in Ur, not in Egypt.
- Abraham's record begins: In the land of the Chaldeans (Abraham 1:1 RE).
- When Abraham was bound and put on the altar to be sacrificed—as illustrated in Facsimile 1—it was upon the altar which was built in the land of the Chaldeans (Ibid. vs. 3).
- It was constructed after the form of a bedstead, such as was had among the Chaldeans (Ibid. vs. 4). The record is silent about whether Egyptians had any similar altar. Scholarly critics explain the Egyptian funerary practice associated with the Chaldean altar with the customary lion-headed funerary bier on which embalming—not human sacrifice—is typically depicted by any similar Egyptian hieroglyphic. Again, however, that is not particularly helpful to understanding what happened in Ur of the Chaldeans. Nor does that criticism address Chaldean behavior, religious rites, or altar design.

- The Book of Abraham does not give us any Egyptian names but explains Chaldean (not Egyptian) terminology is used.

- The book explains that Facsimile No. 1 shows the figures at the beginning, which manner of the figures is called by the Chaldeans Kahleenos, which signifies hieroglyphics (Ibid.). This word is what the Chaldeans would call the vignette, not what an Egyptian would. The explanation is provided because the Chaldean word is different from the Egyptian word. On this point, an Egyptologist's criticism is of little help to authenticate or refute the Book of Abraham.

To the eye of an Egyptologist, the four figures under the lion couch in Facsimile No. 1 are canopic jars. They are the four receptacles used in Egyptian embalming practice for the liver, lungs, stomach, and intestines. The liver jar is, to the Egyptians, the human-headed Imseti. The lung jar is to them the baboon-headed Hapi. The stomach jar is the jackal-headed Duamutef. The intestine jar is the falcon-headed Qebehsnuef. None of the Egyptian names are used in the Book of Abraham by the Chaldeans.

But then again, the text is not about Egypt but about the local practice of those living in Ur of the Chaldeans. In that place, nothing Abraham understood about the four figures suggests they were jars. Instead, Abraham understood they were Chaldean idols before which human sacrifices were performed. The names of these idols in the land of the Chaldeans were Elkenah, Zibnah, Mahmackrah, and Koash. Abraham's account is not about the gods of Egypt. It's about the gods of the Chaldeans.

Egyptologists criticize the account that Abraham (as well as three virgins before him) was offered as a human sacrifice. Many scholars dispute Egyptians offered human sacrifices. To an Egyptologist, the mention of human sacrifice is evidence the Book of Abraham is not credible. But the book is not set in Egypt. Human sacrifice is known to have taken place in the land of the Chaldeans where the Abrahamic account is actually based. Newsweek reported the following:

Archaeologists have uncovered evidence that at least 11 children and young people were killed as a result of ritualistic sacrifice between 3100 and 2800 B.C.E. Their research was published Wednesday in the journal Antiquity. ...Some remains show [the]...stab wounds, but researchers aren't sure how all of the individuals lost their lives. One male had violent injuries to his hip and head, similar to wounds reconstructed from other Mesopotamian ritual sacrifices. ..."It is unlikely that these children and young people were killed in a massacre or conflict," the London Natural History Museum's Brenna Hassett said in a statement. "The careful positioning of the bodies and the evidence of violent death suggest that these burials fit the same pattern of human sacrifice seen at other [locations] in the region." (Katherine Hignett, Newsweek, "Ancient Mesopotamia: Ritual Child Sacrifice Uncovered in Bronze Age Turkey")

This discovery puts Chaldean human sacrifice occurring at or near the conventional dating of Abraham's life.

The New York Times reported on human sacrifices at an ancient location named "Ur" located in Iraq:

A new examination of skulls from the royal cemetery at Ur, discovered in Iraq almost a century ago, appears to support a more grisly interpretation than before of human sacrifices associated with elite burials in ancient Mesopotamia, archaeologists say.

Palace attendants, as part of royal mortuary [practices], were not dosed with poison to meet a rather serene death. Instead, a sharp instrument, a pike perhaps, was driven into their heads. (John Noble Wilford, New York Times, "At Ur, Ritual Deaths That Were Anything but Serene")

(And he goes on from there. It'll be in the published version of this.)

According to the Book of Abraham, none of the names of Chaldean gods—or any of the religious practices Abraham witnessed and experienced—were Egyptian. They were cultic practices and may have been entirely conducted in a locality that imitated their own incorrect understanding of the religion of Egypt. Chaldea's Ur was populated by 'Egyptophiles' who were apparently imitating and practiced a local corruption of an ancient Egyptian religion. They clearly got some things about the Egyptian religion wrong (and may have gotten very many things wrong).

Robert Ritner's book includes a chapter written by Christopher Woods addressing the location of Ur. The chapter is titled, "The Practice of Egyptian Religion at 'Ur of the Chaldees'?" (Dude, you can tell from the title that this is laced with condescension and arrogance. Congratulations, Christopher Woods. You've proven your ego won't fit into a normal human form.) The chapter begins by acknowledging that, "The location of 'Ur of the Chaldees'...remains open for debate." He explains, "Cuneiform sources attest a number of settlements bearing the name of Ur (or a name phonetically similar) in northern Syria, southeastern Turkey, and northern Mesopotamia, mostly small villages, and so making for unlikely candidates for biblical Ur..." (see Ritner, Robert K., The Joseph Smith Egyptian Papyri: A Complete Edition, pp. 73-74).

A discovery of an ancient library of thousands of cuneiform tablets in 1975 raised another possibility for Abraham's Ur, this new one being located in ancient Haran rather than a thousand miles away, as previously thought.

Since Ritner's book is a collection of scholarly criticism of the Book of Abraham, the author does not leave it open-ended. Instead, he speculates Ur may have been at a specific Babylonian location. Based on that assumption, he concludes, "If we are correct in identifying Abraham's Ur with Babylonian Ur, this poses grave difficulties for the account given in the Book of Abraham" (Ibid.). Obviously, if the author is not correct, the inverse is also true: If we are incorrect in identifying Abraham's Ur with Babylonian Ur, then we don't know anything about the matter, and it poses no justifiable difficulty for the account in the Book of Abraham.

Hugh Nibley discusses Ur in An Approach to the Book of Abraham from pages 424 to 428. He writes on page 427:

What leaves the door wide open to discussion is the existence in western Asia of a number of different Urs. Ur in the south was a great trade center... and since Abraham was a merchant, one should expect to find him there. But on the other hand that same Ur had founded merchant colonies far to the north and west at an early date, and some of those settlements, as was the custom, bore the name of the mother city.

The angel of God rescued Abraham from being sacrificed on the altar. The angel killed the priest attempting to sacrifice Abraham. This resulted in great mourning in Chaldea... (Abraham 2:1 RE). Following this, a famine prevailed throughout all the land of Chaldea (Ibid. vs. 4). During the famine in Ur of Chaldea, the Lord commanded Abraham to leave, and the events in the Book of Abraham finally move from Ur: *Now the Lord had said unto me, [Abraham], get yourself out of your country, and from your kindred, and from your father's house, unto a land that I will show you. Therefore, I left the land of Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan (Ibid. vs. 5, emphasis added). The story moves but is still not in Egypt—nor is Abraham heading to Egypt in the account.

The next location must have been comparatively uninhabited when Abraham's family arrived. They name the location after Abraham's deceased brother, Haran. Abraham explains his family went unto the land which we denominated Haran (Ibid., emphasis added). It apparently had no name before their arrival, since they denominated (or named) the place. We have no way to identify the location but only know that it was away from the earlier (also unknown) location called Ur.

At Haran, there is no mention of famine. Abraham's father, Terah, had repented of his idolatry in Ur, but in Haran, he returned to it. When God later told Abraham, "Depart from Haran," Terah remained behind.

Abraham's journey then takes him through Jershon in the land of Canaan. There—still not in Egypt—Abraham built an altar. Moving on again, he arrives in Sechem, situated in the plains of Moreh at a place described as [on] the borders of the land of the Canaanites (Abraham 4:2 RE). He is still not in Egypt. In that location the Lord promised Abraham, unto thy seed I will give this land (Ibid.). Abraham was not given Egypt.

Famine is mentioned again in the land given to Abraham's seed, and as a consequence of that, Abraham reports: I, Abraham, concluded to go down into Egypt, to sojourn there, for the famine became very grievous (Ibid. vs. 3, emphasis added). Abraham's conclusion to go down into Egypt confirms for us that he had not yet reached Egypt during any part of his account to that point.

Abraham received a great revelation about the stars, the heavens, events among the pre-existent spirits of mankind, the fall of Satan, and the creation of the world. This great revelation comprises the remainder of Abraham's account in his book. However, the account clearly states that God told Abraham: I show these things unto you, before you go into Egypt (Abraham 5:4 RE, emphasis added). Accordingly, nothing in the Book of Abraham took place in Egypt. When it is added to the Genesis account, what happened following the conclusion of the Book of Abraham text is: And it came to pass that when [Abraham] had come into Egypt... (in Genesis [7:4 RE]) and goes on from there to explain about Sarai being accosted.

Willard Richards' introduction that claims the book is "purporting to be the writings of Abraham while he was in Egypt" is demonstrably wrong from the text itself—32 times the Book of Abraham states otherwise. When nothing in the text reckons from Egypt, it is questionable how useful criticism of the Book of Abraham from an Egyptological vantage point is. We should expect there to be some deviations from Egyptian religion, language, or culture in the book. The account only covers events among an ancient people, in an uncertain location called "Ur," located somewhere in Chaldea. Those people were only imitative of Egypt. They were not Egyptians. And the events in the book did not happen "while [Abraham] was in Egypt."

One hieroglyph appears in all three Facsimiles:

- It is figure 10 in Facsimile 1,
- At the bottom and adjacent to the figure 2 in Facsimile 2, and
- Figure 3 in Facsimile 3.

The hieroglyph is used to represent "Abraham in Egypt." The figure is a libation table (or "traditional offering stand") on which drink and food were offered. Since Abraham concluded to travel to Egypt because of famine, a symbol of drink and food for Abraham in Egypt would be altogether apt. But the table figure shows a lotus flower atop it. The lotus was a symbol of ascent to the throne of God. That concept is most clearly referenced in the explanation of panel 2 in Facsimile 2. It is at least thought-provoking that Joseph identified the food and drink offering stand and a symbol of ascending to God to be representing Abraham's presence in Egypt.

To be clear, because nothing in the Book of Abraham happened in Egypt, it is questionable how useful anything authentically Egyptian (if we're able to determine that) is to understand or to question the text. The names and practices Abraham encountered imitated—but did not correctly replicate—the religion of 9th Dynasty Egypt. The text explains that the place where Abraham was offered as human sacrifice is an unknown village located somewhere under Chaldean influence named "Ur." However, Ur could have been in any Mesopotamian location across thousands of square miles from Turkey, northern Syria, into Iraq, or Iran. There are many known villages contemporary with Abraham known to have been named "Ur." Of course, there may have been many others unknown to us with the same or similar name. The text ends before Abraham enters Egypt, and therefore, the continuation of an account involving Abraham picks up in Genesis. This begins halfway through Genesis 4 [7:4]. The account deals only briefly with the "princes" bringing Sarai to Pharaoh who was then plagued because of Sarai's presence. Pharaoh then returns Sarai to Abraham [Abram], at which point Abraham [Abram] and Sarai were sent away.

Because nothing in the Book of Abraham or Genesis gives any detail about Abraham's experiences in Egypt, we have no narrative account to help us give context to the facsimiles. We do not know if Facsimile No. 3—like Facsimile No. 1—is a scene that took place outside of Egypt. The footnotes explaining the scene end with this clarification: Abraham is reasoning upon the principles of astronomy in the king's court. It is unclear which "king's court" is being referenced. Clearly, the people of Ur involved in Abraham's experience imitated Egypt. They sought to imitate the Egyptian's "earnest imitation." Therefore, we cannot be certain if Facsimile No. 3 is reporting an event that took place among people who imitated Egyptian religious rites or if they instead happened in Egypt. If it's the former, it's consistent with the rest of the text where nothing else has happened in Egypt.

The Book of Abraham explains the Egyptian Pharaoh could only imitate the Holy Order but had no right to claim that priestly position. In context, this exposes the Chaldean's error in looking to Egypt for Divine guidance. These Urrian residents even anointed for themselves a "priest of Pharaoh" who practiced human sacrifice. Was this an innovation by Ur or imitative of an Egyptian rite? We do not know anything certain. But we know that it was distant from (and only imitating) an Egyptian imitation of the religion of the Fathers. We only have Abraham's understanding of what these people were up to.

It is clear from the text that "before" his journey "into Egypt," Abraham was shown a great revelation about the pre-existence, Creation, and organization of the stars. It raises the question of where Abraham tried to clear up people's understanding in Facsimile No. 3.

The Book of Abraham clarifies many "mysteries" that are not otherwise to be found in Scripture. But Scriptures tell us there are many important truths that are withheld from us. Even if they are unknown to us, there are "mysteries" that are still part of the true religion first revealed to Adam.

We learn of God's promise to the righteous in T&C 69:2:

Unto them will I reveal all my mysteries, yea, all the hidden mysteries of my kingdom. From days of old and for ages to come will I make known unto them the good pleasure of my will, concerning all things to come. Yea, even the wonders of eternity shall they know, and things to come will I shew them, even the things of many generations. Their wisdom shall be great and their understanding reach to Heaven, and before them the wisdom of the wise shall perish and the understanding of the prudent shall come to naught. For by my spirit will I enlighten them and by my power will I make known unto them the secrets of my will, yea, even those things which eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor yet entered into the heart of man.

We're told in Alma 9:3 [RE] that those who give heed and are diligent are rewarded with understanding:

[It's] given unto many to know the mysteries of God; nevertheless, [they're] laid under a strict command that they shall not impart — only according to the portion of his word which he doth grant unto the children of men, according to the heed and diligence which they give....therefore, he that will harden his heart, the same receiveth the lesser portion of the word. ...He that will not harden his heart, to him is given the greater portion of the word, until it is given unto him to know the mysteries of God, until they know them in full.

While Christ was among the Nephites, the greatest part of what He taught them is withheld from our record. We read in 3 Nephi 9:5 [RE]:

He went again a little way off and prayed unto the Father, and tongue cannot speak the words which he prayed, neither can be written by man the words which he prayed. And the multitude did hear, and do bear record, and their hearts were open, and they did understand in their hearts the words which he prayed.

There are many other references in Scripture to important things that are left out of our canon. The true religion contains many "mysteries" that are important, not yet known or taught, but which were to be restored to the faithful in the future.

The Book of Abraham helps us uncover some of the missing information about the religion of the first Fathers. The first verse of the Book of Abraham includes these remarkable words:

I sought for the blessings of the Fathers and the right whereunto I should be ordained to administer the same. Having been myself a follower of righteousness, desiring also to be one who possessed great knowledge, and to be a greater follower of righteousness, and...possess a greater knowledge, and to be a Father of many nations, a prince of peace, and desiring to receive instructions and to keep the commandments of God, I became a rightful heir, a high priest, holding the right belonging to the Fathers. It was conferred upon me from the Fathers: it came down from the Fathers, from the beginning of time, yea, even from the beginning (or before the foundations of the earth) to the present time, even the right of the firstborn (or the first man — who is Adam — or [the] first Father) through the Fathers unto me. I sought for [mine] appointment unto the Priesthood according to the appointment of God unto the Fathers concerning the seed. (Abraham 1:1 RE)

Abraham begins by explaining he "sought for the blessings of the Fathers," the very thing Malachi prophesies will return before the great and dreadful return of the Lord. Abraham obtained what will be available again. Those blessings of the Fathers will be administered again before the end.

At the beginning of his record, Abraham mentions some of the specific things that are part of "the blessings of the Fathers." This identifies Abraham, not Joseph Smith, as the writer of the book.

When the Holy Order is established in its fullness, there is one Patriarchal head appointed to stand as the husbandman-father, occupying the position of the first Father or Adam. When God set Adam at the head, "The tasks given to Adam are of a priestly nature: caring for sacred space. In ancient thinking, caring for sacred space was a way of upholding creation. By preserving order, non-order was held at bay" (John H. Walton, The Lost World of Adam and Eve, p. 106). This priestly responsibility was what Abraham sought. He explained that he wanted to possess a greater knowledge, and to be a Father of many nations, a prince of peace, and desiring to receive instructions and to keep the commandments of God, I became a rightful heir, a high priest, holding the right belonging to the Fathers (Abraham 1:1 RE). The Lord offered to return this lost fullness in Joseph Smith's day, but the required conditions were not met. Therefore, the fullness was not "restored again" and remains unrestored.

Abraham knew more about the Holy Order in his day than Joseph in 1842. After all, Abraham had the records of the Fathers. Much of what Joseph learned about the Holy Order (or as he termed it, the "fullness of the priesthood") appears to have come as a result of him translating the Book of Abraham.

Abraham knew Adam was the Father of many nations. Likewise, the first Patriarchs all expected to have numerous posterity and to be Fathers of many nations. The line of the Patriarchs named in Scriptures is a list of those through whom the Holy Order descended and does not name all of the righteous. The residue of the righteous was also blessed. The original Holy Order meeting at Adam-Ondi-Ahman is described in Scripture:

Three years previous to the death of Adam, he called Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahalalel, Jared, Enoch, and Methuselah, who were all high priests, with the residue of his posterity who were righteous, into the valley of Adam-Ondi-Ahman, and there bestowed upon them his last blessing. (T&C 154:19)

Those names, listed in order from Adam, were the first to hold the presiding Patriarchal priesthood from the oldest to the youngest holding that right.

The Holy Order in its fullness is a right of government or right of dominion. Anciently, it was always held in a line of descent. Abraham marks the first time that non-direct lineal descendant was sealed in the Holy Order to hold it in its fullness. Once sealed,

Abraham became entitled to be a "Father of many nations, a rightful heir, holding the right belonging to the Fathers."

This right is not worldly. Abraham's record gives us a perfect vantage point to understand the difference between worldly government and the government of God. At the time of Abraham, any earthly king did not have the right to make that claim. The Pharaoh of Abraham's day feigned to hold it, claiming it descended to him through Noah. Abraham explained the conflict:

Pharaoh, being a righteous man, established his kingdom and judged his people wisely and justly all his days, seeking earnestly to imitate that order established by the fathers in the first generations, in the days of the first Patriarchal reign, even in the reign of Adam, and also Noah, his father, who blessed him with the blessings of the earth, and with the blessings of wisdom, but cursed him as pertaining to the Priesthood. Now Pharaoh being of that lineage by which he could not have the right of Priesthood, notwithstanding the Pharaohs would fain claim it from Noah through Ham, therefore my father was led away by their idolatry. (Abraham 2:3 RE)

Pharaoh was "righteous" but still descended from a line that could not claim legitimate rule. He modeled his kingdom after the order established by the first Fathers, but it could only be an imitation. He claimed a lineal connection with Noah, which was true enough, but his ancestry gave him no heavenly acknowledgment for his rule. And because he descended from a line that usurped authority not given to them by God, all those who submitted to his earthly rule practiced idolatry.

Abraham, on the other hand, was given dominion, the right to rule over nations, Patriarchal status, and the rights belonging to the Fathers. But Abraham made no attempt to displace the Pharaoh. They were rivals, to be sure, but Abraham was content to hold the right, receive instructions, be a diligent follower of righteousness, be one who possessed great knowledge, be a greater follower of righteousness, and to possess a greater knowledge. He was content to teach his followers the path of righteousness. Unlike Pharaoh, he did not assert authority over others. Abraham was interested in eternity, not earthly recognition and control. Hugh Nibley described the circumstance:

The Book of Abraham brings out the main points of rivalry between the patriarch and the pharaoh in high relief: Each claims to possess the only true priesthood and with it the only true kingship. The earliest legends of Egypt and Mesopotamia introduce us to a scene repeated over and over again in apocalypses and testaments of the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles, of a great and terrible monarch who feels his divinity threatened and his dominion challenged by an emissary of the true God. (Abraham in Egypt, p. 254)

Nibley has observed that "Pharaoh was always unsure of his authority over his own people" (Ibid. p. 233). There were many Pharaohs in later dynasties who investigated their claim to authority.

Of particular interest are those devout and sincere pharaohs who spent their days in the archives engaging in the constant search of Egyptian rulers for divine authority, such men as King Neferhotep in the Thirteenth Dynasty, [and] the great Amenophis I, "a wise and inspired man," according to Manetho, who yearned to see the gods but feared to risk any force or trickery to get his wish, or Ptolemy the son of Glaucias, "the recluse of the Serapeum," spending all his days in the library, as does the hero of the Khamuas story, searching in the House of Life for the book that bestows the knowledge of divine dominion and authority.

The trouble was that they lacked revelation. In Egypt, Henri Frankfort observed, "The actions of individuals lacked divine guidance altogether." (Ibid.)

Egypt's claims may seem arrogant after the Exodus of Israel. However, their civilization attempted to preserve something precious. As one writer put it, "Ancient Egyptians inherited their great wisdom from a much earlier Elder culture which was able to pass on the flame of knowledge before its own apparent demise" (Gods of Eden, p. 17).

God has declared His intent to assert control over His Creation and overthrow all governments. The Christmas 1832 revelation states:

And thus with the sword and by bloodshed, the inhabitants of the earth shall mourn. And with famine, and plague, and earthquake, and the thunder of heaven, and the fierce and vivid lightning also, shall the inhabitants of the earth be made to feel the wrath, and indignation, and chastening hand of an Almighty God, until the consumption decreed has made a full end of all nations, that the cry of the saints, and of the blood of the saints, shall cease to come up into the ears of the Lord of [the] Sabaoth from the earth, to be avenged of their enemies. (T&C 85:3)

All nations, other than the Holy Order family-government ordained by God, will be brought to a full end. Or in the various iterations of the prophecy of Malachi, God will smite the earth with a curse (Malachi 1:12 RE), or the whole earth would be utterly wasted at his coming (Joseph Smith History 3:4 RE)—doesn't mean universal death. It means universal disillusion into chaos, with no governance possible apart from the one that He intends to establish, that will provide revelation, guidance, order, and preserve His people. The only surviving rule or dominion at that time will be the one tied to the Fathers. It will be the people whose one heart is like the one heart of the Fathers. They will possess the promises made to the Fathers, or in other words, they will have been sealed to the Fathers. It is phrased differently in different versions of Malachi's prophecy, but they all mean the same thing. Occasionally, God describes the same thing in different words. The purpose is to help us grasp His meaning.

There are many obstacles to overcome before the Lord returns in glory. Recovering the religion of the Fathers, becoming of one heart with the Fathers, and fulfilling the prophecy of Malachi are directly connected to Abraham. In a very real sense, it will not happen without a connection to Abraham.

Holding the promises made to Abraham is not just a covenant. It also involves knowledge. Joseph Smith was required to recover the "fullness of the scriptures" (or translate the Bible as it was in the bosom of the Lord) into a volume for the faithful to study. Joseph warned the Latter-day Saints they would fail without the fullness. Until the publication of the Restoration Edition of the Scriptures, there was no version of the fullness of the Scriptures available. Of course, they do not accomplish anything if they're not read and studied.

Repenting and reclaiming the fullness of the Scriptures was a required first step of repentance for the Restoration to continue. When that step was taken, there was a covenant. If people are faithful to the covenant, the Restoration will continue.

Abraham was not content with knowledge. He wanted to obtain greater knowledge. The purpose of pursuing knowledge was to receive and obey commandments. Greater knowledge facilitates greater obedience. Knowledge is not the goal, it is the desirable effect that knowledge has on the heart and mind of a righteous soul.

Knowledge about the Holy Order can be misused. Even understanding its rights has inspired envy, jealousy, and anger. Cain murdered Abel because Cain understood the importance of standing at the head of the Holy Order. As he contemplated the possibility of it slipping away from him, Satan tempted him to usurp the right by murdering the more worthy heir. The account of that attempted overthrow is succinct:

Satan [said] unto Cain, Swear unto me by your throat, and if you tell it, you shall die. And swear your brethren by their heads and by the living God that they tell it not, for if they tell it, they shall surely die — and this that your father may not know it. And this day I will deliver your brother Abel into your hands. And Satan swore unto Cain that he would do according to his commands. And all these things were done in secret. And Cain says, Truly I am Mahon, the master of this great secret — that I may murder and get gain; wherefore, Cain was called Master Mahon. And he gloried in his wickedness. And Cain went into the field and Cain talked with Abel his brother. And it came to pass that while they were in the field, Cain rose up against Abel his brother and slew him. And Cain gloried in that which he had done, saying, I am free; surely the flocks of my brother fall into my hands. (Genesis 3:9 RE, emphasis added)

The "flocks of my brother" were not sheep; they were posterity. Abel was to become Adam's successor and stand as the Father of many nations. By displacing Abel, Cain hoped to be the next in the line of Patriarchal Fathers.

Ether chapter 4 shows how the envy of "kingship" results in generations of murderers obtaining power through bloodshed. The Holy Order is not a worldly thing. It cannot be severed from the Powers of Heaven or the Heavenly Council. The presiding Patriarch of the Holy Order is a representative of the Heavenly Council who lives as a mortal on Earth. This is why the Patriarchal head of the Holy Order is the shepherd for the faithful, husbandman for the Creation, and the teacher responsible for dispensing Divine knowledge. That was who Adam was and what Abraham became.

The Holy Order is approved for practice in a proper, functioning temple belonging to God. As Walton put it:

When we consider the Garden of Eden in its ancient context, we find that it is more sacred space than green space. It is the center of order, not perfection, and its significance has more to do with divine presence than human paradise.

...We did not lose paradise as much as we forfeited sacred space and the relationship it offered, thereby damaging our ability to be in relationship with God and marring his creation with our own under-developed ability to bring order on our own in our own wisdom. (The Lost World of Adam and Eve, p. 116, 145)

What records that remain do not give a full picture of how much was anciently included in God's temple. For example, Margaret Barker's investigation has uncovered an ancient presence of the Divine Mother who was identified as "Wisdom." She explained that Josiah's reform changed the First Temple by removing, rejecting, and deducting:

Wisdom was eliminated, even though her presence was never forgotten, the heavenly ascent and the vision of God were abandoned, the hosts of heaven, the angels, were declared to be unfit for the chosen people, the ark (and the presence of Yahweh which it represented) was removed, and the role of the high priest was altered in that he was no longer anointed. All of these features of the older cult were to appear in Christianity. (The Great Angel, p. 15)

Later Christianity, like Josiah's reforms, also abandoned these parts of the religion. Joseph Smith never had the opportunity to finish restoring them. How oft would God have gathered people together under the arms of the Holy Order, but mankind has not been willing or even interested (see 3 Nephi 4:9 RE).

When the Powers of Heaven are offended and the spirit is grieved, the Powers withdraw and the Holy Order rites are either not restored or, if restored, come to an end. Cain's ambition could not be accomplished through any degree of unrighteousness. It was doomed from the time the plan was suggested by Satan. Yet Abel was murdered, and a conspiracy to seize power by blood and horror began while Adam was alive. Mankind is no less ambitious today. That impulse to exercise control, dominion, and compulsion persists and can be seen everywhere: in business, churches, governments, and schools.

The reason so little is understood about the Holy Order is because weak men aspire to honors. Once they learn about the Order, they want control over it. Therefore, it is withdrawn...

(I circled one of the footnotes. What I'm reading you is omitting 390 footnotes. But I've circled this one and I'm... Once they learn about the Holy Order they want control over it. "Too often when men learn some great truth and recognize it by the spirit, they then assume that confers upon them some authority or right to act. Nothing could be further from the truth. There[']s] a great gulf between learning and recognizing and authority to act" (footnote 207). People tend to do that. "Oh, my heart burned within me while I heard it, therefore God gave it to me." That didn't happen. It just means that God told you something and you recognized the truth. How you get it is based upon the order of heaven.)

Therefore, it is withdrawn from mortal men from time to time. When not active among men, it only remains present through John the Beloved. John was translated, acting thereafter only as an angelic minister. Because of this, he's not free to openly preside. The Lord explained to Peter concerning John: I will make him as flaming fire and a ministering angel. He shall minister for those who shall be heirs of salvation who dwell on...earth... (Joseph Smith History 13:19 RE). John has ministered only "as a flaming fire and a ministering angel," which circumscribes how and to whom his ministry is extended. He ministers "for those who shall be heirs of salvation who dwell on the earth," or (as Moroni explained by quoting his father):

The office of their ministry is to call men unto repentance, and to fulfill and to do the work of the covenants of the Father which he hath made unto the children of men, to prepare the way among the children of men by declaring the word of Christ unto the chosen vessels of the Lord, that they may bear testimony of him; and by so doing, the Lord...prepareth the way that the residue of men may have faith in Christ, that the holy ghost may have place in their hearts.... (Moroni 7:6 RE, emphasis added)

Okay, yeah, I get what you're saying, but according to my pocket watch...

Is anyone hungry? Yeah... Look, this is not the breaking spot. See that red sheet there? [Holding up his notebook] That's the breaking spot. So, we'll eat and come back and resume this later, and those that have heard enough, you can go do something else. And I don't know how long the movie's gonna be shown to the kids, but you might want to check that out.

Anyway, we haven't really gotten to the important stuff. (There—that'll get you back.)

So, we'll break for dinner, apparently, and resume again at some point.

We've cobbled together a light that reflects, I think, the same sort of motif as the "redneck Rameumptom" (as they've named it). And I can actually see this!

Look, just a couple comments while people are still settling in. In order to talk about the subject I want to talk about, it's necessary to rely upon content in the Book of Abraham. But the Book of Abraham has been under assault by critics for a long time. I was satisfied about the reliability, authenticity, and scriptural value of the Book of Abraham long ago, but after being satisfied I quit buying and reading the exchange that's gone on back and forth. So, as this subject was something that I intended to talk on, I really needed about eight years' worth of material to catch up on the give and take between the arguments that have gone back and forth. So, I had to buy a new "last eight years" library supplements to all of the Book of Abraham: bitching and moaning and defending and parading and... Went and picked up a copy of Ritner's book, that I've referred to...

MAN: Sorry [referring to the light on the podium].

DENVER: Well, that's fine. It's like a lighthouse—none of you in a boat are gonna hit shore with that up here as your beacon.

I didn't know anything except this guy had been interviewed on Mormon Stories... I think he was jointly interviewed by (what does Corbin call himself?)... Radiofree Mormon and John Dehlin did a joint interview with him. So, I had to go buy his book. I went and bought his book, and when I got home I... Used a credit card; I didn't realize how much the infernal thing was. It's a really, really expensive book!

Well, as I got to the end and I read everything (all the way through the back matter), I found out that it's a very limited printing, and I bought the last one that this local book dealer had of the thing. So, I guess I've got a... I marked it all up. I've hemorrhaged all over it. I've interlineated. And it would have been a collector item, and I would have auctioned it off tonight, except I've wrecked it by all my interlineations.

So... But what I've been doing is catching up on the arguments involving the Book of Abraham so that if someone reads this paper or listens to this talk at some point in the future and they see I'm referring to the Book of Abraham, they know that I've not done that without showing the courtesy to the polemics and the apologists for their give and take. I'm not just talking; I've read the stuff, and I've cited in the footnotes, and I'm not going off without having paid attention to the ongoing dialogue.

But as you've already heard, I think the overwhelming majority of the dialogue that has been invested in the give and take in the Book of Abraham is completely off-point and has no value in trying to determine the authenticity of the book. The last one to weigh in is a book that came out last Wednesday, so I had to spend last weekend reading Dan Vogel's book (that I read you a few of the quotes from) in order to let whoever got the last word to actually have my ear in expressing their last word. But if you're interested in the library of material, the footnotes in this talk will reference it, which will be up on my website tomorrow evening. We'll get home and get it up.

Angels, including John, minister to chosen vessels. It's the responsibility of mortal ministers to preach the message. The message must be accepted and acted on for faith in Christ. The Holy Order must be held again by mortals and must be returned voluntarily back to Christ in a second Adam-oni-Ahman. That is the arrangement made before the foundation of the Earth. God gave dominion over the Earth to Adam, and Christ will receive back the right of dominion before His return in glory.

All knowledge can be misused. The more the Holy Order is understood, the more sobering it becomes. Greater knowledge is being employed today to abuse, control, and subjugate people. The Scriptures warn of evils and designs which will exist in the hearts of conspiring men in the last days (T&C 89:2). Any advantage one individual holds over another can be improperly used to subjugate, oppress, and exploit. Therefore, the hidden mysteries that reach into the highest heaven and contemplate the darkest abyss will include knowledge capable of misuse. Mysteries are guarded, cloaked in sacred ritual, confined to a qualified group of trusted and proven initiates.

The Holy Order will return lost knowledge to the Earth. The specifics have been withheld from Scripture, but the scope of that knowledge has been referred to often. Abraham had the records of the first Patriarchs, and he described some of what was included in the sacred texts:

But the records of the Fathers, even the Patriarchs, concerning the right of Priesthood, the Lord, my God, preserved in my own hands. Therefore, a knowledge of the beginning of the creation, [as] also of the planets and...the stars, as they were made known unto the Fathers, have I kept...unto this day....
(Abraham 2:4 RE, emphasis added)

Knowledge to be revealed through the Holy Order will include information about the beginning of this Creation. At the beginning, "The order that God brought focused on people in his image to join with him in the continuing process of bringing order, but more importantly on the ordering of the cosmos as sacred space" (The Lost World of Adam and Eve, p. 150). We disturb this Creation because we are disorderly. We're the opposite of what God intended for us.

...human sin has blocked God's purposes for the whole creation; but God hasn't gone back on his creational purpose, which was and is to [bring] in his creation through human beings, his image-bearers. In his true image-bearer, Jesus the Messiah, he has rescued humans from their sin and death in order to reinscribe his original purposes, which include the extension of sacred space into all [of] creation, until the earth is indeed full of God's knowledge and [the] glory as the waters cover the sea. God will be present in and with his whole creation; the whole creation will be like a glorious extension of the tabernacle in the wilderness or the temple in Jerusalem. (Ibid. pg. 176)

Restoring the Holy Order will add knowledge about the religious significance of the planets and stars. They were ordained as "signs" to establish "seasons." That does not mean times of the year but also means times of dispensations, ministries, and judgments.

The gospel of Christ and the mysteries of His kingdom are vast. The doctrine of Christ is succinct. The entire doctrine of Christ is set out in one paragraph of Third Nephi. Christ was emphatic that His brief statement of His doctrine is solely and exclusively all of it; there can be nothing added to it. He warns us:

Whoso[ever] shall declare more or less than this, and [establish] it for my doctrine, the same cometh of evil and is not built upon my rock, but he buildeth upon a sandy foundation, and the gates of hell standeth open to receive such when the floods come and the winds beat upon them. (3 Nephi 5:9 RE)

But the records of the first Patriarchs handed down to Abraham include the Creation, the discussion of planets and stars, and "greater knowledge." The reason so much more was reserved [revealed] and preserved in the records of the Fathers is because the gospel of Christ includes all truth.

From the Scriptures, it is clear many of those involved with the Holy Order—as well as dispensation heads and prophets—were taught truth far beyond the doctrine of Christ.

Enoch, for example, was given seership by the Lord and through it uncovered hidden things:

And the Lord spoke unto Enoch, and said unto him, Anoint your eyes with clay and wash them, and you shall see. And he did so. And he beheld the spirits that God had created, and he beheld also things which were not visible. And from that point forward came the saying abroad in the land, A seer has the Lord raised up unto his people...

Enoch was shown all eternity by the Lord:

The Lord spoke unto Enoch and told Enoch all the doings of the children of men. Wherefore, Enoch knew and looked upon their wickedness and their misery, and wept, and stretched forth his arms. And he beheld eternity, and his bowels yearned, and all eternity shook. (Genesis 4:3,18 RE, emphasis added)

The Lord showed Moses everything about this world:

And it came to pass that Moses looked and beheld the world upon which he was created. And...Moses beheld the world, and the ends thereof, and all the children of men who are [or] who were created, of the same he greatly marveled and wondered. (Genesis 1:2 RE, emphasis added)

The Brother of Jared saw everything through the ends of the earth:

He shewed unto the brother of Jared all the inhabitants of the earth which had been, and also...that would be. And the Lord withheld them not from his sight, even unto the ends of the earth. For the Lord had said unto him in times before that if he would believe in him, that he could shew unto him all things, it should be shewn unto him. Therefore, the Lord could not withhold anything from him, for he knew that the Lord could shew him all things. (Ether 1:15 RE)

From these few Scriptures, we learn that Enoch, Moses, the Brother of Jared, and Abraham learned and experienced:

- Knowledge about the spirits God created,
- Things not visible to the eye of mankind,
- All the doings of mankind,
- Beholding eternity,
- The creation of this world and the end thereof,
- All the inhabitants of the world past, present, and future, and
- All things.

Others had many "mysteries" revealed to them. Remember that knowledge of the mysteries of godliness is obtained only through obedience to God (T&C 159:31). That's why Abraham's desire to get additional knowledge was so he could receive instructions and keep God's commandments. Obedience earns more knowledge, and more knowledge requires greater obedience. They move together in one eternal round.

In one sense, the religion of the Fathers is based on a direct connection to God. Reduced to one thought, it is that as long as God is speaking directly to a body of people, giving them commandments, they have the most essential element of the religion of the Fathers. If they remain true to that connection, all things can be restored to them.

Commandments given to others belong to them, and only commandments God gives to us belong to us. Joseph Smith explained this matter, after referring to the New Testament:

[A]lthough we cannot claim these promises which were made to the ancients for they are not our property, merely because they were made to the ancient Saints, yet if we are the children of the Most High, and are called with the same calling with which they were called, and embrace the same covenant that they embraced, and are faithful to the testimony of our Lord as they were, we can approach the Father, in the name of Christ as they approached Him, and for ourselves obtain the same promises. These promises, when obtained, if ever by us, will not be because Peter, John, and the other Apostles...walked in the fear of God and had power and faith to prevail and obtain them; but it will be because we, ourselves, have faith and approach God in the name of His Son Jesus Christ, even as they did; and when these promises are obtained, they will be promises directly to us, or they will do us no good. They will be communicated for our benefit, being our own property (through the gift of God), earned by our own diligence in keeping His commandments, and walking uprightly before Him. (Teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith, p. 66, emphasis added)

This is affirmed in our Scriptures:

I admit that by reading the scriptures, of truth, the saints in the days of Paul could learn, beyond the power of contradiction, that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob had the promise of eternal life confirmed to them by an oath of the Lord; but that promise or oath was no assurance to them of their salvation, but they could, by walking in the footsteps and continuing in the faith of their fathers, obtain for themselves an oath for confirmation that they were meet to be partakers of the inheritance with the saints in light.

If the saints in the days of the apostles were privileged to take the ancients for examples, and lay hold of the same promises, and attain to the same exalted privilege of knowing that their names were written in the Lamb's Book of Life and that they were sealed there as a perpetual memorial before the face of the Most High, will not the same faithfulness, the same purity of heart and the same faith bring the same assurance of eternal life, and that in the same manner, to the children of men now in this age of the world?

I have no doubt but that the holy prophets and apostles and saints in ancient days were saved in the kingdom of God; neither do I doubt but that they held converse and communion with him while they were in the flesh, as Paul said to his Corinthian brethren that the Lord Jesus showed himself to above five hundred saints at one time after his resurrection. Job said that he knew that his Redeemer lived and that he should see him in the flesh in the latter days. I may believe that Enoch walked with God and by faith was translated. I may believe that Noah was a perfect man in his generation and also walked with God. I may believe that Abraham communed with God and conversed with angels. I may believe that Isaac obtained a renewal of the covenant made to Abraham by the direct voice of the Lord. I may believe that Jacob conversed with holy angels, and heard the voice of his Maker, that he wrestled with the angel until he prevailed and obtained the blessing. I may believe that Elijah was taken to Heaven in a chariot of fire with fiery horses. I may believe that the saints saw the Lord and conversed with him face to face after his resurrection. I may believe that the Hebrew church came to Mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the Heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels. I may believe that they looked into eternity and saw the Judge of all, and Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant. But will all this purchase an assurance for me, and waft me to the regions of eternal day, and seat me down in the presence of the King of kings with my garments spotless, pure, and white?

Or must I not rather obtain for myself, by my own faith and diligence in keeping the commandments of the Lord, an assurance of salvation for myself? And have I not an equal privilege with the ancient saints? And will not the Lord hear my prayers and listen to my cries as soon as he ever did to theirs, if I come to him in the manner they did? (T&C 99:14-17, emphasis added)

Whatever the status of other believers may be today, there are promises that have been given by God directly to us. There is now more revelation and more commandments than at any other time. Beginning with the "Answer to the Prayer for Covenant" and the accompanying Covenant, God has given new commandments. If they are followed, the promises made to this people will increase in light and truth until the perfect day. We are not reading the promises made by God to other people because we have God's commandments and promises given to us.

The commandments given directly by God include, but are not limited to, the following:

- God's will is to have us love one another, but we lack the ability to respectfully disagree among each other. The Lord compares us to Paul and Peter whose disagreements resulted in jarring and sharp contentions. We have been commanded to do better.
- Wisdom counsels us to align our words with our hearts, but we refuse to take counsel from Wisdom. There have been sharp disputes between us that should have been avoided.
- Satan is a title and means accuser, opponent, and adversary; hence, once he fell, Lucifer became or, in other words, was "called" Satan because he accuses others and opposes the Father. The Lord rebuked Peter and called him Satan because he was wrong in opposing the Father's will, and Peter understood and repented. We sometimes act as Satan: accusing one another, wounding hearts, and causing jarring, contention, and strife through accusations. Rather than loving one another, some have dealt unkindly—as if they were the opponents, accusers, and adversaries. In this, we've been wrong, and the Lord has rebuked us for our error.
- We have the duty to bind the spirit of the accuser (Satan) within us so that we give no heed to accuse others. It's not enough to say we love God; we must also love our fellow man. Nor is it enough to say we love our fellow man while we—as Satan—divide, contend, and dispute against any person who labors on an errand seeking to do God's will.
- We've been warned that even a single soul who stirs up the hearts of others to anger can destroy the peace of the Lord's people. All must equally walk in God's path, not only to profess but to do as professed.
- We've scarred one another by our unkind treatment of each other; we bear the scars on our countenances, from the soles of our feet to the head, and every heart is faint. Our visages have been so marred that our hardness, mistrust, suspicions, resentments, fear, jealousies, and anger toward our fellow man bear outward witness of our inner self; we cannot hide it. When the Lord appears to us, instead of confidence, we feel shame. We fear and withdraw from the Lord because we bear the blood and sins of the treatment of our brothers and sisters. We're commanded to come to our Lord, and He will make sins as scarlet become white as snow and will make us stand boldly before Him, confident of His love.

- We're commanded to forgive one another, to be tender with one another, pursue judgment, bless the oppressed, care for the orphan, and uplift the widow in her need—for the Lord has redeemed us from being orphaned and taken us that we are no longer a widowed people. We're told to rejoice in the Lord and rejoice with our brethren and sisters and to be one.

- We've been commanded to measure our words before giving voice to them and to consider the hearts of others. Although a man may err in understanding concerning many things, if we regard one another with charity, then our brother's error in understanding will not divide us.

- We're commanded to study to learn how to respect our brothers and sisters and to come together by precept, reason, and persuasion, rather than sharply disputing and wrongly condemning each other, causing anger. God warns us to take care how we invoke His name.

- God's cautioned us that a greater work remains yet to be done. His covenant requires that we abide in it (not as in the former time when jarring, jealousy, contention, and backbiting caused anger, broke hearts, and hardened the souls of those claiming to be His saints during Joseph Smith's life), but we're commanded to receive it in spirit, in meekness, and in truth.

- We cannot be at peace with one another if we take offense when none is intended. We're commanded to not judge others except by the rule we want used to weigh ourselves.

- We're to let our pride and our envy and our fears depart from us.

- He's asked us to covenant with Him to cease to do evil and to seek to continually do good.

- God's covenant with us requires we receive the Scriptures approved by the Lord as a standard to govern us in our daily walk in life, for us to accept the obligations established by the Book of Mormon as a covenant, and to use the Scriptures to correct ourselves and to guide our words, thoughts, and deeds.

- God has asked us, by covenant, to seek to become of one heart with those who seek the Lord to establish His righteousness.

- We're commanded to teach our children to honor the Lord and to seek to recover His lost sheep and to teach them of the Lord's ways, to walk in them.

- We've been instructed that tithes of this people are to be used for the poor.

- God instructed us to trust His words and proceed always in faith, believing that with Him all things are possible.

- We've been commanded to stop murmuring and complaining against all who labor, because the Lord is pleased with all those who are grateful and merciful who will have Him to be their God. (See T&C 157 and 158.)

Consider the question posed by the Lord to us: What have you learned? What ought you to have learned? (T&C 176:2,12). The Lord's question is still pending. It seems apparent to me that these questions are designed to make us talk to one another.

There's a gulf between knowledge and wisdom. We may have access to greater knowledge, but we often display very little wisdom. Knowledge can be arrogant. Wisdom is humble. Knowledge inflates our pride, but wisdom cautions us that we are still very far from being godly people.

Great spiritual development by individuals in isolation will never equip the individual to fit into a spiritually developed society. Alone, we seek connection to God. God represents the highest ideal in compassion, acceptance, and kindness. It's easy to make a place for God in our hearts. But other people are not always compassionate, easy to accept, or kind. God is pure, and mankind is not. When called "good" by the rich young man, Christ responded, Why do you call me good? None is good save one, that is God (Luke 10:9 RE). If Christ would not allow Himself to be called "good," then there is little reason to call one another "good."

Individual spiritual development and group spiritual development are two very different challenges. Recent revelations focus on the development of a group. Everything points to God's desire to have His people turn to Him and live in harmony with one another. It is clear the Lord's objective is Zion and not merely to make us better individuals.

There's a Buddhist story about an enlightened monk who lived near a city having difficulties and conflicts. People from the town asked the monk to come into town to guide them so they could resolve their conflicts, but he refused. He preferred living alone and meditating. The town sent more representatives to ask again, and the monk refused again. Finally, a great crowd of people went to ask the monk for his help because, without it, they said they could never reach peace. At last, he relented. On the way back to town, in the joyful crowd, an old woman stumbled into the monk, pushing him to the ground. This made him very angry.

It's far easier for a hermit to live in quiet meditation than to live in harmony in a community. We are called into a dispensation with more expected than individual salvation and enlightenment. For the salvation of souls today, the primary focus of God's religion is to gather a community. God's purpose for the end times is focused on making people of one heart and one mind.

God's spirit is withdrawing from the world. In the Covenant of Christ Conference in September 3rd, 2017, we were told:

Those who have entered faithfully into [this] covenant this day are going to notice some things. The spirit of God is withdrawing from the world. Men are increasingly more angry without good cause. The hearts of men are waxing cold. There is increasing anger and resentment of gentiles. In political terms, it's rejection of white privilege.

Language of [scripture] gives a description of the events now underway and calls it the end of the times of the gentiles. This process with the spirit withdrawing, will end on this continent, as it did with two prior civilizations in fratricidal and genocidal warfare. For the rest of the world, it will be as in the days of Noah in which, as that light becomes eclipsed, the coldness of men's [heart] is going to result in a constant scene of violence and bloodshed. The wicked will destroy the wicked.

The covenant, if it is kept, will prevent you from losing light and warmth of heart as the spirit now steadily recedes from the world. The time will come when you will be astonished at the gulf between the light and truth you will comprehend and the darkness of mind of the world. ("Closing Remarks," Covenant of Christ Conference, September 3, 2017, p. 1, emphasis added)

We have seen astonishing increases since September 3rd, 2017 of darkness, lies, deceit, and conflict. Lies imprison people. The chain Enoch saw that Satan had over the world was constructed of lies. The "chains of darkness" that hold men in prison after death are also lies. Today those chains of darkness hold fast many people, and their numbers are growing. Woe unto them that call evil good and good evil, that put darkness for light and light for darkness, that put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter (Isaiah 1:17 RE). Confusion over what is light and what is dark and the difference between sweet and bitter comes from widespread lies being accepted as truth.

As the light of Heaven withdraws, it is all the more important for us to keep it within us. But we also have many "thinking errors." Recent revelations from God make it clear we are being challenged to be fit to live in peace with one another. The Scriptures tell us we should see God in our fellow man.

On His way to Jerusalem to be sacrificed, Jesus was asked by a rich young man, Which is the first commandment of all? And Jesus answered him, The first of all the commandments is: Listen, and hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord. And you shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind, and with all your strength. This is the first commandment. And the second is like [it]: You shall love your neighbor as yourself. There is no other commandment greater than these. (Mark 5:44 RE, emphasis added)

Why would love of your neighbor as yourself be compared to the commandment to love God with all your heart, soul, might, and mind? It is because God is in every person you will ever meet. All life is a gift from God. God loans us the breath of life:

God who has created you, and has kept and preserved you, and has caused that ye should rejoice, and has granted [unto you] that [you] should live in peace [with one] another — ...ye should serve him who has created you from the beginning, and art preserving you from day to day by lending you breath that ye may live, and move, and do according to your own will, ...even supporting you from one moment to another.... (Mosiah 1:8 RE)

God sustains us all from moment to moment. Through His power, we live and move. If God is sustaining every living person from one moment to another, then God is within all of us. If He loves them enough to support them, lend them breath, give them power to move and do according to their will, sustaining their life continuously, how can we hate them?

There are sincere people who pray and ask God questions, and they get answers. Often the answers given to one might be different than the answer given to another. Both believe they have intelligence from God and desire to stay true to the answer they've received. In these circumstances, are conflicts inevitable? Well, of course. But does that mean that harmony is impossible? Of course not.

This conflict is like another Buddhist story about a monk who accompanied a great teacher to learn how to help others. Throughout the day, the monk listened to the teacher as he gave answers to those who came for help. At the end of the day, the monk was disappointed and told the teacher his answers contradicted one another. The teacher had told one to do the opposite of what another was told. It made no sense to the monk. The teacher replied that there is only one road, but those who depart to the left must be guided back to the right. And those who departed to the right must be guided back to the left. The road does not change, but finding [it] after it has been lost depends on where the individual has wandered away.

What does it mean for us when there is a contradiction between God's answer to one prayerful soul and His answer to another prayerful soul? If discussion is warranted, it means that by talking through their disagreements, they may both be guided back to the one path to be followed. Sometimes that discussion will take time, experience, and careful, solemn thoughts. Even if the communicating takes a great while, why rush through a process that is designed to bring greater understanding? What if conversation does not produce an agreement? There's nothing wrong with tabling a discussion that has not reached everyone's approval and then resuming the discussion another day. Why the rush?

In legal disputes, there's a conflict resolution process called "mediation." Mediation involves a third-party mediator who helps the parties reach a settlement. The overwhelming majority of mediated cases reach settlement. However, I've seen many cases fail to reach a resolution, and the parties walk away from the mediation table still in conflict. But later, after the parties have taken time to reflect on the mediation, most of those unresolved cases will eventually settle as well.

I think the "Answer to the Prayer for Covenant" is the Lord pleading with us to take the time to talk through our differences. There is nothing in those words of counsel that require us to quickly resolve matters. Quite the opposite. The "Answer" is filled with instruction to us about the process, leaving the result to be obtained eventually—through a respectful process, no matter how much time may be needed. To the extent the Lord cares about time at all, He warns us against "haste."

The "recommended means" to reach harmony are *persuasion, by long-suffering, by gentleness and meekness, and by love unfeigned, by kindness and pure knowledge, which shall greatly enlarge the soul; without hypocrisy and without guile... (T&C 139:6, emphasis added).

During the Scriptures project, there were many conflicts and differences to resolve. These conflict's resolutions delayed the project far beyond what any of us thought it would take. When the two independent groups were first combined, both groups thought their respective project was complete (or nearly so). But it was quickly apparent that the projects differed, and there were issues to resolve. It took months, and when all believed the end was approaching again, new source materials and new research was uncovered that required more than half of the project to begin again.

More than a year after expected conclusion, the project continued. At one point, I sent an email expressing my view of how I hoped to conduct myself:

I would rather submit to the decision of the group than insist that my view be followed. For me, harmony between brethren is more important than getting what I think best to be followed. I believe harmony can lead to much greater things than can merely enforcement of even a correct view. I know how difficult it is to have a correct view, because of how often [I've] been corrected by the Lord. Sometimes [I'm] humiliated by my foolishness when the Lord reproves me. Humiliation can lead to humility, but my experience is that the humiliation is accompanied by shame, whereas humility can proceed with a clear conscience.

My experience with others leads me to conclude that if we can have one heart first, eventually we can likewise come to have one mind. But if we insist on having one mind at the outset, we may never obtain one heart together. (Teachings and Commandments—Epigraph, emphasis added)

A friend sent me a Facebook rant from a man who wants to teach others and very much demands attention and respect. His angry rant ended by telling those who were insufficiently respectful of his great writings that they were "hypocrites and pollutions, and unless you fall down before God in humility, you will suffer horrors you can't imagine. ...The greater the reasons you resist, the more you will be damned." The approach reminded me of the enlightened hermit monk who became angry once jostled. Zion cannot be established in solitary meditation. It requires a community. And community requires us to see God in one another. It requires we listen to and understand one another. That cannot happen if we do not talk with each other about even difficult subjects and serious disagreements. The sharper the disagreement, the more we need to learn! As the Lord explained, There have been sharp disputes between you that should have been avoided. I speak these words to reprove you that you may learn, not to upbraid you so that you mourn. I want my people to have understanding (T&C 157:3, emphasis added). Those may be some of the greatest words God has ever condescended to give to any people, at any time—and we treat them as if they're a rebuke for someone else and not ourselves, as if we needn't heed them.

Also, we've been taught:

Study to learn how to respect your brothers and sisters and to come together by precept, reason, and persuasion, rather than sharply disputing and wrongly condemning each other, causing anger. Take care how you invoke my name. Mankind has been controlled by the adversary through anger and jealousy, which has led to bloodshed and the misery of many souls. Even strong disagreements should not provoke anger, nor to invoke my name in vain as if I had part in your every dispute. Pray together in humility and together meekly present your dispute to me, and if you are contrite before me, I will tell you my part. (Ibid. vs. 54)

From the foregoing, it is clear that the Lord has, in His mercy, chosen to speak again. God has renewed His covenant and provided commandments. But His instructions and commandments are to guide a community into godly harmony. It is only possible to rise up and become that community by following the instructions of God.

I'm ashamed of every conflict I've caused. I regret any discourtesy I've shown to another. But I do not recall ever demanding someone submit to me. At every turn, I have intended only to persuade and invite, not demand and insist. I am no one's commander, president, or church authority. You cannot make me anything more than your equal, because I refuse to rise above anyone else. We are all fellow-servants (and often, unprofitable ones, at that).

It is important to God that the Book of Mormon has been accepted as a covenant. It's a bond between God and man. God has made for Himself a people and "numbered us among the House of Israel" (see T&C 156:15,48; 158:10, emphasis added). But remember that Israel has a long history of rebellion, disobedience, and rejection. Those who remain faithful and obedient to God are those who will vindicate His prophecies, covenants, and promises. Among other things, the people who keep His covenant will be called upon to build the tabernacle where He will take up His abode on Earth in the New Jerusalem. On July 14, 2017, He gave this revelation:

Whenever I have people who are mine, I command them to build a house, a holy habitation, a sacred place where my presence can dwell or where the Holy Spirit of Promise can minister, because it is in such a place that it has been ordained to recover you, establish by my word and my oath your marriages, and endow my people with knowledge from on high that will unfold to you the mysteries of godliness, instruct you in my ways, that you may walk in my path. And all the outcasts of Israel will I gather to my house, and the jealousy of Ephraim and Judah will end; Ephraim will not envy Judah and Judah will not provoke Ephraim. (T&C 157:41, emphasis added)

Knowledge that will unfold the mysteries of godliness and instruct in God's path is designed to be embedded in the House of God. At this point, the prophecy waiting to be fulfilled states:

...when the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob, and he will teach us of his ways and we will walk in his paths. For out of Zion shall go forth the law.... (Isaiah 1:5 RE)

The first Fathers had teachings and beliefs that included much more than what has been preserved from Joseph's day. We should expect greater information to be passed along to us. But knowledge without the tempering presence of wisdom will prove to be dangerous. Aspiring and ambitious men are unwise. They cannot be trusted.

There are those who think circumcision originated with Abraham through his covenant with God. That was a restoration of circumcision, not the origination of it. In the beginning, when a son of Adam and a daughter of Eve covenanted to marry, the son of Adam shed blood by circumcision in order to seal the marriage covenant. Once healed, the marriage was consummated, at which point the virgin daughter of Eve shed blood to complete the sealing of the marriage covenant. Inasmuch as Abraham and Sarah had been married for many years prior to the covenant, it was ordained that circumcision for all of Abraham's descendants would take place at the eighth day. Because of the restoration of the covenant—and God adapting it for Abraham and all the faithful who would follow him as their Father—circumcision was expected to be done at birth. This remains an obligation for all the righteous.

The much later Law of Moses perpetuated the Abrahamic practice of circumcision at eight days. Even non-Israelites who wanted to observe the Passover were required to be circumcised to participate in the Paschal meal. Although the Law of Moses is no longer in effect, restoring circumcision through Abraham pre-dates Moses by nearly seven centuries and is still in effect. Fulfilling and ending the Law of Moses did nothing to change the earlier covenant with Abraham and his descendants.

There were other practices known to the first Fathers that have been lost. We should expect to learn the earliest worship was not limited to a "Father in Heaven" but included a Divine Family. I've already addressed this subject in "Our Divine Parents." The first Patriarchs understood there to be a Father, Mother, and a Divine Son who were all recognized as Divine. There was also a Heavenly Council or Divine Counsel who were among a recognized "hosts of heaven" who also held positions of authority.

In addition to a Sabbath day of rest, the first Fathers were given three Divinely appointed religious festivals or holidays (more correctly, "Holy Days") that were to be observed yearly. These were tied to the Creation to remind mankind of God's wisdom and mercy in organizing this world for mankind.

Because of apostasy, numerous other festivals or religious observances have been added by men. For example, the Jews added Hanukkah, Purim, and Yom HaShoah. Christians added Lent, Ash Wednesday, and Christmas (among others). When the original religion returns, the original religious festivals—always centered in a sacred site or temple—will also return.

I mentioned ~~before that Abraham entered Egypt~~ before he entered Egypt, he received a great revelation about the stars, the heavens, events among the pre-existent spirits of mankind, the fall of Satan, and the Creation of this world. This list summarizes part of the knowledge associated with the Holy Order; God wanted the husbandman, shepherd, and High Priest to comprehend:

- Why this Creation was organized,
- Man's position in the cosmos,
- Who the "hosts of heaven" were,
- That there was a cosmic rebellion in the heavens,
- That a cosmic covenant was established that framed the Creation, established conditions for mankind to gain experience, and through which mankind could progress,
- That all things in nature—including the light of the sun, moon, planets, and stars—were purposefully organized and governed by a covenant with God.

Abraham, like Adam (at the beginning) and his descendant, Enoch, were caught up into Heaven and received a tutorial endowment from God. The purpose was simple enough: helping each of them to understand what came before and what comes after this life. This was to help rescue them from death and hell. In a very real sense, the curriculum of the Holy Order is designed to give both a personal and a cosmic context to Christ. The Holy One of Israel is the redeeming Messiah who has been our constant Protector, Example, and Guide from the foundation of Creation.

The Messiah was the central figure in the Creation. The Messiah was the foremost figure opposing the rebellion in the Heavens. The Messiah came to save the Creation by His self-sacrifice. Man's universal death is reversed by their universal resurrection, made possible by the Messiah. And it will be the Messiah who judges mankind and will assign them to various conditions following mortality. It is the Messiah who occupies the central position in all the mysteries of godliness. The members of the Holy Order understood this best and, therefore, were most trusted to preach, teach, testify, minister, and watch over the posterity of Adam (and later, the posterity of Abraham).

The most useful and obedient servants of the Lord have been those who have been exposed to the greatest understanding of His eternal role. The opening paragraph of Abraham's book is a direct statement of the relationship between knowledge and obedience.

From the first generation, the Patriarchs used ritual to convey a great body of information (a theatrical revelation) to initiates. The Book of Abraham itself appears to be a ritual text.

...the book of Abraham, far from being merely a diverting or edifying history, is a discourse on divine authority, which also is the theme of the three facsimiles. The [explanation] to the three plates make it perfectly clear that they are meant as diagrammatic or formulaic aids to an understanding of the subject of priesthood on earth. (Hugh Nibley, An Approach to the Book of Abraham, p. 178)

Enoch's account (now in Genesis of the Restoration Edition of Scriptures) also appears to be a ritual text. Hugh Nibley calls Enoch,

...the great initiate who becomes the great initiator...

He adds:

His is the independent intelligence always seeking further light and knowledge. He is the great observer and recorder of all things in heaven and earth, of which God grants him perfect knowledge. The great learner, he is also the great teacher: Enoch the Initiator into the higher mysteries of...faith and secrets of the universe; Enoch the Scribe, keeper of the records, instructor in the ordinances, aware of all times and places, studying and transmitting the record of the race with intimate concern for all generations to come. He offers the faithful their greatest treasure of knowledge. He is the seer who conveys to men the mind and will of the Lord. (Enoch the Prophet, p. 19, 21)

The religion of the Fathers cannot be adequately conveyed if it is separated from ritualized knowledge. By using symbol, movement, gesture, dress, architecture, sound, orientation, and setting, it is possible to embed light and truth in a way to engage the mind, spirit, and heart of mankind. The temple can be the house in which it is possible to stretch the mind of man both upward and downward by the things presented there. "The temple itself was but a copy of the heavenly temple, the liturgy on earth a shadow of the worship of the angels" (Margaret Barker, The Great Angel, p. 118). It is through covenant-forming ordinances—including rituals—that the power of Godliness has been manifested to mankind. The order of the House of God has and ever will be the same, even after Christ comes, and after the termination of the thousand years it will be the same, and we shall finally roll into the Celestial Kingdom of God and enjoy it forever (T&C 117:4).

When writing from a dungeon in Missouri, Joseph Smith's reflection on what is needed to save souls clarifies the function of a temple:

...because the things of God are of deep import, and time, and experience, and careful and ponderous and solemn thoughts can only find them out. Your mind, O man, if you will lead a soul unto salvation, must stretch as high as the utmost

Heavens, and search into and contemplate the lowest considerations of the darkest abyss, and expand upon the broad considerations of eternal expanse. You must commune with God. ...None but fools will trifle with the souls of men.

How vain and trifling have been our spirits, our conferences, our councils, our meetings, our private as well as public conversations: too low, too mean, too vulgar, too condescending for the dignified characters of the called and chosen of God, according to the purposes of his will from before the foundation of the world, to hold the keys of the [mystery] of those things that have been kept hid from the foundation until now, of which some have tasted a little, and which many of them are to be poured [out] from Heaven upon the heads of babes, yea, the weak, obscure, and despicable ones of this earth. (T&C 138:18-19)

Accordingly, there is always going to be a temple when the Holy Order is present in its fullest manifestation. Abraham also is directly associated with temple ritual. As Nibley explained, "There is a wealth of tradition now being zealously studied to show that the temple ordinances really go back to the beginning, as Joseph Smith declared. The four names associated with the tradition are those of Adam, Enoch, Abraham, and Elijah" (Temple and Cosmos, p. 78).

To return a complete Restoration, a temple will be required. As the Lord revealed to Joseph, a temple is always required of God's people:

For your oracles in your most holy places wherein you receive conversations, and your statutes and judgments [in]...beginning of the revelations and foundation of Zion, and for the glory, and honor, and endowment of all her municipals, are ordained by the ordinance of my holy house, which my people are always commanded to build unto my holy name. (T&C 141:12)

The required temple in Nauvoo was not built. The fullness was not restored during Joseph Smith's lifetime. Instead of blessings, the saints were cursed. Not only did the January 1841 revelation warn of cursings—including forcible expulsion from Nauvoo—but 22 months following that revelation (in an editorial on October 1, 1842), Joseph Smith pled for renewed focus on the temple. He wrote:

Perhaps [we've] said enough on this subject, but we feel the importance of it and therefore speak plainly. It is for you, brethren, to say whether the work shall stand or progress; one thing is certain, that unless that is done all our efforts to aggrandize or enrich ourselves will be vain and futile. We may build splendid houses but we shall not inhabit them; we may cultivate farms but we shall not enjoy them; we may plant orchards, or vineyards, but we shall not eat the fruit of them. The word of the Lord is build my house, and until that command is fulfilled we stand responsible to the great Jehovah for the fulfilment of it, and if [it is] not done in due time we may have to share the same fate that we have heretofore done in Missouri. (JSP, Documents, Volume 11, p. 127)

Joseph's warning did not inspire the saints. Their neglect and disobedience changed the warning into prophecy. They suffered the same fate as before in Missouri, even though the Lord wanted (and expected) better of them. There's no reason to repeat their failure, because the Lord does not reward the disobedient. He offers blessings, and it is up to His people to receive them through obedience. But if His offer is rejected, there are no secured promises.

In the "Answer to Prayer for Covenant," the Lord assures us that if we are faithful, we will be given His temple:

I will visit my house, which the remnant of my people shall build, and I will dwell therein, to be among you, and no one will need...say, Know ye the Lord, for you [shall all] know me, from the least to the greatest. I will teach you things that have been hidden from the foundation of the world and your understanding will reach unto Heaven. (T&C 158:15-16)

The first and most complete religion belonged to Adam and Eve. They lived with God, and after being cast out, they retained a memory of living in God's presence. The first Fathers were taught they could talk with God, receive answers from Him, and return to His presence. The experience of Enoch—seven generations after Adam—records that direct contact between mankind and God was part of the true religion. After the fall of mankind, the process of the ascent of man into Heaven to commune with God has remained the heart of the religion. That process will reverse, and contact between mankind and God at the end will involve the descent of God from Heaven to visit His tabernacle:

And Enoch beheld the Son of Man ascend up unto the Father, and he called unto the Lord, saying, Will you not come again upon the earth? For inasmuch as you are God, and I know you, and you have sworn unto me and commanded me that I should ask in the name of your Only Begotten, you have made me, and given unto me a right to your throne, and not of myself, but through your own grace. Wherefore, I ask you if you will not come again on the earth. And the Lord said unto Enoch, As I live, even so will I come in the last days, in the days of wickedness and vengeance, to fulfill the oath which I have made unto you concerning the children of Noah. And the day shall come that the earth shall rest. But before that day, the heavens shall be darkened, and a veil of darkness shall cover the earth; and the heavens shall shake, and also the earth. And great tribulations shall be among the children of men, but my people will I preserve. And righteousness will I send down out of Heaven. Truth will I send forth out of the earth to bear testimony of [mine] Only Begotten, his resurrection from the dead, yea, and also the resurrection of all men. And righteousness and truth will I cause to sweep the earth as with a flood, to gather out [mine] own elect from the four quarters of the earth unto a place which I shall prepare, a holy city, that my people may gird up their loins and be looking forth for the time of my coming. For there shall be my tabernacle, and it shall be called Zion, a New Jerusalem. And the Lord said unto Enoch, Then shall you and...your city meet them there, and we will receive them into our bosom. And they shall see us, and we will fall upon their necks, and they shall fall upon our necks, and we will kiss each other; and there shall be my abode. (Genesis 4:22 RE, emphasis added)

So that there are no false assumptions, the Scriptures explain that God's covenant with Enoch includes an actual temple to be built today. And the Lord has reiterated in His Covenant: I will come to my tabernacle and dwell with my people in Zion, and none will overtake it (T&C 157:64, emphasis added).

The religion of the Fathers involved direct communion, contact, and connection between mankind and God. The Holy Order is an important part of the return of that direct association. The original religion of the Patriarchs enabled the faithful to hear directly from the Lord His promise of eternal life. God would seal them by covenant into His Heavenly Family. We can, if faithful, obtain all that the original Fathers received from God at the beginning:

What I, the Lord, have spoken, I have spoken, and I excuse not myself. And though the heaven[s] and the earth pass away, my word shall not pass away, but shall all be fulfilled, whether by my own voice or by the voice of my servants [it's] the same. For behold and lo, the Lord is God and the spirit bears record, and the record is true, and the truth abides for ever and ever. Amen. (T&C 54:7)

As a servant of God, I say with His authority that these promises are true, and He intends to fulfill them for His covenant people Israel. In the beginning, mankind was placed in a family. The first commandment to Father Adam and Mother Eve was to multiply and replenish the Earth. The first man and woman were married. Their union produced the family of mankind. Every soul born into this Creation came from parents and were all intended to be in a family.

The plan of salvation is covenantal and familial. The government of God is a family. If a family is established by covenant with God, it will be the only order that can survive death. In a very real sense, the salvation of mankind now comes only through the family of Abraham. The God of Abraham and of Isaac and of Jacob covenanted with these three successive generations that they would stand at the head of all who would be saved after them. The God of Israel requires some part of mankind—however small—to be sealed into that line or be utterly wasted at His coming.

God has explained in Scripture how He intends to identify covenant Israel in the last days. After the death of King Solomon, Israel divided into two kingdoms:

- The first was the Northern Kingdom. After the division, they were sometimes called "Ephraim" or the "Ten Tribes" or "Israel" (in the Old Covenants).
- The second was the Southern Kingdom, called "Judah" and, later, "the Jews."

The Northern Kingdom was conquered, taken captive, and removed from their land by Assyria in 722 BC. When freed by Assyria years later, they crossed the Euphrates River and disappeared from our records into a far land. They were only lost to our limited record of history.

The Southern Kingdom was conquered in 598 BC by Babylon, taken captive, and removed from their land. When Cyrus allowed their return in 538 BC, only a remnant returned.

Because of these two great exiles, the Ten Tribes were scattered and lost to our history, and the returning Jews were reduced to a small remnant of their original population. Today's Jews descended from that small remnant. The greater part of Israelite blood is in the Middle East. These descendants of the exiled Israelites remained, intermarried, and today are among the ancestors of Iranians, Iraqis, Syrians, Turks, Jordanians, and Arabians. Israelites were also scattered into northern Europe and Asia among Europeans, Russians, and Scandinavians. As God promised to Abraham: Over the centuries, intermarriage and migrations has sent his Israelite descendants into "all nations." Today, almost all Israelite blood runs through the veins of people regarded as Gentiles because, after being scattered, they assimilated and lost their original identity.

Today's Jews are only a tiny fraction of the original Israelites. Their history has been marked by continual persecution. Their perseverance has been heroic. They are a people of destiny and prophecy. However, many of the prophecies concerning Israel do not involve the Jews. In addition, Jews do not know the record of the Nephites. They have not been taught the prophecies of Joseph Smith. They are unaware of the covenant God renewed in 2017. Accordingly, many prophecies are unknown to and will not be fulfilled through the Jews.

It will only be through Israel that we can be sealed by a covenant with God to Heavenly Parents through the Fathers. Salvation is still through Israel. The question is: Where are we to find the prophesied latter-day Israel now?

The Book of Mormon relates how religious identities are changed by God. Jacob, the brother of Nephi, prophesied that the gentiles shall be blessed and numbered among the house of Israel (2 Nephi 7:4 RE). His brother prophesied: As many of the gentiles as will repent are the covenant people of the Lord... (2 Nephi 12:11 RE, emphasis added). Therefore, God promised to number Gentiles as people of Israel by covenant. That promise was realized in 2017 when He ordained a covenant for the Gentiles to re-establish them as His people.

The Jews are still a remnant of covenant people. However, they can forfeit their status if they reject the covenant offered by the Lord in 2017: As many of the Jews as will not repent shall be cast off. For the Lord covenanteth with none save it be with them that repent and believe in his Son, who is the Holy One of Israel (Ibid.).

How we respond to God affects our covenant status. When the resurrected Messiah visited the branch of Israel in the Americas, He quoted His Father about future covenantal realignment of identities. Covenant-status is now based on how individuals respond to the Holy One of Israel. But if the gentiles will repent and return unto me, saith the Father, behold, they shall be numbered among my people, O house of Israel (3 Nephi 7:6 RE, emphasis added).

The Messiah explained the process for a Gentile change of their identity:

The gentiles, if they will not harden their hearts, that they may repent, and come unto me, and be baptized in my name, and know of the true points of my doctrine, that they may be numbered among my people, O house of Israel — and when these things [shall] come to pass, that thy seed shall begin to know these things, it shall be a sign unto them that they may know...the work of the Father hath already commenced unto the fulfilling of the covenant which he hath made unto the people who are...the house of Israel. (3 Nephi 9:11 RE, emphasis added)

The Messiah quoted a prophecy from Isaiah to confirm it was always God's plan to change Gentiles into Israelites:

And then shall that which is written come to pass: Sing, O barren, thou that didst not bear; break forth into singing and cry aloud, thou that didst not travail with child; for more are the children of the desolate than the children of the married wife [Children of the desolate are the Gentiles; the married wife was Israel] saith the Lord. Enlarge the place of thy tent and let them stretch forth the curtains of thy habitations; spare not, lengthen thy cords and strengthen thy stakes, for thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the left, and thy seed shall inherit the gentiles and make the desolate cities to be inhabited. (3 Nephi 10:2, quoting from Isaiah 19:4, both RE, emphasis added)

As Moroni finished his father's abridged record, he added his own prophecy of the last-days' New Jerusalem to be built on the American continent. The occupants of that holy city are described in his prophecy: And then cometh the New Jerusalem; and blessed are they who [shall] dwell therein, for it is they whose garments are white through the blood of the Lamb; and they are they who are numbered among the remnant of the seed of Joseph, who were of the house of Israel (Ether 6:3 RE, emphasis added). "Numbered among." Numbered among: Covenantal.

The New Jerusalem will be built by covenant Israel. The group whom the Lord regards as His Israel is covenant-dependent. But a covenant must be kept.

There are two identifiable remnants of previous covenant people. One group is Native Americans who descend biologically from the Israelite-Nephite covenant people. The other is the Jews. Both are biologically connected to Israel, but they will be "cast off" if they reject the covenant now offered by God. And Gentiles may or may not be biologically connected to Israel but are numbered with Israel if they accept the covenant.

The New Jerusalem is to be built by a remnant of Israel, or to be more precise, it will be built by a remnant the Lord regards as covenant Israel. The Lord's "Answer to the Prayer for Covenant" accepted a body of believing Gentiles as His people of Israel. God's promises and prophecies about Israel in the last days began to be fulfilled in 2017 when the covenant He offered was accepted. The Lord said to those people:

I will number you among the remnant of Jacob, no longer outcasts, and you will inherit the promises of Israel. You shall be my people and I will be your God, and the sword will not devour you. And [to] those who will receive [more will] be given, until they know the mysteries of God in full. ...I have redeemed you from being orphaned and taken you that you are no longer a widowed people. (T&C 157:50, emphasis added)*

The Gentiles who accepted the Lord's Covenant have been promised that they:

...are now numbered with my people who are of the house of Israel...

God's Answer goes on to assure covenant Israel:

And I, the Lord your God, will be with you and will never forsake you, and I will lead you in the path which will bring peace to you in the troubling season now fast approaching.

I will raise you up and protect you, abide with you, and gather you in due time, and this shall be a land of promise to you as your inheritance from me.

The earth will yield its increase, and you will flourish upon the mountains and upon the hills, and the wicked will not come against you because the fear of the Lord will be with you.

I will visit my house, which the remnant of my people shall build, and I will dwell therein, to be among you, and no one will need...say, Know ye the Lord, for you [shall all] know me, from the least to the greatest.

I will teach you things that have been hidden from the foundation of the world and your understanding will reach unto Heaven.

And you shall be called the children of the Most High God, and I will preserve you against the harvest.

And the angels sent to harvest the world will gather the wicked into bundles to be burned, but will pass over you as my peculiar treasure... (T&C 158:10,12-18, emphasis added)

...a second literal Passover.

The Lord's "strange act" is approaching completion. The promises made to the Fathers are being vindicated. The Restoration has recommenced, and if we're faithful, it will not be paused or interrupted again. Although Israel's numbers are few, there have never been great numbers willing to sacrifice everything for God. One requirement for faith has always been the same: A religion that does not require the sacrifice of all things never has power sufficient to produce the faith necessary unto life and salvation (Lectures on Faith 6:7 RE). The Lord has said this about our day: I tell you that [I] will come, and when [I do] come, [I] will avenge my saints speedily. Nevertheless, when the Son of Man comes, shall [I] find faith on the earth? (Luke 10:6 RE).

There are two groups God has (or will) covenant to preserve against the coming harvest.

- The first are those who made and keep the covenant the Lord offered in 2017. It changed all those who accepted it into covenant Israel. They have the right to inherit this land and will be preserved. As stated in His "Answer to Prayer for Covenant": And the angels sent to harvest the world will gather the wicked into bundles to be burned, but will pass over you as my peculiar treasure (T&C 158:18).
- The second are those who will become part of the Holy Order and receive and practice the religion of the Fathers. God alone will decide how many and who will be invited into that order. We have no control over it. We have no right to decide who is worthy or unworthy to receive it. It is entirely the Lord's choice because we are rarely able to determine other people's hearts. The Lord told Joseph Smith bluntly that he was unable to tell the righteous from the wicked. We are in no better position than was Joseph. Therefore, we should leave it with the Lord to determine whether or not to invite men and women and, if so, who and how many. The Holy Order is as much—or more—a burden as a blessing.

As Hyrum Smith explained, God imposes restrictions:

For the mysteries of God are not given to all men; and [to] those to whom they are given they are placed under restrictions to impart only such as God will command them, and the residue is to be kept in a faithful breast, otherwise he will be brought under condemnation. By this God will prove his faithful servants, who will be called and numbered with the chosen. (T&C 152:2)

The Egyptian imitation of the Patriarchal religion kept hidden the most important parts of their religion away from public disclosure. Hugh Nibley explained:

Bleeker duly notes that "certain parts of temples were inaccessible to ordinary people" and that "the Egyptian temple was not meant to let the masses of the people participate in the religious services." (The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri, p. 86, citing CJ Bleeker)

This was because:

The rites, "revealed to men by Osiris, the first mortal to be resurrected," were nothing less than the "Great Secret" of how mortals may become gods, taught in the temple "the place of the great secret." (Ibid. p. 88, citing A Moret)

Margaret Barker explained the Christian tradition of restricting information available even to the faithful. She likened the early Christian practice of concealing some truths from believers by referring to Origen's Homily 5 on Numbers, explaining:

...the secrets of the temple which were guarded by the priests. Commenting on Numbers 4, the instructions for transporting the tabernacle through the desert, he emphasized that the family of Kohath were only permitted to carry the sacred objects but were not permitted to see what was in the holy place; then they had to cover the sacred objects with veils before handling them to others, who were only permitted to carry them. The mysteries of the Church were similar.... (The Great High Priest, pp.76-77)

Clement of Rome recorded that Peter quoted an unwritten teaching of Christ that admonished: "Keep the mysteries/secrets for me and the sons of my house" (Clementine Homilies 19:20). The resurrected Messiah taught His closest peers things that were not told to other believers.

Knowing God's plans does not always produce immediate joy. Solomon made this comment after a life of learning: In much wisdom is much grief; and he that increases knowledge increases sorrow (Ecclesiastes 1:3 RE). We should not be surprised to learn that initiation into God's mysteries can be troubling, disquieting, and even a burden.

If asked to carry a burden by God, do it willingly. If not asked, do not envy. Remember Alma's statement: Behold, I am a man, and do sin in my wish, for I ought to be content with the things which the Lord hath allotted unto me (Alma 15:12 RE). It is our common enemy who stirs us up to jealousy and envy rather than patience and meekness. Great works of God fail because mankind will not wait on the Lord.

Behold, there are many called, but few are chosen, and why are they not chosen? Because their hearts are [so set] upon the things of this world, and aspire to the honors of men, that they do not learn this one lesson — that the rights of the Priesthood are inseparably connected with the Powers of Heaven and that the Powers of Heaven cannot be controlled nor handled, only upon the principles of righteousness. ...when we undertake to cover our sins or...gratify our pride, our vain ambition, or to exercise control, or dominion, or compulsion, upon the souls of the children of men in any degree of unrighteousness, behold, the Heavens withdraw themselves, the spirit of the Lord is grieved, and when it is withdrawn, Amen to the priesthood or the authority of that man. (T&C 139:5, emphasis added)

The more God gives, the greater the peril. Weaknesses of appetites, ambitions, passions, and covetousness is akin to trying to navigate through a narrow pass, guarded by a great beast, pitiless and cruel, that destroys all those whose zeal and impatience brings them into the reach of the beast (see T&C 163). God has provided to us guidance on how to reach Zion. It requires self-discipline and meekness to follow the Lord rather than racing ahead of Him to destruction.

Our first Fathers experienced visions, ascended into Heaven, obtained promises of exaltation, and were transformed by their experiences from men into angels of God. Joseph Smith attempted to bring this back as part of the Restoration. Margaret Barker has written about the use of the term "angel" anciently to identify those who had encountered God's presence. She also explains a Dead Sea Scroll text foretelling a return of that religion: "The Qumran Melchizedek text has a possible reading about people in the last days whose teachers have been kept hidden and secret; perhaps they have been preserving the older ways" (The Great High Priest, p. 79). The return of that religion will more likely be through a last-days' restoration rather than through a preservation. But she is correct to anticipate its return.

The Book of Mormon has account after account of prophets receiving an audience with God the Father and His Only Begotten Son. This is the older, heavenly ascent religion that began with Adam in the Garden.

Joseph was called to become a minister of salvation when he saw the heavens open. He taught the idea of direct association with Christ as the promised Second Comforter during a visit to Ramus, Illinois on April 2nd, 1843. After quoting Christ's promises to not leave His followers comfortless because He and His Father would come to them and take up their abode with them, Joseph explained, "Now what is this other Comforter? It is no more nor less than the Lord Jesus Christ himself... When any man obtains this last Comforter he will have the personage of Jesus Christ to attend him or [to] appear unto him from time to time" (TPJS, pp. 150-151, emphasis added). The appearing of the Father and the Son, in that verse, is a personal appearance; and the idea that the Father and...Son dwell in a man's heart is an old sectarian notion, and is false (LDS D&C 130:3; originally found in JSP, Journals, Volume 2, pp. 323-6, emphasis added). This appearing of the Father and the Son began with Adam and was intended to continue in every generation.

Although the teaching of Christ as the Second Comforter was taught by Joseph Smith and believed by LDS Mormons, it is now one of the teachings that has dwindled from LDS teaching. In a Boise LDS meeting, church apostle Dallin Oaks denounced the teaching of mortals needing to see the Lord as "a tactic of the adversary" ("Boise Rescue," June 13, 2015). Following that, the LDS Church removed a footnote from their King James Version John 14:16, which previously referred to Jesus Christ and replaced it with a reference to the "Holy Ghost." At the time I wrote the book, The Second Comforter: Conversing with the Lord Through the Veil, in 2006, the text explained orthodox LDS belief. Since then, however, that sect has abandoned the teaching. If that book were written today by a faithful member of that church, it would have to be revised to reflect the church's changed view. By leaving the text unchanged, it provides a current example of continuing dwindling in unbelief. Changing belief into unbelief happens very quickly. The Second Comforter: Conversing with the Lord Through the Veil was published in 2006, and the doctrine was denounced as a "tactic of the adversary" by an LDS apostle in an official church meeting in 2015—only nine years later.

Joseph Smith's mission was to recover and restore. He may have seemed every bit an innovator and revolutionary, but the truth is that he was the greatest religious reactionary since Jesus Christ. The recovery through Joseph ended with his and Hyrum's murder, after which dwindling began. Dwindling in unbelief continued until a group repented and the Lord removed His condemnation in 2017. Now we hope to continue faithful. Christ commanded in the Sermon on the Mount: Wherefore, seek not the things of this world, but [first seek] to build up the kingdom of God and to establish his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you (Matthew 3:39 RE).

There is a chapter in a Hugh Nibley book, Temple and Cosmos, entitled "One Eternal Round: The Hermetic Tradition." That chapter goes from page 379 through 433, and it is worth reading in its entirety. However, I am going to lift a few quotes from his explanation of history that should seem familiar:

In each dispensation the world went bad while the prophets united in futile protest, as in the days of Samuel, Hezekiah, Isaiah, and Jeremiah. In the powerful phrase of Ether, "the prophets mourned and withdrew from among the people." ...When not preaching it was their custom to keep a low profile, or simply to depart from the scene in the time-honored manner of the Rechabites, a pattern we find repeated over and over again in the Book of Mormon and vividly depicted in the Dead Sea Scrolls. The holy outcasts would form with their followers a community of saints, a church, waiting and working for Zion. Zion itself is a model of such a retreat from the world: "And from thence went forth the saying, ZION IS FLED." In their retreat the righteous refugees take particular pains to preserve the sacred records—we think of Moses, of John, of Ether, of Moroni, etc., preserving studying,...editing the sacred writings by special command.

...the esoteric community was limited to those who understood and could be trusted with the deeper meaning of...doctrine.

...Throughout the Book of Mormon the church itself regularly splits into a worldly society, notably the religion of the Nehors, and others consisting of "a few... humble followers of Christ" to whom special gifts and revelations were given.

...The gospel that the retreating wise men take with them into hiding is guarded as a secret, and that by express command. Why seek it? The jealousy and envy of others can be dangerous; they resent being shut out from something great and mysterious, like boys excluded from the club tree house. They usually take out their wrath and frustration by wrecking the place.

...[True worshipers] are naturally drawn to each other and excite ever-mounting distrust, suspicion, and envy of those excluded from the magic circle. "I was destined to prove a disturber and an annoyer of his (Satan's) kingdom," said Joseph Smith. ...We all know how the public received the prophet Joseph, who was placed in the greatest danger, not from angry outsiders, but from his jealous followers, like the Higbees and the Laws. The ancient Ephesians passed a law banishing [the] great achievers from the city—they were a standing rebuke to the rest: "If they must excel"... "let them go and excel over [someone] else." ... Anything they don't understand makes dogs and people uncomfortable, distrusting, and dangerous.

...We may consider the gospel as the most advanced knowledge on earth, known to but a few because it is accepted and believed by but a few and can be understood by no others.

...In ancient times, apostasy never came by renouncing the gospel but always by corrupting it. No one renounces it today, and so we have...strange paradox of people stoutly proclaiming beliefs and ideas that they have no intention of putting into practice.

...We seek knowledge as our greatest treasure, while the poverty of most of our manuals and handbooks defies description.

...The great apostasy [at] the time of the apostles was not a renouncing of the faith but its corruption and manipulation.

...Everywhere we find myths and legends about how the primal bond that existed between heaven and earth in the Golden Age was broken by the wickedness of men; the great common assemblies ceased and the gods departed. But, as Aristotle notes, some bits of the old knowledge always survived to the next age. ...the three things in the mysteries that Herodotus would never talk about were (1) the grand mystery of the true nature and character of God, which could be known only by revelation, (2) the ordinances by which the mysteries were taught and implemented, and (3) the doctrine or rationale of the whole, including that which explained the rites.

...Philosophy is the road, not the goal, which it never reaches. If you want answers to the questions which it proposes, you can get them in the end only by revelation.

...Joseph Smith points this out: "As Paul said, 'the world by wisdom know(s) not God,' so the world by speculation (is) destitute of revelation." Religion answers by private but nonnegotiable spiritual experiences.

...[Isaac] Newton also talked as Joseph Smith did, that "truth had been given by God [at] the beginning, but had been fragmented and corrupted in the course of time; its traces survived in enigmatic form[s] in these different sorts of literature, but had to be recovered by a sort of dialectic between hard, disciplined inquiry and the ancient sources."

...Joseph explained to the brethren the ordinances and covenants "on to the highest Melchizedek Priesthood, setting forth the order pertaining to the Ancient of Days, and all those plans and principles by which anyone is enabled to secure the fullness of those blessings which have been prepared for the church of the First Born, and come up and abide in the presence of the Eloheim in the eternal worlds."

These few excerpts from Hugh Nibley illustrate the tension between sacred knowledge and dwindling in unbelief. Facsimile No. 2 in the Book of Abraham is an example of a hypocephalus. These first appeared in 400 BC, and most examples reckon from very late in the Ptolemaic era. These documents were developed because the priests realized that sacred knowledge was slipping away and needed to be preserved. One recent study of the hypocephalus concluded these circular funerary documents were "a synthesis of the widespread theological knowledge of the priests... (Tama Mekis, The Hypocephalus: an Ancient Egyptian Funerary Amulet, p. 75).

They were used in only few burials. "It is clear that the use of the hypocephalus never became widespread. Hypocephali remained exclusive pieces of funerary equipment reserved for the clergy and for the members of their [family] who occupied priestly positions in the palleade of the temples" (Ibid. p. 2).

The Facsimile No. 2 was produced at the end of the dwindling Egyptian religion in its final stages, still seeking earnestly to imitate that order established by the fathers in the first generations, in the days of the first Patriarchal reign, even...the reign of Adam... (Abraham 2:3 RE). That facsimile is both a powerful symbol of what the Restoration promised and how it has dwindled. The original hypocephalus was intended to preserve sacred, hidden knowledge for use by the faithful and initiated priestly inner-circle. But it was written at a moment when the priests realized their sacred knowledge was slipping away. They were only able to make a gesture to preserve it by sketching a montage of ancient hieroglyphs to echo their dwindling religion. That document aptly symbolizes Joseph's calling to restore the original, sacred, lost knowledge. But Joseph's efforts have also dwindled for nearly two centuries. The opportunity to recover and practice the original religion still exists if the conditions of God's covenant are met.

God overthrew the Egyptian gods by sending Moses. God overthrew the kingdom of the Jews by sending John as forerunner for His Son, the Messiah. God overthrew the Christian gods by sending Joseph Smith. Last of all, God renewed and restored life to His people in 2017 when He made a new covenant. Every time God acts, He overthrows all other false faiths to reaffirm His own religion. God's goal is always to revive it in its fullness, but that has been rarely achieved. He is actively seeking to restore it again today. This work is His, and it will continue until reaching its fullness. I am a witness of His hand moving, His voice speaking, His will being revealed, and His guidance being provided continually as His work unfolds line upon line, precept upon precept. We will see it succeed if we have the faith and patience to allow it to do so.

"Each of the great dispensations of the gospel has come in a time of world upheaval, when the waywardness of the human race has been matched by...climactic restlessness of the elements" (Hugh Nibley, Abraham in Egypt, p. 164).

The overthrow of Egypt's gods by signs and wonders has inspired people (from ancient Israel to modern writers) with thoughtful reflection. When the signs and plagues are viewed from the Egyptian religious perspective (to the extent we have been able to reconstruct that view), the God of Israel directly challenged the gods of Egypt.

The competing servants [serpents] described in Exodus 4:11 was a direct conflict between the power of Israel's God and the Egyptian magicians. To Egypt, the serpent symbolized Apophis, the force of chaos. For Israelites, the brass serpent was to become a symbolic representation of their future Messiah. A serpent made of brass, raised up on a pole for suffering Israelites to look upon to be healed, foreshadowed the atoning sacrifice of Jesus the Messiah.

Moses' staff became a serpent that ate the Egyptian magicians' serpents. The incident demonstrated the Messiah's power to overthrow destruction and chaos. The event should have taught the Egyptian Pharaoh that Israel's God held all power.

The plagues that began with Egyptian water turning to blood was a direct defeat of the Nile god, Hapi. That first plague and the final destruction both involved authority over water. Gabriel poisoned the Nile at the beginning and completed the overthrow when the waters of the Red Sea returned to drown Pharaoh's horsemen and chariots.

Pharaoh witnessed the defeat of other Egyptian gods. Hathor was overthrown when the Egyptian cattle died, while the Israelite cattle were spared.

Geb was overthrown when dust under Uriel's stewardship was sent to afflict the Egyptian's skin with boils.

Fire was sent by Raphael with burning hail and loud thunder. Later, a pillar of smoke by day and fire by night unmistakably signified Raphael's protection for Israel.

Michael sent the east wind and locusts to destroy the crops of Egypt. Then Michael blocked the light of Ra, overthrowing the Egyptian deity believed to have power over all creation, including the underworld. Michael removed the breath of life from every firstborn in Egypt that finally led to Egypt's surrender. The power of Israel's God and the combined acts of His archangels proved too much to resist.

Egypt believed there were "four sons of Horus." This idea was left from the Patriarchal era and was their apostate belief that roughly corresponded to the four archangels: Michael, Gabriel, Raphael, and Uriel. Yet Egypt chose to fight against these four until they were destroyed. Once Egypt was defeated, for centuries Israel's religion increased, and Egypt's waned. Eventually, this led to the ultimate death of Egypt's religion. So complete was the God of Israel's overthrow of Egypt that the Egyptian language itself was altogether lost until the Rosetta Stone made it possible to reconstruct (in part) the identities of some of Egypt's defeated gods and fragments of Egypt's ancient beliefs.

In another conflict, John the Baptist was ordained by God's angel when eight days old to overthrow the kingdom of the Jews. Joseph Smith explained John the Baptist "wrested the keys, the kingdoms, the power, the glory from the Jews, and by the holy anointing and decree of heaven" (TPJS, p. 276). He went before the Messiah, as foretold by Gabriel to his father, Zechariah. The Messiah's forerunner fulfilled Isaiah's prophecy and testified to the Jews that Jesus was their Messiah. Once the Messiah had been lifted up, God destroyed the Jewish nation and demolished their temple.

After nearly two millennia, Joseph Smith ended the Christian God's silence by declaring the heavens had opened and the Father and Son had appeared to and spoken with him. In the following two decades, ancient Scripture from Adam, Enoch, Melchizedek, Abraham, and Moses were restored, the Bible corrected and expanded, new revelations and commandments provided, and lost authority to act in God's name was returned.

In 2014, God revoked the authority of the LDS hierarchy. In the ensuing few years, that institution has continually stumbled into darkness and disarray, with their temples closed and services altogether interrupted for a year. They have voluntarily altered and abandoned parts of their temple rites. They have voluntarily chosen to destroy the original Salt Lake Temple and replace it with a modern substitute lacking the original symbolism and meaning. They have continually surrendered to popular opinion and increasingly adopted the worldly agenda of accepting sexual confusion, political intolerance, and censorship of opinion. When viewed as trends, it becomes apparent the LDS Church's leadership is rapidly moving in a direction contrary to its original roots.

In contrast, a small group has been repenting and returning to the original roots established by God through Joseph Smith. By 2017, a more accurate version of the Book of Mormon was recovered, the JST Bible revisions were accurately published for the first time, the Lectures on Faith returned to the canon, additional Scriptures added, and a new covenant with God was established. Overthrowing and returning are repeated cycles, and they are underway again today. But the overthrow and the returning are not yet complete. The overthrow will bring a full end to all nations and religions, but the returning will be determined by covenant-keeping.

In the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

Mahalo. Okay, I promise I'll end on time.

There are very few prophets who are given an assignment so important to God's covenants that the prophet is named and his mission foretold in prophecy many generations in advance. You can probably call to mind the name of a number of such persons—for example:

- The Messiah (or Emmanuel).
- A prophet—John—whose mission would include baptizing the Messiah.
- Moses was identified and his mission foretold, both by name and by prophecy beforehand.
- There was a prophet—John—who was destined to write a remainder of the vision that Nephi had received, whose name and whose mission was identified in advance.
- Cyrus—the governor who would allow the Jews to return and to rebuild the temple after the Babylonian captivity—one of the very few who's identified beforehand and his role clarified who was not a prophet but a king.

(What? He can't hear? That's his fault, not mine. I'm just... I'm just doing my job.)

But one of the individuals who's named beforehand was Joseph Smith.

The title that I gave (when pressed for a title) was "Joseph, Joseph, Joseph" (which at the time I gave the title, I said those were purportedly the dying words of Brigham Young—but this has nothing to do with Brigham Young's dying words). Joseph of Egypt gave a prophecy about a descendant of his who would be a choice seer, whose father would be named Joseph. And then the choice seer would be named Joseph like his father. And so, those three Joseph's were what I had reference to.

In the Book of Mormon, as he is giving his final blessing, Father Lehi gives a quote from the brass plates that is an excerpt of what Joseph of Egypt had foretold about his descendant who would be the choice seer. But interestingly, what Lehi does is both paraphrase and quote—and it's incomplete. If you want to get the complete prophecy that Joseph of Egypt gave about the descendant, you have to go to the Joseph Smith Translation of the book of Genesis, which you won't find in the LDS or RLDS version. You literally have to go to the Restoration Edition (that just recently got distributed in a leather-bound form). And you can find that in Genesis chapter 12, ~~verses—36~~ or paragraphs 36 to 43.

There's some interesting details that leak through that I never noticed about the history that occurred. Joseph of Egypt died when he was 110. But apparently, all of his older—as well as his younger brother, Benjamin—survived him. It becomes clear from the Joseph Smith Translation of the book of Genesis. But Father Joseph, as he's getting into his elderly years and is about to die, then gave some (like his father before him) blessings to his posterity. But because of the relationship that he had with his brothers, he also delivered to them—his brothers—some words of reassurance and comfort about their posterity, as well. And so, Joseph of Egypt becomes sort of the "patriarchal blesser" of his brethren and then the posterity of all the tribes of Israel, which tells you that the Holy Order that had originally been established at the time of Adam—that had gone through a period of apostasy and had to be restored by a connection made with Father Abraham—persisted to and included Joseph of Egypt as one who... I mean, we think Ephraim continued that. But we know for certain—particularly because of the passages that we've gotten in the Joseph Smith Translation—that the Holy Order that originated at the beginning was in full bloom in the person of Joseph of Egypt.

So, I'm gonna read from and comment on the events that took place there:

And Joseph said unto his brethren...

So, while he's telling this—his last blessing—his brethren are alive.

I die and go unto my fathers...

So, he knows he's about to die, and his brethren will survive him. They will be around after his departure.

...and I go down to my grave with joy. (Genesis 12:36, emphasis added)

It's an interesting observation. But a person who dies with a clean conscience before God—having the promises of God that things will be well with them, both in the hereafter and in eternity—can go down to the grave in joy, which Joseph of Egypt was able to do.

We do not have anything similar to this account for Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, Dan, Benjamin, Gad, Asher... We don't have anything like this for the others, which also suggests that upon the death of Joseph—who possessed the Holy Order and the right—none of his brethren succeeded him into that position. (If anyone did, it would have been Ephraim to whom the birthright was given.)

The God of my father Jacob be with you, to deliver you out of affliction in the day of your bondage...

As long as Joseph was there, there was no threat of bondage. But after his departure, after some generations, a new Pharaoh would arise who knew not Joseph (as explained in the book of Exodus). And Joseph is talking about that time and saying, "your bondage," not meaning the very people to whom he was speaking but all of the posterity that are represented in the person of the people to whom he's speaking: You are gonna go into bondage, meaning your posterity. So, he's telling them that there are some bad times coming and that bondage in Egypt was both expected and foretold by Joseph to the other tribes.

*...for [Joseph said] the Lord has visited me, and I have obtained a promise of the Lord...

That is covenantal language. That is exactly the kind of thing that one should expect from someone in possession of the Holy Order. So, he's obtained a visit from the Lord and a promise from the Lord—and he's about to explain what that is.

There are those who think that a prophet can only speak for God if they quote God directly with a "Thus saith the LORD." And Joseph will get there! But he begins by explaining what it is he understood as a consequence of what the Lord said and covenanted with him, a promise of the Lord:

*...that out of the fruit of my loins the Lord God will raise up a righteous branch, out of my loins...

Meaning that there will be a branch covenantally connected to and part of what is "righteousness" or the family of God.

Joseph of Egypt knows there will come a point at which, out of his posterity, will come some people connected as a branch—that's a genealogical, familial, and Holy Order kind of term—that's gonna come from him. And he's saying this, which is apparently dissimilar to his brethren.

Now he's about to die, so they don't have to kill him. But this is kind of the same sort of stuff that got him in trouble when he told them about the "sheaves bowing to his sheaf" and "the stars, the sun, and the moon bowing to him" that got him sold into slavery in Egypt. This can't be welcomed stuff, but he's about to die, so why not be candid? He's gonna "raise up a righteous branch, out of my loins..."

...and unto you whom my father Jacob has named Israel, a prophet — not the Messiah who is called Shiloh. ...this prophet shall deliver my people out of Egypt in the days of your bondage. (Ibid., emphasis added)

Meaning: "Despite that (what I'm telling you about my posterity), you are gonna have someone that comes out of the group that's named 'Israel' by Father Jacob—you are gonna have someone that's going to deliver you out of bondage. So, there's some good news for you, too."

A deliverer, but that deliverer prophet is not gonna be the Messiah. That guy is going to deliver the family of Egypt out of slavery in Egypt. This would be Moses.

And it shall come to pass...

This is what the Lord told Joseph in covenant, and all Joseph's doing is explaining what is going to happen. There is no "Thus saith the LORD," just, "This is how this stuff is going to take place," explaining as a matter of fact. It shall come to pass...

...that they shall be scattered again [meaning all of this family of Israel is gonna be broken up and scattered] and a branch shall be broken off and shall be carried into a far country. (Ibid., 37, emphasis added)

Well, "a branch in a far country" echoes from the blessing that Jacob gave to Joseph before Jacob's death about how the branches of his family would go over the wall over the well (see Genesis 12:29).

*Nevertheless, they shall be remembered in the covenants of the Lord...

Meaning, that branch—scattered as it may be, broken, off, separated—is still gonna be part of what the Lord keeps in His mind:

...when the Messiah comes; for he shall be made manifest unto them in the latter days in the spirit of power, and shall bring them out of darkness unto light, out of hidden darkness and out of captivity unto freedom. (Ibid., emphasis added)

Meaning that when the Messiah comes, the Messiah is going to visit with that broken branch that's gonna be scattered.

Then he says,

A seer...

A very important word because he's now talking about a very, very specific person: A seer...

*...shall the Lord God my God raise up, who shall be a choice seer...

There may be seers a-plenty in the coming generations of Israel, but a seer—distinguished from all others as "choice"— is going to be raised up. But he's gonna be raised up:

...unto the fruit of my loins [meaning he's going to come through the line of Joseph, not the rest of his brethren]. Thus said the Lord God of my fathers unto me...

Now we finally get to a "Thus saith the LORD." So, everything that you've heard up to this point is simply Joseph of Egypt explaining what God let him understand in his (Joseph of Egypt's) words. Now he's gonna quote God, and it's a long quote.

Lehi will primarily take the quote, but he also does some paraphrasing. It's interesting the difference between how Lehi uses this passage from the brass plates and how it appears in the Joseph Smith Translation—and it would be worth the trouble of looking and comparing the two 'cuz it tells you something about prophets quoting prophets.

So, now it's the Lord speaking, and Joseph of Egypt reporting.

...A choice seer...

Again, this is God speaking about him. Joseph first called him a "seer," but when God's words get used, the very first words are "a choice seer."

...will I raise up out of the fruit of your loins, and he should be esteemed highly among the fruit of your loins. (Ibid., 38, emphasis added)

Meaning that descendants of Joseph are going to hold this particular seer in very high regard; they're gonna respect him; they're gonna want to honor what it is that this choice seer represents.

So, now we've had him called:

- Seer
- Choice seer
- Choice seer

Anyone who feels that they can dismiss Joseph Smith as someone who may have "written inspired fiction" or may have been "a successful charlatan" ought to realize that they're treading on very thin ice. Because if God and Father Joseph of Egypt can't describe him without using the words "seer, choice seer, choice seer," it would perhaps serve us well to sit up, take note, and say, "Maybe I ought to search deeply to find out the basis upon which God holds him in such esteem."

And unto him will I give commandment that he shall do a work for the fruit of your loins, his brethren. (Ibid., emphasis added)

So, this choice seer is gonna get a commandment from God, and he's gonna do a work—but it's not for his benefit. It's for the benefit of the posterity of Israel, his brethren.

And he shall bring them to the knowledge of the covenants which I have made with your father. (Ibid.)

Your father, Joseph of Egypt, is Israel—Jacob of "Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob" fame. (You know that band; they had several top 40s.) "And he should bring them to knowledge of the covenants which I have made with your father."

And he shall do whatever work I shall command him; and I will make him great in my eyes...

God's saying, "I'm going to make this man great in my own—in God's own—eyes." That's the person that gets treated so roughly in anti-Mormon literature.

...for he shall do my work. (Ibid., emphasis added)

(I'm looking at the time, 'cuz there's a point I want to make and keep this stuff in mind.)

"He shall do my work." David Whitmer can complain that Joseph overstepped his commission, but God promised Joseph of Egypt that Joseph Smith would do God's work.

And he shall be great like unto him whom I have said I would raise up unto you to deliver my people, O house of Israel, out of the land of Egypt...

So, now God is saying, "This choice seer that is gonna be great in the eyes of God is going to be someone who is comparable to the promised Moses that was to come." Well, when Moses came, one of the things that he accomplished was to reset the covenant of God, establish a law that would be followed, and create an entirely new root of Scripture.

We have lost our Scriptures on a number of occasions. In the beginning, Adam kept the Book of Remembrance, which Enoch elaborated upon because Enoch was the great scribe. (His prototype in Egyptian hieroglyphs is Thoth, who is shown ibis-headed with the stylus and writing—that was Enoch.) And Abraham says that the records of the Fathers (that came down from the beginning) came into his hands, and therefore, he (Abraham) had a knowledge of the beginning of the Creation and of the stars and the planets and all the rest of that. And he proceeded to tell us something about the Creation in the book of Abraham, based (apparently) upon the content of the records from the beginning that fell into his hands—followed, in due course, with his full initiation into the Holy Order through the surviving Melchizedek, son of Shem, who was a pre-diluvian and had a covenant that he could have been translated and taken up to heaven ('cuz that process continued right up into the flood). Even though the city of Enoch had risen before, people were still going through that process right up into the flood, and Melchizedek could lay claim on that promise as an antediluvian, but he tarried until he could hand off (after generations of apostasy) to Abraham. So, Abraham inherits the covenant, and Abraham has possession of the records.

But generations of slavery later, there aren't any records left that Moses can make use of. And so, after a second period of multi-generational apostasy, the Scripture and the records and the description of the Creation had to be restored again. And so, Moses—in restoring the Scriptures—begins with the account of Genesis (the first book of Moses), which is an account of the Creation written by Moses, which (based upon the Joseph Smith Translation of the Scriptures) was Moses being tutored by God so that he understood the events of the Creation in a way that permitted him to create a new root of Scripture.

Well, the Mosaic volumes of Scripture would then later get lost. And so, a new root of Scripture had to be created at the time of Ezra when they returned to the temple. And Ezra essentially writes the Old Testament based upon things he may have found during the effort when they're laboring with a trowel in one hand and a sword in the other to rebuild Jerusalem after Cyrus had permitted the return. But it was essentially a re-creation of the Scripture, at the time of Ezra.

So, you've got Moses that has a root of Scripture because of what had been lost. You've got Ezra who does something fairly similar.

But in this prophecy, what Joseph of Egypt is saying is this choice seer in the last days is gonna be just like Moses. Among other things, he would create a new root of Scripture. He would not only correct and edit and revise the Old and the New Testaments, but in addition to that, he would bring forth the Book of Mormon that is another companion that helps establish the validity and the veracity of what we have that we inherited from the Jews. And he would also receive other commandments that —by revelation—would be preserved. All of that is activity "great in the eyes of God" that God likens to what Moses would do.

So, when you think of the value of Moses to the Jewish people and the esteem with which he is held by the Jews, you should realize that Joseph Smith should be held in similar regard by anyone who accepts the Restoration as a fact that occurred through God working with him.

...for a seer will I raise up out of the fruit of your loins to deliver my people out of the land of Egypt, and he should be called Moses. (Ibid.)

This is explaining how Joseph Smith—the latter seer—will be great like this earlier one (who is Moses). And he's explaining: Moses is gonna deliver the people out of Egypt.

And by this name he shall [be] know[n] that he is of your house, for he shall be nursed by the king's daughter and shall be called her son. (Ibid.)

So, he's gonna be nursed by the Pharaoh's daughter—but he's gonna be called Moses, and because he's got that name, you'll realize he's not from the house of Pharaoh. He's from your house. He's one of your people. So, don't be confused (even though the leaders were rather confused when he came, and they wanted very little to do with him).

And again, a seer will I raise up out of the fruit of your loins. And unto him will I give power to bring forth my word unto the seed of your loins — and not to the bringing forth [of] my word only, says the Lord, but to the convincing them of my word which shall have already gone forth among them in the last days. (Ibid., 39, emphasis added)

So, what Joseph, the seer—the choice seer of the last days—is going to do is gonna be a work that will help to convince people that the earlier Scriptures/the earlier record/the earlier religion/the earlier testimony is in fact also true—God's word convincing the faithful being centered on Joseph Smith.

Wherefore, the fruit of your loins shall write, and the fruit of the loins of Judah shall write...

This is God talking to Joseph of Egypt, saying, "Your descendants are gonna write, and the descendants of Judah are going to write." Now, the Bible is not merely the words of the tribe of Judah. In fact, Moses wasn't a member of Judah; he was a Levite. But the tribe of Judah was the one who preserved the record. So, when the loins of Judah shall write, they are writing the record that includes prophecies that were delivered by prophets from all of the tribes—but we get them through Judah because Judah was the one who preserved and perpetuated the record, wherever it originated, from whatever tribe.

...and that which shall be written by the fruit of your loins [that is, the descendants of Joseph] and also that which shall be written by the fruit of the loins of Judah [that is, the Bible] shall grow together unto the confounding of false doctrines, and laying down of contentions, and establishing peace among the fruit of your loins, and bringing them to the knowledge of their fathers in the latter days, and also to the knowledge of my covenants, says the Lord. (Ibid.)

The purpose of what the choice seer's going to accomplish in the last days is, ultimately, to bring an end to the religious contentions that people who believe in the Bible have with one another. Heavens, the conference that we've been conducting here (and this is peacemaking ground among people of the remnant) really demonstrates, among other things, that there remain contentions among people who believe in the Book of Mormon. We've divided up into various groups. And Tausha has been organizing this conference now (for, I think, the fourth year in a row) in part to try and lay down the contentions that exist religiously between and among one another. It's really odd that when it comes to the subject of the "truth" and "salvation" and "all eternity"... I mean, for goodness sake—all eternity! We want to squabble and bitch and moan against one another rather than to say, "What light can you shed that I do not yet possess? What insight has come to you that I've not noticed that comes from the God of Heaven?" "What truths are there to be discovered and learn from one another?" We don't do that. We bristle, and we complain, and we squabble. But the purpose of the work of Joseph was to lay down contention and put an end to it.

"Knowledge of their fathers." "Knowledge of my covenants."

And then he says,

And out of weakness he shall be made strong in that day when my work shall go forth among all my people, which shall restore them who are of the house of Israel in the last days. (Ibid.)

"Out of weakness." I don't think that Joseph Smith was at all spiritually weak. I don't think that Joseph was physically weak. But Joseph Smith was absolutely, continuously, financially weak.

He had a pending petition for bankruptcy at the time of his death. They had just passed a national bankruptcy law, and everyone went flocking to file for bankruptcy because the ebb and flow of commerce and the banking system in that day was riotous. And if you were, as Joseph was, someone trying to found a city and establish a community, he took a lot of risks. He took risks that he could ill-afford to take. And then he conducted business for the benefit of the people that needed it, not for his own profit and gain. The Nauvoo store that he operated let people take things that they needed, whether they could pay for it or not, with the promise of an IOU—and then they defaulted. And Joseph was left, ultimately, holding the bag with a lot of uncollectible accounts. And he's the very embodiment of weakness financially. It would require the financial support and the charity of his contemporaries in order for him to accomplish any of the work that needed to be accomplished.

And when it came to the construction of the Nauvoo temple, one of the final tasks that the Lord permitted the saints to undertake (on condition that if they pursued it faithfully, they would be defended and protected and kept in their place; but if they didn't measure up, then they would, instead of blessings, bring about cursings upon them, and they would be driven out and suffer a whole series of maladies)—the warning being given in January of 1841, and the subsequent events proving very clearly that they didn't measure up, and they didn't do what was expected of them.

...that seer will I bless. (Ibid., 40)

His financial condition didn't matter. He didn't lay up treasures on Earth, but he certainly laid up treasures in Heaven—because the Lord said he intended to bless him.

And they that seek to destroy him should be confounded, for this promise I give unto you, for I will remember you from generation to generation. And his name should be called Joseph, and it should be after the name of his father. And he shall be like unto you [meaning Joseph of Egypt; Joseph Smith is not only like Moses, Joseph Smith is like Joseph of Egypt, as well], for the thing which the Lord shall bring forth by his hand shall bring my people unto salvation. (Ibid.)

Okay. I've now gotten to the point that if you are keeping score, the Lord in this prophecy has mentioned Joseph Smith—either directly by name or by description or by a personal pronoun—Joseph Smith, 22 times. It's kind of a remarkable bit of scorekeeping, if you're looking at it.

There are prophecies about unnamed future prophets that are gonna accomplish some work, referred to as candlesticks or olive trees—no names given. And yet, they've got remarkable responsibilities that they're going to fulfill. And their mention is paltry by comparison. Joseph Smith's mission and description as a choice seer rather dwarfs statements that are made about others.

I think people ought to be circumspect about evaluating, judging, and criticizing Joseph Smith. As Joseph was in Liberty Jail, the Lord, comforting Joseph because, well, jail was a highly unsatisfactory place to reside for half a year, and his tenure there was now coming to an end; and Joseph's time of reflection and prayer and meditation drawing to an end, he wrote up an account. And in the account, it drifts from 'what he was thinking' to 'what he was praying' to 'what God was telling him' to 'quoting God' in the letter. It's an interesting amalgamation. But this is a quote from the Lord talking to Joseph:

The ends of the earth shall inquire after your name, and fools shall have you in derision...

Well, that oughta make some folks be a little more circumspect.

...and hell shall rage against you, while the pure in heart, and the wise, and the noble, and the virtuous shall seek counsel, and authority, and blessings constantly from under your hand. (T&C 139:7)

Why would the virtuous seek blessings and counsel from under the hand of a pedophile, polygamist, liar, deceiver who publicly preached against the practice of adulterous plural marriages and in secret went about practicing it? It makes no sense to me.

And if (in the review of the historical record) you can't figure out that there's an enormous gap between the available information about the virtue of Joseph Smith and the solidity of his marriage and commitment to his wife, Emma Smith, right up until June 27 of 1844, and then a flood of nonsense that creeps in from polygamists who—20/30/40 years after the fact—begin to reconstruct their recollection (and even quoting Joseph Smith to say exactly the contrary of what he said and taught publicly), then you're not particularly wise.

It makes no sense to do that. I mean, that statement about "Never bet against a Sicilian when life is on the line..." Well, never bet against a Mormon hierarchy when money and property is on the line. Because I'm telling you, as the affidavits were being gathered to support the practice of plural marriage, property was on the line. And they went about writing the affidavits (because they're in the handwriting of Joseph F. Smith) and collecting signatures from women who were in a vulnerable position economically and who desperately did not want to forfeit their position within the structure that had been created in Utah, and so, they have fixed their signatures to the affidavits. And from that, we have folk like Brian Hales that say, "Oh, there's this flood of evidence to support the notion!" And I'm telling you, choose your historians carefully.

And your people, [your people] shall never be turned against you by the testimony of traitors. (Ibid.)

Okay. I want to put that statement into a very specific context because I have to assume that whatever extensions may flow from that statement to Joseph, at the moment this was being told to him in Liberty Jail, if you were to ask him the identity of the traitors, he would be able to give you—exactly—the names of the folks:

- Oliver Cowdery
- David Whitmer
- John Whitmer—the LDS Church... Well, the church historian. John Whitmer took all of the historical records with him when he was excommunicated in the preceding year. And Joseph Smith commenced re-writing the history in 1838 because the histories had been taken by John Whitmer. (Two of the Book of Mormon witnesses and the church's historian.)
- Hiram Page
- W.W. Phelps
- Sampson Avard
- Thomas Marsh (of the Quorum of the Twelve)

These people were not only traitors to him...

They did not have the ability to hold Joseph Smith on the charge of treason without a sufficient body of testimony against him to prove that he ought to be kept in jail to stand trial on the charge. You didn't have to prove the charge, you have to have a preliminary hearing in which someone said something that justified the belief that you might be able to convict this person for treason. And the people who testified (the Missourians) couldn't come up with enough facts to bind him over in Judge King's courtroom. It took Sampson Avard to come in and testify.

Now Sampson Avard was... He was in a command position with the Mormon protective group, and he... I think he may have coined the term "Danites." But whatever it was, they came to be known by the vernacular of Danites—and he was spoiling for a fight. (He was like Louis Naegle in his youth.) He was just looking for a face to punch. So, Joseph decommissioned Sampson Avard because of his hostile attitude, and he made him, essentially, the cook/the mess Sergeant/the guy in charge of keeping them fed. The demotion of Sampson Avard was intended by Joseph Smith to de-escalate the tensions. He did not want Mormons provoking anything. And Sampson Avard wanted to go out on night raids, burning property that belonged to the Gentiles.

It was Sampson Avard who came into the courtroom and who swore that all of the depredations that he had committed—and he described them—were done under the direction/with the permission/with the presiding authority and consent of Joseph Smith. And therefore, "All that crap I did that was so evil? Well, he told me to do it!" So, you've got the guy who did it saying, "Joseph was the author of it," and that was a sufficient basis to hold him over, and he was languishing...

This occurred in the first town they were held in; they'd been transported to and held in Liberty after (I think it was) Richmond, where the preliminary hearing had been held. But now they were in the Liberty Jail, and they were simply awaiting trial. And this statement about the traitors, "Your people shall never be turned against you by the testimony of traitors"...

The second person on that list was one of the Three Witnesses named David Whitmer, who (in what—1886?—in his "Address to All Believers in Christ," now an old guy and somewhat reflective on things) wrote his "Address to All Believers in Christ" that is an oft-cited, early Mormon historical document for the concept/for the proposition that "Joseph Smith was a fallen Prophet and that Joseph Smith's original commission was to take care of the Book of Mormon but that after he finished with the Book of Mormon, that everything that he did thereafter to have himself as Prophet, Seer, and Revelator was overreaching and ego-maniacal and that Joseph fell into some sort of a personal ego trip that led to destruction and that Joseph was off the mark." And that concept gets picked up and echoed by a lot of people. But it is fundamentally based upon the testimony of a traitor identified in a revelation given to Joseph in Liberty Jail that promised Joseph that the pure in heart will never be turned aside by the testimony of traitors. So, if you give great countenance to the testimony of David Whitmer in "An Address to all Believers in Christ," you are literally falling into the very thing that was described by the Lord as something that the pure and the wise and the noble and the virtuous will not do. So, well, take heed.

And the Lord swore unto Joseph that he would preserve his seed for ever, saying...

So, that now is simply a summary, an interjection that is not a quote from the Lord, once again. It's covering something off-script. Now we're going back to a direct quote of the Lord again:

I will raise up Moses, and a rod shall be in his hand; and he shall gather together my people, and he shall lead them as a flock, and he shall smite the waters of the Red Sea with his rod. And he shall have judgment, and shall write the word of the Lord. And he shall not speak many words, for I will write unto him my law by the finger of [mine] own hand. And I will make a spokesman for him, and his name should be called Aaron. And it shall be done unto you in the last days also, even as I have sworn. (Genesis 12:41)

So, the question that ought to occur to us when we get this kind of language is: Joseph Smith had to restore this stuff back into the text of the book of Genesis—it was once there; it got dropped out. Why would it get dropped out?

Well, yeah... People did not want to have... You can't just eliminate the reference to this latter-day Messiah ben Joseph that would still echo in the record of the Jews. Something this blatant, something this obvious, something this in your face has got to go! But there's this analogy that I use:

Probably any one of you here in the room, if you listen to a lot of popular music over the course of your lifetime, you probably have an inventory of lyrics in your head that numbers in the hundreds of thousands of songs. And when a song begins, even if you haven't heard it for many, many years, as soon as the song begins, you hear the first couple of words to the tune, and you probably start singing along with the lyrics. (And if you're alone in your car, you probably do that. But if there's anyone there with you, you're probably a little more inhibited about that kind of rock and roll.)

The other morning, I was thinking about a song that I had not heard in three decades or more. But I'll bet if I started singing it that a significant number of you could finish the tune. (Oh, you're shaking your head! You don't... I'm gonna sing it! Yeah.)

Oh, where, oh, where can my baby be?
The Lord took her away from me.
She's gone to heaven, so I've got to be good
So I can see my baby when I leave this world.

[They] were out on a date in [her] daddy's car. [Okay]
We hadn't driven very far.
[When] there in the road [lying] straight ahead
[The car was stalled,] the engine was dead.

I couldn't stop, so I swerved to the right...
("Last Kiss" by J. Frank Williams and The Cavaliers)

Wait a minute. Hold on. Dude! Her daddy's car. You couldn't stop. This is a chauvinist song. This is sexist crap. Dude shouldn't be driving her daddy's car; she should be driving. This is why we don't hear this song anymore. I gotta... Yeah.

You can eliminate part of a song. You can drop a verse a whole lot more easily than you can mangle a verse. And a lot of the Scriptures were perpetuated by repetition, by word of mouth, and literally, by being sung. That's why a great deal of the Scriptures in the original language is more poetry than—or prose—that's intended to have signals and cues to recall the passages. It's clearly what the Lord was doing with the Beatitudes: making something that can be easily recalled and recited.

So, if you've got passages like the one we're dealing with here (and it's filled with an amalgamation that mixes in both the character of Moses with, overwhelmingly, a description of the last-days' Joseph) and you just don't want to keep that stuff up, you've got to drop the whole thing (which is one of the reasons why Zenos appears in the brass plates in the Book of Mormon, and he did not appear in the record of the Jews—because it was so directly Messianic; whereas the poetry of Isaiah with Messianic "passages" could be used by analogy to describe not just the "singular, individual Messiah" but could be likened to the "people of the Jews"—so that the Jews themselves became the suffering servant, so that the Jews themselves became the ones that were marred for the testimony of the truth and the religion of the fathers).

Therefore, Joseph said unto his brethren...

So, now he's talking to his brothers, as the prophecy is wrapping up.

God will surely visit you, and bring you out of this land unto the land which he swore unto Abraham, and to Isaac, and to Jacob. And Joseph confirmed many other things unto his brethren, and took an oath of the children of Israel, saying unto them, God will surely visit you, and you shall carry up my bones from here.

So Joseph died when he was a hundred [and] ten years old. (Ibid., 42-43)

That passage (Joseph of Egypt speaking about Joseph who would in the last days help restore people to an understanding of the covenants with the Fathers—including Father Jacob with whom God established the people Israel by giving unto him a new name that the people would thereafter be known by) that prophecy is one of the things that we ought to take into account when we try to calibrate how we view Joseph Smith. Anyone that God testifies will be "great in my eyes" is not someone that we ought to be disregarding and dismissing, as if all of the nonsense that we see said about Joseph should enjoy credibility.

We live at a time when the world is enslaved: It's chained; it's bound by lies. In the vision of Enoch, when Lucifer had wrapped the Earth in a great chain and he looked up at Heaven and he laughed, the great chain with which he had wrapped the Earth was lies. People believed lies. If I believe the nonsense that people say about Joseph Smith, I would not respect such a person at all. If I believe the nonsense that people say about the "absence of evidence in support of the Book of Mormon" were true, I wouldn't believe the Book of Mormon. And yet, here today, in multiple talks that have been given, there is overwhelmingly convincing evidence to support the authenticity and ancient source for the Book of Mormon.

Why are those proofs not predominating on the Internet, in the discussion groups, on Facebook, in the Reddit ex-Mormon section? Why are they not heard there? Because people believe and love a lie—and they shall be thrust down to hell, because that's what they prefer.

I hope you don't. And I hope that you have regard for Joseph of Egypt's description and the Lord's prophecy and promise of Joseph, the son of Joseph, of whom I have the absolute highest regard.

Thank you.

DENVER: What if I talk so long that there are none of you left here by the time I finish?

I want to thank the organizers.

[Crosstalk]

(Closer? Really?)

I want to thank the organizers. These things are never easy to do. And the people who do this... (See now, okay, you can't see me.) The people that do are always called upon to make a number of sacrifices. And invariably, by the time one of these occurs, they've vowed never again to ever do another one of these things. And it's like childbirth: It takes awhile, and the memory diminishes. And they say, "Well, let's do another one," foolishly thinking that they won't get to this point again! But I want to thank all of those.

I was going to mention that we had people here... Kaai and McKenzie [Lincoln] that are traveled all the way from Hawaii. And what a remarkable thing it is to come that far. Until, of course, we have ~~Maksat~~ [Maksad] and Holida who came from Turkmenistan to be here. And so, they win the prize. (I'm not sure what that prize is.) But they traveled the longest distance, and maybe the prize is you get to rest now. And he gets called "Max" to Americanize and make it easy for us. But I was saying, "It's Max on, Max salt." The real name is that: ~~Maksat~~ [Maksad]. If you've seen Karate Kid... [Directed to Max and Holida:] I don't know, have you seen Karate Kid? She has, okay. Brother and sister with an interesting story to tell.

(I think if I move it closer, there's more of that, not less. But you're responsible. If you dislike the feedback, throw whatever leftover bread you have back there at that booth. And hopefully, it'll be stale enough to make an impact.)

There was a circumstance that came to many of our attention recently: a fellow named Randy Albalate who lost a friend of his, Delfin. And it occurred to me that I ought to mention the passing of his friend, as well as the passing of a number of other people: LueAnn Thayne, ~~Shane~~ [Shaylee] Achter, Lisa VanCampen, Tyson Hunt, Jody Bailey, Bob Bartel. Many of you probably don't know any of their names. Some of you probably may know one or another but probably don't know all. I can tell you that there isn't one who passes out of this world who's received a covenant from the Lord that isn't notable on the other side after their departure. No one is forgotten in the wisdom of the Lord.

Now, some practical stuff that needs to be said. Every one of you should do what you need to do to take care of your health. The average person who dies as a result of the COVID infection has 2.8 co-morbidities. That means that they have (on average) 2.8

other causes of their death. They don't die from one; they die from a multitude. I saw an Alta billboard at the Alta Hospital, as you drive by. They have this neon sign that changes lettering to tell you things. One of the things that they circulated through on their billboard was that 80% of all strokes are preventable with 30 minutes a day of exercise. There is an expression about "when it comes to activity, you either use it or you lose it"—meaning that the body's capacity is designed to be retained by activity, by the things that you do. If you don't do, the body atrophies, you lose the capacity. Diet, exercise, smoking, alcohol, drugs, and just a general lifestyle—all of these things have an effect upon both your health and how long you will be here. That "eat, drink, and be merry for tomorrow we die" is more or less "eat, drink, and be merry because tomorrow we're causing our death."

So, during the years in which Bill Clinton was the President of the United States, he had an inner circle of folks advising the presidency and trying to move the agenda along, and they made this statement at one point: "Everything is political." And I thought—at the time that they said, "Everything is political"—what nonsense that was. That was a statement of an objective to be achieved.

When I was little, I remember the adults saying that it's not polite to ever discuss politics or religion. You can be friends with someone, you can be bosom buddies with someone, but don't talk with them about politics or religion. That statement by the elders was purposeful. It was designed to prevent conflict over things that people feel strongly about.

So, when the Clinton administration folks are advocating that everything is political, what they're really advocating is that we need more conflict; we need more people to become angry with one another; we need to stir people up so that their hearts are alienated from each other because they feel intensely over some political issue. And make everything political. Make whether or not BYU's football team wins or loses a game against the University of Arizona's football team, played in the capital of sin—Las Vegas—political, and then we can get people even more angry than they would be over BYU playing the University of Utah.

There was a statement that grew out of that same Clinton era that was widespread—you saw it everywhere—that certain kinds of speech are not politically correct. "Oh, oh, oh, you shouldn't say that. That's not politically correct." It seemed like nonsense when that was first emerging into the vocabulary. And yet, today I would bet you that among you folks (who are all here in agreement on certain principles of religion) that there would be very sharp disagreements between the group of you over some political issues. That was an objective—long pursued, artfully developed, carefully manipulated—in order to get us into the position where we are today: divided from one another and our hearts alienated from one another over things that largely don't matter.

People did not discuss politics or religion, because they wanted to avoid being angry with one another. There is a problem that is identified by the Lord in the Answer to the Prayer for Covenant that says, Mankind has been controlled by the adversary through anger and jealousy, which has led to bloodshed and the misery of many souls. That's the problem. And it's a tool for control. Then the next sentence presents the solution: Even strong disagreements should not provoke anger, nor to invoke my name in vain as if I had part in your every dispute (T&C 157:54, emphasis added).

I find it interesting that the way that is put is "to invoke the [Lord's] name in vain"—one of the "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain" commandments that we found in the ten commandments that are foundational to our society.

And so, the purpose is to get you stirred up to anger with one another and then to say—about a matter that's purely political—that God is involved because "I've prayed about it, and I feel righteous indignation in opposing your political view." And then, the inverse is true as well. They feel righteously indignant at whatever it is that you're advancing. And so, we see everything is political. They've succeeded, and we've lost, and now anger becomes the rule of the day.

Disagreeing rigidly... In the Joseph Smith History, part one, paragraph 11, describing the Methodists, the Presbyterians, and the Baptists, this is what Joseph recorded about his youthful observations of how the adult religiousness or religionists were acquitting themselves:

Notwithstanding the great love which the converts to these different faiths expressed at the time of their conversion, and the great zeal manifested by the respective clergy who were active in getting up and promoting this extraordinary scene of religious feeling in order to have everybody converted, as they were pleased to call it—let them join what sect they pleased; yet when the converts began to file off, some [of them] to one party...some to another, it was seen that the seemingly good feelings of both the priests and the converts were more pretended than real. For a scene of great confusion and bad feeling ensued, priests contending against priest and convert against convert, so that all their good feelings for one another (if they ever had any) were entirely lost in a strife of words and a contest about opinions. (JSH 1:11 RE, emphasis added)

That description of the Methodists, the Presbyterians, and the Baptists should not become a description of us. It should not be how we conduct ourselves toward one another, even if we have strong disagreements over something. And it certainly shouldn't provoke us to invoke the name of God in order to make Him be on your side, as if He had part in your everyday petty disagreements with one another.

"Take a breath, Nora." (My wife's gonna be talking about that; that you own that [speaking to Stephanie]. I'm just... I'm giving you attribution.) We have a granddaughter named Harper. What is she now? Two and a half? Three? Two. Yeah, she's two going on 16. And her mom has taught her (and you're gonna hear my wife's podcast), when she's upset and angry and can't deal with it to take a breath. And they were driving about, and Nora was crying in the car. And her two-year-old sister was exasperated at her, and she said, "Take a breath, Nora!!" And so, it's become kind of an internal family cliché: "Take a breath, Nora."

These folks that Joseph wrote about were no less zealous in their faith than we are in ours.

So, some of you feel an inordinate anxiety at the events we can all see taking place throughout the world. You've allowed the politics of everything to make you desperate to flee. Well, it doesn't matter if you flee; the circumstances aren't going to change. And if you bring with you the conviction that "everything is political," you're not going to escape the anxiety that you feel.

One of the reasons why political leaders find it very useful to make people frightened is because when they are frightened and they get to the "fight or flight" part of their mind, they cease to be rational—and they find themselves willing to adopt irrational choices to try and solve the problem that is making them afraid, even if the problem that they fear is of very little or even no consequence.

You're being played. You're being played, America. You're being played, the world. And you are allowing yourselves to be played as disciples of the Lord. You ought—of all people—to have an extraordinary amount of confidence that the Lord knows exactly what He's doing, and He's making provisions to accomplish the fulfillment of the covenants that He said He intends to vindicate. As well might man [put] forth his puny arm to stop the Missouri River [from running] in its...course (T&C 138:22) than man interrupt the purposes of God. It's just not gonna happen.

Patience is very hard to summon when you're stirred up to anxiety—"Oh, my God, my God, my God!!"—over something that your God has control over. He defeated an invading Assyrian army using fleas. He fed the Israelites who were tired of manna with quail that flew in to be feasted upon. The God of Nature is not troubled by what troubles you. And the God of Nature is probably nothing more than bemused at how you're acting in this moment of confusion and dread. Our Lord is unflappable and affable. And He's not dancing around, doing a pee-pee dance because He's afraid of what's happening today. He has absolute confidence in the ultimate outcome, and it's going to be exactly as He said it would be. So, fleeing—particularly at this moment—may not be at all what you think it will be.

Well, I also want to fix some perceptions about the coming idyllic community that you hope to occupy. So, let me tell you what you have to look forward to.

There's two statements that really represent the one view, and one of them is drawn from the Guide and Standard, and the other one is drawn from T&C 64 [61]. This one from the Guide and Standard: We cannot allow ourselves to be drawn in to inequality when the result of this labor is to make us one body equal with one another. We cannot imitate the failures of the past by establishing a hierarchy, elevating one above another, and forgetting that we must be of one heart, one mind and with no poor among us (T&C 175:39). And then, the second one: Nevertheless, in your temporal things you shall be equal in all things, and this not grudgingly; otherwise, the abundance of the manifestations of the spirit shall be withheld (T&C 61:4).

These two statements give the impression that we will have identical property and identical possessions and be identically situated with one another, and they also form the basis for complaints when your theory of what that means is the one thing and the reality is something different—and you're not getting "yours." So, now we've got a scriptural basis with which to point and to accuse and to judge and to condemn and to divide and to say, "It's not fair—or Zion! 'Cuz it's not; look at these Scriptures I just read you."

So, let's ease into what it really means to be equal with one another with a Scripture that is taken from Alma. And this is just describing how the people behaved:

And when their priests left their labor to impart the word of God unto the people, [and] the people also left their labors to hear the word of God. And when the priest had imparted unto them the word of God, they all returned again diligently unto their labors, and the priest, not esteeming himself above his hearers; for the preacher was no better than the hearer, neither was the teacher any better than the learner. And thus they were all equal; and they did...labor every man according to his strength. (Alma 1:5 RE, emphasis added)

They weren't all priests. (Well, that's not equal.) They weren't all teachers. (That's not equal either.) But they were all equal. "And they did all labor...." Oh, so they have one thing in common, and the one thing that they have in common is work, "...every man according to his strength." You have to give what you have. And one man's strength may not be another man's strength, but he needs to give according to the strength that he has. And one woman's strength may not be what another woman's strength is, but she must give according to the strength that she has.

If I could point to one of this morning's examples (or mid-day examples, I guess): Connie Waterman is physically frail. But she has the strength to compose and the strength to sing a song of worship that means something to us all. It certainly means something to me; it certainly had an effect upon me. Everyone has to labor.

Then there's the Lord just confronting Israel directly:

Yet you say, the way of the Lord is not equal. Hear now, O house of Israel, is not my way equal? Are not your ways unequal? When a righteous man turns away from his righteousness, and commits iniquity and dies in them, for his iniquity that he has done shall he die. Again, when the wicked man turns...from his wickedness that he has committed, and does that which is lawful and right, he [will] save his soul alive. Because he considers and turns away from all his transgressions that he has committed, he shall surely live — he shall not die.

Yet says the house of Israel, The way of the Lord is not equal. O house of Israel, are not my ways equal? Are not your ways unequal? (Ezekiel 8:7 RE, emphasis added)

Equal (as the Lord is explaining here) means "accountable, responsible." Every one of us is equal in the eyes of God, meaning you're going to pay a price or you're going to receive a reward, all of this talking about after they die. The righteous (after they die) shall live. The wicked (after they die) shall be dead. Everyone is equal. That's it from Ezekiel, and he poses the question again another eight chapters later:

Yet the children of your people say, The way of the Lord is not equal. But as for them, their way is not equal. When the righteous [man] turns from his righteousness and commits iniquity, he shall even die thereby. But if the wicked turn from his wickedness and do that which is lawful and right, he shall live thereby. Yet you say, The way of the Lord is not equal. O house of Israel, I will judge you, everyone after his ways. (Ezekiel 16:6 RE, emphasis added)

We are all equally accountable before God. And no one gets away with disobedience, period. No one does.

So, let's take this to another level and look at something that the apostle Paul wrote, talking about marriage—in two passages, written to the same audience in two different letters: one in First Corinthians; the other in Second Corinthians. The one in First Corinthians says:

If any brother has a wife that believes not, and she be pleased to dwell with him, let him not divorce her. And the woman who has a husband that believes not, if he be pleased to dwell with her, let her not leave him. For the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband; else were your children unclean, but now are they holy. (1 Corinthians 1:26 RE)

Keep that in mind while we read from Second Corinthians:

Be not [equally] yoked together with unbelievers, for what fellowship has righteousness with unrighteousness? And what communion has light with darkness? And what concord has Christ with Belial? Or what part has he that believes with an unbeliever? And what agreement has the temple of God with idols? (2 Corinthians 1:21 RE)

I would suggest that the correct way to read the second one is in light of the first one—that the first one was the foundation; the second one is the next part. And I would say that being "unequally yoked" is not talking about the problems; it's talking about the commitment to marriage. If a man is committed to his marriage and the wife is committed to the marriage, then it doesn't matter if there are religious differences between them. They're equally yoked so long as they both are committed to their marriage. And there's no reason why you can't be happy with the spouse you chose if that spouse is committed to the marriage, and you are as well.

The things that Christ talked about that were gifts from God were simple things: birds of the air, flowers in the field, the sunrise, the rain, the sunset, the cloud cover. These are simple things that can be enjoyed by everyone and appreciated by everyone as gifts that come from God—without getting into whether or not you ought to bless the sacrament and pass the bread before you bless the wine and pass the wine because "our fellowship does it different than that."

Really?

Really!

Okay, here's another way in which equality really is meant by the Lord in a context: Women have claim on their husbands until they are taken. And if they are not found transgressors, they remain upon their inheritances. All children have claim upon their parents until they are of age... (T&C 79:1), meaning, if you're the man in the house, your wife has claim on you for her support. That's an obligation that's imposed upon you. Among other things, one of the things that occurs naturally in the course of husband- and wife-dom is that the wife will, on occasion, conceive a child, bear the child, give birth to the child, and be indisposed. Even if she's doing light office work, the commitment to the furthering of the family is going to interrupt her ability. The husband has no such interruptions. Therefore, the wife has claim on the husband. And the two of them, together as parents, the children have claim on them. That's your responsibility. That's your parental responsibility. It's ordained by God. And we all share equally these duties before God for the support within our own family.

Then there is this: But if any provide not for his own, and especially...those of his own house, he has denied the faith and is [worth] worse than an unbeliever (1 Timothy 1:13 RE). Everyone—equally—is responsible to provide for their own. My family has claim on me for support. But your family has claim on you for support. Your family doesn't have claim on me for their support. And my family doesn't have claim on you for their support.

Alma mentions that there was no inequality among them. This was because of the preaching that was given: Those priests who did go forth among the people did preach against all lyings, and deceivings, and envyings, and strifes, and malice, and revilings, and stealing, robbing, plundering, murdering, committing adultery, and all manner of lasciviousness, crying that these things ought not so to be (Alma 11:8 RE). These are the things that are required to be removed from among us:

- Lying—that has to end.

- Deceiving, which can be a bit more subtle than outright lying. But deceiving can't be among us.
- Envyings—we should never be caught up in the envy of one another or of anyone else.
- Strifes
- Malice
- Revilings
- Stealing
- Robbing
- Plundering
- Murdering
- Committing adultery, and
- Lasciviousness

I find it interesting that murdering and committing adultery are right together in this list of improprieties. I had a client ~~who got~~ who pled guilty. I didn't think he should have; I recommended that he not. But he pled guilty to a white-collar crime because he didn't want to take the risk of the trial. And because the prosecutor had suggested that he would recommend 90 days of suspended jail time and that he could—if he did get jail time—he could serve it at home. So, the client took the deal against my advice and entered the plea on a white-collar crime that I didn't think he committed. I didn't think what they were charging with actually fit the statutory requirement. And I told him not to do it; he did it anyway. And the judge rejected the 90-day recommendation of the prosecutor and sent him away for 14 years to 24 months in the state penitentiary. Well, this fellow was never ill-disposed to begin with. He didn't belong in prison to begin with. The whole thing was just nonsense. And he went out, and it didn't take the state penitentiary long to figure out that he was a good guy. He helped bring a literacy program into the prison. He helped some guys get through their GED. And as luck would have it, murderers are a problem at the state penitentiary, so he was made the jailmate with murderers in order to calm them down and reduce the threat and make it easier for the guards.

While he was there, he became friends with three murderers in the Utah State Penitentiary. All three murderers had committed murder as a consequence of adultery. So, linking murder and adultery together in the list that Alma provides is not just happenstance. Preaching against adultery and guarding yourself against that may keep you also distant from the kind of anger and violence that results in the shedding of blood and the misery of many souls, just like the Answer to the Prayer for Covenant mentions.

Then there is this statement—it's a rather lengthy passage, but it's really worth hearing:

Therefore, say unto the house of Israel, Thus says the Lord God: I do not do this for your sakes, O house of Israel, but for my holy name's sake, which you have profaned among the heathen where you went. And I will sanctify my great name, which was profaned among the heathen, which you have profaned in the midst of them; and the heathen shall know that I am the Lord, says the Lord God, when I shall be sanctified in you before their eyes.

For I will take you from among the heathen, and gather you out of all countries, and will bring you into your own land. Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you and you shall be clean from all your filthiness; and from all your idols [I will] cleanse you. A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you, and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh and I will give you a heart of flesh. And I will put my spirit within you and cause you to walk in my statutes, and you shall keep my judgments and do them.

And you shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers, and you shall be my people and I will be your God. I will also save you from...your uncleanness, and I will call for the grain and will increase it, and lay no famine upon you. And I will multiply the fruit of the tree and the increase of the field, that you shall receive no more reproach of famine among the heathen. Then shall you remember your...evil ways, and your doings that were not good, and shall loathe yourself in your own sight for your iniquities and for your abominations. Not for your sakes do I do this, says the Lord God, be it known unto you; be ashamed and confounded for your own ways, O house of Israel.

Thus says the Lord God: In the day that I shall have cleansed you from all your iniquities, I will also cause you to dwell in the cities, and the wastes shall be built. And the desolate land shall be tilled, whereas it lay desolate in the sight of all that passed by. ...they shall say, This land that was desolate has become like the Garden of Eden, and the waste and desolate and ruined cities have become fortified and are inhabited. Then the heathen that are left round about you shall know that I the Lord build the ruined places and plant that which was desolate. I the Lord have spoken it, ...I will do it. (Ezekiel 18:8-10 RE, emphasis added)

So, the land is going to produce—you have to walk in His statutes, you have to keep His judgments. And if you do, eventually you will come to the point that you recognize, in your own eyes, the loathsomeness of the things that you have done that were ungodly, that were unclean, that were inappropriate, selfish, unkind, unholy. You'll do that. Because as you become more clean, you look back with abhorrence upon your past failures.

Then, you get to go to harsh lands, bad places, desolate wastes, desolate, desolate. Okay, that's the list. That's what He's talking about. Here's what these people that He's going to gather are going to get to do: They get to go to desolate land; wastes shall be built; it's gonna lay desolate in the sight of all that pass by. And the people that pass by that looked at this place are going to say, "This land that was desolate has become like the Garden of Eden!" Well, how did that happen? It's because, apparently, idiots went and tilled this crappy, desolate, waste place and invested their labor. By the sweat of your brow shall you eat your bread (see Genesis 3:1 RE). What He's saying is, "Okay—finally, finally I've got people who are willing to invest the sweat of their brow. I told Adam that was the deal. You didn't like paradise. So here, go take this, and turn it back into paradise. I made you a husbandman to the ground. You didn't like that; you're malcontent. So here, go out, and work this stuff." This whole passage in ~~Isaiah~~ in Ezekiel is accounting for the surprise. "Oh, my word. Look at that!"—the surprise of the passersby who see tilling going on in pretty unfavorable conditions. Well, why would that be?

It's because the Lord agrees to prosper what you do. But it is the doing that is incumbent upon you. The Three Nephites aren't gonna come plow the field (folklore from early Mormon history notwithstanding). John the Beloved isn't gonna come out and say, "Hey, I've been saving these magic beans for, you know, generations. And if you plant 'em..." Actually, now that I think about it, if you plan 'em you might inherit a giant in the land. So, why don't you do without the magic beans?

There's work to be done. Our covenant with the Lord says,

Teach your children to honor me. Seek to recover the lost sheep remnant of this land and of Israel and no longer forsake them. Bring them unto me and teach them of my ways, to walk in them. And I, the Lord your God, will be with you and will never forsake you, and I will lead you in the path which will bring peace to you in the troubling season now fast approaching. I will raise you up and protect you, abide with you, and gather you in due time... (T&C 158:11-13)

Notice that there's a sequence here within the covenant itself. He's saying He's gonna lead us and bring us to peace. But there's a troubling season that is fast approaching. That's gonna happen with some rapidity; it's gonna be upon you. "I will raise you up and protect you, abide with you, and gather you in due time." That doesn't sound like we oughta be assembling ourselves in haste. That sounds like the troubling times fast approaching are going to precede the time in which He will gather us in due time.

...and this shall be a land of promise to you as your inheritance from me. The earth will yield its increase... (Ibid. 13-14, emphasis added)

Yield requires effort. It requires something be pursued. It requires that there be effort.

- "We got our army together, and we got our battering ram, and we beat against the door of the castle, and a lot of us took arrows from above—but we just kept beating and beating, and the door to the castle yielded. And then we were able to take the stronghold."
- "I saw this gorgeous gal when I was a freshman and asked her out 30 times my freshman year and 60 times my sophomore year and 90 times my junior year. And my senior year, her returned missionary came back and abandoned her, and she went out with me! She finally yielded!"

Okay, think of that word "yield" in the context of the covenant. It doesn't mean, "There! I went out. I prayed. Jesus, I'd like wheat; oh, and barley; oh, oh, and oats—I like oatmeal. Oh, oh, oh, oh, grapes, too. Grapes. I want some grapes. And how 'bout some peach trees? Love peaches!" [Denver singing] "Millions of peaches; peaches for me" (lyrics of the song "Peaches").

"Why is this a barren wasteland, desolate, no better than it was before my prayer? I don't get it, Lord, wasn't this supposed to be fairy dust that makes it all easy?"

...The earth will yield its increase, and you will flourish upon the mountains and upon the hills, and the wicked will not come against you because the fear of the Lord [shall] be with you. I will visit my house, which the remnant of my people shall build, and I will dwell therein, to be among you, and no one will need to say, Know ye the Lord, for you [shall all] know me, from the least to the greatest. (Ibid. 14-15)

That's at the end of the process that He's describing in the ~~Answer to the Prayer~~ or this is the Covenant itself that we're reading from. This is the process that He says is going to unfold. We expect a house of God with no labor, land that will yield without effort, a desolate wasteland to become the Garden of Eden when we do nothing more than to ask.

And then we have these statements: But the laborer in Zion shall labor for Zion, for if they labor for money, they shall perish (2 Nephi 11:17 RE). Okay, we now have a reference to Zion. And in the reference to Zion, there is one singular, solitary role identified: laborer, labor, labor. Oh, there's only one job; it's to labor! Hey, we all get to be equal.

This is all that He promises to us; once you start working, this is the only thing He promises to you:

And they shall build houses and inhabit them, ...they shall plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them. They shall not build and another inhabit, they shall not plant and another eat; for as the days of a tree are the days of my people, in my elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands. They shall not labor in vain, nor bring forth for trouble... (Isaiah 24:9 RE, emphasis added)

That's what you're promised. Anything you want, if you'll work, He will help the ground to yield to your labor. And if you build yourself a house, someone is not going to come and take it away from you. If you plant yourself food, the yield that comes from that no one is gonna come and remove it from you by force. You get to enjoy that.

And again, that was a prophecy by Isaiah. There's another prophecy to the similar effect — fewer words—but in the Psalms: Blessed is everyone that fears the Lord, that walks in his ways, for you shall eat the labor of your hands (Psalms 128:1 RE). See, you get to be blessed. Why are you blessed? Because the stuff that you work for you get as the produce or the product of your labor.

And then there's this:

Who can find a virtuous woman? For her price is far above rubies. The heart of her husband does safely trust in her, so that he shall have no need of spoil...

He doesn't have to go take from someone else. She's productive.

She will do him good and not evil all the days of her life. She seeks wool and flax, and works willingly with her hands. She is like the merchants' ships, she brings her food from afar. She rises also while it is yet night, and gives food to her household and a portion to her maidens. She considers a field and buys it; with the fruit of her hands she plants a vineyard. She girds her loins with strength, and strengthens her arms. She perceives that her merchandise is good, her candle goes not out by night. She lays her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the rod. She stretches out her hand to the poor, yea, she reaches forth her hands to the needy. She is not afraid of the snow for her household, for all her household are clothed with scarlet. She makes herself coverings of tapestry, her clothing is silk and purple. Her husband is known in the gates, when he sits among the elders... She makes fine linen and sells it, and delivers girdles unto the merchant. Strength and honor are her clothing, and she shall rejoice in time to come. She opens her mouth with wisdom and in her tongue is the law of kindness. She looks well to the ways of her household and eats not the bread of idleness...

Okay, I'm gonna insert an editorial parenthetical at this point: That's because there is no "bread of idleness."

Her children arise up and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praises her. Many daughters have done virtuously, but you excel them all. Favor is deceitful and beauty is vain; but a woman that fears the Lord, she shall be praised. Give her of the fruit of her hands, ...let her own works praise her in the gates. (Psalms 6:3 RE, emphasis added)

You see this is high praise. And it's a proverb that applies to a virtuous woman. It's a proverb that applies to the Mother in Heaven. And it is a proverb that applies to the people that are His. This is a description of all of them. And so, the people that are His do these things.

Now, Isaiah 18:2. This gives you, I think, a pretty good idea of what we're going to start with: For the Lord shall comfort Zion; he will comfort all her waste places, and he will make her wildernesses like Eden and her desert like the garden of the Lord. Okay, you see the juxtaposition: wilderness/Eden, desert/garden of the Lord. It's got to be "made into." And how does He make it "into"? He takes a group of people who are not quarrelsome, bickering, and accusing of one another—who can dwell in peace and unite in their effort with one another—to peaceably pursue the objective of the labor. The desire of the slothful kills him, for his hands refuse to labor. He covets greedily all the day long, but the righteous gives and spares not (Proverbs 2:353 RE). Then there is T&C 43:

Behold, thus says the Lord unto my people: You have many things to do and to repent of, for behold, your sins have come up unto me and are not pardoned, because you seek to counsel in your own ways, and your hearts are not satisfied, and you obey not the truth, but have pleasure in unrighteousness.

Woe unto you rich men that will not give your substance to the poor, for your riches will canker your souls. And this shall be your lamentation in the day of visitation and of judgment and of indignation: The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and my soul is not saved!

Woe unto you poor men whose hearts are not broken, whose spirits are not contrite, and whose bellies are not satisfied, and whose hands are not stayed from laying hold upon other men's goods, whose eyes are full of greediness, who will not labor with their own hands. (T&C 43:4-6)

God cannot produce Zion for—or with—people who refuse to labor, because His promise is for the results of the labor and nothing else. Then we have this from Alma:

He also commanded them that the priests whom he had ordained should labor with their own hands for their support. And there was one day in every week that was set apart that they should gather themselves together to [keep] teach the people, and to worship the Lord their God, and also as often as it was in their power to assemble themselves together. And the priests were not to depend upon the people for their support, but for their labor they were to receive the grace of God, that they might wax strong in the spirit, having the knowledge of God, that they might teach with power and authority from God. (Mosiah 9:10 RE, emphasis added)

Churches today are broken, in disrepair, and have nothing to offer that will save people — because they refuse to follow this instruction. Preachers who preach for the monetary reward that they seek cannot have the grace of God or wax strong in the spirit, having the knowledge of God, so that they can teach with power and authority from God. One of the worst offenders is probably the church out of which most of you came, in which they fare sumptuously and have bodyguards and fly first class.

Some of you feel such inordinate anxiety that you want to flee right now in haste. Okay, here's the good news. Assuming that you cannot control your anxiety—and assuming that nothing I have said or can say will calm you down enough to allow the words that the Lord spoke to us in the Covenant itself to inform how you allow things to proceed—and you need to charge off right now, then here's the good news: Joseph Smith said all of North America was Zion. So, go to Philadelphia or Houston or Green Bay or Cape Cod; go anywhere you want, and call it Zion. And let them know you've gone through a flight to this place because of your anxiety because, today, everything is political, and you're here looking for a place of peace. And I can tell you, if you don't get rid of your anxieties before you flee, they'll accompany you there. And you'll find yourself just as miserable in Green Bay or Cape Cod or Philadelphia or Houston—because the problem is in you; it's not wherever you are.

We haven't been told to gather. And we haven't got a command to build a temple. And I'm assuming part of the reason why we've not yet gotten a commandment is because the people—the hearts of the people—that He wants to build His temple are apparently not the hearts that we presently possess. Therefore, we have to do something to prepare ourselves in order to be worthy of getting the commandment to do something on His errand.

As far as I know, none of us... And certainly I cannot provide for everyone. But I can provide for my own family. And each of you should labor to do the same. There are fantastic opportunities to build net worth, based upon what's going on right now in the housing market if you proceed cautiously and carefully and prudently and to prepare for yourself and your family.

I've heard it said that there are people who think that the Lord expects them to spend their time studying the Scriptures. And that that's the labor to which they've been called. I think that's absolutely fantastic. And when you get through gnawing on your leather-bound Scriptures (which may have some limited nutritional value), then I hope that the ink on the cotton (which certainly has fiber) won't kill you when your Scripture study leads you to eating your Scriptures to fill your growling belly. Because it doesn't matter what God gives you, you're not gonna be able to feed yourself. And if the labor of your hand consists in turning a page... Well, I would suggest we build a glass booth and put the person in the booth and put a hat out front for the entertainment value. And we can all drop our spare change in as we go by, watching the man who turns the page produce the labor necessary for Zion.

Because Zion is hard work; it's taking what is desolate and making it become something that it's not. It may be that right now we need to see more economic upheaval in order for the place where God intends that we acquire to go on the market —may not even be available for us at present. But I can tell you, if you run off in haste at this moment, you are doing something that the Lord has counseled against.

Now, one other point that has to be made as part of this talk.

Section 173 of the Teachings and Commandments says that:

[Tithing] was never to establish a wealthy general fund nor to invite the wrongful accumulation of wealth that has resulted from the long abuse of this law. The law was to be a light thing, easily borne by the faithful. Tithing was always to be taken from surplus (meaning unnecessary excess property) and increase (meaning what remains after all costs of the household have been paid). It was to be drawn out of the abundance in the possession of the giver so that there may be enough and to spare ["enough" in the hands of the giver so that they can provide for themselves and their household, "and to spare," meaning 1/10 of what is leftover goes as tithe], not from property required for their necessities. The tithes of this people are to be used for the poor among this people, if they want to become Mine. (T&C 173:1, emphasis added)

Tithing money should be used to help the poor. If you have enough and to spare, and you have given 10% to be used for the poor, and you still feel that you have surplus that is not needed, that's where money for a temple ought to come from. That's the money—not the tithing money. That's that surplus money—or the money that you have in excess of tithe, and you still want to give. That's to go to the temple.

Now, I'm saying that, and I've read a number of Scriptures. And I know that there are Scriptures that have been read today that can be used to justify one position in an argument or another position in an argument. In your temporal things you shall be equal in all things, and this not grudgingly; otherwise, the abundance of the manifestations of the spirit shall be withheld (T&C 62:4). That's a great Scripture to use to go attack someone because they're not giving the way you think they ought to give, and you think that they have more to give. So, now I've got a Scripture, and I can use it like a club to justify my criticism of someone else.

Okay. Let's find another Scripture we can use to do the other thing. How 'bout this one back here? The desire of the slothful kills him, for his hands refuse to labor. He covets greedily all the day long, but the righteous gives and spares not (Proverbs 2:353 RE). "You see? You're just coveting. When you expect me to help you with anything, that's covetous. Covetousness is ugliness itself, condemned frequently in Scripture, and that ought not be."

These Scriptures can be read as a cacophony of contradictions if that's what you want to do to argue with one another. But that's not the purpose of the Scriptures. The purpose is to make you wise. If you "have," and you feel the impulse by the conviction of what these Scriptures say to you (that you can and you should give more), then make sure that tithes are used for the benefit of the poor. And then, your excess can go to accomplish other things.

I know that there has been some criticism repeated to me that there is a general temple fund, and that that temple fund (which, by the way, has not been touched—not one cent)... They don't like that accumulating when there's need for the poor. When Christ was in the house of Simon the leper, who had been cured of his leprosy (which, as it turns out, was Judas' father—Judas Iscariot), a woman anointed Christ with a fragrant anointing oil that in today's money would be a $20,000 gesture. Okay? And there was a complaint voiced that this was an extravagant waste. The anointing of our Lord, preliminary to His death and burial—and He said it was done for that purpose—in order to secure for mankind, generally, the Resurrection as He came forth out of the grave; an anointing oil that had been kept for that very purpose. It wouldn't have mattered if it had been sold. Because as Christ pointed out, the poor you have with you always. It's part of the condition that we find in this world. It's not gonna go away.

If we had to make sure that there were no poor still around before we were able to do anything to raise money for a temple, we would never fulfill the coming command that He has told us is going to be given. And He's given us a season in which to prepare. If we don't prepare—and if the command comes and we cannot fulfill it—we may as well go back to Nauvoo and divert the shipment of lumber that comes down from the Wisconsin Timber Mission and use it to build Brigham Young's house and Heber C. Kimball's house and neglect the construction of the Nauvoo temple, just like they did before. But if we want to be prepared because we've been forewarned that there will come a command—and the expectation is that when the command comes, we're to obey it—then we need to do what we're reading in Scripture.

The tithes of this people are to be used for the poor among this people, if they want to become Mine (T&C 173:1). If all of the tithes gathered cannot take care of all of the poor, we fulfilled our command. And we can ask for others to help, as well. But we have an obligation, also, to prepare when the command comes so that we're not caught—like the saints in Nauvoo—unable, incapable, and without the ability to afford to do what's been asked of us.

Now, there's a... This is given in another context. It's section 105 of the Teachings and Commandments where they're actually trying to live a kind of United Order. It was an incorporation that they had various people that owned a part of. And in connection with that, against that background, the Lord said:

For it is expedient that I, the Lord, should make every man accountable as stewards over earthly blessings, which I have made and prepared for my creatures. [For] I, the Lord, stretched out the heavens and built the earth as a very handy work, and all things therein are mine. And it is my purpose to provide for my saints, for all things are mine, but it must needs be done in my own way. And behold, this is the way that I, the Lord, have decreed to provide for my saints: that the poor shall be exalted, in that the rich are made low, for the earth is full and there is enough and to spare. ...I...prepared all things, and have given unto the children of men to be agents unto themselves. [So] therefore, if any man shall take of the abundance which I have made and impart not his portion, according to the law of my gospel, unto the poor and the needy, he shall with Dives lift up his eyes in hell, being in torment. (T&C 105:4-5, emphasis added)

See, those words mean what those words say:

"The earth is full and there is enough..." That's one thing; that's when the labor of your hands has finally fed you. And then after you've made the ground sufficiently productive, there is not just enough, but there's also "and to spare." It is that "and to spare" that enough hard labor will eventually yield that can be used to help others. And not just the one who produces.

"If any man shall take of the abundance which I have made and impart not his portion, according to the law of my gospel..." Okay—of the abundance. That's not the "enough." That's the "to spare." You have to produce "enough"—and that in and of itself may be a mighty challenge in a desolate wilderness—before you get to the point that you are producing both "enough" and "to spare." And when you have enough to spare, that abundance needs to be imparted in order to allow others to come and labor alongside you.

So, that leads us then to this final thought. This was the definition of "mutual agreement" that was given that's in T&C section 174: As between one another, you choose to not dispute (T&C 174:1). When the definition was given, it was accompanied by the realization the Lord could have disputed every day of His life with someone. He deliberately chose to not contend. He was not an argumentative personality. He wouldn't have argued from a position of ignorance or from a position of being wrong. Had He chosen to argue, He would have been right in every argument. In other words, every day presented the Lord with an opportunity to go around correcting someone. "You're wrong. You need to do it this way. Oh, you're wrong, too! And you need to fix that and do it that... Oh, wait a minute. He's wrong. I got... Just fix that! Now you, man, you're really wrong." Can you imagine what our Scriptures would read like if our Lord chose to dispute? It would be much like some of our fellowship meetings.

Well, I understand there is a schedule, and I understand that I have just a little bit of time that is supposed to be left. But we have some folks here who came a long distance. I don't know if you both... They're brother and sister. I don't know if they want to both come up at the same time or come up... But Holidā—yeah?—and her brother, ~~Maksat~~ [Maksad], are going to talk to you for a few minutes and tell you an interesting story about how it is that folk from Turkmenistan happen to be here with us today.

Let me end by commending to you that however you approach these issues, be prayerful, be generous with one another, be kind in your judgment, be patient with one another. We're being asked to accomplish something that has only been accomplished twice before in the history of mankind. And it was accomplished in those days, in the first instance, with 365 years of opportunity to work through their problems and, in the second instance, among a homogeneous group of people. We are very different from one another. Sometimes diversity is not a strength. But diversity should not matter if you can come together with precept and reason, with kindness, and with patience.

I'd suggest that you probably can't get someone more diverse than the two folks, brother and sister, that we're gonna hear from here in a few moments. And yet, we can be one heart with them. And we can welcome them and learn from their experience. They come from an entirely different world than the one we live in. And we have so much we ought to be grateful for that they are genuinely grateful for; just the ability to talk freely is a great gift to them. We get to talk freely, and we use that freedom to say ugly things to one another. And that ought not be so.

God is working; things are progressing. Not everything that the Lord is up to among us is necessary to be talked about publicly at this point. But God's hand is not idle, and things are moving, and sacrifices are being made, and work is being done to fulfill the words of the covenant.

Of that I bear testimony and witness in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

The following transcript has been edited and expanded by Holida and Max to help make their comments more easily understood.

HOLIDA ANNAMURADOVA: Hello. Hi, everyone.

MAKSAD ANNAMURADOV: Can you guys hear us?

HOLIDA: Okay, so my name is Holida. It's like "holiday" without the "y." So, you know...

MAX: And my name is Maksad, but because Denver mentioned "Maksalt," and it sounds like a different version of it, I go for just Max so that it's easier for everyone. And, yeah.

HOLIDA: And we are from Turkmenistan. This is in Central Asia; it's by Afghanistan. And we came here... He came here three years ago, and I came here to U.S. two years ago. We came to Utah—it's Snow College in Ephraim—don't ask why did he [we] choose [it], because we don't know the reason. It's God's hand, probably. He had a great plan for us. And now we know why we chose Ephraim, Utah, like exactly that place.

So, it's ~~Muslim~~ [Islam] in my ~~religion~~ [country]. In my country, the religion is ~~Muslim~~ [Islam]. But we were not active Muslims (in my country) as a family. And we... We had a lot of hardship. We, as a child... I remember, we grow up in labor all the time—laboring ~~as~~ [with] our parents, together, to help them. So, we did not have easy... We did not have [an] easy life. And suddenly, we had a hard time in our family with my brother—that he got [a] really bad sickness, Hepatitis C—and then my mother got that, too. So, my mom was, like, hopeless. We were all, as a family, [we] lost our hope. We didn't see any door to go out of that darkness.

And then they went to Iran [to get treatment]. And the Iranians, they taught them to start practicing the Muslim religion five times prayer. And then we started [practicing Islam religion]. It's like four or five months, and we seek for God, even [if] we didn't have anyone to teach us. At home, we prayed to God, even [though] we did not [know] how to pray; we tried our best. We did not know that we can talk to God, because they [the priests] did not teach us like that. No one around you talks to God. They don't know how to talk to God. So, we just did it [our best to find the true God].

Suddenly, on the TV, [the] Ukraine Channel opens up, and there one man [an apostle] is talking/teaching about Christ. 10,000s of people are sitting and giving testimonies of Christ, that they're getting healed—the same Hepatitis C that ~~my parents got~~ my brother and my mom got. And my mom is like, no way. This is my only hope. I will try this. Whoever says what I don't trust, but I will try believing in Christ, because they are not crazy—10,000's [of] people believing in Christ? Why would they believe if they don't see any benefit [result] by believing?

So, we started, we tried; we tried to believe. And as soon as we started praying and calling Jesus' name, the change started in our life. Miracles started happening. He [Max] started being healed, and my mom started being healed [from the sickness].

And suddenly [one day], we found the U.S. program that's going to help us, teach us, and prepare to U.S. college. Because five years ago, we did not even imagine or dream [of] coming to U.S. because it was totally impossible for us. We did not have any financial availability for that or any imagination. We did not have [it].

MAX: And I was looking for... First, I studied in that program, and I was looking for [a] college to choose. And then I noticed Snow College in the middle of Utah. And it's out in the middle of [the] desert. And people asked me, like, "Why are you going there?" And "I don't know, I guess it's, you know, God's call to go." So, I...

Before coming here, actually, when I told them (my people and my country) about "I'm going to Utah," and that they will, "Oh, don't go to Utah. They're all polygamists in there." And I was like, "Ummm...is that really true?" And I had to do my own research, you know. And it's so funny that outside of the U.S. (probably maybe inside the U.S., as well), Utah is stereotyped as being Mormons, and yeah...

So, I came to Snow College, and this was my second semester. And I met one of my friends. And her parents were... She and her parents were interested in Denver's readings [teachings], and they persuaded us. They... So, we were seeking to know the truth. The very first semester I was here, two missionaries came to my apartment. And they... And I had a talk with them. And I told them that I'm seeking for truth, and I'm not feeling like joining the church right now. And that they gave me a Book of Mormon for the first time. I did not open the Book of Mormon beforehand. And I opened it, and I thought I'd start reading it. I read the Bible before—little bit. Then as soon as I started reading it, I said, like, "Man, this must be like a Scripture because it's boring," like Denver mentioned that. It's... But then I never opened that after that. Then after I met this people who were interested in the fellowship and the gospel of Jesus Christ, I started with a passion reading the Book of Mormon, and I...

My sister was also planning to come, and I... She was planning to go somewhere else. And I was like, "Oh, come to Snow College... "

HOLIDA: And I was like, "Oh, no, there are so many Turkmens ~~ether~~ students. I want to go somewhere else. It's too small-town for me. It's so boring over there." I was saying, "No." And he [Max] kept saying, "Yes." And I wasn't ready to come that year. And I was, like, praying. I had so many tests; it was so competitive to get the scholarship so we can cover our tuition. And I was like, "No." And something [a voice] in my heart said, "You can do this." And Christ... I saw Christ's hand in my life; He started opening the path. He started little by little helping [me with] the exams to pass. And I'm like, "Okay, even [if] I am not ready, He is ready.

So, He helped me to go through all those and to be chosen among the students. So, I got the scholarship and come that year [2019], and after two months, COVID started and [the] country was shut down. I wouldn't be here at that time if He wouldn't, like, give me motivate me. Yeah, so...

So I... We came here. And as I said, I was looking for, again, church. And then, it was Mormon[ism]. I never heard Mormonism, anything [about] Book of Mormon. Missionaries—they caught me. And they kept messaging me, and like, "Hey, you are wonderful. Do you want to get baptized? Do you want [us] to come? Do you want us to teach?" And something in my heart was pushing [rejecting]; it was saying, "No." And I prayed, "God, like, show me the true path. Show me the path that you want me to walk on."

And He said, "No, don't join; just wait." And I rejected them. And I didn't go to church. We were—just [the] two of us—different from everyone because all our other Turkmen friends are Muslims and [the] other[s]—all of them are Mormons. So, we didn't see anyone like us!

And we met his [Max's] friend; [she] invited us for the Thanksgiving, and we met with their parents, and they listened to us. And then, they noticed that we are looking for truth. Then they accepted/they saw us like their children. They loved us. I could feel so much love, so much care, so much passion in them that they kindly started persuading us, kindly shared this new Restoration, the Book of Mormon, about Joseph, all the history—[and] we were open. Why? Because we did not have any foundation about Christianity. No one taught us [before]; we did not go to church; we did not know anything [about Jesus Christ]. So, anything—everything—was like new, and I could feel in deep [the depth] of my heart, it was something different. These words cannot be told by man. It should be something from God. Because the emptiness in my heart was filled when I learned the truth.

And then, it's like everything started changing. And I told my mom, "Hey, I found a good religion/good truth here." It's like, "I don't know what religion is this, but this is a good thing! They're talking about good stuff!" And I started telling about that, and my mom is like, "Oh, no, that sounds strange," because I was telling about Heavenly Mother, and it was like [a] new idea, right?

And she was like, "Okay, you can continue your way, but I'm going to watch this channel — Ukraine Channel—and listen to him [the apostle on tv]."

And then I said, "Mom, don't listen to me. Just ask Christ. Why don't you pray and ask which path is true, which path you should go?"

And then, she called us ~~tomorrow~~ [the next day]. And she's like, "The channel's disappeared: I can't find it." Just no, no channel. And she's like, "Okay, tell me more about that religion!" Then she got really, like, interested; she's eager to learn. From that time... It was last year—March—that we started moving on this movement/in this journey. And from that time, I teach my mom every day (almost) because she is really eager to learn. And it's so hard to translate [the] Book of Mormon because I barely understand the old language. I couldn't even, like... We read... We opened [the Book of Mormon], and we closed [it] because, "It came to pass..." and we are like, "What's that?" And we barely learned the English! Don't say, "Again learn English, the older version."

MAX: It was a total[ly] new English, actually. It's a different version.

HOLIDA: Yeah. But with Christ's power, I learned that everything is possible. We had passion to learn/gain truth. And then we started reading it. Even [though] it was hard, using a lot of dictionaries, asking people, asking for help. And those people [who accepted the Restoration] started teaching us; it was great help. Because I can't imagine where to get the information, how to learn what is true/what is not. But with Christ, all the time asking [in] my heart [from Him], it was really helpful.

And so, we started our beliefs [of Christ] six years ago, and after five [one] years ago, we came to this movement. And after that, I started... My mom started teaching our other relatives who are in a hard time. So, she was, like, just telling everyone—everyone on the, like, whoever she sees, and the people were, like, "You are on a wrong path; you will go to hell. You are not Muslim. You changed [converted]." We are like, "Oh, okay, whatever." You know? "Whatever! You will see." And after one year/two years, those people who's been told [about Christ], they are coming and like [asking], "Did you talk about Christ or something? Can you tell more about it?" So, they felt in their heart that they need it, because they saw the miracles in our life, [and one of them was] that our bodies get healed.

We came to the place that no one can imagine in [among] our relatives, we were the only two children, like among our, like, all relatives/ all the village. So, everyone looked at us and like, "They dream, ~~how they did~~ How did they get there?" they ask. And I say, "I don't know. It's God; it's Christ." I kept giving that testimony of Christ to everyone. And then they started getting interested.

So, there are like around 15 to 20 people who are really interested, like, they're like, "Send me more information [truth about Jesus Christ]." And I try [to] do my best to translate these things and share my understandings and teach them. And we have Sunday class where we teach people, our people, these things—the Restorations—and they don't go to any religion; they don't join any church, but they learn these things [restored gospel/truth].

So, as you can see, as God says, "I... My hand is everywhere." And He will bring [people from] all four sides of the Earth to the Zion. And I can feel that; I saw that in my life, that [from Christ we could come from] ~~through~~ other side of the world. So, don't ever doubt about God's power. Because if He could bring the people from [the] other side of the world, finding and bringing [them] to this path, then what He can't do? Nothing! He can do everything. Nothing is impossible for Him.

And we ask your prayers for our people so ~~they can~~ we can find a way to send more information [translated books/gospels] for them and help them. But my country is closed right now. So, my parents want to come here—really, like so much—because we are the only children. They want to come and join here in this movement and be here physically [with us].

And also, this is our first conference coming here, and it was so great. Thank you so much for welcoming us. Thank you for smiling at us. It means a lot to us. And great—everyone helped us, everyone is helping [in] some ways, and we are very thankful for each of you/ each of your support, and we are happy to be here. We are happy to walk towards Zion. I can see that everyone is talking about Christ—everyone. I don't have to say, "Know ye the Lord?" because everyone knows the Lord from the least to the greatest. Isn't this the beginning of Zion? We should keep laboring and doing [God's will] and having faith in Christ.

So, this is our impossible story which is possible to [for] Christ.

2021.10.17 Comments about Joseph Smith

At the Griffin Home in Manti, Utah

17 October 2021

DENVER: Apparently, if you accept the doctrine of Christ—which is best defined in the Book of Mormon—that would suggest that you accept the Book of Mormon, which suggests that you believe in Joseph; and therefore, everyone has in common recognition of Joseph as someone through whom the Lord accomplished a great work.

I grew up with a Baptist mother and a father who believed in God but doubted the legitimacy of churches, generally, and the Baptist ministers, particularly. But my mom would make a fried chicken dinner every Sunday and invite the minister (whichever one it was at the time) over after the sermonizing was done, and we'd have fried chicken and the potatoes and gravy, which, by the way, endeared me to the whole "Baptist minister coming over" thing. But it was my father's skepticism about the legitimacy of that particular brand of Christianity that sort of alerted me to the possibility that churches may not be all they're cracked up to be.

We grew up next door to a Catholic family. And I rather liked the Catholic approach because you could raise hell all week and go in and confess; and, you know, a few confessions later, you're good to go again and raise hell for the next week. And that sounded kind of useful, if not particularly "authentically Christian." And I couldn't indulge in the excesses. (My mom thought statuary stuff was "making graven images.")

So, literally, I did not belong to any church until the Mormon missionaries hounded me when I was on active duty in the military. And they presented the Book of Mormon, and they presented their discussions, and I put up with them. I recall bringing cigars and a six-pack of beer to the Mormon family's house to listen to the felt-board presentations (back in those days). And they didn't want us smoking cigars or drinking beer during the missionary discussions. I assured them the beer, at least, would make things a bit more interesting. But they thought that was, you know, evil incarnate.

And I didn't particularly like the Book of Mormon. I didn't particularly like anything that they were saying. But there was something about the Joseph Smith account that struck me as incredibly authentic—because if God worked with and cared about people anciently and sent His Son, and His Son had died as a sacrifice to redeem all mankind, then it made little sense why, immediately after that sacrifice, God would then abandon all those who believed in His Son. And it just struck me that the reformers had not claimed God did anything directly with them. They claimed that the errors they detected were based upon an evaluation of the Scriptures that had been left behind by those to whom God had spoken and that they detected the errors. And therefore, Christianity was amiss. And Martin Luther discovered that there were verses in the book of Romans that could justify a plan of salvation that was not dependent upon a priestly magisterium to hold keys that God gave to Peter, but that you could, by faith, be saved. And so, Martin Luther's evaluation of the Scripture really opened the door not just for Lutheranism but, in turn, for every particular Protestant off-break of the Catholic mother.

But Joseph was saying something altogether different. Joseph was saying that the Scriptures justified taking a case of faith directly to God and asking Him and that God can answer you directly. It was revolutionary in terms of how you define Christianity because it's no longer dependent upon priestly authority and a magisterium recognizing that they held keys that had once been entrusted to Peter and passed down generationally, nor was it dependent upon someone feeling within themselves an inspired calling, and by faith, they had now overcome things. This was something very, very different. Joseph Smith was saying God talked, and God was talking; that Christianity was no longer an artifact of the past, dependent upon echoes that may or may not have been well-preserved through the corridors of history down to now, but it was, instead, God talking immediately and directly.

And as I read the Joseph Smith story (or history) as they handed it out in the pamphlet and as it appears in the Pearl of Great Price of the LDS Scriptures, there was one line in there that just [snaps fingers]... It struck me as so candidly honest that this would not be written by someone who was the vile deceiver that the Baptists accused Mormons of following, nor could it have been written by someone who was really pretentious and dishonest.

(Being of very tender years, and persecuted by those who ought to have been my friends and to have treated me kindly — and if they supposed me to be deluded, to have endeavored in a proper and affectionate manner, to have reclaimed me), I was left to all kinds of temptations. (Joseph Smith History 2:10 RE)

Well, why would the reaction to what Joseph had to say provoke anger, bitterness, and jealousy rather than, "Oh, you poor child. You're deluded, and we need to reclaim you. Let's show you that kindness and the tenderness that..." I mean, he was approximately 14 years old at the time. I don't know in Sanpete County if it's still true because of the damn internet, but a 14-year-old farm boy who is generally a tender creature, a naive creature. I've got 14-year-old grandkids that have been raised in rural circumstances, and they are very unacquainted with men and things, which is exactly how Joseph described his youth. So, why was he provoking this spirit of bitterness and this spirit of contention, and no one was endeavoring to reclaim him?

Well, it was the Joseph Smith story that actually kept me listening to the missionaries. And then they had something that was called a "Fathers and Sons Outing" and a Priesthood Restoration celebration. I was in the military. We were on the coast of New Hampshire, but they were holding this thing at the birthplace of Joseph Smith in Sharon, Vermont. So, we all trudged up to Sharon, Vermont in a caravan of cars, camped out overnight, and there were talks. And I went down to a visitor's center where very amiable old people manned the desk, and they had a copy of this blue book called Doctrine and Covenants and Pearl of Great Price. And I wanted to buy one 'cuz I was interested in it, and they gave me one for free. So, I hustled out of there before they changed their mind and decided they wanted to charge me for it. And the fellow that had taken me up to the Fathers and Sons dog-eared Doctrine and Covenants section 76, which was the Vision of the Three Degrees of Glory.

Now, the Joseph Smith History had struck me with passages that seemed very authentic, but D&C section 76 struck me as something that was altogether from another world. It hailed from Heaven. It touched me. It reached me in a way in which, you know, Corinthians had not.

And I got very serious about investigating things. But, alas, I mean... Mormon families that I had been exposed to in the investigation process lived a lifestyle that was very different from everything I was acquainted with. I got the conviction that I ought to have been baptized, but I despaired at what kind of a Mormon I would make because Mormons were so much better than I was. They didn't smoke. They didn't drink. They went to church on Sunday. They actually owned and wore white shirts and ties. They had suits and stuff. And they read Scriptures. And the Bible, to me, was a cure for insomnia. It wasn't... There was nothing in it that I could relate to (a lot of words). My mom had read the New Testament verses to us at breakfast, and some of them were catchy—For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son (John 2:2 RE). Yeah, see, so some verses stick with you, and they're nice, but the Scriptures did not appeal.

I felt the obligation. I went ahead with baptism, but I despaired at what kind of Mormon I would make on the other side of the waters of baptism. But I went ahead, and I was baptized, and everything changed. The Scriptures came alive. Joseph talked about how the more mysterious passages of Scripture were opened up to their minds within a manner that they could never previously attain to. I was shocked at what happened with reading the Scriptures; I couldn't get enough of 'em. Who wanted to smoke and drink? This was something really interesting! God was now involved with the world again—which I had never supposed.

The summer before this, I had discovered J.R.R. Tolkien, and I'd read The Hobbit, and then I'd read the trilogy of [The Lord of] the Rings, and I'd done it all in, like, a month and a half because it was just gripping. That world came alive. Middle-earth was a real deal: Mount Mordor, Mount Doom, the caves, the caverns.

The Scriptures became more lively to me than had Tolkien's Hobbit and trilogy. It was a stunning transition. I couldn't get enough. I bought and I read... Back then, they had what was called "The Seventy's Mission Bookstore," which in New Hampshire consisted of the back porch of Sister Long's house. Sister Long had an enclosed porch that was windowed up and shut off against the elements, and her back porch was filled up with books.

I bought and I read every biography of every one of the early Restoration church fathers. I bought and I read B.H. Roberts' volume that summarized... His seven volumes that summarized church history. I bought and I read the documentary history that was the original effort in the Joseph Smith Papers. I read everything I could get my hands on because it was lively. It was something real and concrete and appealing.

I probably had been a member of the church (baptized in '73, started law school at the J. Reuben Clark Law School at BYU at '77)... In the four years between baptism and the time I started law school, I think I had exhausted the available library of materials about LDS founding and history and teachings.

There is only one doctrine of Christ, and you're right to lay hold on that. But there is precepts and principles and commandments and teachings and mysteries that go well beyond the doctrine of Christ. The doctrine of Christ is how you get your feet on the road in order to progress. But having my feet on that road, I wanted to know as much as I could know.

Well, after I had exhausted the available library and thought myself a well-informed Latter-day Saint, along came the Leonard Arrington Church Historian's Office and D. Michael Quinn. And things start rolling out of the Church History Library that D. Michael Quinn was repackaging. And he sounded to me like someone that had an axe to grind, and he was being incredibly unfair. He had an agenda, and his agenda was to do something to mess with retelling church history in a way that corrupted it and challenged faith—and it was wrong of him.

So, he excited me to look into the whole history of the LDS Church and the Restoration at another level. But he did something very different from what other historians had done. Largely what they had done was base their histories upon secondary sources. I mean that the Documentary History and the B.H. Roberts materials and then a handful of other source material, secondary, were what they used, and D. Michael Quinn was now taking stuff directly out of the Church History Library and quoting materials that weren't particularly available. So, I made it a quest to try and find the same original source material that Quinn had relied upon in order to show the errors, the unfairness, the bias that he'd allowed to creep in.

He got dismissed from BYU, he got discharged from the LDS Church Historian's Office, and he finished publishing a number of things and then donated his papers to Yale University (because he did not trust the University of Utah or Brigham Young University to let the papers be made public). So, he donated a large volume of material to Yale University. And then Signature Books (which has an axe to grind themselves) started publishing typewritten transcripts of the original journals that much of which Quinn had had access to in the LDS Historian's Office—now they were rolling out in limited numbers. And they were expensive, and they're rare books, and I don't know why anyone would buy them unless they were on a quest to try and get to the bottom of something. But I spent a small fortune acquiring a library of original source material. And I started reading the same stuff that Quinn had read and relied upon when he did his history-making.

I don't believe that D. Michael Quinn had an axe to grind. In many respects, he pulled punches that he didn't need to pull. His history of the church—it comes from a vantage point that I would differ with, but I see the justification for the conclusions that he reached and for the stuff that he published. And the biggest disagreement that I would have with him is that I don't think the narrative about the origin of plural marriage coming through Joseph Smith is defensible. The best you can say is that there's not enough proof to decide that issue one way or the other. But you certainly can't say that you know for certain that it originated with Joseph Smith.

What Joseph was doing appears to be as Richard Bushman said: It appeared to be related to some kind of familial abundance in the afterlife. It didn't have anything to do with taking plural wives and bearing children in this life. Brigham Young changed that kind of afterlife familial interconnectivity into a practice of taking more wives and having children.

There is not a single child that was born to Joseph Smith that didn't come through Emma Smith. She's the mother of all his children. The stories about Fanny Alger are grossly distorted. If you go back and you look at the contemporaneous material, there really isn't anything. Even Oliver Cowdery withdrew the allegations that he made when he was in front of the Far West High Council, called up for disparaging Joseph and insinuating that he had had some kind of inappropriate liaison with her. She had nine children from a husband; Joseph fathered eight children through Emma. Both of them were in their prime fertility when the alleged liaison took place, and yet, there's no children as issue from that relationship.

The most scandalous account of that is given by William McLellin, and he wasn't there! He says he heard something from Emma which was told to him over two decades after "whatever happened" happened, and then he reports it in the 1870s. And he's one of the two primary sources, the other being Levi Hancock, son of Mosiah Hancock; and Mosiah didn't leave a record. And the only thing about the McLellin account is the punctuation and the spelling: "TRANSACTION" all in caps, "in the barn," exclamation point, exclamation point. And he's writing this to one of the sons of Joseph Smith. Well, what was the transaction? Apparently, Joseph practiced sealing of people together in a relationship for the next life. "Sealing" became a code word for marriage. But sealing did not mean marriage, at least not at the beginning: sealing included adoption; sealing included a number of other things—not marriage and certainly not marital relationships.

Well, I went to dinner with D. Michael Quinn, and he was a great conversation starter. He said, "You know, I think your position on Joseph Smith and polygamy is bovine feces," (but he didn't use that; he used a more colorful expression). And that's because he relies upon all of the historical material that got ginned up in the 1860s, 70s, 80s, and 90s. So, I posed this question back to him. I said, "If you take the historical record, and you limit your inquiry to what existed on June 27, 1844 and before then, and you rely upon nothing but the material that existed while Joseph Smith was alive, can you prove that Joseph Smith practiced plural marriage?"

And he thought about it for a few minutes. I could tell the wheels were turning. And I said, "Yeah, Far West won't do it, will it?"

And he thought for another minute. He said, "Okay. Okay. I understand where you're coming from."

So, the problem with that subject is that it gets all changed after the 1852 talk given in General Conference by Orson Pratt when he was told by Brigham to go to the podium and announce the plural marriage thing, and then everything changes. And the Church Historian's Office began to alter historical documents. You can see proof of that in the Joseph Smith Papers.

And so, I wound up being an apologist for the church and a Gospel Doctrine teacher for about nearly three decades teaching the four standard works as you go through. I taught Gospel Doctrine in a Pleasant Grove ward, in multiple Alpine wards, and in multiple Sandy, Utah wards for decades. And I—even though we went through the four standard works serially—I never taught the same lesson twice. I wasn't interested in plowing and boring myself with the same material. I tried to push it further. Got to the point that at the end... Going through the Book of Mormon, they give you eight chapters to cover in a 45-minute, and I would cover a verse or a phrase within a verse; and you know, the rest of the material you just... You've got to read that on your own. We're not gonna get there.

I've come to the conclusion that the Book of Mormon was a far more materially dense book with far greater volumes of information included within it than any of the other volumes of Scripture that we have. I've also come to the conclusion that Joseph Smith, throughout his ministry, understated everything, that he never overstated a proposition, that he never gave us anything beyond the veil that he was not required to give, that Joseph Smith was everything that he claimed to be and a whole lot more.

There was a trendline that occurred in the Restoration, where Joseph—even after the publication of the Book of Mormon and after the initial success that the book began to have—was still susceptible of being influenced by bigger personalities than him. I don't know that any of you have spent enough time with it, but I think in the marriage, Emma was the more dominant personality. I think Joseph deferred to her. I think she was trusted; she was better educated; and he looked to her for assistance, counsel, guidance, and that she was a stronger personality than was Joseph.

Joseph continually read into other people the same sentiments that were in his own heart. Therefore, he was continually being duped by pretenders and con-men. That followed him right into Nauvoo with John C. Bennett—because he assumed John Bennett was just as good and decent and noble as he (Joseph) was, and John Bennett was not. He was a horrible character.

Well, one of the people that showed up early on was Sidney Rigdon, who was an accomplished orator and a persuasive minister who had a fountain of biblical understanding and preaching competency that wowed Joseph Smith. And part of the trajectory of the Restoration early on was influenced by the counsel and the guidance that Joseph, who was younger, took from Sidney Rigdon, who was older and more acquainted with men and things. And one of the things that Sidney Rigdon really wanted to see was a New Testament church revived.

And of course, one of the things we learn from the Scriptures is that if you ask, and you ask often enough, no's can turn into yes's. And the lack of permission to give 116 pages into the custody of Martin Harris can turn into permission to give the 116 pages to Martin Harris, with certain restrictions—which would not be honored; and therefore, they got forfeited. But God had planned ahead for that failing. And Joseph is told right out in one revelation, "Joseph, you cannot see what's in the hearts of other men. You're no good at that." And it plagued him throughout his life.

Well, with Sidney's influence, the church organization tumbles out, and we get a presidency, and we get a Quorum of Twelve, and we get a Quorum of Seventy, and we get stakes that are modeled after the larger magisterium, and we get priesthood authority, and we get hierarchy. And that continues right into the 1838 crisis in which the hierarchy in Zion...

See, there was a presidency in Kirtland, and there was a presidency in Zion. And the presidency in Zion was David Whitmer, Oliver Cowdery. And they were the successors to Joseph Smith—if he was not gonna be around, David Whitmer was gonna run the church. And the group in Far West in Missouri (the presidency in Zion) turn on Joseph—members of the Quorum of the Twelve (David Whitmer, Oliver Cowdery), these people (John Whitmer), they wind up excommunicated from the church. They wind up, several of them, signing affidavits that help get Joseph held in prison for treason and rebellion.

And so, the magisterium of priestly authority that God established to roll things out has now turned on the founder of the Restoration. And Joseph Smith is in prison as a consequence of that, and he's left for nearly half a year. He writes a letter at a moment when he really didn't know when or if he would ever get out of prison. And things change dramatically. This is what he wrote from a dungeon in Missouri:

Behold, there are many called, but few are chosen...why are they not chosen? Because their hearts are set so much upon the things of this world, and aspire to the honors of men, that they do not learn this one lesson — that the rights of the Priesthood are inseparably connected with the Powers of Heaven and...the Powers of Heaven cannot be controlled nor handled, only upon principles of righteousness. That they may be conferred upon us, it is true, but when we undertake to cover our sins or to gratify our pride, our vain ambition, or to exercise control, or dominion, or compulsion upon the souls of the children of men in any degree of unrighteousness, behold, the Heavens withdraw themselves, the spirit of the Lord is grieved, and when it is withdrawn, Amen to the priesthood or the authority of that man. (T&C 139:5)

Joseph's in the process of deconstructing the entire priestly magisterium (sitting in a dungeon in Missouri) because it's proven to be potentially treacherous. He goes on to say:

No power or influence can or ought to be maintained by virtue of the priesthood; only by persuasion, by long-suffering, by gentleness and meekness, and by love unfeigned, by kindness and pure knowledge, which shall greatly enlarge the soul; without hypocrisy and without guile. (Ibid. v.6)

See, imagine what the group out of which you have become disaffected would look like if no claim by anyone to any authority at any time was given any credence by anyone, but it was, instead, necessary that you had to be persuaded by the pure knowledge of the speaker before you said, "Amen," to any proposition. Control and compulsion and dominion could not be exercised if the burden was placed upon the preacher, the priest, the minister, the president, the bishop to persuade you first that what they were asking of you or preaching to you was predicated upon truth and light and knowledge.

Well, everything has rather turned into a murky mess from the history to the current claims of leadership. My suggestion to any of you would be that you view claims that people make today of holding authority—whether it's within a priestly establishment or hierarchy or some chest-thumper claiming to be "mighty and strong"—that you evaluate that based upon the way in which Joseph Smith pulled the rug out from under every one that would have the audacity to make such a claim and to say, "Not so."

If you've got something of light and truth, share it. Show me by your pure knowledge something that is of value. Edify me. Give me truth. But if you've got nothing but your claim to authority, then I can detect you right now as someone aspiring to have control and compulsion and dominion. And I'm a refugee from that nonsense, and I will not go back.

So, there it is.

In the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

I'm going north. Thank you.

I don't know—how long have I talked?

AUDIENCE: Like, forty minutes.

DENVER: Okay. We've had people who've had to go already, and I envy them that. So...yeah. Do you want to hear from her [Stephanie Snuffer]?

STEPHANIE: No, no, no, no.

AUDIENCE: Yes.

AUDIENCE: Heck yes we do!

AUDIENCE: What about a couple of questions?

AUDIENCE: Yeah, questions.

DENVER: She'll answer anything you want... [laughter]. Questions can always be asked, but answers are another thing.

Yeah?

QUESTION 1: So, what do you think it's gonna look like when Christ comes back or, like, when all the problems are fixed, and we become unified and build Zion, say? What is it gonna look like for, like, authority? Does that make sense? Like, how are we gonna be organized, is it Patriarchal Order or... What is it? What's the ideal system that you think Joseph wanted to set up that kind of got kaboshed, you know?

DENVER: I don't think that... In the book Gospel Doctrine, Joseph F. Smith said one thing I really agree with (and that one is quotable, and that one is worthwhile). He said, "The government of God is a family."

And I think that having our hearts turned to the Fathers is a way of expressing in a short — you know—phrase the idea that we began with a family that consisted of Adam and Eve; and both of them, in the garden, were exercising the priestly functions—both Adam and Eve. He was the high priest; she was the high priestess. And they were the ones to whom the government belonged.

When Cain slew Abel, he did that to dispossess the heir (the one that would succeed the father). He murdered Abel; he did not murder Adam—because Cain did not want the position held by Adam to be subject to threat or death or overthrow. He wanted it. He envied it. He wanted to occupy that position, and he aspired to that role.

God had other plans, and Seth was born, and the right of government passed to him. But the original structure of the family was patriarchal and matriarchal and familial. And I believe that when we are organized again in the Millennium into something that makes sense, that the sensibility will reckon from a family and that all who survive into that will be put into a family relationship—and everyone will be aunts and uncles, cousins and nephews, fathers and grandfathers, grandmothers. It will not be organized, in my view, outside of the family line because there's really no reason to create redundancy. The eternities are a place in which there are families. It'll just be getting us back into a familial connection that we'll take with us on into eternity.

QUESTION 2: Do you believe that Joseph Smith will return as the Davidic Servant?

DENVER: Well, he denounced that idea as a doctrine of the devil, so I doubt it.

AUDIENCE: Where did he denounce that as the doctrine of the devil?

DENVER: When Matthias came and claimed... Well, when the guy who claimed to be Matthias reincarnated (or returned to Earth) came to him, Joseph rejected the idea as a doctrine of devils and said he had cast the devil out in bodily form after he told Matthias, you know, "Get out of here. You're deceived, and you're teaching a doctrine of devils."

Look, I forget which section of the Doctrine and Covenants it is—I was just reading it in the new Scriptures, but...

Christ goes to the top of the Mount of Transfiguration. On the Mount of Transfiguration, we get in this revelation in the Doctrine and Covenants a greater explanation of what took place there. What Peter, James, and John were shown was what was gonna transpire on the world down to the latest generation. Coming out of that incident—so now, Peter, James, and John know what's gonna happen down to the latest generation—coming out of that, Peter and James say, "Don't leave us in the spirit world. Let us come speedily into your kingdom," which means: "Resurrect us, and get us out of the spirit world so we're not there." John says, "Let me tarry here on this side; I don't want to go there."

If it's possible to recycle through the spirit world and what they were looking at was, "I'm gonna die; I'm gonna come back. I'm gonna die; I'm gonna come back. I'm gonna die, and I'm gonna come back," it wouldn't have said, "They looked upon the long absence of their spirit from their body as a prison" (see T&C 31:4). They would have said, "Well, we're in and we're out of prison. So, cool enough, we'll just hang here, and we'll do our thing." And John would not have needed to say, "Let me tarry in the flesh," if it's possible to go and return.

So, I think Joseph was right when he said doctrine of devils, and that when he threw... What was the name of the guy? I mean it was... He called him Matthias. But he was a roundabout preacher that made a thing off that.

Yeah?

QUESTION 3: So, for me, if I was to sum up if someone asked me what the point of your remarks was, it sounds like you have a concern that someone in our group is claiming to be a "mighty and strong one." So, I'm just asking you really directly: Do you have... Have you heard (from whatever source) that there's someone in our group that claims to be a mighty and strong one? That's one part of my question.

The second part: Under what conditions do you believe a mighty and strong one would be called to set in order the Latter-day Saint Church? Do you subscribe to that? And how would you recognize that person? And do you think they need to have their house set in order?

DENVER: [Chuckles]

STEPHANIE: Okay, wait, wait. I want to answer something first. Can I answer something first?

DENVER: Sure.

AUDIENCE: She speaks.

STEPHANIE: Oh, I do speak. You know, I guess that's an interesting... 'cuz I've been sitting here listening, and I didn't take that from it at all. And I think a lot of it might have more to do with...

Oh, never mind. You go ahead and answer.

QUESTION 3 (continued): I'm not trying to be contentious!

STEPHANIE: No, no, no...no.

QUESTION 3 (continued): You said if someone comes to mind you... thumping their chest and thinking they could be the mighty and strong one... I haven't heard of anybody doing that, and I'm just curious...

AUDIENCE: Are you talking about the LDS Church in that scenario, or... there's any church...?

DENVER: Ok, let me clarify, let me clarify... I know nothing about your group other than having gone to lunch with a fellow named Curtis that Jeremy Hoop...

AUDIENCE: Mark Curtis.

DENVER: ...Mark Curtis, who Jeremy Hoop, a friend of mine... If you saw the movie Charlie, he was...

AUDIENCE: Or Testaments.

DENVER: He was the romantic interest of "Charlie" in that movie. Jeremy Hoop took...

STEPHANIE: That's how I know him.

DENVER: ...he and I to lunch. And mostly, he talked about how he didn't believe in eternal marriage, that he thought that his study of Scripture led him to the conclusion that there was no eternality to marriage, which...

AUDIENCE: Really? That's weird.

DENVER: ...was what stuck out in that lunch.

I'm not saying anything about this group in particular. I just know that around every corner, in every fragmented group... You've got your Allreds, and you've got your... What's the name of the guy that got arrested in the red...

AUDIENCE: Daybell.

DENVER: No, no, not Chad Daybell—although I'm pretty sure he would have claimed he was mighty and strong. No, the guy that's down in prison that...

AUDIENCE: Jeffs.

DENVER: Warren Jeffs, yeah! The Cadillac Escalade with the $50,000 in cash in the back end of the... I mean, being mighty and strong really pays well, apparently!

But no, I don't know anything about anyone making any claims among your group. But if there is or are, if there's 50 of 'em here, then that wouldn't surprise me because they're everywhere. I think there's one down in South America who has fabricated a phony set of brass plates, and he claims he's... I think he claims he's Joseph Smith reincarnated.

STEPHANIE: Okay, and just so that, you know, where I was headed with that was that that tends to be a strong reaction for him because people think that of him.

DENVER: Yeah.

STEPHANIE: There, I mean... You know, you don't have to go too far into the depths of the internet to read, you know...

AUDIENCE: People think he is the Davidic Servant?

STEPHANIE: Well, or people think he thinks, or people think he... or whatever. I mean, just whatever iteration of...

DENVER: I think...

STEPHANIE: ...that thought process is.

DENVER: I think that...

COMMENT: Is it the followers of you think that you are, too?

STEPHANIE: I don't...

DENVER: I think—and I would proclaim it from the rooftops—I am "the one foolish and weak." I don't make any claims to have anything that requires you to respect me. If I can't persuade you to a truth, if I can't share light, then you ought to dismiss what I have to say altogether. I believe we probably need someone to help fix a whole lot of things, but they're not gonna do it by proclaiming themselves to be something great and high and mighty.

If you are something, then go get the work done! I assume that if they achieve some- thing, that that will identify them, but hollow claims and bragging and asserting entitlement to any kind of respect or position, to me is nonsense. The greatest who ever walked on this earth was asked about His authority. And what was Christ's response?

AUDIENCE: To do my Father's work.

DENVER: No, He said, "I'll tell you what my authority is if you'll tell me what John's authority was." And then they argued among themselves: "Well, if we say that He came from God, then He's gonna ask us why we didn't believe him. And if we say He's not from God, the crowd's gonna get mad because the crowd thinks John's from God... So, we can't tell you." And Jesus says, "Well then, neither can I tell you what my authority is."

I mean, when Christ died, the "He called Himself the Son of God" thing that was up there was so controversial that there was an argument about whether or not it ought to be taken down. His followers scattered. It wasn't until He reappeared and said, "Look and see"—then they went from cowering in the shadows to walking boldly into the temple. I mean, look— what did Christ do as the example who was the Son of God? He went about doing good. Go about doing good. Whoever... If there is such a person that ever arrives on the scene—and Lord knows, every single group of people everywhere could use someone that goes around doing good.

But I don't know how you set in order a trillion-dollar organization.

QUESTION 4: Speaking of doing good, the next 6 months to 12 months, what is your group hoping to accomplish?

DENVER: There's a conference in Kentucky in the spring that I'll be speaking at. There's a conference being organized in September of next year that I've been asked and I will speak at.

There's an ongoing project (it is a Herculean project) to translate the Book of Mormon into Old Testament Hebrew. Modern Hebrew is not what the Book of Mormon needs to be rendered into; it's got to be put into Old Testament Hebrew. There is a panel...

We do not possess the competency to be able to accomplish that. There's a panel of scholars that are working behind the scenes that are some of the best "Old Testament Hebrew" scholars in the world. (I mean, we're talking Europe; we're talking people around the globe.) But we have to pay them to do that, and right now the cost is running about $15,000 a month to pay for the translation effort. The work is... About a third [is] in a great form, and probably 40% [is] done. We've got another (we're guessing) year and a half at the current rate before we get it done.

But there's an obligation that's imposed upon us through the Book of Mormon to take the message of the Restoration to two remnant groups: One group are native covenant people in the Americas; the other are the remnant of the Jews. You're not going to attract any attention among the Jews unless the Book of Mormon is presented in an authentic form that requires an extraordinary effort to make it suitable for the audience. That work is being done. Outreach to the Native Americans is also being done. People have been asked to accomplish the work of...

AUDIENCE: Are you translating that into a language more suitable for them, as well? Is that what you mean?

DENVER: Umm, okay. The Book of Mormon translation text in the version that we have at present is actually a formal kind of English that... It would be more correct to analogize the translation to 1600s English than it would be to analogize it to 1830 English. Some of the words and the phrases that are contained in the Book of Mormon are antiquated in 1830. So, if you go buy an 1830 Merriam-Webster dictionary and you use that, you're really not gonna tree what the translation is talking about. There's an effort being made to take the entire Book of Mormon and its correct translation setting and to move it up to English of today.

Joseph made no effort to present to the Lamanites a version of the Book of Mormon any different than to the English-speaking audience of his day. We expect that when the modern-English version is finished, that that version will hold more appeal to the Native American audience because it is actually in simpler modern English that we use in our vernacular today. But those efforts are underway and are being accomplished.

We have conferences scheduled. We just finished with the Scripture Project (that took far more work than we thought it would take to get out into print). And who knows, we...

QUESTION 5: Do you feel like there's any way that we can all work together? Or do you think we're just gonna do our own thing and meet up in the Millennium or something like that?

DENVER: Don't... Don't know. I mean, I came down here. I mean, Bryce was the one who had this brainchild; he set this up. He knows you, apparently, through his father. I mean, some of you may know his father. I went to hear Bob talk in the park on Saturday, and on Monday, he was... I got news that he'd died. I mean, we went to the park, and my daughter (who was up from college in Southern Utah) was there in the park with us at the time your father talked, and it came as quite a surprise.

QUESTION 6: Can I ask one more? So, you issued, as I understand it, a new covenant. I'm curious, what was the genesis for that? And what is it?

STEPHANIE: So, you get to end on this. This is your swan song, so...

DENVER: But there's a lady over here. I thought...

STEPHANIE: Oh... oh. Go ahead.

AUDIENCE: I've got a question for you.

AUDIENCE: I did.

AUDIENCE: Do you want me to ask my question first?

DENVER: No, you can ask yours last. [Laughter]

AUDIENCE: Mine's not as interesting as his is.

QUESTION 7: And my last question is: Can you bear witness of Christ and share your testimony of Him?

STEPHANIE: OK, go ahead. Start with one at a time, honey. It's okay. One at a time.

DENVER: As the Joseph Smith Papers rolled out and as the source material started to become more abundantly available, it became apparent to a number of people that the Scriptures (in the form that it's published by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints) were not what Joseph had started with. There were three different groups that had it occur to them that work needed to be done to try and find a more correct version of the Book of Mormon and a more correct version of the revelations through Joseph Smith, and they began working on this stuff. As long as they were at it, the Joseph Smith Translation of the Bible was something that also ought to be looked at. And so, different groups began working on recovering the Scriptures.

Two of the three groups combined into one; that left two surviving groups. Both of them finished their effort at the Scriptures within two weeks of one another. And both of them (when they finished their work) brought it to me and said, "Here, we want you to take a look at this. These are better Scriptures." And I took what both of them had done, and I said, "Okay, you guys have been getting down really granular about these Scriptures, and now I've got, you know, 2,000 pages of material to read. I got a better idea. Why don't we just get the two surviving groups together, and let's all meet, and let's all talk."

So, I set up a meeting at my law office, and I brought together the two groups—some of whom participated by Zoom but many of whom were there in person—and they sat down and they talked, and they'd all run into some challenges that they had resolved differently. And so, my suggestion was instead of leaving that with different resolutions, why don't we compare notes and figure it all out? So, the effort that had reached a conclusion by the two groups started over as a single group looking at how everyone had resolved things. And the give-and-take was largely figuring out which was the better historical source to rely upon in order to figure out what the accurate statement of the record was, and some people had found better source material than other people had found. And that went back and forth.

And so, we also stumbled upon a guy who had redone the Joseph Smith Translation of the Bible in the 1960s and had put it into print—and that guy was still alive. And he was... He had sold everything he planned to sell, and he turned over... He just turned over (in a word processing format) all of the work that he'd done. And so, now we had a (we thought) a better thing.

So, we're getting to the point that we're gonna suggest to a conference of people that we adopt new Scriptures, and at the point that discussion begins (we're putting it out in paperback for everyone to read and everyone to comment on and everyone to pick apart and find any additions) there's a guy sitting in the audience who has made it his life's work to study the Joseph Smith Translation. And he—taking that JST—went back and found where the publication (in the form that it rolled out through the RLDS Church/Community of Christ/Herald Press) had changes made by the committee that published it that Joseph never did. And in the Nauvoo era, Joseph Smith gave talks in which he said, "I'm gonna quote from this passage in Galatians—I could give you a plainer translation, which would be this..." He had gone to the trouble of finding 14 other changes Joseph had made to the biblical text by talks he gave in Nauvoo, and those were being added in. And so, the work we thought was done on the Bible had to go through the same crunching again. And so, it really took years after the project had been finished. And after the project had been finished, it started over again, and it took years to get the whole thing done.

Well, after it had gotten that far along, the people involved in the committee asked me if I would present the scriptural project to the Lord for His acceptance. And they all were united in agreeing that if I asked, that whatever answer was forthcoming, that they would consider accepting. So, I prepared myself, as people ought to do to offer a significant prayer to the Lord. And the dedication of the Kirtland Temple was done by a written prayer, and this, I thought, was a serious enough question that the prayer ought to be written. So, I sat down to compose a prayer.

Now, I have written 250,000 words about LDS history in a single volume, and I've presented multiple papers at the Sunstone Conferences about incidents in church history, including a discussion about the original formation of the church. I sat down to write a prayer of my own writing, and what occurred was an inspired prayer that summarizes the entire history of the Restoration (from the beginning to this moment) in far, far fewer words than anything I've ever composed and gave a more accurate statement of what has and is happening. And it includes the necessity of repentance and forgiveness from the Lord for the condemnation that was originally imposed in 1831 because we were treating lightly the words of God. And instead of treating it lightly, this entire effort was an act of repentance; it was an act of contrition; it was acknowledging that we've inherited corruption and that we are trying—unlike those that got condemned by the Lord in 1831—we're trying to say to the Lord: We want to shake off that condemnation.

And so, the inspired prayer for the Lord to accept the Scriptures was met with a lengthy revelation that was presented in September of 2017 in Boise. And it proposed that He'll renew His covenant with this penitent group and that He'll work with this penitent group to go forward.

Now, you really need... It's a bigger subject than we can talk about right now, but throughout... Every little red tag you see here in these Scriptures...

Identities in the Book of Mormon shift; they go back and forth. You have Lamanites, and you have Nephites. And at some point, the Lamanites repent, and they are numbered among the Nephites, and at other points the Nephites are thrown out. And the identity of people being numbered among one or the other changes repeatedly in the text of the Book of Mormon. Your identity with "the remnant" is not determined based upon biology or genealogy. The remnant of the people of Nephi will include people that are called Gentiles (at the outset) who become numbered among the people of God when they repent and return to Him. And the part of the red tags includes language within the covenant the Lord offered in 2017 in September to a group of Gentiles assembled in Boise that says: "I will number you among the remnant of the house of Israel."

QUESTION 6 (continued): So, that was the covenant that you issued?

DENVER: Yes. Yes. And the language of the prayer, the language of the answer, and the language of the covenant itself are all contained in the... They were added by the committee into the new Scriptures and sustained by a group of people. And they are separate sections of what's called the Teachings and Commandments. (It's the T&C, not the D&C.)

QUESTION 6 (continued): So, do you see that as part of your issuance of a new set of Scriptures? Or what is the basis of, you know, extending that covenant that the, you know, this group of Gentiles might be adopted into the house of Israel?

DENVER: The process by which that gets accomplished is contained within the "Answer to the Prayer" and in the "Covenant" itself. And it can be renewed by anyone at any time in any circumstance just by following what the "Answer to the Prayer" and the "Covenant" itself states. I mean, people this last week have become covenant people—because it's an ongoing thing.

QUESTION 6 (continued): Yeah. It talks about, you know, that in 1 Nephi 14.

DENVER: Yes. Yeah, it's a great chapter.

QUESTION 6 (continued): Yeah. I mean, the (you know) the process (you know) outlined by Nephi is that (you know) the Gentiles of the end times, we have to repent and return...

DENVER: Yes.

QUESTION 6 (continued): ...that the Lord would remove our stumbling block. And really the (you know) what I would call the new and everlasting covenants that Christ declares in 3 Nephi 9, (you know) comprised of two oaths—an oath that man makes to God, an oath that God makes back to man...

DENVER: Right.

QUESTION 6 (continued): ...is that you will offer up unto me a sacrifice of a broken heart and contrite spirit. And whoso does that (you know) become my daughters sons and daughters—the formal adoption process which is the baptism of fire/baptism of the Holy Ghost. And so that's really (you know)... What Nephi outlines is the way the Gentiles repent and return. It's to enter into that covenant (you know), offering up sacrifice of a broken heart and contrite spirit.

DENVER: And if that's the universe of your belief and how you read the Book of Mormon, then I would say, be happy with that and go no further.

QUESTION 6 (continued): So, how do you expand on that?

DENVER: I would say, "Wherefore murmur ye, because ye receive more of my word? Ye need not suppose because I have spoken one word that I cannot speak another" (see 2 Nephi 12:9-10 RE). And to the Gentiles directly in 1831, the Lord said, "You are condemned because you treat lightly my word" (see T&C 82:20).

QUESTION 6 (continued): Or in 1832.

DENVER: And later He said, "I am going to reject you with your dead if you don't give heed to the things that I'm telling you to do." That was the January...

QUESTION 6 (continued): Yeah, "I'm giving you one last chance to repent and return."

DENVER: Yes, that was the January 1841 revelation...

QUESTION 6 (continued): D&C 124.

QUESTION 6 (continued): 124

DENVER: ...in which He gives you the description. "This is how you know if you've met my terms: You will not be moved out of your place. But if you don't give heed, then this is how you know that you're rejected: You're gonna be hounded out of this place by your enemies, and this center stake that I have accepted will not be where you're allowed to live in peace."

QUESTION 6 (continued): Sure. "If you repent and return, I will fight your battles..."

DENVER: Right.

QUESTION 6 (continued): "...You will not be driven out of Nauvoo." However, we were smitten and driven.

DENVER: Yeah.

QUESTION 6 (continued): Therefore...

DENVER: And I don't think that when you get to the precipice of having the Prophet Joseph Smith (who was the reason why we were a true and living church, because we have the oracles of God through Joseph)... When we did what we did, and we corrupted what we corrupted, and we treated lightly what we treated lightly—and we've dealt with incomplete, inaccurate, corrupted Scriptures for generations—I don't think you simply pick up...

The Book of Mormon itself has required numerous fixes. There was the printer's manuscript (which was copied by Oliver Cowdery from the translation manuscript), and the printer's manuscript we still have 100% of. The translation manuscript got put in the cornerstone of the Nauvoo House. It rotted because moisture got in. There's only about 28% of that manuscript that's left. From what we've got of the original translation, Oliver Cowdery made one-and-a-half copy errors per page in transcribing the printer's manuscript from Joseph's translation.

AUDIENCE (PETER): [after bumping something]: Oh, I did it again. I'm so sorry...

AUDIENCE: [Sarcastically] Peter, you're not allowed to sit there anymore... [Laughter]

DENVER: Then E.B. Grandin took the printer's manuscript and made even more errors. Joseph Smith was in the process of revising the Book of Mormon (after it had been in print) and correcting it for re-publication. And from what we can tell, Joseph Smith was changing the errors that had crept in by Oliver and E.B. Grandin back to the original translation— everywhere that we have any ability to determine that.

QUESTION 6 (continued): Right, so we've got the 1840 and 1842 edition.

DENVER: Yes. The Book of Mormon as published by the LDS Church is neither one of those; it hails from the British publication. And the British publication has its own additional swarm of errors contained in it. And that's what's been handed down.

I don't have the time to walk through everything that needs to be walked through, but I can tell you that I've dealt with all these subjects at one time or another in what I've written, in what I've taught, or what I've said. And not to be perfunctory, but I don't...

I'm not here to tell anyone to be discontented. If you're happy, if you believe that you have obtained from the Lord a hope in Christ, I don't want to upset you or set you at odds with me or anyone else. I say: Go your way in peace, and be happy; go your way rejoicing. All I'm trying to do is to get things right as we approach the decreasing circumference of the funnel leading up to the return of the Lord, in which a great deal has to be done. And as far as I can tell, I can't see anyone on the horizon that's doing the things that need to be done.

The LDS Church sold the right to proselytize in Israel to get the BYU Jerusalem Center. They have a treaty with the nation of Israel—they will not proselytize in the nation of Israel. They want to keep their BYU Center. They actually had a fellow who translated the Book of Mormon into Hebrew that donated it to the church, which then showed up... The church put it into print and then took it out of print and then took all the copies and destroyed 'em. And oddly enough, they donated the Hebrew manuscript to the Genealogical Society, and we were able to get that copy from microfiche at the Genealogical Society. But it's a crappy version; it's modern Hebrew, and it's not... You're not gonna take that version to a rabbi in Jerusalem and present it as an authentic Old Testament text. They'll laugh at it; they'll say, "This is clearly a ginned up..."

QUESTION 8: Can you give me the Reader's Digest simplified version of what the covenant that was given in Boise 2017...

STEPHANIE: No, hold on; over here first.

QUESTION 7&8: I still want to hear your testimony of Christ. But I'm wondering about the simplified Reader's Digest version of what that was, 'cuz Justin told us that...

AUDIENCE: It's on the website: scriptures.info.

QUESTION 8: Okay, I just wanted to hear it.

STEPHANIE: Okay, over here.

QUESTION 9: Okay, super quick. So, I'm really new to all this, and I was intrigued. So, I bought the new Scriptures, and I was reading in T&C section 3 where the Lord says, "Oliver Cowdery, you have a gift of the sprout." And I thought, "Man, that's totally new; I've never seen that before." So, I had to cross reference it with the D&C (which is what I've grown up with, and I have known my whole life) where it's talking about the gift of the Aaronic Priesthood—which is radically different. Maybe... At least in my estimation, the word was so radically different that it just blew my mind. So, my question is, "How is it that the Scriptures that we have are so radically different?" And you may have already just answered it with the last thing, but since I'm so new to this and I just stumbled upon this, this is one thing that just was really kind of freaking me out this last week. Why are the Scriptures that I have so completely different than this, which I am to believe may be more accurate?

DENVER: The revelations that were given to Joseph Smith (and you're talking about that subject)... Manuscripts were taken by Oliver Cowdery to be printed at Independence on a printing press that the church bought there. He was going to print it in 1833 in Independence in what became known as the Book of Commandments. When Oliver Cowdery was setting it in Independence, he believed he had a certain "discretion" to write them up in an improved form for publication in 1833. And so, the typeset version of the Book of Commandments in 1833 is a starting point from which the next volume rolled out. The 1833 Book of Commandments was not a true and faithful, accurate reproduction of what Joseph had given. It was edited through the printing press in 1833. That's the press that got destroyed in Missouri. They smuggled out printed copies in the skirts of some of the women. The copies that got smuggled out then got bound together, and a few copies of the 1833 Book of Commandments survive because of the smuggling process that went on.

That 1833 version then became the basis that a committee used in 1835 to publish what would become known as the Doctrine and Covenants. Joseph Smith, leading up to the 1835 conference, spent time working on a series of lectures that had been delivered in the School of the Prophets, which became known as Lectures on Faith. Joseph edited Lectures on Faith, and they are the doctrine of the Doctrine and Covenants. They were put in the front of the book. They are in larger type than was the rest of the book. The revelations that were given to Joseph were in... I'm not sure the font size, but I'm gonna estimate it's like a nine pitch, and the Lectures on Faith are in like a twelve pitch. So, they're in the front of the book, they're in larger print, and Joseph Smith (at the conference) vouched for the accuracy of the doctrine. He turned the revelations over to a committee. The committee consisted of a group of people who also felt that they had the right to do some editing. So when the Doctrine and Covenants rolled out, the revelations to Joseph had undergone further modification. And in the minutes of the conference, what Joseph vouched for was Lectures on Faith; he didn't vouch for the publication that was made there.

So, section 27 of the Doctrine and Covenants, when it was originally given, consisted of about (I forget what it was)—about three or four verses; it may have been five verses. Doctrine and Covenants section 27 now goes on for pages. And it's in the expansion, beyond revelation given to Joseph, that we have the first mention of "Peter, James, and John, by whom I ordained new apostles," which is part of the claim to the priestly succession that went on thereafter. In fact, when the first quorum of the twelve was called, they were ordained by the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon. And, as an interesting side note, we don't know who ordained who, but if you start with their names in order of seniority, every third one that got ordained would be [by] Martin Harris. And the math works out that Brigham Young was likely ordained to the apostleship by Martin Harris, which is sort of an interesting thing.

You can read the Covenant in section 127 of the Teachings and Commandments; it's online. Oh, no, it's section 158 of the Teachings and Commandments" at scriptures.info/Teachings and Commandments. Just click on 1-5-8, and you can read it there.

[Answer to QUESTION 7] You can also read an expanded version of a testimony (within the Teachings and Commandments) where I talk about the suffering of the Lord in Gethsemane and what happened on the morning of the Resurrection. I wrote accounts of those things (at the time that it happened) in my journal. I do not think later reminiscences are as accurate, authentic, or valuable than the thing you record at the moment. And so, I've never released reminiscences; I've stuck to exactly what was written in the journal at the moment in which these things occurred. And that's what showed up that the Scripture Committee wanted added to the Scriptures and what people voted to have added in there, but you can read my extended testimony there.

Here and now, at this (you know) late hour, with the exhaustion that is clearly setting in in the faces of some of you (some of whom would have liked me to shut up long ago, including the missus)...

I know that the Lord lives because I've seen Him, and He's ministered to me. The full extent of what the Lord has asked of me, I don't think would ever appropriately be put into the public record. I can tell you that I don't view myself as anything special. I don't believe that a fantastic testimony makes the person to whom it's been entrusted bigger or greater or wiser than anyone else. I don't think I've lived as good a life as many of you have lived, because I did not become a practicing Mormon until I was 19 years old, and I grew up in southern Idaho where there was a lot of boredom.

I sought the Lord sincerely, earnestly, using everything that I believed would be appealing to the notice of Heaven, including the formalities of prayer that you learn about in an LDS "true order of prayer" ceremony. I did every step that I thought would bring it about, and then nothing happened.

So, I went about doing what other Latter-day Saints who are faithful did: I magnified my calling; I was 100% home teacher for 15 years; I was a diligent Gospel Doctrine teacher; I was a student of the Scriptures. But I thought that I had gotten all I was going to get from the Lord. And then, on His timing, at His chosen moment, for reasons that are entirely His, He decided that He would make Himself known to me—not because I'm "someone," but because no one else was willing to do what needed to be done. I don't think I'm anything other than someone who's willing to do His agenda, not my own. I don't have an agenda. I don't want to be responsible for things. I am not pushing the Lord. If He wants something of me, He asks—I'll do it; I'll do it to the best of my ability. And I can tell you, much of what I've been asked to do I find more difficult than anything I ever imagined.

At one point, the Lord told me, "If we go on, there is a war underway in this world, and you are going to be a combatant in the war in this world"—not taking up arms and shooting people. I'm talking about ongoing conflict between truth and error, lies, deception, arrogance, foolishness—the tools of the devil. When he wrapped the earth with a great chain at the time of Enoch, and he looked up at Heaven and he laughed, the chain was lies. The Lord is fighting against incessant, continual lies. The foolishness that exists down here...

And I responded to the Lord that "I'm ready to go," and He literally... The Lord would not take my answer. He insisted that I think about it. And I thought about it for a couple of weeks, and I thought, "What's so bad about fighting against the forces of evil? What's so bad about fighting against the nonsense that goes on in this world?"

Yeah, I can tell you that sincere, good, believing, religious people are aligned with the lies! People think they're doing God's errand when they're fighting against what God is doing right this minute. And people that you would want to love and embrace, you cannot because they will not hear His voice speaking at this moment. They murmur because they do not want more of His word.

And so, in my two weeks of reflection, I determined, "Yeah, I'm ready to go forward." And then the Lord took me at the word, and we went forward. But I can tell you, if I knew then what I know now, I might not have answered in two weeks. I think I would have still given the same answer, but this—this is not fun. And this is not particularly even rewarding. And I don't think anyone in this room can understand what I'm saying except her [Stephanie].

But I am on the Lord's errand—as ill-suited as I am and as comparatively unworthy as I am to some of you. I try to be a diligent servant, and so far, that appears to be enough. But there is so much left to do; we've hardly begun. And the stuff left is the hardest of all, and we've still gotta get it done.

I know He lives. He's ministered to me. And I would guarantee you with every fiber of my life that I'm not overstating anything. I try to mirror the model of Joseph. Joseph said, "You don't know me; you never knew me. If I hadn't lived it, I wouldn't have believed it." I get that. It's a terrible thing to be in the presence of a living God—but it's an even more terrible thing to think yourself somehow involved in work that can affect the souls of men, and the truth of the matter is that "only fools trifle with the souls of men" (see T&C 138:18). Joseph put it well. And I hope not to trifle with any of your souls. I wish I could make a more persuasive presentation to convince you that God's really doing something right now. But I'm as weak as I am and as flawed as I am and...

And I said we'd get out of here after that one, but there's a hand over there. So, I'm gonna stand up and act like I'm walking out and... What's your question?

QUESTION 10: Real quick question. So, by the way, thanks for coming. So, in the beginning of the "Prayer for Covenant," you mentioned having received the name David from Heavenly Father. I was just curious if you'd be able to tell us, like, how that happened and maybe what you understand that to mean?

DENVER: I thought it was really a disappointment. It was an ugly moment for me. I mean, I know what... I did not have in mind what people have in mind—at all! At all! The Voice that spoke to me said those words about the name—and God gives new names to people all the time; it happens in Scripture; He does it. To me what that new name meant was I'm supposed to rejoice at being named after an adulterer who murdered the husband of the woman that he committed adultery with in order to cover the sin of adultery that he impregnated...

I thought of Uriah. I thought of Bathsheba. I thought of Joab receiving the orders. (It's not in the Bible, but it's in Josephus: Joab, the nephew of David, getting the order from David that was supposed to help murder this man in secret. And Joab, to his credit, read the order to Uriah and his commanders. And when they withdrew so that Uriah would be killed, many of the valiant men stayed behind and died with him because he was their comrade in arms.) This is David who betrayed these people! This is the name that... and the context. I spent two days troubled about that. In fact, I bitterly complained about the name. I did not want that name.

QUESTION 10 (continued): So, when did it happen?

DENVER: It's in the Scriptures. It's in the Teachings and Commandments.

QUESTION 10 (continued): Okay.

DENVER: But after my bitterest return-prayer (that took a bit of emotional composition in order to go back before the Lord), the response that I got from the Lord was, "I thought it no great insult to be called the Son of David," which, I mean, it just... It cut me like, "Here I am, ungrateful for something that the Lord viewed as a positive." I've been cut to the heart many times. I'm not the... I've made a lot of mistakes. I'm sure that all of the correction that I have required has been well deserved, and many of it has been poignant and heart-piercing.

Yeah, you had a...

QUESTION 11: So back to... You lost me a little bit when you were talking about Joseph Smith and MMP [Multiple Mortal Probations]. Some of us don't jump to that. So, when I came... I'm relatively new. About seven years ago, we found ourselves praying about the pollution in the church and asking Heavenly Father who the Apostles were, and we were told they've made an oath of death. We prayed about who Nelson was, and we were told, "I will send one mighty and strong, holding a scepter of power." And we were then told that, "You'll know him by his fruits," and that, "Beware of wolves in sheep's clothing."

I asked the Lord when we moved to Manti recently: "I am lost; I have to speak in Sacrament," saying, "I'm all alone, Father. They have killed the holy prophets; they have killed Joseph Smith; they have polluted our temple..." (that I was excited to move to this temple), "and they have... And I'm all alone." And then I asked Heavenly Father for comfort and opened up to (I think it's in) Romans, and it said [that] Paul said the same thing (that I opened to), which was, "They have killed the holy prophets; they have swept down the altars." And I'm all alone, and I thought, "Please guide me to some people that know what I know," and then I came into this group.

And so, I asked Heavenly Father about the one mighty and strong recently, and I was just told that he would be involved with new records and translations and Cumorah. (I was about to a passage that said something about the Cumorah and the other records to be coming forth.) And so, I wonder if you can make remarks. And I just...

I jumped to the conclusion that that could be Joseph Smith resurrected. I never went to the idea of MMP, so that frightens me. The whole idea of MMP is something that I, exactly, I asked that and opened up about Matthias as well. And I've been researching, and I see it from your point of view. So, how can you reconcile Joseph Smith or one "like to him"? Because I haven't gotten the full answer to who he is, just that I know he will be involved in this before he puts the rec[ord], you know, gives the inheritances and puts the church in order and so forth, whatever. He might not even know who he is!

So, could you maybe comment on the idea that it could be Joseph Smith, or if it could be...

DENVER: I don't think it's possible for Joseph Smith to come and do work that... The work of salvation is the work of mortals. The burden of salvation is the burden of mortals. It does not happen that resurrected beings, translated beings, or "second-life" beings come back and do the work that would change the conditions for mortality.

When the three Nephites exceeded their natural life, they were no longer seen publicly. But they ministered to Mormon and Moroni who, in turn, then ministered to the public.

John ministers to people as a ministering angel, as is described in the Doctrine and Covenants.

Angels minister—as explained in Alma and as explained by Moroni in the Ether chapter seven (I think it is)—angels minister to people "of a firm mind in every form of godliness" (in Moroni's description), and (in Alma's description) angels minister to the "chosen vessels." Then the chosen vessels are the people that are of a firm mind [who] spread the message down. So, if you're talking about a translated being who functions as an angel or if you're talking about a resurrected angel ministering, they minister to people that are then sent on an errand—but the errand involves a mortal going out to preach.

And other mortals have to hear the word from people to whom the angels have ministered, in order for them to rise up and to receive what they need to receive in order for themselves also to qualify to be ministered to by angels. And then the process proceeds from there, who preach and teach to the chosen vessels so that they're prepared to receive the Son. And then the Son has a ministry with people in which He prepares and presents them to the Father. And it is an orderly process that's described in both Alma and in Moroni.

But the idea that we're gonna get Joseph Smith, you know, walking around... Is he gonna show the bullet holes in his... Is Hyrum gonna show his bullet holes, as Christ did when He said, "See my wounds..."

AUDIENCE: Wow.

DENVER: "...and know that it's I." I mean, what are we expecting when, in fact, Joseph denounced the...

QUESTION 11 (continued): Yeah, I agree.

DENVER: ...Joseph denounced the idea of reincarnation. But there is an early-Mormon teaching about multiple mortal probations that is slightly different, and that teaching you can actually find in the Doctrine and Covenants where it talks about the "deaths" (plural), and it talks about "worlds without end." And in Joseph's King Follett Discourse, he talks about going from "exaltation to exaltation, until you attain to the resurrection of the dead."

Well, we're all going to be resurrected, but we don't "attain to the resurrection of the dead," because Jesus brings us out of the grave. You have to be precisely what the Lord is and nothing different than that to be a saved man. To be "precisely what the Lord is" means you have to attain to the resurrection of the dead. Until then, you will go from exaltation to exaltation until you arrive at the point that you are prepared, worlds without end, for the resurrection.

QUESTION 11 (continued): That has to mean something...

DENVER: Yeah. And if you want a more fulsome description of the difference between that process for the man and the woman, then you should read the talk (now a paper) called "Our Divine Parents," in which the role of the Mother in this process is described. But again, that talk kind of picks up where King Follett leaves off.

AUDIENCE: Who is the author of that talk?

DENVER: It's my talk.

QUESTION 12: Denver, could I just get your thoughts on an experience I had this year?

DENVER: Yeah.

QUESTION 12 (continued): And this is something that happened January the 9th of this year. But the Lord came to me and said, you know, "Michael, stop referring to the Book of Mormon as the Book of Mormon, but refer to it as the Book of Christ."

DENVER: Hmm.

QUESTION 12 (continued): And I said... I mean, my... The reason that I'm here is because of the testimony of Nephi in the Book of Mormon. And so, people I've shared it with, some have outright rejected it; some have accepted it; some say, "It makes sense. Michael, you run with it; that's your revelation." What are your thoughts?

DENVER: I think you should call the Book of Mormon "the Book of Christ." And I don't think you should vary from that, because I think by doing that you're gonna provoke a lot of people into conversations that I think you ought to participate in. Because that message to you, I think, is a conversation starter and a really good one, and I think you ought to stick with that.

QUESTION 12 (continued): Yeah, I mean, I have. Because to me, it just makes sense. What other book can bring a Christian closer to Christ than the Book of Christ?

DENVER: Yeah. Right. And it's an astonishing book. I mean, I taught it every four years for years, and it got to the point that I became in awe of the Book of Mormon. Nephi...

Well, we've got to leave. It's... It is almost surreal.

Thank you!

2021.11.24 Mormonism Live
Interview with Denver C. Snuffer, Jr.
November 24, 2021

Radio Free Mormon (RFM): Good evening, Mr. Reel. Wow, wow, that's impressive. Thank you, everybody.

Bill Reel: That crowd feels like it gets bigger and bigger, doesn't it?

RFM: I know that the applause gets longer and longer every week. I don't understand why that would be.

Bill: Yeah, there are 145 people watching at the moment. There's already 14 comments up there. And before we jump into the show, you've got the topic tonight. We've been advertising it everywhere. So I hope people are excited. We're interested in having this conversation today. And I'll let you introduce our guest in just a moment. But...

RFM: I took out a full page ad in the New York Times.

Bill: Yeah, but I did want to introduce our helping hand here, our third teammate. And so, I'm gonna change the little thing here so that's not kind of irritating. Maven, are you there?

Maven: Yes. Can you hear me?

Bill: I can hear you. Maven is live on Mormonism Live. This is our... This is the third person, the third teammate here of the team Mormonism Live. Maven is in charge of the behind the scenes stuff going forward. And we are so excited to have her, and I just want to introduce her to all of our viewers. This is Maven. And folks, this will be who is helping us behind the scenes, and give us a few weeks to really get into the groove of it. But she's already saving us a lot of time, energy, and resources and making things easier for me. So big kudos to Maven, and...

Maven: Thanks, though.

RFM: Hey, Maven, in the interest of transparency, Maven is not her real name. And that is not her real picture.

Bill: No, that's...

Maven: Thank you, RFM.

Bill: She's not actually a cartoon.

RFM: Because for some reason, she wants to maintain a certain degree of anonymity, even while she's helping us out behind enemy lines.

Bill: I love it.

Maven: Yes, I'm still not out to my family. So, at this point, I'm going to try the RFM route. We'll see if I get doxxed later by anybody.

RFM: It's a good thing you don't have a distinctive voice.

Maven: Well, according to you, I do, so we'll see how it goes. But I'm excited to be here for sure. I did want to just give a quick shout out for my screen name to a commenter on last week's program. And so, it was Equinox Project. And they asked to give the behind the scenes tech-maven a nom-de-keyboard, maybe some significant Mormon woman from its history. So, I actually really liked Maven. So I picked up on that. But I have been using "Brody" as a last name, which is an obvious call-out to Fawn Brody. So...

Bill: Oooh, I like it.

Maven: So that is where Maven came from. Thank you very much. I really liked how that sounded. And I'm really excited to be part of the show. I am not a tech-maven, but I am someone that's interested in this, and I'm dedicated to figuring out and solving the problems. So I certainly hope I'm an add and not a subtraction from the show.

Bill: You are a huge net positive. And so, we'll let you go back behind the scenes. But thank you so much for all that you are doing and going to continue to do here for the show and all the help you're going to be.

RFM, I'm turning it over to you, my friend. Tonight's show is yours.

RFM: Thank you. I am so excited about tonight's show, because we have a very special guest on tonight's show—a guest that I have been working on for years now to try and get him on tonight's show. He finally caved. I think I used the missionary commitment pattern successfully to get him on the show. It's Denver Snuffer. Do you want to bring him on?

Hello!!

Denver Snuffer: Now, who is this?

RFM: It's Denver Snuffer, I think! I'm Radio Free Mormon, and that's Bill Reel.

Denver: I've got the name RFM written right on my screen.

RFM: Yes, thank you very much. I appreciate that—because we certainly know each other a little bit more familiarly when we're talking on the phone, et cetera. You know, we're... I'm very excited to have you here. I think a lot of people are gonna know who you are. If I could just give a brief introduction, and hopefully I won't get it too wrong.

You're an individual who has written a great deal about Mormonism. And you and many similarly-minded people... You found a lot of similarly-minded people who have read your books who, in large measure, I think, agree with your points of view and who have created a rather large number of people who have left the LDS Church in favor of your teachings. I'm trying to avoid calling you a leader because I know that that is something that you eschew vehemently.

Denver: Yeah, I don't like that.

RFM: Right.

Denver: But I think one of the problems with religion is when you do have leaders and you have hierarchies, I think you stumble at that point.

RFM: Yes. And very brief: My understanding is that what you seek to do is to restore the church to its charismatic beginnings under Joseph Smith, which you feel got lost after Joseph Smith died and Brigham Young took over the reins, and it hasn't been recaptured since by the official LDS Church. Is that a good thumbnail sketch?

Denver: Yeah, that's pretty good. Back in the missionary discussions and in a big plaque on the wall in the Visitor's Center at Temple Square, there was that quote from Roger Williams about how the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit that was evident in that first primitive church that Christ established had been lost, and that the reason that it was lost is because the Christians had no more of the spirit than the heathens had, and that the only way to get that back would be for God to send new apostles because it wasn't gonna happen otherwise. That Roger Williams quote got used to paper over the charismatic issue for Mormonism because of the claim that we have, you know, an ongoing set of bonafide apostles, and we have an ongoing set of prophets, seers, and revelators. But as you examine the track record, the prophecy and the seership and the revelation phenomenon really was the whole reason why Joseph drew people to him. And then after his departure, the net results were quite different.

And so, now looking at it today and examining where the LDS Church is, that sort of presence of the Spirit seems to be wanting. And I'm not trying to lead anything, but I am trying to teach about what it was that Mormonism stood for. Religion ought to be inviting; it ought to be exciting. Assuming that religion (as Joseph defined Mormonism) includes all truths, wherever you find it—it includes and encompasses all truth—assuming that is the case, then the religion ought to be the most exciting, enticing, inviting, interesting thing there is. There isn't anything bigger than something attempting to gather all truth. And yet, Mormonism (as it has developed under the umbrella of the LDS Church) has turned into something that rather doesn't want any new "news" intruding in, and the confining nature of how Mormonism in the LDS version is developed has resulted in a lot of people feeling like there's got to be something more to this religion—because if it is accurately depicted in its correct form in the institution of the LDS Church, then it's just as hollow and just as spiritless as any Protestant denomination.

RFM: Yes, and perhaps more so. My experience in church during the last couple of decades of my activity was that going to church was as boring as watching paint dry. No, actually, it was worse than that. It was as boring as watching dry paint dry. So I think you're right. I mean, it advertises itself as the "only true and living church." I don't think it's really living anymore. It may not be completely dead, but it's definitely on life support.

Denver: Yeah, yeah...

RFM: So I wanted to tell everybody a little story about you and me on the phone the other day because I think it's significant for what you've just said. But this is when I called you up, maybe a month ago. We finally got you scheduled to come on the show. And I call you up, and I say, "Hey, Denver," and you say, "Hi, Radio Free Mormon." And I say, "How's my favorite prophet?"

Denver: [laughter]

RFM: And you did that: You laughed (you laughed MORE 'cause it was, you know, new to you then; you're hearing it for the second time now). But I thought (and I think I said, you know), "That is very, very appealing." Because a person who does not take themselves too seriously is something that I personally gravitate toward. I think it was one of the things that a lot of people found attractive about Joseph Smith, that—in some areas, of course, he took himself seriously—but as he presented himself to the public, usually, he was very down to Earth. When I joined the church in the late 70s, we used to hear the story all the time about how he loved to pull sticks...

Denver: Yeah.

RFM: ...with people, though I haven't heard that in decades now. I don't know if that went by the wayside as we moved on toward more serious-minded or presenting prophets than Joseph Smith. But I can understand why it is that you are very appealing in that way.

Denver: Well, it's a sincerely-held conviction. I don't think you get anywhere in the idea of "achieving oneness as people" if you start out from a proposition that there's a structure and a hierarchy and someone's bigger and better than someone else. I think if you go back to the New Testament and you look at what Christ did, He didn't assert that He had authority. And when they asked Him by what authority He was doing things, He deferred on the question by posing a corollary question about the authority of John and, you know, "Tell me what the authority was," and they could not say after they reasoned, and so their response was, "We can't tell you where John got his authority from." And Christ said, "Well, then neither will I tell you what my authority is." And the matter ended.

If the Lord... If the Lord elected not to say, "I have authority," and it comes from whatever source, what value is it to make a bunch of claims about authority? If the Lord didn't do it, why do we do it? I mean, I think that what the world needs right now is someone to help teach about the religion in a way that invites, entices, interests people, and inspires them to do better, because we really do need people doing better. There's so much going on that's depressing, and discouraging about our conversation, our society, our news, our media. Shouldn't religion be like an oasis in the middle of all that and to make us think more deeply, more clearly, more reflectively and to enjoy life more? And you don't get there by saying, "I'm bigger than you. My opinion matters more than does yours."

RFM: Can I break in just to tell you a story, which you may find amusing. It was going on ten years ago, I'd never heard of you before (it probably wasn't ten, but almost ten years ago, and I'm at church. This, by the way, is a very, very small ward in a small town in western Washington. And I have to go out to the car to get something (maybe it's an excuse just to get away for a few minutes, you know, take a smoke break outside), but the deal was that there was nobody in the parking lot, but of course, there's a bunch of cars, and I look over a couple cars down, and the bishop's wife is seated in the passenger seat of the car. And I go over to her, I say, "Hi, how are you doing?" And she's got this book that she is just bent over and riveted to. "What are you reading?" and she says, "This is a book by Denver Snuffer." (And I don't know which book it was.) But here we have the bishop's wife in the parking lot during church, reading your book. And in some ways, I wonder if that's emblematic of a lot of your followers. What do you think?

Denver: Probably so. I've told people that, in my view, you can remain an active Latter-day Saint, you can be a Catholic, you can be a Baptist, you can be any religion that you want to be if you find that fellowshiping helps you there. But there are some things that you ought to know, and I'm happy to teach them, and the teachings are largely based upon Scripture and not, you know, some new innovative thing—but primarily trying to point out that there's a great deal that we already have that is poorly understood, and so let me see if I can teach you and persuade you. And if so, then welcome it if you find it to be true. And I think there are a lot of people who have found, as you pointed out, Mormonism to be stale, flat, and...

RFM: Unprofitable?

Denver: Unprofitable.

RFM: ...to complete the Shakespearean phrase.

Denver: Yeah. And it has become so. You mentioned you came on board in the 70s. I remember in the 70s, the most interesting hour of the week was the priesthood session, with all the arguments that went on about doctrine and history and speculation about eternities. And the second most interesting hour of the week was Gospel Doctrine, where it was a free-for-all, and everyone was talking. The high priests and the elders (the priesthood group), they were a little more combative; the Gospel Doctrine—because the women were in there, it toned down a bit. But those two hours were just gripping. They were fun. It was interesting to go to church. And if you brought an investigator, they came away saying, "Wow, my church isn't anything like that." And I miss those days. Leadership has strained the life out of it.

RFM: Well, I do, too. And I've likened those days (my first days in the church in the late 70s), that there was a new and glorious sun that had burst upon my view as I learned about Mormonism, as I joined the church, as I began as a new member attending the different church meetings. But in retrospect, it wasn't a sun that was rising. It was a sun that was setting and on the verge of going down below the horizon.

Denver: Yeah, I... Remember—and this may shock people that didn't live through that era—but there was a moment in time when we actually had Leonard Arrington as the Church Historian, D. Michael Quinn as an assistant in the LDS Church Historian's Office, and Paul Toscano as an active member of the church (and a vocal member of the church). And that was a condition in which the church actually existed at a moment in time. And, you know, that's passed.

RFM: I'd like to talk with you about your excommunication, not to reopen old wounds. But that was September 2013, correct?

Denver: Yes.

RFM: That was more when I became aware of you through other means, as well. My son, Jonathan (who is in the United States Air Force) was very much involved with your teachings. He liked a lot of what you had to say. He married into a family that was even more involved with your teachings (and is still married into that family). But he gave me a book—and this was actually at the end of 2013—he gave me one of your books. Let me come back to that. Let's talk about September 2013 and your excommunication. Can you tell our audience in thumbnail form why it was that you were excommunicated? And who was behind it, if you know?

Denver: Yeah, I had a stake president that had defended me for some period of time. He had actually called me to be a member of the High Council. I was on the High Council, and he was getting, apparently, some feedback from downtown. But he defended me, and he vouched for me. And ultimately, there was enough pressure that he released me from the High Council. But he released four people at the same time. So it didn't draw any attention.

RFM: Denver, what is it you're doing that's causing this attention?

Denver: Oh, I had written the book, Passing the Heavenly Gift, and that had been greeted with some consternation downtown.

RFM: What is the thesis of your book, Passing the Heavenly Gift?

Denver: It's taking a look at some of the events in church history and saying that perhaps there is a different narrative that would more accurately reflect the events rather than forcing the events to fit into a narrative that says, "All as well in Zion." Perhaps it would fit better into a narrative that says, "We're out of sync with the Lord." One of the major themes of Passing the Heavenly Gift is that in that January 1841 revelation to Joseph Smith (which is Doctrine and Covenants section 124), the Lord tells the saints in Nauvoo that He's got some objectives in mind that He's going to assign to them and that He'll give them sufficient time in order for them to accomplish the objectives. But if they don't, then at the end of the allotted time, there's going to be a fork in the road. If they achieve it, they will not be moved out of their place. He will defend them, and they will establish the cornerstone of Zion in Nauvoo. But if they fail in the task, then they WILL be taken and removed, and instead of blessings, there'll be cursings, and they will be dispossessed of their Nauvoo position, and they'll go through a whole sequence of disasters. It's in Doctrine and Covenants section 124.

RFM: Was that...?

Denver: I...

RFM: Oh, I'm sorry, I started to say was that the five-year prophecy on (or deadline on) building the Nauvoo Temple?

Denver: Well, the Nauvoo Temple did not... Section 124 does not set a date. It just says, "I'll give you sufficient time," without establishing what the timeline was. What I suggested in Passing the Heavenly Gift is that there's an objective set of criteria that we can use to try and figure out if they passed muster and accomplished what was required OR if they failed and if they were driven out. And the answer is, obviously... I mean, they didn't finish the temple, they got driven out of Nauvoo, they suffered a series of cursings rather than blessings. The book details what happens to them after they were expelled, including, you know, the distresses that they suffered in Utah. Famines were not the end of it. They lost all their cattle up in Cache county because of the winter that came in. I mean, the stories about Lorenzo Snow going out and digging up the Se-go lily bulbs, and he was so hungry that instead of taking the bulb back to his family, he ate it on the spot because he was starving. The stories about eating shoe leather. I mean, these were objectively verifiable sequence of events that happened after the section 124 promise that you're gonna either have blessings, on the one hand, or you're gonna have cursings, on the other hand. And I suggest, "Well, why don't we at least allow for the possibility that they failed?" And that as a consequence of that they WERE rejected with their kindred dead, as 124 says.

RFM: So, if I understand you correctly, HISTORY demonstrates the fact that they did not build the temple within the sufficient time period allotted by the Lord because they obviously received scatterings and cursings, rather than blessings and staying in Nauvoo.

Denver: Right. And the book goes through/walks through all of that, and it walks through history and hiccups and problems. And the book—ultimately, at the end—suggests that, yeah, it's kind of a mess, and it's not all that it claims that it is. However, there's still some value to it. And there's nothing wrong with you—individually—YOU going back and saying, "Okay, the church as an institution may not have pleased the Lord with what THEY have done. But there's no reason why I can't go back and repeat the process, going all the way back, you know, as Joseph Smith did and approaching God as a penitent inheritor of a flawed, messed-up institution." I can still individually approach God and say, "Hey, I know it's a mess. But I would really like to get right with you—myself, individually."

And so, the book ends on the rather upbeat note of suggesting, "Hey, you can still reclaim it; it's not dead." The other day when we were talking, I mentioned to you that the book cover has a candle, and the candle is smoldering—there's a spark still on the wick and there's smoke coming up (that are actually Hebrew letters that come up in the pattern of the smoke), but the spark is there. And we all know that if you've got a spark left in a candle, you can get it to reignite just by blowing on it. If you blow on the candle, you can stimulate it back to a living flame. And that symbolism on the cover was suggesting, you know, that the breath is a symbol of the Spirit; you can get the Spirit and breathe life, breathe the fire back into the promise of the Restoration—individually, if not institutionally. And institutionally, I think that that ship sailed.

RFM: Right, and I remember I said, "the Ruach Elohim."

Denver: Yeah.

RFM: The breath of God. And then I said, "I have just exhausted my knowledge of Hebrew with that phrase."

Okay, so that's the book. I want to come back to this in a second. But can we just pursue this line for a minute? Because I remember reading the book and recall that you had likened the current state of the LDS Church to the children of Israel wandering in the wilderness under a lesser law. They weren't cast off from God, but they'd been given a lesser law to try and help them along. And so, my question for you now is: Do you still maintain that view of the LDS Church as having a lesser law that they can rekindle by blowing upon the flame?

Denver: I think individuals can. I don't think the institution can. I think the institution has trapped itself in its own mousetrap and that there literally is no way out. I could take you and Bill and Paul Toscano and (if he were still around) Hugh Nibley, and I could put you guys in a First Presidency/Quorum of the Twelve, and I don't think the institution is capable of responding. First of all, you would be junior-most members so that you would be quite elderly before you ever get into the big seat that really matters—the one chair that matters. And by that time, you would have been habituated to a program. There is, in fact, a program.

Bill: We'd have to go to the crappy places in South America.

Denver: Yeah. And you have to sit and wait for other people ahead of you in line to tell you what to do.

RFM: By the way, apologies to all of our listeners in South America, BILL!

Bill: I didn't say which ones. All I know is that when you're the "junior-six," you get told what to do and where to go. And the other guys get the easy tasks.

Denver: Yeah. And you enter, and you leave the room according to seniority.

RFM: Yes, but it's not a legalistic religion.

Denver: No. Well, I'm not sure it is still a religion.

RFM: So, let me take you back to 2013, if I can...

Denver: Yeah.

RFM: ...because you mentioned this book; you've gone over the thesis statement. Apparently, the people downtown—and by that, I take it you mean downtown Salt Lake City in the church office building? Is that correct?

Denver: Right.

RFM: That they were having heartburn over this. Can you tell us what happened (and this is just a thumbnail version, because we actually have a whole bunch of other stuff to get to), and how it was that you found out who was behind the hit?

Denver: Well, the Stake President that defended me was replaced by a new Stake President. And...

RFM: Had your first Stake President served his entire ten years?

Denver: It was nine years. So, I don't know how long you would normally sit, but I think nine years is close enough that you might not...

RFM: Yeah.

Denver: ...you might not think it was an early release.

RFM: Okay.

Denver: So, after nine years, he was replaced. The fellow who came down to replace the Stake President with a new one was Russell Nelson. I think he, at the time, he was either President of the Quorum of the Twelve... Actually, it may have been... It may have been Boyd Packer. But Russell Nelson was right up there in seniority. He came down, he released the old Stake President, he called the new Stake President, and on the date that he called the new Stake President, he handed my membership records to the new Stake President and said that the committee had decided that this member needed to be dealt with. And so, that was the introduction...

RFM: Denver, this is very important information (I think) to me and to the audience because it was right around this time—maybe a little bit later—that the church sent out a spokesperson named Ally Isom (I-S-O-M, if memory serves) when other excommunications were going on (that you may be aware of) to assure the public-at-large that these were local decisions and that the leadership of the church was in no way involved in any kind of disciplinary proceedings on the members.

Denver: Yeah...that didn't happen with me...

RFM: So, I'm going for your basis of knowledge on this one. Can you tell us how it is that you know that Russell Nelson was behind this and that he told your Stake President that the committee had made the decision to... What was it you said?

Denver: That this member needed to be dealt with, that there needed to be discipline done for this specific member. And the membership records—my membership records—were handed to the newly-installed Stake President. The reason I know that is because there was...

It actually took numerous interviews and about a year-and-a-half before the new Stake President decided to pull the plug and actually hold a court and kick me out. During that year-and-a-half, we had a lot of interviews, meetings, discussions, email exchanges, and at one point, he thought everything was going to be copacetic. It was just going to work out. And he told me that the reason this was happening was because of the day he got called, and Russell Nelson handing him the membership records, and all of this other stuff ensuing.

RFM: So, it was your Stake President who told you...

Denver: Yes.

RFM: ...that Russell Nelson was the one who told your Stake President, gave him your membership records, and said the committee has decided that you need to be dealt with.

Denver: Right. And in the series of meetings, he was persuaded that I was not the threat that the committee thought that I was.

Look, I was very low-key and very quiet in my ward/in my stake. I wrote things, but you had to BUY them, you had to go FIND them. I didn't advertise it. There were a lot of people who were neighbors and members of my ward who never knew I'd written a single book! And so, the idea that I'm out proselytizing to try and get people to, "Hey, wake up! This church is a mess!" That's a false notion. I did my home teaching. I paid my tithing. I had a temple recommend, which is another interesting thing—I was never asked for my temple recommend back throughout the whole ordeal, right up until, well, even after I was excommunicated. They never did ask for my temple recommend back. But I was not a threat.

At one point, the Stake President wanted the entire Stake Presidency to hear me out. So, we got together one Sunday evening. We were talking... Actually, it's in my journal; it may not have been a Sunday, but it was an evening, and it was early enough. I was answering questions. And I said, "Look, look, guys—we're not getting anywhere. You don't even have the right questions to ask. Let me just walk you through what it is that I think you need to understand in order to grasp where I'm coming from." And we were in the High Council office; there's a whiteboard there. I got, you know, a magic marker. And I walked them through on the board for about an hour/hour-and-a-half explaining things to them.

And when it was done, I mean, one of the members of the Stake Presidency had tears he was so moved. The other one was saying, "We have to keep you in this church." And my understanding is that after that interview, they sent a letter downtown—all three of them—suggesting that it would be a mistake to give me the boot. And I thought (and I think they thought) that everything would be copacetic at that point.

However, within a month, the Stake President called me back, and he said that he had been given more training—and he actually had a copy of the Church Handbook of Instructions with highlights on it—he'd been given more training and that "these sections required" that he had to do something. And I asked him if I could, you know, look at the pages. And he said, "I can show them to you, but you can't have them." So, I looked at them, and I said, "It doesn't fit. I'm not doing that. That is not what happened here."

One of the accusations was that I was "disparaging a president of the church." In Passing the Heavenly Gift, I quote from Heber J. Grant's diary. Heber J. Grant's diary included entries where his mother told him that he cared too much about money and not enough about things of the Spirit. And then in his diary, he goes on to talk about how he's never had an inspired dreaming; he's never had any kind of spiritual experience. This is the president of the church in his own diary, either quoting his mother or making his own reflection. So the point I made was, "I'm not disparaging Heber J. Grant. I'm quoting him, and he's quoting his mother. If you got a problem with the language, then you ought to go discipline Heber J. Grant's deceased mother, or you ought to go do something with Heber J. Grant, but I'm not doing anything more than quoting them." And...

RFM: I take it all of your arguments were in vain.

Denver: Yeah, yeah. Ultimately, a church court was convened. I cleared it with the Stake President that I could bring my family with me to the church court. The reason I wanted my family there was because all of this had to do with the book, and it did not have anything to do with moral lapses (because excommunication almost invariably has a stigma associated with it—that it's because you are doing some immoral act). So, I wanted my family to be there so that they understood EXACTLY what the basis was.

When we got there that evening, instead of allowing my family in, we learned that they were not going to be welcomed into the High Council room. One of the excuses they gave was that "there aren't enough chairs," and my kids who were present said they'd be happy to sit on the floor. And they said, "No, that won't work." And I reiterated, at one point... We went back and forth for about 45 minutes in the hallway of the Stake offices trying to allow me and my family in so that I could deal with the court issues. And they wouldn't. And at one point, I said, "Look, the reason I want them there is because I want them to fully understand exactly what the accusations are and that they do not involve anything of moral turpitude and that all of this is about a book." And the Stake President... I had my family—one of my daughters was on the love seat in the hallway, sitting right next to where the Stake President was standing. He said, "I want to assure you that this has nothing to do with any immorality. This has to do with a book." And my daughter (I won't name her), bless her heart, my daughter, who was sitting right next to him, looked up to him, and she said (really indignantly), "A book! A book!!" And you could almost see the Stake President shrink from what he had just said and what this teenage daughter's reaction was.

Ultimately, they wouldn't allow me in the room. They went...

RFM: They allowed you in the room, though, right?

Denver: They would have allowed only me in the room.

RFM: Okay.

Denver: And because my wife and I had struck an arrangement before we got there, we'd agreed that if they can't all come in, then I wouldn't go in. And so, they tried me in absentia, and it took a little while, but they finally reached unanimity. And that date, it was September the 10th of 2013. It's...

RFM: A significant day for you, wasn't it?

Denver: Exactly... Exactly 40 years (to the day) from the day I was baptized on September 10th in 1973. So there was a symmetry to it all and...

RFM: By the way, Denver, I'll give you a little observation that may not have occurred to your Stake President: I have never seen an LDS Stake Center that has had a shortage of chairs.

Denver: Yeah... yeah. Well, they only have a shortage when they need to have a shortage.

RFM: Yeah, I'm getting that impression.

Denver: And I guess they had one.

Bill: Just a quick... Just a quick note. Yeah, no, you're good. Just a quick note. Having been excommunicated myself, I can also acknowledge, as a second witness, that the Stake... My Stake President also informed me that people higher than him said that he had to have the disciplinary court; it wasn't up to him. So, when these guys say that that's all local level decisions...not true.

Denver: Yeah, it's not.

RFM: Why do you think they do that, Denver?

Denver: Um, I think they're... If you look at how the church (the institution of the church) has developed itself and painted itself into a corner, the one thing that they just cannot allow to happen is for people to question keys, continuity of authority, existence of status to rule and govern and preside. And if you diminish the way in which the institution has poorly preserved the original endowment that was given at the time of Joseph Smith, what they have left with today is: We have authority. We are prophets, seers, and revelators in the same sense that...in the same sense that the pope is the Vicar of Christ. The pope's infallibility does not reckon from the fact that he speaks the WORDS OF God. It reckons from the status that he holds as the regent of God, therefore empowered to bind God in a legal sense. And I listened to a Rasband... It was a Rasband recording, somewhere on the internet...

RFM: Oh, Elder Rasband!

Denver: Yeah, Elder Rasband.

RFM: I thought this was some kind of reggae musical group.

Yeah, no, it's Elder Rasband in a recent recording. And essentially he attributed the status of Russell Nelson to being "prophet, seer, and revelator" to office and position. These are honorific titles. They are honorific titles in the same way that the pope is an honorific. They don't mean that he's a prophet indeed. They mean that he holds an office titled "prophet"; he holds an office titled "seer." It's not that there is the presence of charismatic prophecy. It's not that there is the presence of seership, in the sense of "seeing beyond the veil." It is an honorific.

And they use that as a word of art. And all I'm suggesting is wouldn't it be nice if, despite all the institutional claims, if you could set the institution aside just for a moment as "it's a nice place to go and worship and fellowship, and have your kids raised, and participate in meetings, and have your children learn some public-speaking things, and read some Scriptures, and sing some songs"? It's a nice place to do all that. But your religion, your connection to God, the spark of the divine that exists within you, connecting to the originator of that spark of the divine? Hey, that's up to you. Why don't you go do that? And there's no impediment to you doing that. You're just as authorized as was Joseph Smith, and you're probably more authorized than was Brigham Young. So, go do it. Go do it yourself. Worship where you want to. If Joel Osteen turns your gears, hey, go join a mega-church. Listen to Joel. I mean, his gospel of success... I don't like his delivery, but you know, at times he stumbles on an acorn, but...

RFM: [laughter]

Denver: Yeah.

RFM: Denver, you said twice that the church has painted itself into a corner. Can you explain what that corner is you feel the church has painted itself into?

Denver: Everything is circulating around the fullness of the keys that are possessed in one individual, exclusively, in its fullness. Bruce R. McConkie had some little phrase that he used: "All authority that God has vouched safe to man is possessed in the fullness by the head of the church." And so, now that that's the deal, what happens when, as was the case (I'm not making this up; it was the case), what happens when people learn the true order of prayer in the temple, and they organize their prayer groups, and they gather together in the homes, and they dress in the robes, and they engage in the true order of prayer, and they get revelation? What happens when that happens? And they have a revelation, and the revelation from God to them trumps something that a leader is trying to get people to do—what happens? I mean, the conflict almost instantly suggests that the way you resolve the conflict is, "Obey God." I mean, obey God because He spoke to you. You don't obey someone through whom God is filtered if you can go to the source and God can speak to you directly. So, you obey God—now you've got a conflict.

Well, how does the institution deal with that? A letter goes out from Spencer W. Kimball; I put it up on my website, at one point...

RFM: Can you tell our listeners the name of your website so they can find it?

Denver: Oh, it's just denversnuffer.com, just d-e-n-v-e-r-s-n-u-f-f-e-r.com. And you can go there.

RFM: I apologize for interrupting.

Denver: Yeah, you'd have to search to find it. It's a PDF, but it's the letter. It was sent out from... over the signature "Spencer W. Kimball as President of the Church" to all of the stakes and all of the bishops, and it announced, "We are discontinuing prayer circles outside of the temple."

RFM: Wait, wait, wait, wait, wait, wait, wait. Okay. Now, I know that you were a member of the church for five years before I was, but you're blowing my mind, man. Because I would have thought that NEVER would prayer circles outside the temple be countenanced by the leaders. I'm wrong about that?

Denver: They had prayer circles in wards! They had prayer circles in Stakes!

I don't know how much of this you're aware of, but there's actually an Elder's Quorum room in the Salt Lake Temple, just like there's a First Presidency room, and there's a Quorum of the Twelve room—there's an Elder's Quorum room. And the Elder's Quorums would sign up, and they would rotate the... In the valley, they would rotate their opportunity to go into the Elder's Quorum room in the temple. And one of the regularly conducted things in the room was to hold prayer circles. So, they would bring their wives and the, you know, the teachers and what have you, and they'd rotate in for their Elder's Quorum presidency meeting and include a prayer circle.

They used to hold them in stake centers; they used to hold them in ward buildings. In fact, one of the things that was talked about is, "Who's in your prayer circle?" "She's in our prayer circle." "He's a member of our prayer circle," because they would get together, and they would pray, and the way in which you deal with this—when the conflict arises, and it's hard to govern—is you terminate prayer circles.

So, a letter went out... I forget the year; I think it was '74.

RFM: I'll bet it was before 1978.

Denver: Yeah, yeah, yeah, it was before '78. And it terminated prayer circles. And I remember Bruce R. McConkie came to a stake conference meeting when I was down in Texas (your neck of the woods, RFM). He was down in Texas; we had a stake conference. It was in Odessa. (To give you an idea of how big a stake in Texas was, the stake boundaries were actually larger, geographically, than the state of Utah.) So if you're going to stake conference (we were over in Abilene), we had to drive hours to get over to Odessa for the stake conference. And on a Saturday evening, there's a priesthood meeting held at the stake center. Well, in Texas at that time, with those boundaries and that travel, the get-together for the priesthood meeting that evening was the main chapel of the stake center with the missionaries (the full-time missionaries) and me and one or two others. It was like, you know, 14 or 15 people in a hall that could seat a thousand.

And so, Bruce R. McConkie came down from the podium. He had a whiteboard brought in. My memory is he actually took his coat off, which tells you, you know, he's going to be approachable. And he opened it up for questions. And there were lots of questions, and the prayer circle issue was something that someone asked about. And one of the comments that he made was that the church determined that it was difficult to govern with the prayer circles going on. And so, the termination of the prayer circle practice was done so as to make it easier to govern the church.

Well, it's an illustration of how you drain the Spirit out of the institution. Because the institution literally is built to protect a singular office. There is one and only one Mormon legally, because the Corporation of the President (which is a corporation sole) owns every chapel, every stake center, every temple, every welfare farm, every ancillary business, every mall... Everything that's out there is the property of one and only one person. And that's the "whoever happens to be the individual" that occupies the Corporation of the President of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Well, when that's the structure, you... I mean, you've now invented the perfect mousetrap, and you've caught everyone in it.

Bill: Just a quick note, Denver. I shared a link in all of the places where our stream goes out. It is a website, ldspioneerarchitecture.blogspot.com. They have an article on prayer circle rooms in LDS chapels, and they share pictures of multiple ward buildings that had that. So, just another...essentially to back up what you're saying and to express that a lot of the LDS wards early on (and some of them still today) have prayer circle rooms.

RFM: And this is one of the fascinating things about Mormonism to me is that as much as I've studied over many, many years, there's still new things I'm learning, like this tonight.

Denver: Oh, hey, let me tell you something. Yeah, I have that experience all the time. You know, I thought... I read it; in fact, Oliver Cowdery said it. Oliver Cowdery (after he'd been excommunicated in that 1838 timeframe) had lamented that he had always hoped that Joseph Smith would make some effort to reproach him and to bring him back and to invite him back. And Joseph wound up killed before that had ever been done. And so, in reading Oliver's end of things, I had always assumed that Joseph never made any outreach to Oliver, when (to my surprise, and I just learned this in the Joseph Smith Papers, Documents, Volume 12) in June of 1843, Joseph Smith directed that a letter be sent to Oliver Cowdery asking Oliver if he'd spent enough time eating the corn husks and if he didn't want to be welcomed back home (it being, you know, a reference to the prodigal...

RFM: The prodigal son.

Denver: ...son). Yeah, and so Joseph did make the effort for the outreach. Now, he directed that the letter be sent and out over his name. But the Documents doesn't include a letter. So I don't know if the letter ever got written or sent. I'm still waiting to see. Maybe it'll show up in Documents, Volume 13 when they release that, which I'm waiting for. But Oliver, I think, would have been really gratified and touched had he known that in June of 1843, Joseph had actually wanted to reach out to him, you know—and I just learned that. The study of the Mormon landscape is ongoing, and you're always going to find something new.

RFM: I will tell you that even in 2021, which we are in now, there's no guarantee that if you write a letter and put it in the mail with sufficient postage affixed, that it's actually going to get where you're sending it.

Denver: Yeah, I just had a... This is a pleading with the court. I just had an exhibit show up in my mail for a motion that got filed—and I didn't get the motion; I just got AN exhibit (it was like exhibit G or something). So, everything that had gone before that in exhibits, as well as the motion itself... Even the court system is at times unreliable.

RFM: Denver, this is fascinating. We are already almost, well, an hour into this. There's one thing I want to talk with you about, and we're gonna let a lot of it go to the cutting room floor. This has been fascinating talking to you. And I suppose if anybody wants to ask a question about your visions of Jesus or seeing Jesus (however you frame that), I'll let them call in and ask that, but I wanted to go right now—for the final part of this part—with the June (I think was June) 2015 "Boise Rescue."

Denver: Oh, yeah.

RFM: Where now President Oaks (a heartbeat away from the presidency) President Oaks took off to Boise, Idaho, which I understand he perceived of as being a hotbed of Snufferite-ism. And he went there with Richard Turley (Assistant Church Historian) in tow to give a three-stake fireside in which he vehemently denounced false prophets. I'm sure you're aware of that happening. We actually have a clip here from the news at the time talking about it with a few audio clips from Elder Oaks and Richard Turley (who I cannot help but continue to think sounds just like Barney Fife—Richard Turley does; when you hear it, you'll see if you agree with me). But I want to get your comments on this after we play it. It's just about a minute or two long. Do we have that?

And I cannot hear the audio.

(It might be one of the better ways to listen to Elder Oaks.) But we really need to hear the audio for this clip to work. It does have subtitles, at least.

Bill: Yeah, no biggie. I think it's just a little glitch when you add the screen that the audio has to be added to so no biggie, she'll have it back up here in a second.

RFM: Ok. And this ran on the news a few days after it happened. And there's even a clip of you because they talked to you for comment at the end. Okay, let's give this another go.

Bill: Oh, still not.

RFM: Still not. So, we'll continue to work on that.

Bill: And Maven, maybe if you can send me the link on Facebook, I can try to put it up on my screen and see if that makes any difference.

RFM: By the way, everybody, I hope you'll be patient with us. We are trying to take care of a few kinks in the technology. One of the main reasons that we were doing this was so that hopefully listeners can actually hear me when they call in (that was one of the big things that we've been dealing with for about a year now). And hopefully we've got that ironed out. But as I'm finding out with technology, when you iron out one wrinkle, it can raise a few more in other places. And sometimes there's no telling why—unless you're really smart.

Bill: And I actually might have it here. Let me see if I can get it.

RFM: Alright, and that is Elder Oaks, and I'm not sure if that's really video of him from Boise. It looks kind of like the stake center, but maybe they have a really nice... Excuse me, from the General Conference Center. Maybe they have a really nice stake center there in Boise with a nice wood and the plants and everything in the background.

Bill: Sorry, I apologize.

RFM: Yeah. Because my understanding is is that this is not something that was supposed to be ready for primetime. It was a multi-stake fireside. People were actually not supposed to record because they give that warning at the beginning, right? "Don't record, don't record us." And somebody, some disobedient soul, actually went ahead and recorded it, and I think they're playing the recording over some stock footage of Elder Oaks. And let's see if we've got it now.

Bill: All right, I think this should be it. Let me know if you guys have sound.

— — —BEGIN VIDEO CLIP— — —

Dallin Oaks: When you follow false prophets, when you start toward apostasy, you are on the wrong side.

Newscaster: LDS Apostle Dallin H. Oaks with a plea to members of three stakes in Boise.

Dallin Oaks: Stand fast with the leadership of the church.

Newscaster: Oaks, alongside Church Historian Richard Turley, picked Boise as the place to spend time responding to critics.

Richard Turley: One claim that we sometimes hear is that the church is no longer the church that was restored to the earth by the Prophet Joseph...

Newscaster: ...a claim made by this man, Denver Snuffer, an attorney from Sandy.

Denver Snuffer: It was not the same church in 2013 as the one I was baptized in in 1973.

Newscaster: Snuffer was excommunicated two years ago for spreading his ideas, including the thought that Mormons should be able to be rebaptized. He lectured about that in Boise.

Denver Snuffer: I know there are a lot of people that have been rebaptized. I know that there are people that are blogging in the Boise area and talking about meetings that are taking place.

Newscaster: But the church denies this meeting came in response to any of that, telling 2News Elder Oaks was not scheduled for an assignment that weekend so decided to use his free time to visit an area with a concentration of members, knowing that some members have questions from time to time that trouble them. Snuffer doesn't know what role, if any, he played.

Denver Snuffer: I don't know that I have a following. I know that there is a group of people that is discontent.

— — — END VIDEO CLIP — — —

RFM: And there's the end of the video clip. Oh, and the very interesting...

[crosstalk]

All right. So, I wanted to say about that, however, that I thought, number one, you were very gracious in how you responded to... Let me back up. It was obvious to anybody with two brain cells to rub together that you're the reason that Elder Oaks took Elder Turley out to Boise, Idaho—because everything he said was designed to contradict all of your main talking points, even though he never mentioned your name. And it was so obvious that the reporter asks the church if you were the cause (which it obviously was), and Elder Oaks then has the church spokesperson (Elder Oaks doesn't respond to it because, you know, he's very busy), and he has a church spokesperson deny it and say, "Oh, he just had some free time in his schedule, so he decided to go out there, you know; it was just one of those things." I thought that was an obvious, let's say, well, something that was less than the truth on his part in saying that. But I thought you were gracious in not holding his feet to the fire about that. What were your thoughts about the Boise Rescue, as it's come to be known?

Denver: Well, the concern that I have is that anytime I try to assert my own relevance and importance, we're missing the point. The point is not me. The point is: If Mormonism has value, and I can talk about the value that it has, and there are a whole host of people that resonate with that value and say, "Yeah, that's something that I've thought or I've believed or I've understood, or I now understand, and I believe that to be more correct than what I'm hearing elsewhere..." It's the content that has some value, not me. But to say, "Hey, hey, look at me," it seems to me that that is contrary to achieving anything to benefit other people.

People are best benefited when the religion lives in them, when the fire gets ignited in their own hearts, when they can look around in this world and they can see the fingerprints of God everywhere and the wonder of this creation and to feel like they have a spark of the divine in themselves as well. To say, "There's a lot that God has done with ME," distracts more than it contributes. If instead you can say, "There's a spark of the divine that's within YOU that is actually connected to God," and if you can find the peace within you to allow that still small voice to actually be heard, you will find an amazing thing about the value of not only yourself but every individual that's walking on the planet, and that we are all interconnected with one another through that divine spark. The problem is, we tend...

The whole idea of a prophet status, a seer status, a big guru, a divine cumbah that has somehow the authority to rule and reign from the rivers to the ends of the earth and none dare make afraid, it... That is nonsense. That is contra accomplishing what the Savior did. I mean, the Savior was more or equally concerned with the leper, with the blind, with the maimed, with the halt, with the poor, and He called from the ranks of the blue-class laborer the intimate circle that He had. He was not interested in the recognition from the hierarchy. And the hierarchy certainly had very little use for him. They felt threatened by Him. That's the problem. The truth and religion itself—when it properly connects a person with God—makes them so resilient that they don't fear a hierarchy anymore.

RFM: Can I ask you a question? First off, with my observation, and this will probably be the last thing—I'm sorry—before we take callers. There's so much we could talk about, and I know that you've written a great deal. How many books have you written, by the way?

Denver: I think I've got 22 in print. There's a new one that we're trying to get into print here shortly. I don't think we're gonna get it out in time for Christmas, but it's primarily addressed to Christians...

RFM: Twenty-two books. You're like the Stephen King of Mormonism.

Denver: That...yeah. Hey, this one [holding up A Man Without Doubt].

RFM: Yes?

Denver: This one was written to give Joseph Smith the opportunity to actually defend himself. And it takes the three longest compositions by Joseph Smith—but gives an introduction that sets them within a historical setting so that you can understand what was going on, why he wrote what he wrote. But it's the three longest compositions, and this is for a Christian audience. I'm trying to get people that distrust Mormons and Mormonism to take a look at it.

And then this is the latest book, Religion of the Fathers. It's actually based on a talk that I gave at a conference down in Aravada Springs. And it's dealing with the whole Book of Abraham controversy.

Those were the two most recent ones, but a new one is coming out. It's primarily for a Christian audience. And I'm going out to Kentucky to at a conference there in the spring and hopefully have an opportunity to see some more Christian folks. It's really hard because the impression that people have been given by the Mormon missionaries is that the LDS Church defines what Mormonism is. And if that's the definition, Christians really ought to walk away. But if the definition can be expanded to include something more and embrace any truth that they already have, then maybe taking a second look would be a good thing. Yeah. Twenty-two books in print right now.

RFM: I apologize. I wasn't laughing at you. I... Every now and then I make the mistake of reading the comments that Bill's putting or that Maven's putting up. And I saw a comment after my Stephen King reference, saying, "Which apostle is the clown in the sewer?" And that started making me giggle. I apologize. We're not going to try and answer that question tonight.

But I did want to continue with my observation that Stephen King scares a lot of people, but what you write, I think, scares the leadership in Salt Lake City more than anything else—because here's what I see. First off, I see that all of the members of the church, to some degree, I think have a little bit (maybe a lot a bit) of cognitive dissonance. And it's built into the system because we are baptized into the church that Joseph Smith founded; we learned about Joseph Smith, the Book of Mormon, all the visions, all the charismatic gifts, but then we get baptized into this nearly-dead husk of a church that I think has been resting on the laurels of Joseph Smith for about 180 years now. And they see there's no "there" there. And we have leaders of the church now finding that many of their best and brightest—seriously—are leaving the church to follow the path that you're charting. And, dang, if you're not doing all the things that Joseph Smith did that the leaders of the church are not doing. And by that, I mean, claiming to see Jesus (Joseph Smith did that). They're still trying to hang on to that sort of fiction in the top echelons of the LDS Church, but I think that people are starting to get wise to that, that they haven't really seen it. The old joke is that when the Quorum of the 15 get together in a room, each of them sits around wondering if they're the only one who hasn't seen Jesus. So... But they certainly haven't produced new Scripture; you have, and I'm thinking there of the Testimony of John (and probably other things as well). So you have visionary experiences, you're producing new Scripture, you have charismatic gifts, there's the whole second comforter and the visitation of Jesus that you have re-instituted into the world because the LDS Church has lost it, thus the title, Passing the Heavenly Gift. I think that you are a real burr in their bonnet. (It's a bee in their bonnet and a burr under the blanket.) But I think you're both of those things to the LDS Church leaders. What do you think?

Denver: I think that if you were to reduce it down to one concept, the idea of democratizing revelation so that everyone can stand on equal footing is fearsome to people who entertain a lot of insecurities about that very topic. If you have the self-confidence to say, "I have connected with our Lord, and therefore, welcome, brother, if you have likewise connected." That's one approach. The other approach is, "I haven't. I don't expect I ever will. In fact, it is not within my ambit of experience or expectation, and therefore, what you say about connecting up with God, that's threatening to me. We have office. We have order. We have position. We have rank. We have keys," whatever the hell those things are.

RFM: Keys mean, "You can't do bupkis without our permission."

Denver: Yeah, keys are one of the most often-used and poorly-defined ideas that the institutional church rails upon.

RFM: Did I define it pretty well, though, in an LDS context?

Denver: Yeah, "I'm the boss." That's...

RFM: Yeah, "You can't do anything without my permission," whether it's baptizing people, you rogue you, baptizing people without authority of the duly-constituted Bishop —or anything else that you do. And this is another thing that gets them very upset with you, such that they go and have a special Boise Rescue, not only because they're concerned about you, but they're concerned about the influence that you're having among members of the church. I think that goes without saying, but I just said it anyway.

Denver: At one point I... In one talk I gave, I said they claim that they hold all the keys and that there's one guy who's the key holder, above all, and every one of you are nothing more than keyholes.

Bill: Yeah, yeah.

RFM: Ooh. Yeah. He's the... President Nelson is the Key Master.

Denver: Yes. And you're a keyhole.

RFM: I'm the gatekeeper.

Bill: So, let me jump in here. Let me jump in here for just a second. So first, let us set up the... I want at least get the phone call stuff set up so that Maven can start screening some calls. And then I want to ask a question, while she's doing that, maybe two.

So first off, I'll put the banner up. This is now our brand new "Victory for Satan" segment of the show where you get to not only put in the word "Mormon" (which we'll get to), but you also get to put in the Mark of the Beast, 666. So, our telephone number, our new telephone number for our live call-in section here is 1-662-MORMON or 662-667-6667. And when you call in, Maven will screen your calls. We want to make sure that those calls are on topic and have to do with Denver Snuffer and the things that he's saying tonight, and she'll double check that.

So, here's my question while she's doing that; two things, really. Jonathan Streeter asked a great question because, Denver, I'm a skeptic at heart. And, you know, I don't want to debate my end-position on whether what some of these things you've said, in terms of your experiences, are real or not. But here's what I do think. I think you're much softer and kinder and more... You're easier to work with and to sit with and to have a conversation and try to talk about hard things.

So, two things. One is that when Joseph Smith died, there were multiple voices that came forward trying to lead the church.

Denver: Right.

Bill: And one of my fears is that, you know, when your day on this earth comes to an end, that there's going to be voices within your followers who do the same thing who say, "Hey, I'm now the guy who should be leading." And I'm curious what your contingency plans are to make sure that whatever it is "your vision of what should happen" actually does happen rather than three or four James Strang's coming forward.

Denver: Yeah. I'm trying to elevate people and to bring them along and teach them enough so they can stand on their own feet. Hopefully, by the time I finish, there will be people who are of deep enough understanding and vast enough experience that there won't be a controversy. One of the things that I've tried to get across is that having an organization is going to doom anything because organizations can be taken over. But if you fragment it, if you leave it at the bottom level without an organization, then you have to corrupt every single person. You can't get to a hierarchy or an individual or an inner clique, you can't get to that and corrupt the whole. If everyone stands on an equal footing, then you have to corrupt every single one of them.

One of the things that I've taught or suggested is that people get together in fellowships and they gather their own tithing among their group. And then after they gather their tithing, they use that money to help anyone with a need among them. I'm trying to take all of the money/all of the profit out of the practice of the religion, and there IS money in religion in the form of tithes and offerings. But if that money gets used to benefit people in need, and it never gets aggregated into some fortune with a hierarchy and control of it, if you have to sacrifice for the religion because you can't earn a living by being a minister, then a lot of the people who want to practice a religion in order to benefit themselves look at this and say, "Well, it's a dry well—there's nothing there for me to benefit or profit from because I can't get paid for what I do."

I've spent a small fortune on doing what I do in order to advance the religion. But I haven't profited. I don't make money. And tithing groups that gather money use that money among themselves to pay for food and shelter and transportation, medical care, and education, and take care among themselves of needs that they have. I'm hoping that, by the end, there is a group of people who are sufficiently united in how they view the practice of religion ought to be conducted that we don't need a leader, we don't need a, "Hey, hey, listen to me." But if someone's got a good sermon to deliver, a good message, a good concept, let them speak up, and let everyone listen and determine for themselves if it be true or not.

RFM: And I understand, also, Denver, that your definition of tithing is different from the LDS definition in current usage—that your definition of tithing is a tenth of an individual's SURPLUS.

Denver: Only their surplus. Yeah, you have to take care of your own family. All of the costs associated with your own family, whatever's left over after that, one-tenth of that is the tithe. You don't deprive your own family. In fact, if you can't meet your needs, not only should you not PAY tithing, but you ought to be the recipient of help from other people who ARE paying tithing. It ought to be a light thing. It ought to be easy to be born.

Bill: Perfect. And we've got a caller in the queue; we'll go to her in just a moment.

My last question is: When you have somebody who's following along and they want to be included in your group, but they're saying things or doing things that aren't meshing, what is the way in which your system—and again, I don't mean, you have a system; I know you don't have a system—but the way in which your group of followers kind of do... Because on some level, you do have to regulate a little bit, right? You do have to... If somebody's imposing themselves in unhealthy ways or maybe they have mental instability or maybe there's some other reason that they're putting themselves at the forefront, and it's not helpful. What's the way in which your organization (for a lack of a better word) handles that?

Denver: Issues like that are dealt with by the women. Men don't do that. The women are entrusted with that kind of disciplinary stuff EXCLUSIVELY. They may ask a man to come testify, but the women are the decision-makers on that. We've empowered women to do that sort of thing, including investigating and even suspending people. That's up to the women.

RFM: Hmm, where did that come from Denver? Was that a result of revelation?

Denver: Yeah, actually, I... We hadn't gotten to the tenth talk, but one of the things that I had advocated for and prayed about was just giving women priesthood. And the response that I got was not that. But instead of women having priesthood, women have authority OVER the priesthood to govern, to discipline, to curtail—and so, the balance was struck. Instead of men holding the exclusive authority to do everything, men can perform ordinance work, but women have the ability to deal with the discipline, including terminating the ability of a guy to exercise priesthood because he's out of line. In many respects, one of the most common problems that men have when they become abusive is something FIRST learned or experienced or witnessed by the women. And so, the women—who have long been powerless—really have been entrusted with that end of things, and it's kind of a balance.

Bill: Perfect. So, we're gonna go to our first caller. We're gonna hope, we're gonna cross our fingers, RFM, that the caller gets to hear you, as well. And so, she has called into the show before, but it is Nicola. Nicola, I'm adding you to the show now. Nicola, how are you?

Caller 1, Nicola: I'm fine. I just wanted to ask... And I was very... This is a very good episode. I really like it. And I very... I'm quite interested, but I wanted to know what his take on the sacrament was? Does he just do it the same way? Because like, if you're going to do it from home, how the heck, I mean, basically, I've just been... I've been taking the sacrament, and I've just been praying that Heavenly Father does it because, obviously, I haven't got priesthood.

Bill: Yeah.

Nicola: I'm not going to church anymore because I can't... I'm... I suppose I'm concerned it's just not right, but I feel very strongly about the sacrament. So, I want to know how you feel about, like, how you do things because obviously...?

Denver: Okay. I've actually tried to help out with this, particularly during the period of time in which meetings were suspended and people were not gathering together for fear of some, you know, exposure to something that's going to kill them. So, I actually recorded the sacrament prayers, and they are on my website: denversuffer.com. And I've said if you want to use my recorded version of the sacrament prayer at home when you're in isolation... And it was intended primarily for women to use. There are a lot of single mothers, there are a lot of widows, and they don't have any access to someone that can bless the sacrament for them. I recorded the sacrament prayers, and you can play them off of my website and do the sacrament at home.

And the prayer, by the way, is the one that you find in the Book of Mormon, not the one that you find in the Doctrine and Covenants. They changed the prayer in the Doctrine and Covenants. I've remained faithful to the version that appears in the Book of Mormon. (I believe that the section 20 language was written by Oliver Cowdery.) But the Book of Mormon version—slight wording difference—Book of Mormon version is the one that I would use...

RFM: The Book of Mormon says...

[crosstalk]

I'm sorry. In the Book of Mormon it says, "wine." So do you use wine instead of water?

Denver: Yeah, I believe wine ought to be used in the sacrament.

Bill: And I'll just say, I've been to a remnant meeting, and we were there for the sacrament (being done here in southern Utah and St. George—it was at one of the conference rooms in one of the hotels). And the sacrament, as administered by your group, Denver, matched up much more closely with my study of LDS Scripture than the LDS sacrament.

Denver: Yeah, yeah.

Bill: Unfortunately.

Denver: Again, it just... Yeah, the longer it goes on, the more distant they become from where it was, notwithstanding what Turley said in the recording you played earlier.

Bill: Yeah.

RFM: And what was that he said?

Denver: Well, he said that there are claims that it isn't the same church as the one that Joseph did. Hell, it's not even the same church I joined in 1973, or you joined in '78!

Bill: It's not even the same church it was 10 years ago.

RFM: Can I tell you one of my favorite quotes for me?

Denver: Yeah.

RFM: One of my favorite quotes for me is the dilemma that the church leaders find themselves on, which is, number one, if Joseph Smith was not a prophet, then they're not prophets. That much is obvious enough, right?

Denver: Yes.

RFM: The other prong is if Joseph Smith WAS a prophet, then they sure as hell aren't prophets.

Denver: That ship's sailed.

RFM: Yeah.

Bill: Nicola, does that answer your question?

Denver: Emma Smith said...

Nicola: Yes, and thank you so much. That was very, very interesting. That's very good.

Bill: Thank you.

Nicola: Will the show notes cut to these things?

Bill: Say that again.

Nicola: So, is this... Is his website attached to this... Have you got the website attached that you get the sacrament prayer?

Bill: Denver, where's the website she can see that?

Denver: It's the denversnuffer.com website. And there's a link right on the front page that you can go to the sacrament prayer. Are you going to link it in this, in the notes of this?

Bill: Yeah, I'll put it in the show notes.

Denver: Okay. By the way...

Nicola: Thank you so much.

Bill: Thank you, Nicola. Good, have a great night. Bye-bye.

Nicola: Thank you. Bye-bye.

Denver: Just to finish the thought that RFM provoked. Emma Smith said, "Without Joseph, there is no church." And I think Emma was right on that score.

Bill: Yeah, yeah. Cool.

Next caller is going to be Christian, and Christian wants to ask you a question about gender within how you understand the theology works. So, Christian, you're on the air, Mormonism Live with Radio Free Mormon and Bill Reel and Denver Snuffer. What's on your mind tonight, my friend?

Caller 2, Christian: Hey, good evening, everybody.

Bill: Good evening.

Christian: So, "The Family: A Proclamation to the World" has been a pretty big battleground, in terms of in the church and without the church. I was curious as to hear Denver's thoughts on how much... You know, if that's good doctrine, if it's mixed doctrine. Essentially, I've heard him speak on the divine roles of men and women. And I was curious to hear more about that. And then, of course, more like, what are some social and cultural stigmas that we've made up in terms of men and women. What should we be seeking, in terms of divine, you know, prototypes of the man and woman?

Denver: I gave a talk that's actually—I think it's 47 pages in the form that it's on my website—called "Our Divine Parents," where I get into the whole issue of the Creation, the creation of the man, the creation of the woman, the relationship between the two of them, what it was that was required in order to make Christ the Redeemer for a posterity and, therefore, the essential fatherhood of Christ to the man Adam but, on the other hand, the essential connection of the woman to the Divine Mother. And that there's so much about the story of the Creation and the origination of the two and how those two go together.

And then I took off on the statement that Joseph made about Jesus Christ being the prototype of the saved man and that if you're going to be saved, you have to be precisely what Christ is and nothing different or else not be saved. And I used that analogy to then talk about the role of the woman and the prototype of the saved woman and tied that into the role of Mary as the mother of Christ and Her stewardship over the whole thing—from the time of the Annunciation, the birth, the divine origin of Christ in mortality, Her role shepherding Him right through to the end. She was there at the Last Supper; She was there in the Garden; She was there at the cross. She shepherded Him through the entire thing and discharged the Divine Mother role and is the prototype of the saved woman. And I suggest in that talk that the Catholics got Mary right a bit more than did the Mormons get Mary right.

And that there is a process by which the male fulfills, ultimately, the role of achieving, duplicating what the prototype of the saved man (or Christ) is and attaining to the resurrection. You're going to be resurrected, but when you get resurrected, you're dependent upon Christ for that. You have to "attain to the resurrection," as Joseph explained it in the King Follette Discourse. "Our Divine Parents" goes into that and tries to explain how that relates.

And then the prototype of the saved woman is explained in "Our Divine Parents" in a way that I think makes a lot more sense than what we've done with Mary in Mormonism. I mean, Bruce R. McConkie made her breeding stock for both the Divine Father and Joseph, and that, yeah, it's all... It's all a mess.

That talk—I'd refer you to that. And I've only briefly skimmed the surface of that; it's a big subject. Read the talk—it's 47 pages—or listen to the talk. It's recorded; it's on the website somewhere.

RFM: Can I throw a follow-up in here, Bill?

Bill: Yeah, sure.

RFM: I apologize. Denver, is there a place for gay/homosexual/lesbian people to be accepted in full fellowship in your faith?

Denver: I don't see any reason why they would not be accepted. They need to understand that there is a divine role behind sexual identity, and we get to imitate that divine role in being a father and a mother in this life. And...

Look, people bring with them a whole lot of baggage. I would imagine that almost every person who's ever been excommunicated from the LDS Church has suffered some kind of trauma. There are all kinds of reasons why we have the quirks we have, we have the hang-ups we have, we have the errors, deficiencies, mistakes that we have. The fact that someone has something that is quirky about them...

And the objective is to love one another, and then go from there. You'll never get anywhere if you can't sort through the idea that there is a divine spark in anyone, no matter who they are and no matter what's wrong with them. There are a lot of angry people who, if you were in their shoes, you would be angry. I mean, I don't understand a lot of things about what people get hung up on. There are some bizarre, aberrant things that are fetishes that are out there. I don't claim to understand them. But I don't care if you've got them. Just don't practice them on me, please. And we'll get along just fine.

RFM: Okay, Denver... And I apologize. This is not at all a gotcha. I just want to put a fine point on this question. If I am a gay man—openly gay man in an openly gay (even) marriage—and I'm a member of your faith, are there any things that I, as a gay man, cannot do in your faith or any ordinances that I cannot perform?

Denver: Not that I'm aware of at present. I wouldn't think so. We don't have a temple, and we don't have marriage sealings. And so, that's an issue that we don't even address at this point. I think, at some point, we may have a temple.

Your question reminds me of... There was a homosexual couple... I grew up in small town in Idaho, and there was a homosexual couple in the hometown. They lived together. They owned a business together; they had a restaurant. I actually worked for these guys when I was in high school doing labor in the kitchen and washing dishes. And euphemistically...

They were accepted in the community; no one, you know, talked down about them. But everyone knew that they were homosexual. And they were euphemistically referred to by the good Christian folks in my hometown as "bachelors." They were a couple of bachelors. And so, for some time when I was a kid, I didn't know if "bachelor" was codeword for homosexuality or an unmarried male, but bachelor had that connotation in our little neighborhood in my hometown. And by the way, we trick-or-treated at the house. They were accepted as people in the neighborhood. And I mean, they were known to be a couple of steers without a cow. But, you know, hey, if that floats their boat, what the hell?

Bill: Yeah, I just, I would simply hope that the God that we're all kind of dealing with has a space for all of humanity and all of its expressions that isn't causing harm to other human beings.

Denver: I think it is worse to collect tithing to pay a professional minister than it is to have a homosexual relationship in which you are a faithful companion to someone else. No matter what the relationship is, I think it begins with fidelity and trust and honesty. I don't know how you become a suitable, trustworthy person if you're untrustworthy in the most intimate relationship that you have.

Now, the most intimate relationship you have was originally ordained to produce progeny, and progeny was intended to teach you something. I think both of you are fathers...?

RFM: Yeah. Mostly they teach me regret.

Bill: [laughter]

Denver: Well, and humility. And, yeah.

RFM: I'm still working on that one.

Denver: Yeah. I mean, the life's lessons that come from being a parent by far exceed any other experience that I've had. My children are exceptionally precious to me. They just... They make my life more whole. Some of my fondest moments in life have come inside the family—and not just with my wife, but with my wife and children. And so, that ennobling experience of the family is something that I would suggest needs to be included within life's experience, if at all possible.

Bill: Yeah, and just a note. So, people are noticing, I mean, two women in 2021 can certainly have a kid; two men can certainly have a kid. I know lots of gay parents, and they seem to be doing a hell of a lot better job raising their children than I sure did do in mine. And my... Again, I just want to throw it out because I want to represent some of the voices in the...as the viewers. My hope would be that you (as you move forward, in whatever this is or turns into) that you do a better job than the LDS Church at finding a fair, healthy, equal place for people whose humanity has been marginalized over and over again when they are doing no... They're doing as much harm or less harm in the world than I'm doing. And I hope that your God—and I'll say, "My God," because I would have to spend two hours debating what that sounds like or what that means to the listeners—but that your God or my God, that we find a place for folks to feel loved and to feel equal. Because I think that group of human beings have been marginalized and traumatized enough.

Denver: Yeah. And I do think that there are problems with all of us. But if what your focus is upon is plumbing the depths of connecting with God... I don't know how many people are interested in what I'm talking about if they have no interest in trying to comprehend the value of the marriage relationship and the explanation that I've given in "Our Divine Parents." If they do, then I have no problem with them. And I do think that there's enough trauma to go around without us inflicting more upon one another.

And I like what you said, Bill. I have no doubts that God loves everyone who's down here. And I have no doubt that he would like the atonement to accomplish the maximum possible and to avoid having it affect a tiny group of people that are religiously narrow-minded as the outcome of all His suffering. The objective is to have everyone that enters this world be added upon. And I can think of hundreds of ways in which you can add upon someone no matter what their sexual issues are.

Bill: Yeah, and I would go one step further, and again, I don't want to press. We can go to our last caller here in just a moment, and we can kind of wrap up the show. But my two cents... And again, I haven't spoken to the Savior, and I don't have any of those experiences. But I would suggest, too, maybe we all have to kind of sit down and come up with better language. I've heard, as you're talking the last few minutes, a lot of the words you're using, saying "problem" or other kinds of rhetoric, often... And I think it's reasonable to see some of those words as meaning "less than" or "problematic," and I just... I think...

Denver: Or judgmental.

Bill: ...I think we all ought to sit down and come up with better language. Not only are these folks looking for a place to be just human, they're also looking for the rest of us to change our language so that the space sounds fair and equal, too.

Denver: Yeah, yeah.

Bill: So, anyway, final caller—if you're okay with that, RFM?

RFM: Yes. And thank you for taking those questions that were sort of interruptions on my part, Denver. I apologize.

Denver: Oh, yeah, that's fine. That's fine.

Bill: Yeah, so Dark Swarm is our last caller. He wants to talk to you a little bit about your Scriptures. And so, Dark Swarm, you're on the air—Mormonism Live with Denver Snuffer, Radio Free Mormon, and Bill Reel. You're gonna close this out, my friend. What's on your mind?

Caller 3, Dark Swarm: Hello there. I would like to hear more about Denver's new edition of the Scriptures. I've heard that they're attempting to distance from the LDS Church so that more people can view them. What's your thoughts about that?

Denver: Yeah, all of the Scriptures are available free online. Surprisingly, there was a website URL (scriptures.info)—all of them are up and there. We did get a leather-bound set prepared, and those are available, and there's still a handful of these that can be purchased through the scriptures.info website (I think there's a link to get there). But you can read them free online.

Dark Swarm: Hmm.

Denver: What the Scriptures are is an effort to go back and try to reclaim, as best as it is possible now to do so, the original Scriptures as they were first translated by Joseph Smith, in the case of the Book of Mormon, and as the revelations rolled out to Joseph Smith when they were first recorded. The Doctrine and Covenants that the LDS Church offers have been substantially modified, edited, revised, and don't reflect what Joseph originally did. Doctrine and Covenants section 27, for example, was only about five verses long originally. Oliver Cowdery (in the Book of Commandments) out in Independence felt at liberty—because he'd been told that he could do some things—he felt at liberty to expand that. It grew; it became a monster—revelation 27; it includes the first recitation of a visitation by Peter, James...

RFM: Peter, James, and John.

Denver: ...and John. Yeah, that wasn't in the original revelation that got stuck in by Oliver. The press got destroyed in Independence, but pages got gathered up and smuggled out in the skirts of some women; those pages got bound. And then THAT was the prototype that got used for the 1835 Doctrine and Covenants, where Joseph added the teach...the Lectures on Faith. We've gone back to get the—as near as possible as we can—the original revelation to Joseph, the Lectures on Faith in the form that Joseph published and vouched for them, and we've included that in the Doctrine and Covenants, which has been renamed "Teachings and Commandments"—T&C instead of D&C.

Dark Swarm: Oh!

RFM: And part of that, Denver, by the way, is you got rid of section 132, correct?

Denver: Yeah, we got rid of 132, and we got rid of 110—there are some problems with them. And there's an explanation, actually, in the Scriptures for what got dropped out and why. Provenance is a problem with a number of things. We could probably spend an hour on that! The Book of Mormon...

RFM: By the way, going... I'm sorry, just before you get to the Book of Mormon (because I'm fascinated by all of this), but you've also added a few sections to the Teachings and Commandments (which is your version of the Doctrine and Covenants)...

Denver: Correct.

RFM: ...including two sections that detail your visions or, well... Jesus appeared to you/visitations of Jesus. So, if anybody wants to read those, they can go to them. What sections are those, Denver?

Denver: They're in the T&C, the Teachings and Commandments sections 160 and 161. You can read them there. And those are excerpts from a journal that I keep. Anything that happens gets recorded contemporaneous with the event. If I later talk about it, I only talk about it as a quote from the contemporaneously-recorded event. I don't elaborate on it; I don't embellish it. It's just what's there and only what's there, and it doesn't grow with time. So 160 and 161 are where you could read those two.

The Book of Mormon has a really interesting provenance for what we've got. Joseph Smith translated it, and scribes wrote it down. They didn't take that to the printer. They took a copy that Oliver Cowdery rewrote; it was the printer's manuscript. The printer's manuscript got copied by Oliver Cowdery, taken to E.B. Grandin, and then E.B. Grandin did all of the punctuation (it was John Gilbert, his employee, that set it up and did the typesetting and punctuated) because what the printer's manuscript looks like is one long sentence. So Grandin and John Gilbert punctuated the Book of Mormon.

Joseph Smith began to revise the Book of Mormon before he was killed, and the revisions that he made in the Book of Mormon appear to be corrections. When Oliver Cowdery copied it, he made, on average, a mistake every page and a half. When the printer printed it, the printer made some mistakes. Joseph was apparently going back to the original narration that he gave and correcting the Book of Mormon to make it conform to the first version.

We know that (or we can conclude that) because the original manuscript of the Book of Mormon got deposited into the cornerstone of the Nauvoo House, and then, years later, it got taken out—it had rotted; only about 28% of the original manuscript still exists. But with that 28%, we are able to compare the what was originally translated with the printer's manuscript (that we have in full) to pick out the errors. and then we have the ability to see what Joseph was doing when he was making revisions along the way so it looks like that original printer's manuscript. So the Book of Mormon that we published is an attempt to get back, as near as possible, to the original translation.

Now, here's where the story really gets interesting. Joseph Smith's revisions were not picked up when the Book of Mormon... Joseph authorized them to print it in London. When the Book of Mormon got printed in London, it was an earlier edition that hadn't been corrected by Joseph, but it got printed in the mission field in London by the Quorum of the Twelve over there. When the LDS Church began to print the Book of Mormon itself, they did not use the version that Joseph had corrected. They used the version that was over in London.

RFM: Was that the 1837 version?

Denver: Yeah, yeah.

Bill: In Kirtland, yeah.

Denver: Yeah, so the Book of Mormon version contains errors that were made by the printer, errors that were made by Oliver in copying it, and errors that were made by a new printer over in London. And that's the version that's been handed down in the Book of Mormon version from the LDS Church is that. We've tried to fix all of that. And in the Foreword to each of the volumes of Scripture, there's an explanation given that tells all of the effort that went in to try and fix it and to make it more correct.

RFM: Did you rely at all on Royal Skousen Herculean efforts in this regard to try and correct...?

Denver: Yeah, that was used in the examination as well. And his latest version where he did a side-by-side comparison and he tracked it down through, that was really helpful.

Bill: Perfect. Anything else, RFM?

RFM: No, that's it. Except that, you know, we could go on for a long time. We've already gone longer than we usually go. But I have really, really enjoyed the conversation, Denver Snuffer. I appreciate your coming on the show and giving us of your time, and hopefully we can, maybe, get you to come on some...

Denver: Hah!

RFM: ...time in the future to talk about everything that you're doing now and all the great things that you're doing—because it's been a few years, and a lot of people I've talked to in my experience has been that you sort of seem to have fallen off the radar. And some people were wondering if you're even around anymore, if you're even doing anything anymore. Somebody thought maybe you had died. Obviously, that's not the case.

Denver: Well, this is a few months old; this is about a year old [holding up books]. And there's another one coming out here shortly. Yeah, I continue to work. And the purpose is to push the Restoration further along, to get more of it on the ground and back into the hands of people.

RFM: All right, well, you're certainly very busy. And no, you haven't fallen off the radar. So, thank you so much for coming on the show. And it says RFM. Yes. And this is...

Denver: That's so I don't... Yeah...

RFM: That's me. #lazylearner.

Denver: There you are.

RFM: I think that's all of us here tonight.

Denver: Well, my note was up so I didn't call you by your name.

RFM: I appreciate that. You had made a comment about in the private chat, saying you had the note up there to remind you to call me RFM. And I said, "And I have a note up on my computer to remind me to call you 'Your Holiness.'"

Denver: Your Holiness, yeah.

RFM: Yes. And you take a joke. You're so great. I appreciate it so much.

Denver: Yeah.

Bill: Denver, thank you for your time.

Denver: Yeah. Good to talk to you. Take care.

Bill: Yeah, appreciation to Maven for running things behind the scenes. By the way, it does look like the phone system now works, RFM, where you and I can both communicate with the caller. So, that worked out great, as well. And listeners, just want to say thank you. I appreciate so much everybody tuning in today, and it was grateful for Denver to give us his time. And folks, if you like Mormonism Live, please go to mormonismlive.org and donate. And don't forget...

2021.12.17 Christmas Fireside

West Jordan, Utah
December 17, 2021

There are a lot of ways to triangulate into the story of Christmas. But I thought one thing that might be interesting to look at would be the significance of women and their role, motherhood, and the coming of children into the world, generally as a theme and then—ultimately—specifically in the case of the Christmas story. But I want to go a long way back before starting and take a look at a child that was born about 1100 years earlier, when Israel as a people had stabilized, had gotten an inheritance in the land, had been observing the law of Moses and the festivals that had been established under the law. They had a known hierarchy. They had locations where the center of worship was located. And everything had settled down into a pattern where you could clearly identify people in authority; you could clearly identify how, where, and when the religious observances ought to take place. And Israel as a people had assumed a very stable form.

And it was utterly corrupt. The center of the religion housed and was presided over by a family who engaged in drunkenness and immorality and seducing of women in the shadow of the tabernacle. And they were utterly off the mark—completely compliant with a recognized structure, unquestionably knew who was in authority, and everything about them was offensive to God.

And in the midst of this mess, an Ephraimite's wife, who was barren and couldn't have children, went up to the tabernacle on one of the festivals (because they were observing the festivals—the only reason to go up would have been on one of those occasions). She went up to the tabernacle. Don't know the date; don't know when; don't know which observance brought them there. But while there with the rest of her family enclave, she prayed that her barrenness would be removed and she be able to have a child.

And the wicked priest Eli—who tolerated his whoremonger sons, Hophni and Phineas—saw her moving her lips, but no words were coming out. And he made the normal assumption about the condition of the folks at the tabernacle at that time, and he assumed that she was drunk. And it was in the morning, and he more or less chided her for being drunk so early. (I mean, this is the kind of behavior we expect in the afternoon or the evening, but not in the morning.)

"You shouldn't be out here drunk and carrying on this early in the day." And she corrected him and said, No, she was praying. And he (without knowing what she was praying for) said, "A religious, righteous woman! May the Lord grant your prayer." The priest was unworthy. There was no reason why God would respect what this priest had to say. But he said to her, [May] God...grant you your petition (1 Samuel 1:5 RE), and this Ephraimite woman conceived and bore a son.

So, you ought to ask yourself: Why would the blessing of the presiding high priest (descendant of Aaron, sitting in the position of authority) who clearly could not raise sons in righteousness and who tolerated wickedness around the tabernacle, why would his statement to Hannah result in God granting her petition? It's NOT because Eli's faith made her whole. It's because HER faith made her whole. She took the word of Eli, and God vindicated HER faith and gave her a son.

So really, the greatness of the story of Samu-EL—a name that means "the voice of God"—the reason why the story of Samu-el becomes significant is because of Hannah and her faith. God wasn't going to give to this woman of faith a son who didn't match the worthiness of the faith of the mother that sought the blessing of the son to come.

And so, Samu-el comes and is born. (I mean, the story is in the First Book of Samuel, and I've more or less summarized it.) God heard, and Samuel was born. And so, a barren woman conceives because of faith, and Samu-el comes into the world, and it changes the entire trajectory of Israel's history at that point. In fact, it will be Samu-el who's entrusted by the Lord to create the kings—first Saul and then David—create the kings that would replace the way in which things had been run. And Samuel found that offensive. But God told him, "Don't worry about it, Samuel. They're not rejecting you; they're rejecting me." And God's big enough to absorb that kind of faithlessness from His people and still bear with them.

Well, Samuel, was taken by Hannah (when he was weaned) and delivered to Eli to serve in the tabernacle—because he was a gift given to her from God, and she was returning the gift back to God after he was weaned by giving him to the high priest to raise. And Samuel grew up under the auspices of the presiding high priest in the tabernacle. And Hannah came up year by year, as the festivals were celebrated—[they] don't identify the festival, but I'm fairly confident it was the Passover—and brought a new coat to fit her son each year because Mom was not going to abandon the son, though the son had been given back to God as her offering.

We don't know the timing of the incident that happens that really changes the whole direction of where this story is going, but at one point, after making the observance that:

And the word of the Lord was precious in those days; there was no open vision. ...when Eli was laid down in his place and his eyes began to wax dim, that he could not see, and before the lamp of God went out in the temple of the Lord, where the ark of [the Covenant] was [it was a tabernacle], and Samuel was laid down to sleep — that the Lord called Samuel. (1 Samuel 2:8 RE)

And Samuel went back to Eli ('cuz he'd been called) and asked him what he wanted, and Eli said, "I haven't said anything. Go back to sleep." That repeats itself three times, and Eli finally says, "You're being called by God. And the next time that voice calls to you, answer, 'Here I am, Lord.'"

So, the narrative tells us that Samuel did not yet recognize the voice of God—which is why he kept coming back to Eli. And then the incident happens again; the Voice calls to him, he answers and says, "Here I am, Lord." And then Samuel encounters the Lord for the first time. The extent of what happens when he encounters the Lord is not explained—it's just that the Lord spoke to him then. But as the narrative goes on, it confirms that what happened was, in fact, the "open vision" that did not exist in those days. So, you have this apostate Israel—this decadent group of people with a corrupted, central hierarchy—and out of that, because of the faith of a woman, a child of faith is born. And the Lord deals with Hannah's son.

And from that moment, beginning at Samuel, something changes in the way in which the Lord will deal with Israel for generations. There is continuously a hierarchy and continuously a high priest, and continuously, there are Levites that are serving, and the structure remains intact. Samuel could not be the high priest because he was an Ephraimite. But he could be a prophet. And despite the structure, Samuel functioned as the voice of God to the people in those days. And he would be the one, ultimately, that anointed the king. And he'd be the one that ultimately replaced the king with the anointing of a second king.

God continued to deal with Israel through prophets throughout the Old Testament period of time. And it was an extraordinary exception if one of them was from the tribe of Levi and qualified to be a priesthood holder. And yet, they functioned as God's messenger, as God's spokesman—which presents a problem. Because the question is: How on earth is it that prophets can come along who don't fit into the hierarchy and match the pattern of governance that was established by Moses and respected throughout the Old Testament period? And Joseph Smith gives us the answer to that question, which is: God Himself ordained them. You had to have Melchizedek priesthood in order to enter into the presence of the Lord. But God cured that by conferring upon them the authority when He made His presence known to them, because God's a clever fellow, and He knows how to get around whatever rule there is that gets established.

So, Israel continues on their downward spiral. God peels off ten of the twelve tribes through captivity, and Assyria removes them, takes them over the Euphrates, dispossesses them of their land. They get freed, but they don't return to Israel. They're prophet-led after their scourging, after their imprisonment, after their enslavement—but they're prophet-led after they repented. But they never return. When they cross the Euphrates, upon their return, they turn north, and then they get lost. So those are the lost ten tribes.

Judah and the Southern Kingdom, they remain behind until—from 725 until about 600—so, for another one and a quarter centuries. And then they're taken captive by Babylon, and they're treated similarly. And when they return, Ezra, Nehemiah... They reestablish, and they reestablish a hierarchy (and the hierarchy matched what Moses had established). And it required that you be able to prove genealogically that you were of the house of Aaron or the tribe of Levi in order to be a Levitical priest or in order to be the governing high priest or part of the high priesthood's family in succession. And some people claimed that, that couldn't prove that, and they said, Okay, you can't function until there arise someone with Urim and Thummim that can get revelation to identify your genealogical qualifications to serve.

And so they divided up the folks that were able to return and prove (or get otherwise established by revelation) to be qualified to serve in the temple. And they divided them up into 24 courses. One of the 24 courses was the "course of Abijah." And they would come to minister in the temple on a circulating basis; every 24 cycles, you'd get back to your course (except that when there was one of the festivals, everyone showed up—you had to have all of them in order to take care of what went on during the festival season). And so it was that Luke tells us that:

In the days of Herod the king of Judea, a certain priest named Zacharias, of the course of Abijah, and his wife — being of the daughters of Aaron, and her name Elizabeth — were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless; ...they had no child. Elizabeth was barren, and they were both well-stricken in years.

And while he executed the priest's office before God in the order of his priesthood, according to the law... (Luke 1:2-3 RE)

So, Zacharias has come to the temple. It cycles through—you have to go outside of the scriptural record in order to put together part of what's going on. But in order to serve in the capacity that Zacharias will serve (that we're gonna read about in just a moment), you had to win the lottery (and I mean, literally—they drew lots). And if the service in the temple needed someone and you had not been selected, then you remained in the drawing of the lots. But if you had been through and you had rendered that service in the temple, you weren't in the lot drawing. And apparently, based upon the record, Zacharias was an old guy, and he'd never won the lottery (kind of like those guys that drive up, you know, to Malad, Idaho to buy the lottery ticket when the number gets high enough, and they come back disappointed year after year). Well, Zachariah had been doing that because it was considered an extraordinary honor to have been allowed to go into the temple and to participate in the service that he was gonna render, in particular.

The way that the service got performed, they kept, outside the temple, they kept the altar of sacrifice burning continuously; it was always on fire. They cleaned it up from the ash from time to time, but the coals remained behind. When the occasion required the incense to be burned in the Holy Place, there were two priests who went in, one of whom got the ashes off of the little golden altar, and the other of whom put a shovelful of coals onto the golden altar (inside, before the veil of the Holy of Holies). One came in to clean, the other came in to deposit the coals, and then they were to depart. They could not turn their back on the Holy of Holies; that would be disrespectful. So they would back out, carrying what they brought with them, and they would leave. And then the priest who was allowed to burn the incense (that's who we're gonna read about in a minute), he then put the incense on the coals, and he gave a prayer before the Holy of Holies, outside the veil, while the incense ignited and burned. And the interior (above the altar), a column of smoke would rise up, and it would spread out on the ceiling of the Holy Place, which is where he was located, while he was offering a prayer—the ascending smoke being a symbol of the prayers of Israel going up to Heaven, and then when the column reaches the ceiling, it spreads out as a symbol of the Tree of Life and representation of the salvation that God offered.

The prayer that Zachariah offered was a set prayer. We can actually find it and read it today because Edersheim, a Jewish convert to Christianity in the 1800s, preserved the prayer. And the prayer, in its relevant part, asks God to "return the light of His countenance" to Israel. So, Zachariah offers the prayer and is petitioning God to let the light of His countenance return.

(Okay, you can't tell Troy everything that's gone on, 'cuz he's just arrived. So it'll be mystifying to him.) Over here. Good to see you, by the way. Yeah, hey, it started at seven. Did you know that? [Audience laughter.] Troy's a big guy; he can take a ribbing.

So, when the prayer gets offered, the only one that is inside the Holy Place is Zachariah. He's won the lottery, he's had the opportunity, he's recited the prayer. Everyone knows what he's praying for. And on the right side of the altar—emerging from what would symbolically be the presence of God in the Holy Place—comes the angel Gabriel, who identifies himself as: I am Gabriel, who stand in the presence of God (ibid. v.4). Okay? So Zachariah cannot make a mistake about who is talking and the authority represented by the voice of the person who's just identified himself. So, Gabriel says he "stands in the presence of God," AND "your prayer is to be answered"—so the light of God's countenance will return to Israel. "Your prayer's been answered; your wife is gonna bear a son." Elizabeth—who is barren and well-stricken in years, who is righteous before God, walking in holiness, observing all of the ordinances—she is going to conceive (the woman who is barren), and she's going to bear a son.

So now again, we have a woman who's going to conceive who cannot bear a child, just like Hannah before. And there's going to be a son sent into the world who's going to go before the face of God to prepare the way for the light of God's countenance to return to Israel.

And of course, Zachariah—who's there representing Israel, asking for God to do something for the people of Israel—is a little taken off-guard. "Okay, the light of God's countenance is going to return, and ~~you're Zachariah~~ you're Gabriel—you stand in the presence of God—and this is all great and wonderful, but uh... My wife is gonna have a child? I mean, we're both in 'assisted living' now. And this is not really... When I'm not here, we're in wheelchairs! I mean, she's got that little motorcycle cub that goes down the sidewalk, but..." It's the improbability of the mechanism that is being described for the return of God's countenance to the people of Israel that astonishes Zachariah. "I mean, wonderful, this is a great thing that you're going to do! And I'm happy for that. I just don't... I just don't get that one thing, you know: Elizabeth? And a son? Uh... that's, well, improbable. In fact, I'm calling BS. Okay, I know you're an angel and all, but I just... I'm... I'm not... I'm not seeing that."

And Gabriel says, "Oh, you want a sign, do you? So that you can have faith? Well, let me give you a sign. I mean, we've done rainbows; we've done floods. We produced leprosy on a hand, and we've removed it. We've parted waters. Let's see... Okay, I got it. You're gonna be dumb, and you're gonna be deaf. How's that for a sign? That way we're not screwing up anyone's neighborhood. We're not wrecking the irrigation system in the valley with the water of the Jordan drying up. We're not gonna do any of that stuff. We'll just do it with you. How's that sound?"

...very calculated maneuver, because everyone knew how long the prayer would take, and Zachariah was in there too long! So everyone perceives that something's going on that's a bit irregular here. And one of the traditions—I'm not sure how credible it is—but one of the traditions was that the priest (who remained behind to offer the prayer) came in with a rope tied to one of his legs so that if he died while he was in there, they could pull him out, and they wouldn't go disrupt the peace of the Holy Place; they just retrieve the guy. And if that tradition be true, I'm pretty sure that Zachariah was...

"How can this be...? Gah! You know, give me some room here!" He was skeptical! But the people outside knew he was tarrying and something's going on. And it's beginning to become awkward. I mean, I can imagine people looking at one another and saying, "I don't know. What do we do? You know, you don't turn your back to the Holy Place. But we don't go in their face first. Do you back in to retrieve the carcass of the old guy? I mean, this guy's, you know... We all call him 'a raisin' behind his back—and that's being generous. I mean, what do we do? What do we do?"

He tarries long enough that it's awkward out there. And when he emerges, Gabriel's been really clever—because everyone wants to know, "Hey, hey, what gives?" And they perceive that something happened. And it's a way of saying, "Too sacred for you, at this point. You're not going to get the story just yet. You, Israel, in your messed-up, wretched, apostate state, you're not gonna know. I've got my priest. I've got my righteous mother who's barren, and I've got my miracle coming. But as for you people? You won't know. And furthermore, when that boy is brought to be circumcised, an angel will ordain him on that day to overthrow the kingdom of the Jews, so that he will come with authority."

Samu-el came to try and fix and repair; John would come to overthrow. So in the apostate condition that Israel finds itself when the angel Gabriel is sent, he's sent to allow another barren, righteous, faithful woman to bring a son into the world that will go before the presence of the Lord Himself, to prepare the way.

Zacharias said..to the angel, How shall I know this? For I am an old man, ...my wife is well-stricken in years. ...the angel answer[ed and] said unto him, I am Gabriel, who stand in the presence of God, and am sent to speak unto you, and to show you these glad tidings...

And [so,] in the sixth month, the angel Gabriel was sent from God unto the city of Galilee named Nazareth, to a virgin espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David; and the virgin's name was Mary. (Ibid. vs. 4-5)

So, now we have a barren woman who is going to bear a child. And in the sixth month of her pregnancy, the angel Gabriel is sent again, this time to another woman—who may not have been barren, but she was also not married—and so her ability to bear a child is going to be equally miraculous with the coming of Samuel into the world, with the coming of John into the world—and this will be the Son of God. It's in the sixth month.

Now, we actually can calculate (because they kept pretty good records) when, in the normal rotation of things, the course to which Zachariah belonged would have been serving; it would have been at one of two times during the course of any calendar year. But the problem is, we don't know whether the incident involving Gabriel appearing to Zachariah occurred on those days or on one of the festival dates in which the priests would be at the temple and would be sacrificing and performing the daily rituals and having lots drawn—because it happened on those dates.

Well, if it was in a springtime observance, then the birth of John would be in the fall, and Christ's birth would be exactly half a year opposite one another. Whether you knew it (or recall it), the tradition in the early days of the Restoration with Joseph was that the General Conference held on April 6th was held on April 6th because that was identified as the time when the Lord was born—meaning the Lord came in the spring. And if that's the case, they then had the fall conference exactly six months later, and that would be on October 6th (so that April 6th would be Christ's birthday, and October 6th would be exactly six months later—and no one ever pointed it out, but that would have been John the Baptist's birthday—if you accept the six months and you accept those dates).

There's a symmetry to that because, in the spring, you have new life breaking forth; you have a period of time in which the fall and the winter (representing death) is overthrown with the spring and the coming of new life—and the April 6th date kind of makes sense. And the October 6th date for John kind of makes sense too because you're... That's when you're wrapping things up; it's harvest time; it's when you're closing up shop. And if you're talking about judgment, that sort of makes sense that that would be coinciding with the birth of John, who came to overthrow the kingdom of the Jews and bring it to an end.

So, what the incidents represent in the story, thus far, is that a long-suffering God, who literally has put up with the disbelief, the apostasy, the wickedness, the wretchedness of people that He had called to be His—that long-suffering is not without its limits. But the limits are determined by God. He's the one that sets it up, and He's the one who takes it down. And part of the Christmas story is a reminder to us that even people with whom God has a sacred relationship (who He has called and restored the light of His countenance to in the person of Samu-el and other prophets that followed thereafter, including Isaiah, Zenos, Zenock), even people to whom He has extended His hand (stretched out still, despite their faithlessness), have their limits. And it is up to God to decide when the limit has been reached. And it's up to God to decide when He will overthrow it. And when He chooses to do so, then the only thing that matters, whether anyone respected the boy or not, was that the boy be ordained to do the work. And so John's mission, once he's been commissioned by God to do so, could not prevent the overthrow of the kingdom of the Jews. It was God's will.

A lot of people thought John a mere curiosity. He may have had a father that served in the temple—but John never did. He was raised in the wilderness; he was sort of a curiosity: "Hey, I know. Grab a bag of new wine and new skins. Let's go out in the desert and watch the wild man ~~put~~ a tie-one-on and have a good laugh. The guy wears camelhair clothes. I mean, I'm chafing just looking at the guy. He eats freaking locusts, man. And, you know, he eats honey. (We can make mead out of honey, and that'll do the same trick as the wine—but he eats the honey!) I mean, let's go see him! Oh, come on, let's go out. Let's do this; let's get a good laugh. Hey, come on."

John was not someone that was welcome to the inner circle of the kingdom, of the hierarchy, of the priestly establishment. He was not bonafide in the sense that the Jews would accept. People listened, heard, and were converted. But they were largely people who knew they needed to repent, who (for all the problems that Israel had) recognized that they themselves had something wrong with them. And therefore, their hearts were softened enough that they could take in the message that he had to deliver. The priests that came out? They didn't believe; they had no reason to give up what they considered as their authority, their position, their hierarchy. They were bonafide.

"There was no beauty in him that we should desire him" is kind of an English translation that's poetical and non-literal. What the passage (which applies equally to John and to the Lord that he went before) would be better rendered, "He had no credentials that we should respect." "There was no beauty in him that we should desire him" has created in medieval artwork these caricatures of a butt-ugly Lord. Our Lord was not an unappealing physical specimen in the flesh. But He was an outcast, and He was not someone that got respected. There was no beauty, there was no credential, there was no bona fides, there was no respectability associated with Him that we should give Him automatic respect. The Lord came (just like John came) not entitled to automatic respect. It required the words of His mouth to be heard in order to determine whether or not the man spoke for God.

To say, "I have authority! You must respect me!" is so hollow and so insipid that no one ought respect those that come with that claim. But to speak words with authority that tell you truth, that bring light, that stir you to understand things that you did not before, that open the veil by letting in more light and truth, that by persuasion and pure knowledge give you an understanding that you did not possess before, that's what matters. And that's what Christ came with. And it pierced the hearts of the people who heard.

And when they came to Christ and said, "Okay, okay, yeah... You've got a good schtick here... BUT what authority do you have? I mean, we can't compete with you when you get up and you deliver a sermon like the Sermon on the Mount! But what we can claim is that we have the position of authority; we run the temple. We possess all of the accouterments—you don't have any of the stuff that belongs to the temple in your possession. We've got it all! So tell us your authority, 'cuz we can show you ours. We've got it all." And Jesus says, "Hey, I'll tell you what: You tell me what authority John had. And if you'll answer me and tell me whose authority John had ('cuz you didn't accept him in your ranks; he was an outcast; he was not preferred within your organization), you tell me what authority he had, and then I'll tell you what authority I have." They knew that was dangerous. So, "We can't tell you." And so Christ, likewise, said He couldn't tell them what authority He had.

Everything about this story, thus far and continuing on into the life of the Lord, everything about this story has nothing to do with bonafide authority by people who possess rank and position—nothing to do with that! It has to do with angels. It has to do with women of faith. It has to do with the ability of women in miraculous ways to conceive and bear and bring forth sons commissioned by God to accomplish a work. And when they have that, it's the only thing that matters. It changes the outcome of the history of Israel. It changes the outcome of the dispensation of Moses. God set it up, and God took it down. And He set it up in a fabulously-obvious public way. And He took it down with an obscure guy who stayed in the desert of Judea until the day that his ministry began. (It was almost like an anti-crescendo; it went out with a whimper, with the authority of God to accomplish the takedown of the kingdom.)

And the people of that generation—whether they thought John was significant and who may have rejoiced at his beheading, and who thought the Lord was insignificant and who were glad to be rid of Him on the cross, and who resisted the rumors of His resurrection—the people of that generation knew their kingdom was overthrown when, in 70 A.D., the entirety of their construct was destroyed by a Roman army. And they literally, they literally ate the bodies of their young dead children after their children died because of the extremity that the Roman siege put them under. So the overthrow of the kingdom of the Jews was an exclamation point and unmistakable. But the moment at which the Lord caused it to happen was different—and unless you knew what John was up to and you listened and accepted the message, you wouldn't know it had just happened. But it did.

So, the story then turns to Mary and the accomplishment of the announcement to her (the angel Gabriel sent to her and announcing it):

And when she saw the angel, she was troubled at his saying, ...pondered in her mind what manner of salutation this should be. ...the angel said unto her, Fear not, Mary, for you have found favor with God. And behold, you shall conceive, and bring forth a son, and shall call his name Jesus. He shall be great and shall be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David. And he shall reign over the house of Jacob, for ever, and of His kingdom there shall be no end.

Then said Mary unto the angel, How can this be? And the angel answered, ...said unto her, Of the holy ghost and the power of the Highest. Therefore also, that holy child that shall be born of you shall be called the Son of God. And behold, your kinswoman Elizabeth, she has also conceived a son in her old age, and this is the sixth month with her who was called barren; for with God, nothing shall be impossible. And Mary said, Behold the handmaid[en] of the Lord; be it unto me according to your word. And the angel departed from her. (Ibid. vs. 5-6, emphasis added)

"Behold the handmaid[en] of the Lord," the word handmaiden (Old English term), but it literally means "God's spouse." Behold His Wife.

So, this kind of intimate knowledge... I mean, Luke is writing this story. And I mean, one obvious question that ought to present itself is: How does Luke know what Mary is "pondering in her heart" when he writes his account? See, the people who are New Testament scholars... Luke wrote the Gospel of Luke, and he wrote the Book of Acts. And in the Book of Acts, he uses the plural pronoun "we" at one point in the travels, and so they claim that Luke was a Gentile convert who got converted by Paul and joined him on one of Paul and Barnabas' missions (because the "we" plural pronoun suggests that that was when he came on the scene).

Well, the Scriptures we have in the Joseph Smith version... Joseph renders his Joseph Smith Translation version only in English. So we don't know what the Greek counterpart necessarily would be. But one of the very first things that Joseph did to change the account in Luke was to change the first sentence. And this is how the book of Luke begins in the Joseph Smith version, As I am a messenger of Jesus Christ... (Luke 1:1 RE), and then he goes on from there. Well, you've got "angelos" (or angel), you've got "apostolos" (or apostle) for the word that appears here as "messenger." I mean, we don't have the Greek text to go consult. And that only appears in English. But what Luke is saying is he's either an angelic ministrant who is commissioned with a message that was given him by God, or he's an apostolic messenger who got the information that he's conveying from the Lord. But neither of the options that you have suggests that Luke was some kind of Gentile convert with Paul and Barnabas going out and finding him in the Mediterranean basin and bringing him aboard. He's talking about the earliest events that occurred in the coming forth of the Lord with intimate detail.

Luke is one of the two men walking on the road to Emmaus. He identifies by name the other person: Cleopas (Greek name, similar the male counterpart to Cleopatra, the female rendering of the Greek name). But he doesn't identify the other guy, because that's him. So, Luke knows things about the Lord before He comes even into conception in the womb of Mary. And the Lord spent the better part of the day of His resurrection walking on the road between Jerusalem and Emmaus and talking with them as they wondered about the events that had occurred of late. So Luke is no small potatoes. And Joseph Smith, I think, rightly changes the narrative to put him in a position to know these things.

Well, so, the handmaiden...

...and the angel departed from her.

And in those days, Mary went into the hill country with haste, into a city of Judah, and entered into the house of Zacharias, and saluted Elizabeth. ...it came to pass that when Elizabeth heard the salutation of Mary, the babe leaped in her womb. And Elizabeth was filled with the holy ghost, and she spoke out with a loud voice and said... (Ibid. vs. 6-7, emphasis added)

Isn't that interesting that Elizabeth speaks out, but what she has to say is quoted by Luke, and he makes mention that when she speaks these words, she does so in a loud voice.

You know, the "Hosanna Shout" is is not supposed to be [spoken quietly, rhythmically, and with no enthusiasm]:

Hosanna.

Hosanna.

Hosanna

to God and the Lamb.

It's supposed to be a shout. In fact, it's supposed to be a chaotic shout, with everyone yelling—and not in unison. Everyone knows the words, and they repeat the words. But it's just a cacophony, a loud outpouring. Elizabeth is pretty much doing just that when Mary comes to meet her.

Now, it doesn't go into any great detail, but it's pretty apparent that Mary stayed with Elizabeth throughout the time period—and that when Joseph and her encounter one another again, she was "showing." And of course, Joseph wants to be discreet about it. He has no intention of making her any further humiliated. And the angel Gabriel says to Joseph, "You don't worry about that. This is something God's doing. And you take her to wife anyway."

His genealogy mattered; Mary's genealogy mattered—He needed to be brought into that house. If the kingdom of Israel were still functioning, Christ would have been the king of Israel. It was necessary before Christ's ministry began that Joseph die so that Joseph [Jesus] was indeed the King of the Jews. And so, all the events that happened, happened in a very calculated way.

(Okay, Troy got here a little later, so I'll take a few more minutes. But I intended not to impose on people by keeping them beyond one hour, and it is right now one hour—well, we started a few minutes after the hour.)

Look, we tend to focus on the men when we read the stories. We tend to celebrate the coming of the angel Gabriel, and the guy to whom he spoke, and the status of someone burning incense in the temple, and John coming with authority and making the hierarchy upset, and Jesus, and the priest Eli, and Samu-el. But the fact of the matter is that the miraculous conception and birth of these men were entirely contingent upon the presence of faithful women who conceived and bore these sons into the world through faith.

It was Hannah's faith that got us Samuel, and it was Samuel that was the prototype of all of the Old Testament prophets. He was it. And following in his example—in his footsteps—were other prophets throughout the Old Testament era who came similarly called and ordained by God, in order to accomplish the various missions that they were sent. But it began with Hannah and the faith of Hannah.

When a woman who is "otherwise unlikely to conceive and bear a child" brings a child into the world as a result of the intervention of God (and my supposition is that that's happened throughout history a number of times), then the course of mankind's history hinges and changes upon the faith of the woman and the birth of the child. And we tend to read the Christmas story without even noticing the overshadowing presence and role of the women—just like we read the story of Samuel, and we think, yeah, yeah, he ordained Saul to be king of Israel. And then he was the one who was blind when Samuel [Saul] came back from the war, and he brought with him all of the sheep and the cows. And he had told King Saul to destroy everything, including the animals—and Saul's lying to him and says, "Yeah, we did what you told us. Great day. I mean, we won the game. It was a shut-out. They didn't score a single ~~shut~~ touchdown; we routed them, and we did everything you told us to do." And Samuel says, "Then what's the bleating of the sheep and the moo-ing of the cows that I hear? Can't see 'em, but I can sure hear 'em." And so Saul disappoints the mouthpiece of the Lord, and bad things follow.

Look, God does indeed control the outcome. And it doesn't matter who's in charge, what the hierarchy looks like, how much property they possess, whether they have all the accouterments that make them appear to possess priestly authority. All that is ever required to overthrow any establishment that God has ordained is for Him to send one person with authority to accomplish the purpose of overthrowing it. And it doesn't even matter if those who are overthrown recognize it until 70 years later, when they're eating the dead carcasses of their own children to keep themselves alive, otherwise dying of hunger and thirst. It doesn't matter that they recognize or acknowledge it; it only requires that God do it. And if He's done it, then it's irresistible. It'll happen.

And so it is that the Christmas story includes a whole lot of feminist issues that we tend to overlook. I mean, the Scriptures really are replete with a whole lot more "central role of women" in the bringing of things to pass than we recognize. And the Heavenly Mother has informed us in one of the proverbs (I think it's eight, but you can look it up; I've quoted it in Our Divine Parents). She's informed us that SHE is the One who appoints kings and princes. She's the One that makes the determination. Father defers to Her when it comes to the choosing of the sons that are to be elevated. And so you risk a great deal when you fail to acknowledge the presence and the central authority of the Divine Mother. (I've been trying to make that point for a while now, and I don't know how much success that's had.)

Anyway, let me close by bearing testimony that miraculous conception/miraculous birth/timing—all of those things are not just done with "mighty men." The presence; the central role; the importance of the mothers who have done the work of perpetuating the species, bringing to pass the continual presence of man on Earth; the presence of women and their integral role in the whole of it is something in the Christmas story that we ought to take a moment to reflect on, as well, and not forget the vital importance of what women have and are and do and will do. Neither is the man without the woman, [nor] the woman without the man, in the Lord (1 Corinthians 1:44 RE) is another way of reminding us—in Paul's writings—about how the Creation itself was ordained. It was not complete until the two of them were together. The image of God did not appear on Earth until you had the man and the woman together. In the image of God created he him: male and female created he them (Lectures on Faith 2:8; see also Genesis 2:8). There's not a single man in this room who's complete. The completion only comes with the presence of the woman.

In the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

2021.12.22 Salt Lake Tribune Interview

Mormon Land
Denver C. Snuffer, Jr.
December 22, 2021

Dave Noyce: Thanks for joining us today on Mormon Land where we explore news in and about The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. I'm managing editor, Dave Noyce. I oversee the Salt Lake Tribune faith coverage. I'm joined again by senior religion reporter, Peggy Fletcher-Stack. Hi, Peggy.

Peggy Fletcher-Stack: Hi Dave.

Dave: We remind our listeners about a new way to support Mormon Land. Just go to patreon.com where, with a small donation, you can access transcripts to our podcasts, our complete newsletter, and other gifts. Again, that's patreon.com/Mormonland. Now for today's show.

Some members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints believe that their church has become staid, legalistic, and bureaucratic. They yearn for more of the mystical encounters espoused by church founder, Joseph Smith, and his early followers. In 2006, Utah Attorney Denver Snuffer published The Second Comforter: Conversing with the Lord through the Veil. It became an overnight sensation with those Latter-day Saints who wanted more spiritual experiences. That book and the volumes that followed attracted the attention of church authorities, and in 2013, Snuffer was excommunicated. Hundreds of other members joined him at gatherings and in small groups, and thus was born the "remnant movement," which today touts 1000s of adherents. Denver Snuffer joins us today in studio to discuss the movement, its past, present, and future. Welcome.

Denver Snuffer: Oh, thanks.

Dave: Glad to have you with us. So Denver, tell us a little bit more about the birth of this movement and why you've ventured down this spiritual path.

Denver: My departure from the LDS Church was not voluntary; I would have remained a member had they permitted me to remain so. They just thought that, apparently, the things that I was saying/the things I was writing were incompatible with their desire to claim the authority to rule and reign and control in a way that invades even what a person thinks. And so they kicked me out, although I was willing to remain.

And shortly after that, I began a series—it was a year long; it was exactly 365 days long... I began a series of ten lectures throughout the (what we call) the Mormon corridor in Boise and Idaho Falls and down into Farmington; we went into Colorado; we went into Nevada, into Arizona, delivering a series of ten lectures. And at the end of the lecture series, the tenth lecture, we invited people to be re-baptized, which was a USUAL event in the life of early Mormons; it's an UNUSUAL event today.

There's no church; there's no organization. It's simply an act of following a command by Christ to be baptized. And so, people have been re-baptized, have remained Latter-day Saints, they have remained Methodists, they've remained affiliated with whatever group they want to be a member of in an organizational sense. But rebaptism itself is a signal of faith and repentance and acceptance of Christ (as opposed to joining an institution—there is no institution). But there are a lot of people who believe similarly...

Dave: So, are most the people that are in the remnant Latter-day Saints, though?

Denver: I would say, right now, the majority is clearly former and perhaps disaffected Latter-day Saints. But that hasn't been the only group that there's been an outreach to. I've done a series of lectures or presentations—Los Angeles, Dallas, Atlanta—approaching Christians, in many respects because of the aggressiveness of the LDS Church's missionary program. They get there first, and they get there early. And then Christians form their opinion of Joseph Smith based upon the narrative story told by the LDS institution and its missionaries.

One of the books that I wrote, which is aimed primarily at a Christian audience, is A Man Without Doubt (and I brought a copy of that, which I'm gonna leave with you folks today). A Man Without Doubt, it focuses on the Christian nature of Joseph Smith's life. It takes the three longest compositions by Joseph Smith, and it gives you a historical setting so you can understand the context out of which the document was composed, and then the composition itself. I call it the three greatest failures in Joseph Smith's ministry or life—and then his response in dealing with the failure.

The first one was the effort to get the higher priesthood conferred upon people (that happened at Morley's farm). And the history of what happened after that is a disaster. The people upon whom he conferred that authority universally fell away, apostas[ized], became enemies; one of them wrote a series of nine letters denouncing Joseph that got published in the newspaper. And in response to that failure, Joseph went to work trying to get people to understand faith more—and Lectures on Faith came out of that experience.

He got confined to the Liberty Jail, and he spent approximately half a year (just under six months) there. And in the Liberty Jail, he composed the "letter from Liberty Jail." The LDS version of that appears as Doctrine and Covenants sections 121, 122, and 123. The entire letter is in this book. And that arrest came as a result of betrayal by members of the organization of the church. He was dealing with a mass apostasy, an excommunication of the three witnesses/of members of the Quorum of the Twelve in the 1838 timeframe. And he wrote the Joseph Smith History—because John Whitmer (the brother of David Whitmer, who was also excommunicated) took the history—he was the church historian—and there was no history. So, the Joseph Smith History that he wrote is in response to the problems that resulted at Far West. And all of the history that leads up to those documents is in this book as an introduction.

And the suggestion to a Christian audience is that maybe you ought to take another look at Joseph. If you understand the context and then you see the way in which he responds to these crises, to these betrayals, to these insider friends turning their backs on him, then you'll understand the man a little bit better. And that's A Man Without Doubt —primarily for a Christian audience, but Latter-day Saints will probably get a lot out of it, too.

Dave: So, Denver, you just talked about... First of all, why is it called "remnant"? What's...? Is that something that began organically or as a...

Denver: Yeah, it began organically, and I don't know that there is a name quite yet, although that's kind of the settled term that people call it.

Dave: And is there any kind of structure? Are there leaders? I mean, you've sort of hinted at this, like, are you a leader or...?

Denver: Well, the answer is that there's no real structure. There are fellowships that get formed. And then they can grow; they can split; they can reorganize themselves. The only organizational governance that exists are: men hold the priesthood—but a man cannot exercise priesthood authority outside of his own family unless he has seven women sign a certificate vouching for him as a worthy man who is to be trusted in exercising authority. It requires the seven women to sustain him before he can use priesthood authority outside of his own family. If someone were going to baptize someone, for example, and they're not a member of their family, they would need to have a sustaining vote by seven women.

The other governing principle is that if a man becomes or is viewed as having fallen into some kind of transgression that makes him untrustworthy, then the right to exercise that priestly authority outside of the family gets revoked by a council of 12 women who have to reach a unanimous decision. And if the 12 women reach a unanimous decision to revoke the priestly authority, then his certificate is taken from him. And he can't exercise priest[ly] authority outside of the family that he belongs to.

Peggy: Who issues those initial "licenses" (or whatever)?

Denver: Yeah, the sustaining certificate—it's issued within, generally, within fellowships. The requirement is that the women who signed need to be acquainted with the man's daily walk, and those are the words that get used: "acquainted with his daily walk," meaning you can't get a stranger to sustain you; you need someone who essentially knows what kind of person you are and feels like you can be trustworthy.

If the man is married, one of the seven must be his wife. If his wife will not sustain him to exercise priestly authority outside the home, then it doesn't matter if seven other women will. She has to agree to it. So, while men exercise priestly authority, women do all of the controlling, vouching, and removing—and priestly authority has been revoked by women several times within the movement.

Peggy: Okay, so that's sort of the structure. Do you have basic tenets? Is there an Articles of Faith? Are there 13 Articles of Faith? Are there 20 Articles of Faith? Are there...?

Denver: There aren't... There aren't particular Articles of Faith. But we do have our own canon of Scripture, and I've brought for you a set of the Scriptures that I'm gonna leave with you.

Peggy: Okay.

Denver: If you are interested in how best to understand the differences (the major differences), then you can look in what's called the third volume (called the Teachings and Commandments). And there's three sections in the Teachings and Commandments — sections 156, 157, and 158—that will really give you the anchor/the bedrock for what the differences are. And then there's another one that I wrote down (which is 166) that I think helps explain why the LDS Church has gone into a period of radical doctrinal-shifting since 2014—and that's 166. But I'll leave that with you.

Dave: Okay.

Denver: Three volumes, and they're yours to...

Peggy: So, what's your... Again, I guess we'll call this a "movement." What's the view of Joseph Smith versus Brigham Young?

Denver: Joseph is unquestionably accepted as someone that had a mission from and accomplished a work on behalf of God. Joseph Smith's revelations, largely, are accepted—slightly different form than what you have in the LDS Church and more of them than what you have in the Doctrine and Covenants—and are canonized in what's called the Teachings and Commandments (the T&C). Joseph also had revelations that were not canonized, and they appear in the T&C. And the entirety of the letter from the Liberty Jail is included in the T&C, as opposed to excerpts from it.

Joseph was and is recognized as someone that began a work that will eventually culminate in wrapping things up and the return of Christ. But when Joseph died, Emma Smith made the comment that "without Joseph, there is no church." And I think that largely proved to be the case.

Things took a turn with Brigham Young. I personally think that we still owe a debt of gratitude to Brigham Young, no matter what, because... One of the comments I've made about him is that he figured out (unlike Joseph), he figured out how to monetize Mormonism. Joseph was had a pending petition for bankruptcy when he died, and Brigham Young became the first multi-millionaire west of the Mississippi—because Brigham knew how to monetize Mormonism. THAT you can say is a bad thing, but it's also a good thing, in the sense that I don't think that the Book of Mormon would have been preserved, the teachings of Joseph would have been preserved, Mormonism itself would not have been preserved if it had not been for Brigham Young.

I don't think (just like HE said), I don't think he was a prophet in the same sense of as Joseph Smith. He did not claim to be; he claimed to be a Yankee guesser and someone that could be trusted to preserve things. And he did. And we owe a debt of gratitude—despite all his excesses—we owe a debt of gratitude to the man, and I'm grateful for what he preserved because the Mormon missionaries that came and persuaded me to convert to Mormonism in 1973 were as a direct result of the successes that Brigham Young brought to Mormonism.

I don't think he preserved it intact. I don't think that... For example, there's ample proof to satisfy anyone that's willing to look at it that Brigham Young introduced polygamy, certainly practiced it in a form that differed from what was going on while Joseph Smith was alive. And I don't think polygamy was or is a moral practice. Brigham Young endorsed it, he defended it, he practiced it, and he produced offspring with a lot of women. And Joseph Smith, whatever your view may be of that, had children/he fathered children with Emma Smith alone. And I think that single problem defines, I believe, the difference between the two men (as many other things do, but it's one of the more vocal ones). And we don't believe in or practice plural marriage.

Dave: What's your view of Russell Nelson, the current LDS Church President?

Denver: He's the fellow who came to my stake and released the prior stake president (who had put me on the stake High Council) and called the new stake president who would ultimately excommunicate me. And it was Russell Nelson who handed my membership records to his newly-called stake president and told him that the committee had decided that this man needed to be dealt with. And so, Russell Nelson—I assume on behalf of the Strengthening Members Committee (he said "committee"; he didn't define which one)—was the one that had me kicked out. So...

Dave: How did...? What...? How did you get crosswise with the church? I mean, what is it that they did not approve of (even if you disagree, of course)?

Denver: Yeah, I could see in the LDS telling-of-their-history that there were many things that were either inadequately or even falsely portrayed and that there were gaps that really needed to be filled in. One of the people that was affected by the lack of candor in Mormon history by the institution was a son of mine who was a returned missionary. He had gone on an LDS mission, and in the process of time, he had fallen away, left the church, and was not interested in it any longer. So I took the problems with Mormon history, and I wrote a book (Passing the Heavenly Gift) that was intended to acknowledge—candidly—some of the problems with Mormon history and then to suggest, in spite of that, it's possible still to preserve faith. But I discussed candidly that a number of the claims that are made institutionally are on either thin ice or underwater. And that book—which was designed to allow people to preserve their faith in the Restoration—was viewed by people who had NOT come to some crossroads or crisis because of the lack of institutional candor. People that weren't aware of these problems, reading the book, were horrified that I'm talking about these kinds of things.

One of the passages that was, in particular, highlighted by President Nelson and the stake president in discussions with me involved Heber J. Grant. Heber J. Grant recorded—in a letter that he wrote to a woman—that he was unaware of anyone who had had any contact with the Lord since Joseph Smith's death. He also recorded (in his journal) comments that his mother made to him about how he was more interested in money than he was in spiritual things, and he acknowledged in his diary that he had never had an inspired "dreaming" or any kind of spiritual experience. And those are appear in the book, and I'm quoting from Heber J. Grant's own diary. Well, I was accused of denigrating a church president by quoting from the church president's diary. And my response was that if he's being denigrated, it was by his mother—or himself—because he was quoting HER in his diary, and he was WRITING in his diary. And so, if there be objections to what was in the book that was denigrating, it's really candor on the part of Heber J. Grant. There's a lot of that kind of stuff in the book.

Peggy: Weren't you also...? Didn't you talk about your own conversation with Deity?

Denver: Only to mention the fact that it had happened.

Peggy: Okay.

Denver: It was not... The book, The Second Comforter literally has nine words in it about me and that experience. And so, yes—but there's another backstory to that...

I don't know; I'm talking a lot. Do you... Is that what you want?

Dave: What's that...? What was the experience? And you know, what did you write about it, to make these nine words (or whatever)?

Denver: When I have had any kind of an encounter with the Lord, I have written down what happened contemporaneous with the event. I recorded it in my journals (I have about 13 volumes of journals now), and when they're made public, the only thing that I ever make public is a direct quote from the journal. I didn't make anything public in The Second Comforter book other than the fact that it had occurred. Subsequently, I did make public some of the events involving the Lord—events dealing with the Lord in the Garden of Gethsemane—were taken and made part of a chapter in a book, Come, Let Us Adore Him. That excerpt has been taken out of the chapter and put into the Teachings and Commandments, so you can read it in there.

Peggy: How many kinds of face or one-on-one experiences have you had with the Lord?

Denver: In terms of number?

Peggy: Yeah.

Denver: I don't have a count really. I...

Peggy: But quite a few?

Denver: Yeah, I tend to make a lot of mistakes.

Dave: Are we talking visions, personal encounters...?

Denver: Yes...

Dave: Which?

Denver: Personal encounters...

Dave: Okay.

Denver: ...and visionary encounters. But here's... This is my general observation. If you talk a lot about that kind of thing, it attracts the attention of a certain kind of personality. That kind of personality is quick—QUICK—to be impressed and become enthusiastic. But they're shallow, and they don't stay around. And they create a lot of problems in their going.

To the extent that it is possible for me to take something I've been instructed by the Lord to cover, I do it by using Scripture—existing Scripture. It is only in the extremity that there isn't something that I can use that I will resort to talking about something that is heretofore uncovered by existing Scripture. I don't like the idea of sensationalism, because it attracts the wrong kind of person. I also don't like to ever retell a story using more and new and different words—because I've seen what's happened with the (between 9 and 13) versions that Joseph made to the First Vision encounter and how people say, "Oh, he must have been making it up because he left something out here, and he added something there. Therefore, it must not be true." So, when I do make something public, I go back to the journal, I quote directly from the journal, and so what you've got in (to the extent that it has been canonized) are excerpts (literally) from my journal, word for word, with what got recorded contemporaneous with the event itself. And I try to limit it all to that, and to tell it one time consistently, and to leave it at that.

But sensationalism... It doesn't accomplish what you think it would accomplish. The truth that persuades people is not a fantastic story about an encounter with God. The truth that persuades people are things that appeal to the integrity of your heart and the kindness, the goodness, the decency within you that aligns with something truer and higher and better. You know when you are doing right and pleasing God because you've just done something to help or bless the life of someone else. When someone relies upon fantastic stories to attract attention, very often they're trying to raise money or get a claim or get power or authority over people.

Dave: So, you talked about a canon.

Denver: Yes.

Dave: Just so our listeners... Is your canon...? And just briefly is it, like, do you use the Bible, the Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants? All? More? It sounds like things have been added, of course. Pearl of Great Price? What's your canon?

Denver: The front matter(s) in all three volumes of the canonized Scriptures explain themselves. But to summarize what went on: Joseph Smith, in a number of revelations that appear in the Doctrine and Covenants of the LDS Church, refers to the "fullness of the Scriptures." He had a very specific objective in mind when he talked about the fullness of the Scriptures—it was to have the King James Version of the Bible with inspired revisions and commentary published as a new version of the Bible—and then put together with the New Testament and the Book of Mormon in a single volume. The Old Testament would be published separately. And then they would include the Doctrine and Covenants, which began with the Lectures on Faith (one of the three works that I talk about in that A Man Without Doubt).

What the canonized Scriptures consist of are the Joseph Smith version of the Old Testament in one volume, which includes what would appear as the book of Moses in the LDS Pearl of Great Price—that was always intended to be part of Genesis, so it appears in the book of Genesis, in the fashion it was originally prepared by Joseph in the Inspired Version. It is the Joseph Smith Translation of the New Testament in the second volume, together with the Book of Mormon. And then the third volume is a Teachings and Commandments that include things that have been left behind by Joseph, by Hyrum Smith, and then some of the things that I have done. And in the third volume, there's also a Glossary of Terms. That Glossary of Terms, I think, is one of the best theological educations that you could get right now if you want to know about Mormonism and the Restoration—and it's quite extensive. It's probably, you know, 40% of the third volume (are the Glossary of Terms).

Peggy: So, do you have missionaries?

Denver: Well, not in the sense that someone's called and sent out on a mission...

Dave: No name tags and all the...

Denver: None of that stuff. But yeah, there are a lot of people out there missionary-ing. And one of the... As I mentioned, A Man Without Doubt was written to try and redefine Joseph to a Christian audience. A new book that just came out (which I'll leave with you also) is titled The Testimony of Jesus: Past, Present, and Promise, which is also specifically addressed to Christians.

I'll be at a conference in Kentucky in next March. And the hope is that Mormonism can be re-envisioned by the Christian audience as something that is not necessarily The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, with name tags and white shirts and knocking on doors and "What do you know about the Mormons? Would you like to know more?" This book deals with the history of Christianity, the history of Protestantism, and the history of the Restoration in a way that I hope helps Christians relook at things. Much of what the Christian world has today, no matter what denomination you go to, would have been considered heretical and non-Christian for the first thousand years of Christianity. And so, Evangelicals that are even later in time than the Protestant fathers think they have a hope in Christ based upon their interpretation of New Testament passages. What this book suggests is that maybe we ought to allow Christ the prerogative, if He chooses to do so, to speak again and redefine what it meant and means to be a follower of Christ. And so that book is for a Christian audience. And I'll leave that with you. There should be plenty of fodder in what I'm giving you for a good article.

Peggy: Do you have... For communion or the sacrament, do you use wine as the...?

Denver: Yeah.

Peggy: So, it's wine. Do you have other regular rituals? Do you have any temple rituals?

Denver: None at this point, but we are raising funds to build a temple and expect to do so. We don't have a command to build a temple at this point. But we do have a statement to us from the Lord that He always commands us (His people in any generation) to build a temple to Him.

Joseph Smith had begun a process of restoring something that included temple ordinances, but they never got completed. They weren't regularized into print until about 1877 by Brigham Young. All of the early church presidents—Brigham Young, John Taylor, even Wilford Woodruff—all of the early presidents said that the temple rites were not correct, they were not complete, and that they expected a resurrected Joseph Smith to come and to put it all in order. That's been dropped, and the assertion today is that they've got everything, it's all intact, it's exactly as it needs to be, and that nothing's missing.

We anticipate that much (like many other things that were left incomplete when Joseph left us/was martyred) that the temple will be something far more expansive than what the LDS Church has perpetuated.

Dave: Do the remnant followers—people who go to these fellowships—do they tithe? Do they make donations? Do... I mean, is it a...

Denver: Yes, but it's a little different than the LDS practice. The tithe obligation is not based upon your gross income; it's based upon your excess. If you don't have anything left over after you've taken care of feeding, housing, transporting, and educating, and taking care of medical bills, then you don't have tithe. But if you have something left over after that, then that 10% is donated in a fellowship.

But the donations aren't aggregated into some central fund. The fellowship itself usually includes people who have needs. If someone needs help with food, or shelter, or transportation, medical bills, or education, then the tithe that got collected in the fellowship is then distributed within the fellowship to the people with the needs. It doesn't go to pay anyone. It goes to help take care of people.

And that requires—if you're going to be someone that helps in the movement—that requires that whatever you do you donate. I don't get paid anything. No one gets compensated for anything. Conferences—they get organized, get paid for (the expenses) by the conference organizers; if people want to donate to help defray some of the costs, they do that. But no one is making a living, and we don't have a professional clergy. And we don't... No one's compensated by any kind of a fund. The money gets used to help people who have needs.

Peggy: So, how did you fare during COVID? Did you have mask requirements? Did you have vaccination expectations?

Denver: There was... Everyone was left to their own choice. There were conferences held. I don't think I saw many people wearing masks, although there were one or two.

No one said, "What are you doing that for?" that I know of. If they wore masks, that was fine. If they didn't, that was fine too. The majority... Visually, it looked to me like the majority both did not wear a mask and didn't bother staying six feet apart. And in terms of vaccinations, that was left to everyone to choose for themselves. I have family members who have been vaccinated; I have family members who have not. I think everyone in my family has had COVID at one time or another. But everyone decides for themselves based upon the best information they have.

Dave: As we start to wrap up Denver, a question: Is there one true way... Do you folks believe there's one true way back to God?

Denver: Well, I think the purpose of this Creation is to be added upon, and I don't care where you go or what you do (and I believe this is in the Book of Mormon—every nation has some pointed allotment of truth) everywhere you look, you are going to be added upon. Even if you live a short, wretched life, you're still being added upon by the experience that you get down here.

In the hierarchy of eternity, there is a Being who has exemplified the highest, the best, the truest, the most pure form of what it means to live fully human and fully godlike, and that's Jesus Christ—who came here and lived as a sacrifice and as a pure soul who was intending on elevating others. We believe that He rescues this Creation by the life that He lived and the power that was given to Him at the outset of the Creation, and then His stewardship over it allowed Him to bring us back out of the grave eventually.

But Joseph Smith said in the Lectures on Faith (that used to be in your Doctrine and Covenants and that are in the Teachings and Commandments), Joseph Smith said that the prototype of the saved man is Jesus Christ. And if you will be saved, you must be precisely what Christ is or else not be saved.

Christ attained to the resurrection, meaning the grave could not hold Him. You will be resurrected—and you will be resurrected and I will be resurrected because Christ is redeeming this Creation. But at some point, in some cycle of being "added upon" in the distant future, you must become precisely what Christ is or else not be saved.

And so, I don't know about you, but I'm a long way away from something like that. I'm down here trying to improve upon myself in the time that I'm given, and to try and bless and benefit the lives of any others, and to certainly not be a hindrance to anyone if I can avoid being so. But I don't think that I am at all approaching "attaining to the resurrection of the dead" or being like the prototype of the saved man, which is Christ.

And by the way, there's a talk (that's now a paper that you can read) called "Our Divine Parents," which explains the prototype of the saved woman. And you might want to take a look at that if you're interested in looking at the difference between the role of the male and the role of the female—because the male is incomplete, and the female is incomplete. But it's the union of the male and the female, which becomes the image of God—they together (and only together) can become the completed image of the Heavenly Parents. And the paper, "Our Divine Parents," attempts to explain in a little more detail.

But yeah, I think everyone down here is gonna be improved by the experience that they get here, no matter how miserable. But eventually, we're all gonna have to progress and grow and become like the prototype of the saved man.

Dave: Well, Denver Snuffer, thanks for joining us today.

Denver: Yeah.

Dave: Be well and stay safe, k?

Denver: It was far less painful than I thought it would be. And let me put a plug in that the Salt Lake Tribune is now a nonprofit organization...

Dave: It's true.

Denver: ...and you mentioned, just briefly at the beginning, what you're up to. Anyone that wants to support the Salt Lake Tribune, generally, or this program can get a tax deduction under 501(c)(3), and if you do it before the end of the year, it'll help you with this year's taxes.

Dave: That's absolutely true. Thank you for that promo. And thanks to Peggy Fletcher-Stack...

Peggy: Always a pleasure.

Dave: ...and our producer, Chris Samuels. We remind our listeners that they can keep up on all of the happenings in and about the church by subscribing to the Salt Lake Tribune's free Mormon Land newsletter. Just go to SLTrib.com to sign up, and we'll talk again next time on Mormon Land.

2022.02.26 True Blue Mormon: Independent Faithfulness

Presentation at the "Rescuing the Restoration" Conference

Denver C. Snuffer, Jr.

Boise, Idaho

February 26, 2022

Christianity was languishing at the time that Joseph Smith lived, and Joseph Smith took Christianity and changed it (to borrow from Mark Twain) to the difference between lightning and a lightning bug. Joseph Smith envisioned a form of Christianity in which the God of Heaven Himself was accessible, living, proximate, nearby to each and every one of us—as opposed to Christianity in a diluted form, in which the philosophies of men (which are considerably far more boring than the declarations of Scripture) were mingled with and diluted Scripture into something that only a philosopher could really appreciate. Joseph Smith's "living Christianity" promised things that were akin to what Christianity looked like when the New Testament was being composed.

The culmination of the development of doctrine and teachings by Joseph Smith was a temple ceremony that (in a diluted form) is still reenacted in LDS temples today—in which the journey of Adam and Eve is simply figurative, and those who participate are instructed to envision themselves as if they were, respectively, Adam and Eve. The journey culminates with an experience in which "having been true and faithful," they're invited to "converse with the Lord through the veil" and then, having conversed with the Lord through the veil, to "enter into His presence." That part of the ceremony is rife in the form of Christianity that Joseph Smith restored, from the beginning and throughout. It can be summarized in a single verse that Joseph Smith gave us by revelation which says, Verily thus sa[ith] the Lord: It shall come to pass that every soul who forsakes [his] sins, and comes unto me, and calls on my name, and obeys my voice, and keeps all my commandments, shall see my face and know that I am (T&C 93:1, emphasis added; see also D&C 93:1).

See, the religion that Joseph restored divides things up into categories that the vocabulary of the Book of Mormon clarifies:

You have "belief" if you have a correct understanding of true teachings that are given to you in an authentic way that actually reflect the religion that God would like you to possess.

You have "unbelief" when you have something other than that. If an error creeps in, you have unbelief. By and large, Christianity today is composed, essentially, of unbelief held by unbelievers because they cannot have belief without true doctrine, and you cannot reject the words of God and claim to be a believer in Him.

The word "faith" is applied to those to whom angels have ministered.

And the word "knowledge" is applied to those who have entered into the presence of the Lord. Joseph Smith was attempting to restore a form of Christianity designed to give mankind knowledge. So, you "shall see my face and know that I am."

In another place (this is language from the Testimony of St. John), the Lord said:

Remember that I will ask the Father, and he will provide...you another Comforter, that he may be by your side endlessly. You will obtain the record of Heaven, the truth of all things which is denied to the world because the world refuses my Father, and therefore they do not know him. But you know him, for he is with you, and shall provide answers to guide you. I will not leave you comfortless. I will stand at your side also.

...To those who show love for me, my Father will show love to them, and I love all those, and I will personally minister to them. (TSJ 10:11-12, emphasis added; see also John 14:15-21 KJV)

This is the gospel of Christ. This is the promise that was made. In the Book of Mormon that Joseph Smith restored, we have a promise:

It shall come to pass that if the gentiles shall hearken unto the Lamb of God in that day...

..."that day" being the time when the Book of Mormon should come forth, "that day" not being when the Lord was resurrected. At the time of the Lord's resurrection, what He said was, "They understood me not that I was not gonna go to the Gentiles at that time. They were gonna hear about me through the ministry of my servants, but I will not show myself to the Gentiles in that day." Here Nephi is writing about the time in which the Book of Mormon would come forth, a much later time period—the difference between approximately 33 AD and 1830 AD, so:

It shall come to pass that if the gentiles shall hearken unto the Lamb of God in that day that he shall manifest himself unto them in word and also in power, in very deed, unto the taking away of their stumbling blocks, and harden not their hearts against the Lamb of God, they shall be numbered among the seed of thy father. Yea, they shall be numbered among the house of Israel; and they shall be a blessed people upon the promised land for ever. (1 Nephi 3:25 RE, emphasis added; see also 1 Nephi 14:1-2 LE)

...if they will hearken unto the things that the Lord intends for them to receive in that day.

So, there's a process that's described in the Book of Mormon, the religion that Joseph Smith restored.

He sent angels to converse with them, who caused men to behold of his glory...

See, angels come to visit with and minister to people. Those to whom the angels minister now are able to behold the glory of God.

And they began from that time forth to call on his name; therefore, God conversed with men...

The angelic "faith" secures for them "knowledge"—because it's their ministry to bring them into the presence of God.

Therefore, God conversed with men and made known unto them the plan of redemption which had been prepared from the foundation of the world. And...he made known unto them according to their faith, and repentance, and their holy works. (Alma 9:7 RE, emphasis added; see also Alma 12:29-30 LE)

This is a religion Joseph Smith was restoring. This is what's testified to in the Book of Mormon as the manner in which these things unfold. It's a question that gets posited by Moroni, towards the end of the Book of Mormon:

Hath miracles ceased? Behold, I say unto you, nay; neither have angels ceased to minister unto the children of men. For behold, they [the angels] are subject unto him [God], to minister according to the word of his [God's] command, shewing themselves unto them of strong faith and a firm mind in every form of godliness. And the office of their ministry [that is, the job that angels are employed by God to perform; this is the office that they occupy; these are their responsibility—the "office of their ministry"] is to call men unto repentance, and to fulfill and to do the work of the covenants of the Father which he hath made unto the children of men, to prepare the way among the children of men by declaring the word of Christ unto the chosen vessels...

Angels declare things to men; the men to whom it is declared are called "chosen vessels." Now understand: This is Moroni. In Alma, it's made clear that angelic ministrants don't just come to men. They come to men and to women and to children—but we're not in Alma now, so don't be hung up on the fact that he is addressing the office and the calling in the masculine. Okay? It's of no moment.

...declaring the word of Christ unto the chosen vessels of the Lord, that they may bear testimony of him; and by so doing, the Lord...prepareth the way that the residue of men may have faith in Christ, that the holy ghost may have place in their hearts, according to the power thereof; and after this manner bringeth to pass the Father the covenants which he hath made unto the children of men. (Moroni 7:6 RE; see also Moroni 7:29-32 LE)

All of this serves the purpose of accomplishing and fulfilling the covenant word God gave previously to those that secured covenants with God in past generations—so that God's promises are vindicated, and no word that God ever pronounced from the beginning to any of those that have received a covenant from God will fall to the earth unfulfilled. They will all be fulfilled. And the system in which that takes place is:

Men who have faith receive the ministering of angels. The purpose of the ministry of the angels is to assist so that the fulfilling of the covenants can take place by declaring it unto the "chosen vessels."

They, in turn, have the obligation to disseminate the information to the residue of the people so that they may have faith in and receive ministering by the Holy Ghost so that the work can be done.

The word "residue" is interesting. It shows up here; it also shows up in another place in which, three years previous to the death of Adam in the valley of Adam-Ondi-Ahman, there were gathered together seven who were direct lineal descendants of Adam who stood within the Holy Order, and the Lord came and ministered to them. And the residue of Adam's posterity who were righteous were also present on that occasion. So when the word "residue" is used here in Moroni, think about how the word "residue" gets used, likewise, in the valley of Adam-Ondi-Ahman when Adam, three years previous to his death, is ministered to by Christ, and the residue were also present. So, it's not belittling anyone.

Let's go to that Alma thing that I referred to. It's in Alma chapter 9 [16]. And it says that He sent angels to converse not only to men but also to women and to children also (and I'm using the new set of Scriptures).

Well, what is the purpose of the Lord in causing all these things to happen, okay? It's so that we can attain to an understanding of the things that the Lord would like you to comprehend about Him. In the testimonies that we have in the four Gospels, we learn about the sacrifice that Christ made, His passion, His death, His resurrection. But apparently, the four Gospel accounts do not give prominent enough explanation of the Atonement suffering that the Lord had, because in the early days of the Restoration through Joseph Smith, Christ gave a more fulsome explanation of what it was that He went through in atoning for mankind's sins. This is language from a revelation that was given in 1830:

I command you by my name, and...my almighty power that you repent, repent lest I smite you by the rod of my mouth, and by my wrath, and by my anger, and your sufferings be sore — how sore you know not, how exquisite you know not, yea, how hard to bear you know not. For behold, I, God, have suffered these things for all that they might not suffer, if they would repent. But if they would not repent, they must suffer even as I, which suffering caused myself, even God, the greatest of all, to tremble because of pain, and to bleed at every pore, and to suffer both body and spirit, and would that I might not drink the bitter cup and shrink. Nevertheless, glory be to the Father, and I partook and finished my preparations unto the children of men. (T&C 4:5; see also D&C 19:15-19)

Not one word of the suffering the Lord describes in this revelation talks about the cross. He's talking exclusively about the experience that He had in Gethsemane—which is one of the curiosities about the Restoration, with Christendom having crosses everywhere (yeah, that being the result historically of Constantine and the battle on the bridge, in which his troops painted the cross on their shields and won an unlikely victory over the adversary when the leader—the idiotic leader—of the opposition rode out in full armor onto the bridge and fell into the water, and gravity took care of the rest). So, here we have the Lord, after talking about eternal punishment and endless punishment, giving you a description of what it was that He went through and telling us that that was rather exquisite.

In our day in our Scriptures (meaning the Restoration Scriptures that were approved at a conference in 2017 and adopted as a new set of Scriptures), a revelation in our own day is given by the Lord to describe what He went through so that we can understand and have more faith in Him. And this is from modern Scripture:

I knew a man in Christ about four years ago who, being overshadowed by the spirit on the 26th of February, 2005, had the Lord appear to him again. And the Lord spoke to him face to face in plain humility, as one man speaks to another, calling him by name. As they spoke the Lord put forth His hand and touched the eyes of the man and said, Look! The man had opened before him a view of the Lord kneeling in prayer. It was...a dark place. The air was heavy and overcast with sorrow. The man beheld the Lord praying in Gethsemene on the night of His betrayal and before His crucifixion.

All the Lord had previously done in His mortal ministry by healing the sick, raising the dead, giving sight to the blind, restoring hearing to the deaf, curing the leper, and ministering relief to others as he taught was but a prelude to what the Lord was now to do on this dark, oppressive night.

As the Lord knelt in prayer, His vicarious suffering began. He was overcome by pain and anguish. He felt within Him, not just the pains of sin, but also the illnesses men suffer as a result of the Fall and their foolish and evil choices. The suffering was long and the challenge difficult. The Lord suffered the afflictions. He was healed from the sickness. He overcame the pains, and patiently bore the infirmities until, finally, he returned to peace of mind and strength of body. It took an act of will and hope for Him to overcome the affliction which had been poured upon Him. He overcame the separation caused by these afflictions and reconciled with His Father. He was at peace with all mankind.

He thought His sufferings were over, but to His astonishment another wave overcame Him. This one was much greater than the first. The Lord, who had been kneeling, fell forward onto His hands at the impact of the pain that was part of [the second, greater] wave.

This second wave was so much greater than the first that it seemed to entirely overcome the Lord. The Lord was now stricken with physical injuries as well as spiritual affliction. As he suffered anew, His flesh was torn which he healed using the power of the charity within Him. The Lord had such life [force] within Him, such power and virtue within Him, that although he suffered in His flesh, these injuries healed and His flesh restored. His suffering was both body and spirit, and there was anguish of thought, feeling, and soul.

The Lord overcame this second wave of suffering, and again found peace of mind and strength of body; and His heart filled with love despite what he had suffered. Indeed, it was charity or love that allowed Him to overcome. He was at peace with His Father, and with all mankind, but it required another, still greater act of will and charity than the first for Him to do so.

Again, the Lord thought His suffering was over. He stayed on His hands and knees for a moment to collect Himself when another wave of torment burst upon Him. This wave struck Him with such force he fell forward upon His face. He was afflicted by this greater wave. He was then healed, only to then be afflicted again as the waves of torment overflowed. Wave after wave poured out upon Him, with only moments between them. The Lord's suffering progressed from a lesser to a greater portion of affliction; ...as one would be overcome by Him, the next, greater affliction would then be poured out. Each wave of suffering was only preparation for the next, greater wave.

The pains of mortality, disease, injury, and infirmity, together with the sufferings of sin, transgressions, guilt of mind, and unease of soul, the horrors of recognition of the evils men had inflicted upon others, were all poured out upon Him, with confusion and perplexity multiplied upon Him. (T&C 161:1-8)

This goes on to describe what He went through in Gethsemane, in further detail, and then the resurrection and His coming forth out of the grave.

So, why does the Lord want us to comprehend something about what He endured in Gethsemane? In Isaiah, there's a passage that says:

When you shall make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed; he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand. He shall see...the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied; by his knowledge shall my righteous Servant justify many, for he shall bear their iniquities. (Isaiah 19:3 RE, emphasis added; see also Isaiah 53:10-11 KJV)

What Christ acquired through His suffering was knowledge and understanding of everything you have or will ever go through or suffer. He understands. But He doesn't understand that in order for you to simply be the passive recipient of a blessing that He confers as a consequence of what He went through. He went through it so He can guide you to the same end. There is no magic fairy dust. You must rise up. You must overcome sin. You must leave behind you the things that bring about guilt and remorse. He has finished His preparations. And now the Righteous (who has knowledge of how to bring you through that) can guide you, can lead you, can succor you in your affliction so that you too can overcome that portion of the world that you have to contend with.

Listen to the words that the Lord gives us in an answer concerning the covenant that He's renewed again in our day:

Although a man may err in understanding concerning many things, yet he can view his brother with charity and come unto me, and through me he can with patience overcome the world. I can bring him to understanding and knowledge. Therefore, if you regard one another with charity, then your brother's error in understanding will not divide you. I lead to all truth...

This is Christ talking: "I lead to all truth."

I will lead all who come to me to the truth of all things. The fullness is to receive the truth of all things, and this too from me, in power, by my word, and in very deed...

...the same thing that Nephi had prophesied would happen in this day. Christ is saying He'll do it; we will get it from Him "in power, by my word, and in very deed."

For I will come unto you if you will come unto me. (T&C 157:53, emphasis added)

There's this passage that we've got—it's probably recitable by all of you who are here. I want to look at that as I conclude and put it in the context of everything that you face and everything that you will face, through and including your own ultimate final disease and death. Okay?

The Lord is my shepherd. I shall not lack. He makes me to lie down in green pastures. He leads me beside the still waters...

You know, the waters are going to be turbulent! That's just the way it's gonna be. But if He is by your side, the turbulence is of no moment. He leads you beside the still waters because "Peace, be still" is His message, even when you are in the midst of the hurricane itself.

He restores my soul. He leads me in the [path] of righteousness for his name's sake. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil...

You're going to walk through the valley of the shadow of death. But if death has no claim on you because of promises He has given to you, what is there to fear? Why not look forward to what comes next? It's gonna be far more interesting than what you're going through lying in your final illness or coping with whatever they do to you in the medical industry on your way out.

I will fear no evil, for you are with me. Your rod and your staff...

Well, what's the rod, and what's the staff? They're things you use to beat or steer or grab or jerk the animal to get the animal back on the right path. These are implements of (frankly) cruelty—not because you're trying to hurt your sheep; you're trying to keep them from falling off the cliff; you're trying to keep them from injury and death. You may have to discipline with a rod or with a staff. But the discipline is designed to correct, improve, and pull them away from an even greater danger or their own destruction.

Your rod and your staff — they comfort me...

And why is that? Because you understand the purpose of the Lord behind what it is that He's doing for you. It's designed to make you ultimately live.

You prepare a table before me in the presence of my enemies...

You're gonna have enemies. Well, okay. They can do you no harm. Christ said, "Don't worry about those who can destroy the body. Worry about those things that can destroy the soul." He's literally saying, "Don't be afraid of death." There are gonna be enemies. They're going to conspire. They're gonna do things purposefully to try and inflict and to injure, to set back, to harm, and ultimately to kill you. And He's saying, "You prepare a table before me in the presence of my enemies." It's of no moment.

You anoint my head with oil. My cup runs over. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life, and I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever. (Psalms 23:1-2 RE; see also Psalms 23:1-6 KJV)

...in the midst of potentially turbulent waters, valley of death, and enemies surrounding you. Why is that? Because Christ overcame the world. He understands anything and everything that we will be put through. And when He says, "Peace, be still," and counsels and comforts and guides you, He does it from a position in which He understands everything. "Art thou greater than He? The Son of Man hath descended below it all" (see T&C 139:8; see also D&C 122:8).

Expect turbulent waters. But you can still be at peace because of Him. This is the message that Joseph Smith's restored gospel is trying to get across to us: an immediate, accessible, proximate Lord and Savior who understands and comprehends what you are going through and what you will go through and has the ability to sucker you in your every need. It doesn't mean your burdens are gonna go away. It means your burdens are gonna be made understandable to you so that what you experience is acceptable and does not harm your soul.

In the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

Okay, so we have 11 minutes in which all the people who spoke are still here, and it's open for questions, and you can ask them anything, including, "Why'd ya ask the people to talk who talked?" There were great, by the way; they were all great (except that last speaker).

Anyone? Oh, is that wired to the system, and it's on? Does anyone have a question they want to ask to anyone?

What?

Audio/Visual: Yes, you must go up to the microphone.

Audience Member: If there are people who would like to ask questions and not be on tape, can you agree that they won't be?

Audio/Visual: No video. We can say, "No video."

Audience Member: We can say no video.

Audio/Visual: But the audio still goes.

Audience Member: But it's not gonna... Okay.

Denver Snuffer: They've already sent the folks to photograph the license plates. They know if you're here. [laughter] Yeah.

So you wanna...?

Audience Member: Right here's good.

Audio/Visual: No, we can't hear you if you don't come up. Please, if you're going to ask a question, nobody can hear you unless you come up to the microphone. Thank you.

Audience Member: Now my license plate number isn't gonna be sufficient.

DS: Yeah.

Question 1: I was just wondering what's going on with the work with the Lamanite Nations or the Lamanite people as the fulfillment of the Gentiles is done, and the Lamanite people will be involved in the last days' (you know) New Jerusalem and so forth. I'm just curious as to what's going on with that.

DS: In many respects, the safest way to proceed with finishing some things is to get the work done before rolling it out for public view so that it can roll forward unhindered in getting to a state in which it's no longer able to be frustrated. And work among the Lamanites has been ongoing for some time now. And there are concrete steps that have been and are being taken. And there will be announcements that reflect the progress that has been made once we have something more to talk about.

But believe me, a lot of work has to go into getting something ready to roll out. And although I know there are a lot of people that would like to volunteer to do a lot of things, the fact of the matter is that sometimes "a lot of people" only get in the way of one another—and it's better to focus in and try to accomplish some things.

The Scripture project was undertaken by a committee of people that ultimately required that the work be divided up. It was a research assignment. It wasn't a composition assignment. It required a lot of plowing through a great deal of old texts in order to try and locate the most accurate material. And it didn't matter who did it, the result should have been exactly the same. But when you're dealing with limited resources, you... We can't buy multiple sets of books costing thousands of dollars in order to give 50 people the opportunity to do something. We have to have it make some economic sense and get the work done.

There are a lot of things like that, and right now there is an extraordinary effort that has been and is ongoing in focusing on both the Jews and the Lamanites. And in due course, when something has been suitably achieved that is worth holding up and saying, "We got something done," everyone will know about it. But until then, people are laboring hard behind the scenes to try and get something done with as much focus and as little notice as possible. It's the only way you get work done, really.

So, is that it? What's the time?

Audience Member: I have a question.

DS: Oh, yeah, yeah, yeah...

Question 2: As members of the Church, we're taught that we receive the baptism of fire and the Holy Ghost at confirmation. And I personally don't believe that that is the case, although I think we can receive many baptisms of fire that can help sanctify us. I think even Elder Bednar mentioned in a 2010 conference talk that (you know) it's an injunction to receive the baptism of fire and the Holy Ghost. So my question is, what role do you see the baptism of fire and the Holy Ghost playing in receiving the Second Comforter, which is entering into the Lord's presence?

DS: Yeah. It's a great question. It's a big subject; there's a lot that probably ought to be said in order to set the stage for an answer to make a whole lot of sense. However, briefly and hitting just some high points:

Within the Book of Mormon text, Christ gave authority to baptize by saying, "You have authority to baptize." Christ gave authority to go perform a ministry by saying, "You have authority to go perform a ministry." The priestly conferral of authority was the voice of God speaking to empower the individual to do it. The Holy Ghost, however, when they get to that (and it's covered—I don't know if it's one verse in the LDS version; it's one paragraph in the new Scriptures) mentions four times Jesus touched them; He touched them all. And He touched them. He touched them, okay? Everyone that got authority to baptize got it by simply the voice of God. Conferring upon someone the gift of the Holy Ghost came by touching the Savior, okay? That was a prerequisite.

Now, hold that thought for a moment because there's another line. It... You see it in the history of Joseph Smith in the LDS version [or in] Teachings and Commandments section one of the new Scriptures, in which Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery get authority to be baptized by John the Baptist, and then they go out, and they baptize one another. Upon their baptism, [claps hands] the Holy Ghost... They... It's clear from the record that Joseph did not yet have authority to lay on hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost. They baptize, and [clap hands] the Holy Ghost is poured out upon them, so that when Oliver is baptized, Oliver immediately begins to prophesy. And when Joseph gets it, he proclaimed many great and marvelous things are about to unfold. And he talked about... He doesn't call it prophecy, but he describes that he's essentially doing exactly the same thing. And then the two of them, "being enlightened by the Holy Ghost," set about to understand more mysterious passages of Scripture in a way that they could never have previously attained to, which means that they had the Holy Ghost allowing them to comprehend Scripture in a way they couldn't have ever done.

That description (which is more fulsome in Joseph Smith's history or the T&C 1) mirrors the shorter description that's given in the Book of Mormon. Every single Book of Mormon baptism is accompanied by the receipt of the Holy Ghost with no laying on of hands. Okay? It just happens: baptism and the presence of the Holy Ghost. In the LDS model: "We lay our hands upon your head and confirm you a member of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and say unto you, Receive the Holy Ghost." Those are the words. That is... Those are the ordinance words (I know, 'cuz I've done that...many times). They are not conferring upon someone the gift of the Holy Ghost; they are admonishing them to do something and to receive something.

So, baptism and the presence of the Holy Ghost occurs (within the Book of Mormon model and in the Restoration-through-Joseph model) automatically upon baptism. And Christ describes His gospel, and He describes His doctrine; and in both of them, the way that the Lord describes them is: You go get baptized, in faith, repenting; and upon that, then the Holy Ghost ministers to you.

The difference between the "gift of the Holy Ghost" and "receiving the baptism of fire and the Holy Ghost" and the "presence of the Holy Ghost" and the "ministry of the Holy Ghost" is oftentimes described (if you're willing to read through a lot of Ensign articles, General Conference talks) it's conditional, okay? You have to repent of your sins, and you gotta stay in the right way, or the Holy Ghost is going to depart from you. And they tell you that. The Holy Ghost will leave you if you're not a good little boy. And that means that you've got to (oh, I guess it was Boyd Packer): "You gotta leave that little factory alone."

The Holy Ghost can be offended and withdraw if the presence of the Holy Ghost has come as a consequence of faith, repentance, and baptism. The gift of the Holy Ghost that the disciples were given by coming into direct contact with the Lord was the power to confer upon someone the indelible presence of the Holy Ghost... (Keith, you gotta stop laughing. You're gonna make me... I move on from these things, and if I stop and think about it, I think, "Oh, you're such an ass.") ...the indelible presence so that when you offend the spirit, it doesn't withdraw. In some respects, it gets louder; it convicts you and convinces you that what has been done is an error—which then requires some explanation about what it means to offend or to deny the Holy Ghost, and it's not...

Denying the Holy Ghost is not doing something you know to be wrong while the Spirit is counseling you not to do so (because people will do that for a whole host of reasons, some of which may include the desire to try and achieve a good end by doing something that they know to be off the mark in the hopes that it'll work out). Denying the Holy Ghost means that you come out in outright rebellion against God, that you are committed to a contrary course; you are working at cross purposes to God's purposes, and you're doing so deliberately—with the intent that you're trying to overthrow the kingdom of God.

In order to confer the gift of the Holy Ghost, if you read the Book of Mormon and you pay attention to what it's saying, it mandatorily requires that the person who is going to confer the gift have come into contact with the Lord. The Lord confers that directly upon the person. What the LDS Church model suggests is the same thing that the "Oliver Cowdery/ Joseph Smith baptism before the higher priesthood was restored" and what the Book of Mormon model suggests, which is faith, repentance, baptism. You've got to repent of your sins. You've got to witness unto the Lord that you're leaving those sins behind, and acting no hypocrisy, go in, and receive baptism—at which point, the Holy Ghost is secured. It comes... It bears witness of the Savior.

I was baptized into the LDS Church in 1973, and I recall on the beach... We baptized in the North Atlantic, off the coast of Maine, and cold water—and I recall kneeling after the baptism in North Atlantic cold water, the Spirit being poured out upon me and being warm from head to toe. It was odd. I physically felt warm. I mean, I would agree that you call that "fire in the Holy Ghost" because it... I was shivering. And I was so warm that I was absolutely comfortable. And funny things happened after that—I mean, odd things.

I did prophesy. And I did read the Scriptures, and they came alive. I'd been read the New Testament by a Baptist mother my whole youth, and they were kind of boring. And now they were astonishing! The Scriptures came alive in a manner that could not have previously been attained to.

And we're after six [o'clock], thankfully. Thank you all. (Don't forget your ring.)

2022.03.26 Hear and Trust the Lord

Presentation at the "Hear and Trust the Lord in the Storm" Conference
Denver C. Snuffer, Jr.
Lexington, Kentucky
March 26, 2022

I have to do in two trips what I once could do in one because I broke my right arm, ironically, by slipping and falling on a handicap ramp. It was covered with ice, and I couldn't tell that in the dark. And when I landed, my feet went out from under. When I landed, it sounded like someone broke a carrot; it just snapped. And I thought, "Well, maybe I've just dislocated something. Maybe we can shove it back in place." But a more calm-headed nurse practitioner son-in-law of mine said, "Nah, we might want to get that x-rayed before we decide how we're gonna manipulate that thing." As for my part, there was a president of the LDS Church whose name was Spencer Kimball who said swearing was "an attempt of a weak mind to express itself forcefully," and I broke out all my old golfing language and distributed it liberally to the ramp and the parking lot and the...anyone within earshot.

I really appreciate the music that's gone on here. When Joe Alexander informed me that he'd made arrangements to bring those sisters aboard to provide music for this, I have to confess I looked them up on the Internet, and I listened a little. And they're actually better in person, I think—because there's something that distances you from the performer when all you have is the sound that they make. And we've got their presence; there's something about that.

I hope that some of you who are here today are Christians. If not, then I hope that those that listen to the talk that's given today are among those who are Christian.

A friend of mine (scholar, member of the faculty at Brigham Young University) attended a theological convention attended primarily by the ministers of Christian faiths. And he was invited to present a paper. He presented a paper, and one of those who was there at the time said to him (in kind of incredulous tone), "You talk as if you believe this stuff really happened!"—meaning the events of the New Testament. And he was surprised. And in the convention, the question was put to those in attendance: How many of them believed, literally, in the New Testament description of events? And somewhere between 10 and 20% raised their hands. And then it was turned on its side to make sure: How many of you think that these events did not literally occur? And over 80% of the audience raised their hand. And these are ministers! These are people who preach and serve. For them, the ministerial position is an occupation that they earn a living through. But faith and belief may belong to the congregants but does not necessarily belong to the minister.

One of the fellows who I've read and have some respect for is a scholar teaching a New Testament studies. He's a theologian, and he's an agnostic. He's written a book; one of his books, the first part of the title is: The Orthodox Corruption of Scripture, and then colon, and then there's a lengthy secondary title which I don't recall. It's something like: "How the Christological Debates of the Second and Third Century Resulted in Alteration of the New Testament Text" [The Orthodox Corruption of Scripture: The Effect of Early Christological Controversies on the Text of the New Testament], in which he shows that the text was to the New Testament was changed in order to support one side of the argument that was being made (over the nature of who Jesus Christ was) during the debates that went on in the second and third century after Christ had died.

What Christ left behind were apostles with messages that went out and that taught about their experience in having been with Jesus during His lifetime, witnessing His ministry, seeing Him crucified, and then being taught by Him in the resurrection and getting commissioned by Him to go unto all the world and to preach about this—which they did. But they didn't have social media, and they didn't have the Internet, and they didn't have phone lines. And as a consequence of that, how Thomas taught (in isolation on his mission) and how Matthew taught (in isolation in his mission) and how Peter taught gave rise to a variety of Christian forms that survived the deaths of the various apostles. But they were non-homogenous; they weren't the same thing. There was an extraordinary amount of variety in that first generation of Christianity, which is one of the reasons why a New Testament scholar can turn into an agnostic.

We want to impose upon Christ and upon the Father an obligation for the kind of perfect symmetry that we expect TRUTH to have. And yet, God has gone to the trouble of making every maple leaf on every maple tree unique. Every snowflake is individualized and unique. There isn't one person in this room whose fingerprints match the fingerprints of someone else. And your eyes are so differentiated from one another that I can get through the security screening at the airport by letting him scan one of my eyes. That's how unique you are.

God catches Ezekiel up into Heaven. And Ezekiel comes and gives a report, and he says, "Wheels within wheels; it was all in motion." The majesty of the creation that he beheld defied his ability to put it into words, and so he uses analogy. The testimonies that are given by those who have seen beyond the veil reflect their limited ability/limited vocabulary/limited capacity to take what is vast and beyond human understanding and try to put it into words. I don't talk much about what it is that goes on on the other side of the veil. But believe me, there is so much more to the truths that God has yet to make public, that every one of us ought to be humble about what little we are able to share and how limited our capacities are.

Christianity was diverse, divergent—and it came to a single focus in the recognition that Jesus Christ came as the Son of God and paid a terrible price in order to make grace possible. All Christians believe that they are going to be saved—somehow and in some way—as a consequence of what Jesus Christ did. If you were to ask a Catholic to give you a theological explanation of how that would happen, they would point to the tradition that the keys of the kingdom were given to Peter, and that those keys have been passed down, and that they have the ability to open or shut the gate of Heaven, and therefore, if you attend confession, the priest (vicariously—going all the way back to Peter) has the capacity to open that gate and to let you in. So it's important that you keep your fidelity to the Catholic Church.

The Catholic Church separated from the Eastern Orthodox Church at about 1000 AD. And in the eastern half of the Christian world, they wouldn't tell you that you can go to the Catholics and be saved. They have their own tradition; they have their own set of beliefs. And they preserve some things that the Catholics let go of. One of the things that the Eastern Orthodox Church kept on is the belief in the deification of man—that man may eventually become God. That's not believed in the Catholic side.

Now, all of you who are Protestant or Evangelical, your form of Christianity did not even exist AT ALL until about 500 years ago. If we transport you back in time to some time before Martin Luther's era you'd be killed as a heretic because preaching and believing what you preach and believe today was not only not considered Christian, it was considered heretical and dangerous. So, Christians ought to approach their Christian faith with a modicum of humility about what it is they think they have in their belief system that can secure for them salvation into eternity.

Here's a problem for all of you Christians: If you are an Evangelical, you proclaim loudly, By grace you are saved, ...not of works, lest any man should boast (Ephesians 1:5). Now, there's a statement from Paul that includes both grace and works. So, you're saved by grace. Then Paul poses the question in the book of Romans, "What shall we say then? Shall we let sin abound" (see Romans 1) meaning, should you now be licentious? And his answer to that question is, "God forbid; you may be saved or rescued by grace, but by your works, you shall be judged" (ibid.). When you get to the book of Revelation and you read the criteria upon which the final judgment is gonna be executed, your judgment will be based upon your works. Well, there's a dilemma for you. So you're saved by grace. Okay. The Lord can erase all those mistakes. Now, what do you have to show for yourself? Why, I got a blank slate. The board's been erased. See, there's the grace; see that whiteboard over there? That's my saved Christian friends. Well, how the hell are we gonna judge you by your works if that's what you've got? (And I use the word "hell" advisedly because that's pretty much what we're left with.) We have NOTHING we can do for you. You merit NOTHING. Jesus' grace is intended to make it possible for you to free yourself from the slavery of sin. Now, what are you gonna do that you are freed from the slavery of sin? Christ tells you in the Sermon on the Mount what you ought to do:

- Don't be angry with your brother.
- Don't commit lust in your heart, because it will lead to adultery.
- Do good to those that despitefully use you.
- Be a peacemaker.
- Be among those who are going about (as Christ is described) doing good.

Then we have something upon which to judge you. Doesn't mean you're gonna live an error-free life, but the grace of God will help remove those errors. Just go on, and do something good.

Well, I hope all of you who have been here today have listened with the kind of precision that the talks have been given earlier today. Matt's talk, Whitney's talk, "Whitney's husband's" talk [laughter]. (We're not used to saying "Vern." We're used to saying, "Whitney's husband.") They were all delivered with precision about the subject. Now, some of you are probably, in hindsight, thinking, "This sounds like there's a lot of luggage being toted around as a consequence of Mormon history." And that's true enough. There's a lot of stuff that got said today that is only necessary to be said in order to distinguish people who believe in the Lord's Restoration of Truth from those that claim institutionally to OWN the truth.

The LDS Church is the best known—the Mormon church, headquartered in Salt Lake—is the best-known group of those who claim that they become established by Joseph Smith. But there are literally over a hundred different formal organizations that claim that they were founded by Joseph Smith. And part of what's necessary in talking about the truth is to say "what we're not." And there's been a whole lot of "what we're not" that got said today. And that's good and well. But the fact is that something happened in the spring of 1820, in which a long prelude led to the heavens opening again.

If it hadn't been for Martin Luther and his rebellion against Catholicism, there could not have been Protestant churches. But the initial Protestant churches were just as beset with problems as was the Catholic mother from which their births came. Martin Luther participated in killing those who rejected Lutheranism and who defended papalism. John Knox was called the apostle of murder because of the violence and the killing that he engaged in. Enforcing religion at the edge of a sword was considered to be necessary as part of the early Protestant Christian movement, just as the Catholic religion had been plagued by the violence that it inflicted on people. It took the Protestant Reformation and it took hundreds of years of working through that before both the Protestants and the Catholics became more benign and more tolerant of one another—and THAT required the founding of a new nation that conceived of religious liberty as a venue in which religious pluralism was allowed to flourish, so that God could, in fact, call and start something new, under the Son, that resembles what went on before.

The reason why theologians become agnostic and faithless is because they study the minutiae of what the texts say without ever permitting the experiment of what the texts TEACH to become how they live their lives. We hear the idea that you have faith in something. But the idea of faith did not really get defined until Joseph Smith sought, through the heavens, to ordain on Earth a form of priestly authority that hadn't been here since Old Testament times and with Christ and His apostles. And he got a revelation that allowed him to confer that authority upon a limited group of people. He was rejoicing and celebrating the accomplishment—and to a man, every one of those who had been ordained failed to accomplish anything, apostatized, rebelled, wrote a series of letters denouncing Joseph. And everything that he had hoped that this achievement would reflect turned into nothing but a mess. I wrote about this in A Man Without Doubt.

What Joseph Smith did in response to that was to set about trying to fix the problem. Out of that came what's called the Lectures on Faith. One of the Lectures on Faith was quoted earlier today in one of the talks. Well, Lectures on Faith defines faith as a principle of action. You can believe all you want to believe, but you do not have faith unless you act.

We don't pay, hire, or support ministers. If you don't sacrifice to minister to others, you cannot acquire faith. When Joe invited me to come and speak at this conference, and I agreed to do it, I understood we had to buy our own plane tickets for my wife and I to travel here, we had to rent our own car, we had to pay for our own hotel room. I didn't expect and I would be insulted if they offered to compensate me for anything that gets done—because faith is a principle of action that requires that you engage in sacrifice.

When I got the opportunity to come here, I sat about writing a talk (despite the fact that we're told to "take no thought beforehand"). And so, I had a great talk prepared to give, but I broke my arm, and I can't hold the Scriptures with one hand, and I can't turn the pages with one hand, and I can't prepare a talk to read with one hand. And so, I was rather forced into the corner of just coming and talking spontaneously. And so, all the great thoughts that I had are sitting at home on a computer that are still unfinished. Sometimes we're required to take things out of our own hands and to trust in what the Lord wants.

We don't believe in an organization, because organizations can be compromised simply by capturing the control center. You are witnessing a concerted effort being made everywhere you look—churches, the military, the government, businesses, Disney... Everywhere you look, there is a concerted effort to acquire control over the control center of the organizations in order, then, to corrupt the entirety of the organization by gaining control of the center/of the top. If you never consolidate power into a single place but every person must stand on their own—and every person has their own volume of Scriptures, and everyone has the ability to get access to the heavens through prayer—then it doesn't matter who you corrupt, you cannot corrupt the whole. And when she [Kathy Alexander] said (just before the last song and me getting up here) that she takes no one's word for anything but she has to pray for and have her own assurance of the truth, what that means is no person's corruption, no matter who they may be, stands in the way of her ability to discern and be faithful to the truth. There's a resilience to a lack of hierarchy, a lack of position, a lack of control. There's a vulnerability to any organization that, right now, is being exploited relentlessly no matter where you turn. The Disney organization is going to be getting into the adult-film business, probably using a different label—but they are clearly moving away from the "family-friendly" fare that Walt Disney founded it to become.

If you are a Christian, you should study what happened in the last 222 [202] years since the heavens opened in 1820 and God spoke to Joseph Smith. If you are a Mormon and you want to try to understand what happened to Christianity, you should look at your own last 222 [202] years and the marvelous transformation that your own religion has undergone to try and understand what happened in the early days of Christianity.

Christianity was such a divergent group that when Constantine decided to make Christianity the state religion of Rome, he thought he was getting a religious organization that he could subordinate to the interests of the Roman state, and it would be unifying and gratifying. What he found out was that Christians believe things so differently from one another that Christians were killing Christians over debates about Christianity and how it ought to be practiced. And so, in hindsight, it is now called (it's a rather flattering sort of BS term, but nevertheless) it is called the "First GREAT Ecumenical Council," the Council of Nicea, out of which comes the Nicene Creed, which was the attempt to standardize (under the direction of the Emperor) a definition for what the Christian faith minimally consisted of so that we could get our story straight! And they held votes, and they were literally sequestered by the Emperor until they came up with a definition—and even then, they still had a couple of holdouts who got exiled out of the Roman Empire. But voila, from the ~~great-ecumenical~~ First Great Ecumenical Council, now we have a definition of Christianity that we can use.

And so, Christianity assumed a stable form. But that was at 324 AD, and the battle had been going on since the death of the apostles, and Scriptures were being revised. And Christian scholars who look into these things deeply enough wind up saying, "I don't know how much of any of this stuff is reliable." So if you go to the Mormon history and you check out what happened in the Mormon history, you will find out that there are extraordinary numbers of parallels that go on. Joseph Smith was not the character he was represented to be by Brigham Young and the cabal of interests that followed Brigham Young to the west.

The telling of Mormon history, just like the telling of Christian history, can be analogized to this: You set off from Europe in a wooden sailboat. And the winds are pushing you in one direction, and the current is pulling you in another direction, and you're headed to India because you want to get cinnamon and pepper and spices to bring back and become a wealthy person. And en route, you manage, at some point, promiscuously sailing first one way and then another, with the winds blowing you in every which direction, but you're trying to hold your course west at San Salvador. And you say, "We made it to India." And no one's speaking Punjabi (it's a real problem). So, the story over time turns into something a little different and a little more heroic. And it's the contention that the possibility exists that there's another trade route on a globe, and "I'm inspired by God, and we're headed in the right direction, and God's leading us all about," and we get the story—the heroic story—of Columbus and his persistence, and the sailors getting ready to rebel the night before, and him saying, "Just one more day," and sure enough, they find the land—and we've turned it into something heroic.

Mormonism has taken mess after mess. mistake after mistake, wicked purveyor after wicked purveyor, and they've dressed it up into something that is a great story of triumph. Brigham Young could not conceive that God wouldn't vindicate him 'cuz he had the keys and the kingdom was with him. So when he sent all the cattle up to Cache county (and the winter in Cache county is ever so much worse than it would have been if he'd kept them down in the Salt Lake valley), and the entire herd of cattle dies from the winter, Brigham Young doesn't blame his own stupidity; he blames the Mormons for not being sufficiently faithful to the leadership. And so, he launches the Mormon Reformation.

There's something... Well, it doesn't exist anymore. But there's something called the Home Teaching program—where members visited one another to encourage them in faith every month. The predecessor to that was the Home Missionary program. The missionary program came to members' houses and asked you a series of questions.

The series of questions were designed to determine whether or not you should be "blood atoned," because Brigham Young believed in a principle which was that "some of your sins are so bad that Jesus won't suffer for them; your own blood has to be shed for that particular sin." So, if you committed a blood atonement sin and the home missionaries visiting discerned that, then you needed to shed your blood in order to atone for your own shortcoming so you could be saved. (And by the way, the person who got killed in this manner would later thank you because you made it possible for them to enter into the kingdom.) This is the kind of nonsense that went on when the Mormons were isolated from the larger American community.

Johnson's Army came out and dispossessed Brigham Young of the governorship. The railroad came through and made it possible for transportation. The year after Johnson's Army arrived in Salt Lake to dispossess Brigham Young of the governorship, over 3,200 families fled out of Utah going east to get away from Brigham Young because they were afraid of him. We have good numbers on those that went east. We do not have numbers for those that went west. By that time, the forty-niners had been out there, Sutter's Mill and the gold had been found, and there was plenty of land—valuable, useful land—in California to go to. And so it's thought that multiples of the number that when east fled to the west, out of Utah, to escape from Brigham Young's reign of terror.

He believed (when Johnson's Army was coming to Utah) that the Indians would rise up and defend his claim to be governor and that (he called the Indians "the battle-ax of the Lord"), he believed that that would secure for him his continued governance, and he could declare his independence from the nation, and he could found this theological institution that he would reign over as king. It didn't happen—and the talks that Brigham Young gave (that are now available—they weren't for a long time, but they got published about 2005), the talks that Brigham Young gave during that time period of emotional crisis lead me to believe that the man literally lost his mind. There's an example that's drawn out of Mormon history from the LDS perspective to discredit Joseph Smith's counselor, Sidney Rigdon, who claimed that he should be the custodian over the church after Joseph was dead. He gave a talk that is pointed to as evidence that he was a nutcase. Brigham Young (after Johnson's Army arrived) sounds very much like Sidney Rigdon in his campaign to be the church president after Joseph's death. They're BOTH nutty.

Mormon history is fraught with embarrassing, outrageous, violent, unfortunate events. If your faith requires that you have a church that doesn't bear any of the marks or failures, then it becomes intolerable for you to hear anyone reciting the events that occurred in your church. Mormons' faith is largely predicated upon the notion that the Mormon church has survived intact. Christians' faith is predicated upon the notion that Christianity has survived sufficiently intact so that you can secure for yourself salvation in the kingdom of God in the afterlife if you follow the form of Christianity you believe to have saving power today.

I have good news for everyone, and I have bad news for everyone. But first, the bad news: None of your churches are gonna save you. None of your current Christian forms are gonna save you. None of your Mormon forms are going to save you. If you intend to secure for yourself hope in Christ, then it is requisite, it is mandatory, it is absolutely essential that you hear the voice of God when it speaks to you in YOUR generation. It is necessary that someone be sent with a message from Him—just like Joseph Smith was sent with a message from God to tell you about how you can extract yourself from sin and error. And Joseph secured (for those who were willing) the possibility of their own salvation by obedience to the ordinances of the gospel which he could authoritatively declare. Paul says, "How can you believe if you don't have someone who is sent, and how can you be sent if not being sent by God?" Joseph met the criteria: He was sent. He did bring a message. It did have the power of salvation. It IS possible to secure salvation once Joseph's voice gets raised. And that voice and those ordinances remained authoritative until they get broken.

Study Christian history and you'll begin to realize that the Christian message got broken, certainly by 324 AD. Study the Mormon church. I mean, she [Kathy Alexander] joked that I got baptized in 1973, and it's true enough. But I gotta tell you, the church that I got baptized into in 1973 has nothing in common with the church that exists calling itself... Well, it doesn't even acknowledge itself as "the Mormons"; they were kind of proud of that back then. Now, it's "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints," because "the devil is happy every time you use the word 'Mormon.'" Ohmmmm...

I'm not sure how that worked. Which is another thing, I don't have a clock, so... [looking at the time]. Okay, I can keep going.

So we have to have—it's an essential ingredient of Christianity; it's an essential ingredient of salvation—we have to have God talk to us in our generation. The words of an old book—which is how Joseph Smith described the Bible—the words of an old book and the salvation that took place in their day does not do anything for us! We can come along and pick up the old book and imitate what it's saying there, but unless that religion lives in you, their religion belonged to them. Their feats, their acts, their sacrifices secured for them salvation in their day. What does God want of you now in your day? I mean, pick up the book, read it, and imitate it, but the LDS Church is largely left in the same position as the Christians were after 222 [202] years: They pick up an old book, and they imitate it. Where's God's voice to them today?

Well, something got alluded to in passing, and I don't know how many picked up on it. But in 2017, again at a time when there were alignments in the heavens (because the heavens often testify to what the Lord is doing on Earth, just as the heavens testified when Christ was born—and there was an alignment in the heavens, and wise men came to the east in order to find who it was that had been born "the King of the Jews")... Well, in 2017, God spoke again and offered to this generation/those living today/you people who are within the sound of my voice (whether you're here in this hall today or you listen to the recording) offered to you—today—the possibility of salvation through a new covenant. And part of what He's telling you in that new covenant is that He has some things that He expects to accomplish before He returns in glory to judge the world. You think Christ is coming again, and that is true enough; He's coming to judge the world. But before that time, He expects to establish a covenant people so that the religion that was once here at the time of Adam is here again. Paul wrote about how the gospel had been fore declared unto Abraham, and Paul's exactly right: Abraham knew the gospel. But so did Adam. So did Enoch. So did Noah. And so now can we too, not as part of the words of an old book, but as part of a living community of people that believe, have accepted a covenant today, and have sacrificed in order to bring forth the works of salvation today.

We believe in paying tithes. But we don't use them to buy buildings, and we don't use them to pay clergy. We use them to help the poor among us. The tithes that are gathered among the people who believe this message are used in fellowship meetings to help their neighbors or anyone within their community who are in need. Money doesn't go to invest. Money doesn't go to compensate people whose sacrifice in serving the Lord is required as part of their faith. Money goes to help those who stand in need: food, clothing, shelter, transportation, medical care, dental care. These are the things that the tithes are supposed to be used for. These are the things that we DO use tithes for. A conference gets organized, as this one has, and it requires the people who are going to organize it to rent the facilities, to gather the funds necessary in order to take care of everything that goes on during the course of the conference. And since housing isn't always free, if they can arrange to get someone to provide housing and make that available for people to purchase, they do that. But everything about our faith is intended to be sustained at every moment by acts of faith so that unless our faith remains vibrant, ongoing, active, and producing sacrifice, it will disappear from the earth. Because the last thing we want to do is to leave behind another hollow shell to become corrupted and to be used by evil and designing men to achieve their ends instead of God's ends.

It was mentioned that there are periods of restoration and periods of apostasy; those two things are intertwined. As soon as restoration ends, apostasy begins; you cannot sustain it. It MUST have a life of its own. Blow out the candle, and then enjoy its light—because that's how it works: You've got to keep the flame alive. There are people who have written me emails and letters saying I've got to institutionalize this or it's going to die out. Well, may it die out if the candle ever gets extinguished. IF it is to continue, it must continue solely on the basis of the sustaining light that comes from Heaven and not because we've created an institution that can be co-opted and turned into something like the rest of the world.

I have spent—I was gonna say "hours," but it would be much more accurate to say "many days" conversing with...well, it's not just the Lord; it's the Heavenly Council—about the management of a dispensation of the gospel. Past dispensations have failed. A dispensation of the gospel is very vulnerable, delicate thing. It's as delicate as gossamer or a cobweb, and it can be torn by inadvertence and neglect. It has to be attended to with care. The resilience of the dispensation of Moses consisted in a bunch of rites and practices and observances that could make people slavishly repetitious in what they did, and so it could go on generation after generation very durably.

The Christian dispensation went into, rather, freefall but stabilized at about 324 AD and assumed a form with enough resilience that Catholicism today has more than a billion adherents, and as long as Catholicism is around to remind us of Jesus and the apostles and the keys of the kingdom, then at least we know THAT much about Christianity.

Joseph Smith organized a church with a series of co-equal groups: a First Presidency (3), a Quorum of Twelve Apostles (12), a Quorum of Seventy (70), and then Stake High Councils (that were 12 members in as many stakes as existed geographically throughout Mormonism). Every one of those was equal to one another until Brigham Young got his hands on the reign of authority. And then Brigham Young used a verse that says, "Where the Twelve can't go, they can call upon the Seventy to go fulfill an assignment." And he said, "No longer are they equal in authority. I get to boss the Seventy; I'm the head of the Twelve," and they became subordinate, and ultimately, he got tired of power-sharing with the other members of the Twelve, and within three years, he wants to be the First Presidency again. And today, in the LDS form of governance, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints consists literally—absolutely literally—of one person. The president of the corporation of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints owns every building, every university, every business venture, all of the acreage that consists of over 2% of the landmass of the state of Florida, all of the Hawaiian farms, all of the radio and television networks, all the motion picture production stuff, all the newspapers—ONE Mormon, and he owns it all. And that one Mormon is a "corporation sole." And when he dies, then the senior-most member of the Quorum of the Twelve becomes the member of the corporation sole, and then HE owns it all. That's what Mormonism has turned into today. It is a vast financial empire, so much so that the religion that Mormons claim to believe in is really one of the smaller "side projects" of the Corporation of the President. There is a lot of money in religion. It's one of the two oldest professions in the world. And it's slightly more profitable than the other but not at all dissimilar.

That's the problem with religion. And so, when people hopeful of salvation and anxious about their eternal state come to the ministers of the various denominations and they hear the good news in Jesus, they're hearing something that grossly misstates the obligations that devolve upon you. An adulterer cannot enter into the kingdom of Heaven. A penitent adulterer can enter into the kingdom of Heaven so long as they confess and forsake their sins. You don't get there by continuing to entertain the vile lusts which the Apostle Paul said need to come to an end once that grace has been bestowed upon you. Look at Paul's example:

He's holding the coat of those that are throwing the stones that kill Steven. And Paul was probably responsible for having gotten Stephen into that predicament in the first place. He went about persecuting the Christians. He was a strict Pharisee. I mean, under his religious definition of righteousness at the time that he was practicing these things, he (the Apostle Paul) was a righteous Pharisee, vindicated by all that he knew, believing himself in good standing before God. And yet, when he awakened to his awful circumstance, he realized that he was a vile sinner. So what did the Apostle Paul do once that he recognized the ENORMITY of what it was that he had done that was wrong? He spent the rest of his days pursuing the exact opposite. He went on mission after mission proclaiming the righteousness to be found in living a life according to Jesus' sermons, Jesus' principles, the gospel of Christ.

Mormons have no hope in Christ because they belong to a church that gave them "authoritative ordinances." Without faith in Christ and a change to your heart and a willingness to obey the teachings that come from Christ (the latest of which is the covenant that instructs us what we are to do), then it doesn't matter what organization you do or don't belong to. Salvation is to be found by following the words of a living God—and that God is not only living, He is speaking. And what He has to say is remarkably profound. We've brushed up only against a small part of it in the talks that have been given today. But a lot of what has been said presumes that you know something in the background of Mormonism and the Restoration in Joseph Smith.

I'm here to tell you that the tattered history of early Christianity and the tattered history of Mormonism over the last 222 [202] years are directly analogous. You will understand your Christian faith better by understanding what has happened to Mormonism than you will by listening to preachers in the pulpit. And you Mormons will better come to reconcile an understanding of what's happened to your Restoration when you candidly look at how Christianity conducted itself over the first two and a quarter centuries.

It is HARD to hold onto the truth. It is HARD to have the Lord walk with you. But that's only because this world wears on you and asks that you compromise a little here and that you give up a little there and that you indulge a little here. And everywhere you turn in our society today—entertainment, the news, the political voices—they're all urging you to sin. And the bad news is we become victimized by that. We become inoculated to it. I mean, you only wade through and sit in raw sewage so long before you lose the scent, and you don't realize the mess that you're living in. This world intends to drag you down. And at the same time in that same covenant, the Lord says, The tares are ripening. ...What of the wheat? (T&C 157:64). We have to become wheat, something worthy of being laid up in-store by the Lord for preservation into eternity.

Now, I need to let you know one other thing before I finish, and that is: We made our reservations to come out here at the time Joe invited us (months ago), and we bought our tickets—and just a few days ago, in going through and confirming and locking everything down, we found out that we didn't have the rental car after all; they knew we'd expressed interest; we had to take care of that again. We found out that Southwest—on their own—decided they were changing our return flight, as a consequence of which we are gonna have to leave to get back to Louisville early enough that I'm not gonna be here and talk tomorrow. And so, I told Joe, "Don't you announce that. I'll just tell 'em as part of my talk," and then you can throw your shoes at me instead of at him. I've got to be out of here. And so, in the Q&A, it's the last you'll hear of me in this conference.

2022.03.36 Hear and Trust the Lord Q&A

"Hear and Trust the Lord in the Storm" Conference
Denver C. Snuffer, Jr.
Lexington, Kentucky
March 26, 2022

This is a continuation of the "Hear and Trust the Lord" talk that Denver gave at the "Hear and Trust the Lord in the Storm" Conference.

So, having said that, I've already gotten one question that the answer's, "No, I would not advocate using marijuana to get close to Jesus." Nor peyote, nor... Gah, we got off the plane in Louisville, and like the first 50 signs—I didn't realize there were even this many varieties—the first 50 signs were different kinds of bourbon. I mean, I finally saw these bourbon signs enough that I asked my wife, "Who do we know I could buy some bourbon for? 'Cuz clearly it's a thing down here." And it's a big thing, and it must be great. I'm not a bourbon drinker, but wow.

Okay, so do the Thomas Sisters have any questions? 'Cuz they've been here listening to all this weird stuff. And it just occurs to me you're kind of favoring us by showing up. You've been listening in on this stuff. Do you guys have any questions?

Thomas Sisters: We're good.

Denver Snuffer: You're good? Okay. Are there any CHRISTIANS who have questions? ('Cuz your Mormon questions are just...) Do we have a Christian who's got a...?

Okay, we can go! Oh, what? Okay. Yeah.

Question #1: First of all, your shirt, where did you get it?

DS: Oh, I saw this, and I went online, and I said, "I gotta wear that!" So we bought it. Yeah. "Normal isn't coming back. Jesus is." I think we got it on Amazon. Yeah, on Amazon. And I think if you just search for "T-shirt normal isn't coming back," I think you'll find it.

Question #2: Can I ask another one? I had a whole page of 'em, but the Vern and...

DS: Yeah, they answered them all. So...

[Question #2 regarding cremation]

Cremation? Well, cremation will not prevent a resurrection, because if you read the account that John gives in the book of Revelation about the dead coming forth, one of the places that will surrender their dead is the sea/the ocean. Once you drop a body into the ocean, it's pretty well gone in fairly short order (even if you don't drop it in a crab field in the Deadliest Catch terrain). And the bones will dissolve, everything will resolve back. So it doesn't present an impediment to resurrection.

However, you've also got the example of the Lord who, upon being resurrected, they rolled the stone away from the tomb where He had been laid, and He literally came forth, and He was in the garden; He was still there at the site that morning when Mary and others came to the tomb. And when He appeared later, He asked them to handle His hands and His side and His feet and to see that, you know, He bore the same wounds and the same physical body. And so, the argument is that if the body has not decomposed into nothing, that then the very same body that you lay down will rise again from the grave.

One of the ambitions that Joseph Smith failed to achieve in his lifetime was to build a mausoleum in Nauvoo, in which his parents and his wife and his children could all be buried so that in the resurrection, they would come out of the grave at the same location and then be able to, you know, hug and embrace and kiss one another upon coming out of the grave—which suggests his belief in the literal coming forth of the actual physical body that you lay down in the grave. And if that be the case, then, of course, burning it up and turning it into ash is kind of a desecration of something that is the image of God. And there's that theological argument.

I've learned of one fellow who intends to have his body cremated and then to send the ash off to have it crushed into a diamond—and then to have the diamond be the property of his widow after his passing, which is, you know, kind of cool. Yeah. Yeah. But, you know, in the end, I think no matter what you do, you... Everyone's gonna come forth out of the grave. And some may want to create as many impediments to that as possible 'cuz they're not proud of how they lived, and so they'd like to delay the coming forth. But I don't think it's gonna stop things.

It was an early teaching of both, well, of Christianity, generally. It was an early teaching that you did not suddenly flare into existence as a spirit and a body at the time of your conception in the womb of your mother but that your spirit preceded your coming into this world—that you have a long history before you ever got here. Okay? That idea is very comfortable inside the Restoration because of the book of Abraham and the book of Moses (the revision of Genesis) makes it clear that we have a long, long history before we ever enter into this world as having been YOU, having been a separate sentient spirit-being. And from the book of Abraham, it becomes clear that some of the people who are here now (in the flesh) lived and had a physical body in another cycle of creation in an earlier round and that they didn't just exist as spirits before they ever got here. So you have to ask yourself if it is possible to have a body, resurrect the body, and then have that body somehow get integrated—more as spirit than body—into another body and another cycle of creation, what exactly is the resurrection? And what exactly happens with the body? Okay?

We view ourselves as incredibly solid because we can't put ourselves through walls; can't do that because the atoms and the movement of the molecules and the charge between the electrons is such that it has a form of solidity that makes it impossible to pass through. AND YET, Jesus came forth out of the grave with the very same body, and He entered into the room with the door locked. (How'd He get through that wall?) And He ate! He ate fish that He cooked with coals on the... I mean, He's moving physical matter. He's consuming physical stuff. He's walking into physical rooms, and yet He also has the ability to do something which physically we are unable to do, which ought to tell you something about the resurrection. All spirit is matter, but it is more refined and pure. So if all spirit is matter but more refined and pure, can you not take that spirit and reduce it to a more solid form?

Right now we have temperatures that exist in our neck of the Milky Way that go up to 20 million degrees. The difference between cold matter and hot matter is the vibrational speed at which it is moving. If it is at 20 million degrees, it is almost impossible to describe it as anything other than a gas. Okay? But we also have temperatures that go all the way down to absolute zero. And when you get down, you know (what is it? It's less than 400 degrees below zero in Fahrenheit), the it just stops moving altogether; you freeze even the molecules. Everything's slowed down. So it's possible that "quickenning" (it's the word used in Scripture) is not just quickening meaning "turning something cool, neat; it's quickened; it's like Nestle's Quik, except better." Quickening might actually be a description of the physical state of the being, that it is sped up/it exists at an energetic level that is far above the energetic level at which we are functioning here. And therefore, it assumes a form that is, you know, "spirit" matter, which is quickened and refined and lacks the kind of solidity that your physical body exists in here and now. And my conjecture is based on limited observation, but I think that's what I saw.

So I think there's something to... You know, read your Scriptures, and look into that, and study a little bit of physics, and see if you don't see it converging at some point in something that kind of makes that view look...

So I wouldn't burn something that's gonna dwell in everlasting burnings. I would wait for that to arrive on its own. Yeah, you gotta...

Question #3: As a child, was Christ tutored by the brass plates?

DS: See, now there's a bit of interesting speculation because now you're gonna have to have converging social interaction that so far the Scriptures have not let us comment on. So, it's a great question! Great question. Okay. Anyone else? Yeah?

Question #4: I'm trying to figure out how to phrase the question, but in the Lord's Prayer, Jesus taught us to pray, "Our Father in Heaven," and we know from Scripture that He's known as the Father and the Son. And we also know that He becomes our Father as we become a child of Christ. So when I pray or when we pray, "Dear Heavenly Father," also keeping in mind that in Third Nephi that the people were praying to Him, and He said, "It's okay." But when WE pray, we pray, "Our Heavenly Father." Are we supposed to be praying to our Heavenly Father or to Christ as our new Father as we become His children? That's my question. I hope that made sense.

DS: Yeah, okay. First, the idea of the Father and the Son as a theological issue has created a marriage between scriptural language and philosophy that turns God into an unknowable, incomprehensible being in which He is three-in-one—and yet, He's not three, He's one—without dividing the substance. "The Father uncreate, the Son uncreate, the Holy Ghost uncreate; and yet, there is not three uncreates, there is one uncreate. The Father incomprehensible..." (see Athanasian Creed vs. 8-12). This... I'm reciting a Christian creed, by the way. All of you believe this if you're a Christian or a Catholic or a Protestant, "The Father incomprehensible, the Son incomprehensible, the Holy Ghost incomprehensible, and yet, there are not three incomprehensibles. There is one." (This is Athanasian Creed? Which one is that? No, no it's not Nicene; it's a later... Athanasius, yeah, okay, yeah.

Okay, so the point is you touch up against the oneness of God, you touch up against the Father and the Son, you wind up in the middle of a theological mess. Jesus (in the New Testament, King James Version or New Revised Standard Version or whatever) offering the intercessory prayer (in the chapter 17 of the gospel of John) prays that the apostles and His disciples "may be one, as thou Father and I are one, that they may be one in us" (see John 9:21). See, He's not talking about turning Matthew and Peter and the others into one and then, you know, morphing like something out of Matrix into single "whatever." He's talking about this unity that exists in the conviction, the belief, the purpose, the understanding, sharing in the same mind, okay? That's what He's talking about. So when you say, "Christ taught us in the Sermon on the Mount to pray, 'Our Father who art in heaven,' and Jesus is becoming the Father, are we praying to Jesus or are we praying to the Father?" And the answer is yes. Because there is no difference between...

I mean, I could tell you things about how prayers get answered, and it's not what we sometimes think it is. There's a lot going on on the other side of the veil that is left out of the story—and for good reason, because it isn't necessary. But there is no prayer that gets answered, at any level at which the prayer does get answered, in which the information that's conveyed/the message that is granted is not approved, ultimately, all the way to the Father. But the Father resides in a place in which ALL THINGS past, present, and future are manifest before Him continuously so that there isn't a past and a present and a future; it's all one in His presence. Okay?

(I don't know if I should even be telling people this, but...) In order for those who reside in the presence of God to come and actually connect to this physical creation, just like we have to undergo some profound transfiguration in order to be caught up into Heaven, there is a similar process that's required in order to descend from Heaven. And it is not pleasant for those who are used to a higher order of things to condescend here. And therefore, there's actually... I mean, one of the phrases that gets used is that there are sentinels who guard the path. There's a Cherubim and a flaming sword sent to guard the way to the Tree of Life. And, you know, analogy though that may be, it's referring to actual things. There are those who...

Well, if you look at the vision of the Three Degrees of Glory, an angel who was in a position of authority in the presence of God fell and became Lucifer. So we know that turned out badly, and he's a ne'er-do-well, and we don't like him, and he doesn't like us, and he's aiming to disrupt the purposes of God. But the phrase that you ought to pick out of that is that he was "in a position of authority in the presence of God," which as a description ought to suggest that if that was the case in the instance of an angel who fell, it only makes sense that it would be true also of angels who have not fallen. And if there be angels who are not fallen who are in a position of authority in the presence of God, then meditate on that idea for a notion of, you know, prayers and answers and who we're praying to, which is always... EVERYTHING is always done in the name of the Father. Everything is always ordained at the outset by the authority of the Father, and the glory and the praise and the honor be the Father's. But there are those who are moving along in a process that if they're "trusted" are trusted and if they're "true and faithful," they're true and faithful—and if they're given a position of authority in the presence of God and you lost your keys and you're praying to find your keys, do you really need God the Father? Can a local angel who's looking around saying, "This guy's an idiot. 'Look behind the sofa there!'" There, I used my angel voice: "They're behind the sofa." Actually, that's more like the king in Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat. "Joseph!"

Yeah?

Question #5: I have a question. In the Testimony of St. John (in chapter one and throughout the Testimony of St. John), it refers to the "cosmos," such as, "the creation of the cosmos was organized by a messenger," by Christ. Does this refer, that use of the word cosmos, can you comment on whether that refers to a galaxy, this creation specifically, or the entire universe?

DS: Oh. Christ created more than this world. The testimony of the afterlife says that the worlds are...and were created [by him], and the inhabitants thereof are the...sons and daughters of God (T&C 69:5). Okay? (I didn't bring my Scriptures, but I remember some of them.) That tells you that Jesus, personally, was responsible for more than the creation of this world. That tells you that when a creation is made of a world on which there is a divine purpose involved, that it is inhabited by people that are children of God. And if they be children of God, then they're gonna be redeemed.

I just think... There is something in the additions to the Scriptures that describe a vision of the Lord returning in His glory, the language for which was prescribed specifically, and those are the words that have to be used and the only words that can be used. But there's stuff in the new Scriptures—if you look at them and you ask yourself that question—that will really help you get your hands around some of that. But I don't think it's right when you're told to "color within the lines" to color outside the lines. So, just look carefully at the Scriptures with that question in mind. You might be surprised how much stuff there is in there about that.

Yeah?

Question 6: Yeah, the theme of the conference is "Hear and Trust in the Lord in the Storm," so when you're lying at the bottom of an icy ramp, and your life has just changed, what do you do to stay in tune with that voice and to trust in what's coming next?

DS: I don't, I don't...

Audience Member: Can you repeat the question?

DS: Oh, yeah. He said, When I fall and I'm laying at the bottom of an icy ramp with a broken arm, what do I do in that circumstance to, you know, stay in tune? And there really is an answer, except I don't... I hate being emotional... 22nd Psalm.

The 22nd Psalm has a phrase in it. Well, let me see if I can do this better. Okay. When Christ was being crucified on the cross, one of His final acts was to recite, My God, My God, why [hast thou] forsaken me? (Matthew 12:28). Everyone who was present knew He was reciting the opening words of a psalm. He was not asking God why He was forsaking Him; He was testifying that He was the Messiah—and a messianic psalm that had been composed about the VERY scene that was then unfolding was His testimony that all those that look at him "shoot the lip out and mock Him," that He was "surrounded by dogs," that "his garments were parted," and that "they cast lots." He's reciting the messianic psalm about the very moment that all of those people who were skeptical about Him were living when He began to sing, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" He apparently, at that point, was so near death that He couldn't do more than the first line. But if you read that psalm, it will slap you up in the face.

Okay, there's a line in there about how His bones stare at Him because everything is disjointed. And this [the broken arm] hurt. And it hurt, you know, right up there with the greatest amount of agony I've encountered. I didn't realize it at the time, but I was... I went into shock: I was shivering and blacking out and all that from pain. And what I was thinking at the time is, "I don't know how the Lord did it. I don't know how He endured what He endured." If you read that psalm and you realize... I mean, first of all, I COULDN'T do it. I would have blacked out, and they'd have been hauling around a limp body, nailing it up, and you know, it would have been sort of anti-climatic. You know, "Don't stick a spear in him; you'll wake him up!" It's pathetic. But He hung right in there, and I... I just marveled at Him.

Anyway, there was another... Oh, way back there. Yeah?

Question #7: I was wondering... You probably never deal with this at all, but if you notice pride within yourself, what is something you do, or what do you think of, or how do you kind of...?

DS: Well, I'm... I came up here, and I was looking at his drums, and I was thinking, "If I just had my right hand, I could do something!" I got a set of drums in my basement, and I'm a little proud of some of the stuff I can do there.

But pride—when it comes to the things of God—makes no sense at all. I don't think I've ever done an adequate job with anything that's been entrusted to me, but somehow people are good enough to compensate for my own shortcomings. There have been phenomenal things/miraculous things that have been achieved as a consequence of the faith of people. I may have been able to facilitate a few things getting done, but GREAT things have been and are getting done—not by my efforts but by the efforts of other people. I rented and paid for and went to ten venues to begin things in the Ten Talks that got given, and after that, the conferences have been organized by people of faith. The facilities that have been arranged have been done by people of faith. The recording that's been done... I wasn't even responsible for recording any of the ten talks; a fellow volunteered, and you know, it was a good idea that he do that. But I just went to give talks; I didn't give any thought at all to preserving them. And he began a practice of doing that and then making them available on CD—which, in turn, led (ultimately) to the Restoration Archives, in which a vast library of recorded material has been preserved. Well, I look at everything that has been done, and I admire a lot of the people, and I'm in awe of some of the successes that have been achieved. I don't personally take any pride in that. I think what I've done, I've done inadequately, haltingly. But I've learned a lot! I've learned a lot. I have a better understanding...

When the Scripture project was approaching its completion and the idea was that we would take it to the Lord in prayer, my first thought was, "Something like that deserves the dignity, it has the solemnity, and it has the importance that the prayer ought to be written down." Because when the Kirtland Temple was dedicated, the dedicatory prayer was written down, and then it was read. And so, while it's really unusual in my life (it may be the only one I've ever written down), I sat down to write a prayer because I believed—I had this conviction—that that's what needed to happen.

I sat down to write the prayer, and the prayer was given by revelation; the conviction was all that I brought to the party. That prayer more succinctly deals with the entire sweep of the history of the Restoration in just very few words—I mean, I've written volumes of history trying to explain things, and that prayer does it more clearly, more accurately, more succinctly than I ever did. So if I compare that prayer (which, literally, all I was, was the scribe that wrote it down) with what I've written, all that does is make me feel verbose and inadequate—'cuz I take a lot more words to say what the Lord can say in fewer words. Well, when the prayer got answered, the answer came with such clarity that I thought, "Oh, I'd better write this down!" And I was forbidden. "No." And that just seemed odd. Why would you...? Why would you get so clear an answer if you're not supposed to write it down? It's got to be written down.

And then it changed—so that the words that would have been written down wouldn't were not the same. And I thought, "Oh, that's why I didn't write it down, because it was a diff... There was a change; it needed a change to be made. So, now I can write it down. Now I can write that." No, I was forbidden from writing it down—because the prayer changed again. And what it finally... This happened several times. And what it finally got through to me was: Heaven responds to what happens on Earth immediately, instantly; They see what's going on. We are turbulent; we are in motion. And how we are in one moment doesn't reflect the maturity that we acquire in a later moment in the give and take of abusing and misusing and misunderstanding one another and then being humiliated by that and then growing up a little bit and being a little better person. And so, the answer changed because the real world changed until, finally, it got to the... And I held off. I held off because, in my view, this could be different right up until the very end.

It finally stabilized because of the PEOPLE, not because of me. Because of the people, it stabilized, and then the command came, "Write it." And so now, the whole thing came in one writing. And it wasn't the same as it would have been a month earlier, a week earlier, or two weeks earlier, because there were still people that had to work some things out "as between one another" that hadn't stabilized yet. And it was a fabulous education.

The Lord's invested a great deal in getting things done. I'm not the smartest, the best, or (I don't even think) the most worthy—but I WILL follow direction. And I WILL limit what I say and do to what I'm told to say and do, and go no further. And I do think there's a great deal of material yet to tumble out from Heaven. But Heaven alone is gonna control that, and I don't take any pride in any of it. But I do think that I've been serviceable, and I'm glad at that. I just wish I had been more so; I wish I could persuade more people. I know there are people with probably legitimate complaints and criticisms of me that find that I create a barrier for them in connecting up with the Lord and what He's doing now. That's unfortunate. I wish I were not an impediment to anyone. I wish they would just read the material and forget about me because the material stands on its own. It will lead you to truth. It will lead you to light. You don't need to say, "Oh, he's this, or he's that" or "He's NOT this, and he's NOT that." And I'll admit, I'm not THAT! But God IS something, and He's working. And He's working right now to achieve an end, and it's going to be glorious.

There was another hand up here I thought. Yeah, yeah?

Question #8: What's the risk we'll fail?

DS: Oh, man.

Audience Member: What's the question?

DS: What's the risk that we will fail? Zion and a city of God that got caught up to Heaven, in the history of the world, has been accomplished two times. There will be a third time, but this Zion will not be caught up; instead, Heaven will come down. It's prophesied. It's promised. It WILL happen, but the prior two—literally—one was antediluvian, and one was immediately post-deluge, and look at all the generations of people that have come and gone and have not seen Zion. I mean, the Lord's lamentation is, "How oft would I have gathered you as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, and you would not." That lamentation is found in every volume of Scripture that we've got (including our new Scriptures; every volume of those). So the impediment isn't God's willingness to bring Zion; the impediment is always our end, not...

How can you have one of the most qualified New Testament scholars that exists in the world today be agnostic? I mean, how is that possible? It's because "getting the information" doesn't mean "living the religion." It's because "memorizing long passages of scripture" doesn't mean "living the religion." You can have all the theology and understanding that any man has ever attained to, but if it's not alive in you—if that spark of the divine is not part of your experience and your life—then it's still nothing more than an idea.

When the Mormon missionaries came and taught me (and they taught me the Joseph Smith story), I literally thought all Mormons saw angels. I literally thought that was what the Mormon religion was. I got baptized, and it was some short while after that, that I get caught up to Heaven, and I'm in the presence of an angel—and it didn't... It didn't surprise me; it didn't put me off; it didn't... I thought, "Yeah, this is that new religion that I joined! This is the way this works! Yeah!" And so, I'm acting more like a tourist than anything else. I'm confident I was a disappointment. I mean, you've got all the solemnity of eternity in the countenance of this Being. I can quote him; I've done that before: "On the first day of the third month, your ministry will begin, and so, you must prepare"—that was his message. (You've heard that; I've said that a time or two.) But I didn't ask anything. I didn't... I thought, "Hey, I like this new religion! This is kind of nice. But this seems like such a humorless fellow, you know?—dressed in white and looking all like granite practically..." BOO! You know, he probably came back to return and report and said, "What the hell are you thinking with that guy? He's not all that!" Yeah, there's another story. I don't tell that one, but maybe I should.

Yeah? Yeah?

Question #9: I have a question about miracles.

DS: Miracles.

Question #9 (continued): Yes, in Third Nephi, when the disciples were asking about what the church of Christ told them that if it is built upon my gospel then the works of the Father would be manifest in them. You read in Fourth Nephi about healing the sick and the lame walking. What is it that we lack, if we are one on the path of the gospel, to get those words of the Father manifested?

Audience Member: Can you repeat the question?

DS: Yeah, he's saying that the works of the Father get shown forth in people of faith, and what is it we lack that we don't have the miracles that they talk about in Fourth Nephi, and the obvious and the simple answer is: faith. I mean... I...

It's a funny thing about faith and healings and miracles and signs, okay? On the one hand, signs do follow those who believe. And on the other hand, those who seek for a sign lack faith; very often, those who seek for a sign are adulterers because it's a wicked and adulterous generation that seeketh after a sign. I have seen signs and miracles; there's people in this room that could tell you about miracles that have occurred as a consequence of faith and obedience. And I don't do that. I don't talk about that. Because very often the people most interested in that are people that go from one titillating story to another titillating story. Christ would admonish those for whom miracles were performed to tell no one, to keep it quiet. And part of the reason for doing so is because those kinds of incidents inspire and attract a certain type of person—and those people are quick to convert, fickle, they have shallow roots, and they don't go anywhere. They dry up in the heat of the day. So all it takes is a little opposition, and then those that flock in to that run away.

I have witnessed miracles. I have seen miracles. I don't talk about them because I believe that, in the end, the more we focus on the search for finding and experiencing those, the less our search is for bending the knee and submitting to the will of the Father. And there may be more on that in the future—because I was pursuing that very specifically and recently learned that God has purposes behind who He heals and who He does not heal and why He does and why He does not. And I'm not sure that it would be of any use at this moment to talk about that, but God knows what He's doing. And sometimes there's a much, much bigger set of dynamics that are involved in what's going on down here: who's taken, who's left, why someone is taken, and what purposes are achieved. But God literally is in charge of everything. And miracles do happen. Just because they're not, you know, turned into a headline doesn't mean that they haven't and that they don't occur. They do.

Yeah?

Question #10: I've got a question about baptism.

DS: Baptism.

Question #10 (continued): It says you have to have six or seven women. And I only know two.

DS: Oh.

Question #10 (continued): So where do I get, if somebody wants to get baptized, where do I find six [seven] women that knows my...

DS: Well, you ought to get another four [five] women to talk to the two women that know you, and one of the places where that happens are at conferences, and this is a conference. I mean, some of you ladies need to get to know this fellow. (There—that sounds like an early pioneer Mormon Utah come on if I ever heard one!) No, we should/you should take care of that here at the conference, and if the two women who do know you can talk to other women who are present here and they can/the other women can ask you questions, you should be able to get that taken care of right here during this, before this is up.

Yeah, there's an arm up back there...?

Question #11: Yeah, in Third Nephi, when the Lord... I'm going off of the Ten Talks when you made mention "their works not their book", their works not their book with the remnant of Lehi [indecipherable]. Can you talk about that for a second, what he meant by that? I mean, if I understand right, we're working a mighty change to bring a book to them, but what are the works more specifically that even the Lord said would be that sign?

DS: (Well, apparently my time is up.) Okay, so one of the ways in which John is described after his translation is that he became a ministering angel to "minister to those who are heirs of salvation." The responsibility to work out salvation is the responsibility of mortals. If...

No generation is going to have an advantage over another generation by having a resurrected, visible, angelic ministrant walking around as the preacher. They minister to people whose responsibility it is to teach. And so, the works that they do behind the scenes are the works that angels do (hey, Steph, can you bring the sling up? I'm gonna put my arm back in), that the works that they do are behind the scene, and the same kind of thing that would be done by an angel (and not publicly), they (the ministers that... the translated three Nephites, John, and others) do, "holy men whom ye know not of" do are designed to fulfill and keep the covenants of the Fathers. But it's all...

Everything that's going on has been and is designed to achieve the fulfillment of the covenantal process in which God's gonna keep faithful to the agenda that began with Father Adam and Mother Eve and is intended to culminate in a wrapping-up scene in which the world is judged, the wicked are destroyed, and there is a season of peace brought on the earth. And between the beginning and the end, there has always been a process in which angelic ministrants behind the veil educate and then send forth mortals to teach mortals so that the work of salvation gets done BY mortals, and the test is the same in every generation.

No generation gets to say, "Yeah, but they had THIS." I mean, Christ is the closest thing we have to something that's supernatural that walked on the earth, but look at how few people followed after Him. When He gave His bread of life sermon, practically everyone abandoned Him and went back the other way. And by the time He enters triumphant into Jerusalem—and they're laying down their coats, and they're laying down their palm trees, and they're celebrating: "Hosanna, Hosanna"—well, a few days later, no one interferes when He's marched up to Golgotha and nailed to the tree! And the few people that, you know, they trusted in Him, and look what a big disappointment He is. It takes the resurrection, and THAT was largely held to a private event of a handful of faithful people. And by the time you get to the book of Acts and you look at the numbers, there's about 500 people that believed in Christ. That's about it. So, you know, you can say you would have believed had you been there, but from all the thousands who WERE there, in the end, only about 500 of them believed. And as the sad story of Nauvoo was told today, how many of them believed? How many of those people that were contemporaneous with Joseph Smith ever realized just what an extraordinary blessing he was to have had around in their day? I mean, it was an utter... It was an utter failure.

Let me end 'cuz I've...

(Oh no, I'll tell that story some other time...)

Thanks for coming. I hope that people beyond this crowd listen to some of the comments that were made here today. I thank the organizers and the Thomas Sisters and everyone that's participated or will participate, and I'm sorry that I won't be around tomorrow. Thank you for coming.

2022.03.26 Group Conversation

"Hear and Trust the Lord in the Storm" Conference
Lexington, KY
March 26, 2022

Denver Snuffer: ...to hold on to institutional Mormonism. It is a mess.

Oh, yeah. Yeah.

Bart Ehrman was a believing Christian when he started down the... He's perhaps, outside of Catholicism, he's perhaps the leading Protestant Christian scholar of today—agnostic. The closer you look, the more of a mess you've got on your hands.

Matt Lohmeier: So, let me ask you this...

Reed Larsen: I've been reading some of his stuff.

DS: Great stuff.

ML: So, have you heard of the BYU professor called Thomas Wayman?

DS: Oh, yeah. Yeah, you know, that's crap.

Adrian Larsen: He's the one that "Joseph was gay..." Joseph was gay crap...

ML: Yeah. I just saw the video yesterday.

DS: Yes. No, no, I just saw.

ML: Okay, so I'm behind the power curve. Everyone's already heard of this guy. I'd have books in the house by him or that were edited by him. But I just saw these videos show up yesterday with "Joseph's gay; Jesus' gay lover is John the beloved"...

DS: Have you noticed how his mannerisms have become increasingly effeminate over the years.

AL: I should probably be rather ashamed then of the jokes. Somebody that sent me this —and some jokes ensued on text, and it got worse and worse. But why stop there? "Abraham's wife never had a kid, but he was a 'friend' of God." "Are you sure it wasn't Gay-braham?" I mean, it gets worse and worse.

DS: Oh, yeah, but see...

ML: This is gonna be an argument as Steve made.

DS: You might as well go there.

AL: Right. Yeah, the argument is just as specious. So yeah, we went back and forth. It was... It was bad.

ML: Okay, so I've got a question.

DS: Oh no, we don't do questions.

ML: Oh, that's all we've been doing until you showed up. We can't ask questions anymore?

AL: And I can't keep answering because I'm making stuff up at this point. So it's your turn.

ML: It's about the "Question and Answer" session. I'll open it up for dialogue then.

DS: I have a question about the "Question and Answer."

ML: I've got a question about the "Question and Answer" session. Okay, so you mentioned...

DS: What is the worst movie Bruce Willis was in?

ML: No, we can't go there yet.

AL: Die Hard 3.

Vern Horning: Ah, man... Surrogates.

DS: No, no, what about that sci-fi show?

AL: Sorry, Matt.

ML: I get it.

DS: OK, no, you were saying...

ML: I gotta read this...

RL: Are you gonna have Tommy John surgery so you can get your fastball up to 90 miles an hour now?

DS: No, Tommy John is in the elbow. This is the shoulder.

RL: The humerus, yeah?

DS: Snapped like a [indecipherable].

RL: Sorry, Matt.

ML: The Wisemen came TO the east...

RL: Came to the east—the Wisemen—from the west?

ML: I mean, I spent years...

DS: No one picked up on that!

AL: We all picked up on... We've been discussing it.

DS: Okay. I want you to assume for a moment that Joseph's explanation of the Garden of Eden being in the Americas is accurate.

ML: Okay.

DS: And I want you to assume for a moment that you needed something from the Tree of Life in order to bring a body back out of the grave.

ML: Okay.

DS: What direction would the people bearing the gifts from the east that included anointing oil for the Tree of Life, what direction would they necessarily have come from?

ML: Depends. I mean, you can go either way...

AL: The Americas to the east.

DS: Yes, it would be far more efficient.

ML: Okay.

DS: To the east.

ML: So they would have had to have come... So, that's why it takes them a couple years to get over there.

James Fargo: This is not what I came into. This is not...

DS: And can you imagine....? Hey, James Fargo is a reputable man, and he walks out with Aaron Bishop. I can only account for that to geography. They live in the same (roughly) county and not...

JF: Light cleaveth unto light.

DS: Yeah.

AL: Yin and yang—they're canceling each other out. You were saying something, though, about...

DS: About which?

AL: Well, you had just left off the anointing oil...

RL: Going from west to east...

ML: Well, he didn't say "anointing oil." He said something from the Tree of Life. Well, no—you did say anointing oil.

DS: Well, yeah. I have to tag back up to that.

ML: Okay. Yeah, that's right.

DS: ...which was, you know... If you think about a creation being self-contained in the ability to take care of everything that needs to be taken care of, as part of the whole thing, and then you've got the Tree of Life, which everyone assumes is a metaphor and not an actual thing... Yeah, well, why do you need to guard it if it's merely metaphorical, you know? We always take what's literal to be metaphorical and what's metaphorical to be literal.

Christian Sanders: Actually, I wanted to ask about that because, I mean, you have spoken about... Because in the creation story... The [indecipherable] creation story is an analogy, right? And it's sort of like, okay, when does that story end? Because does the creation story entail Adam and Eve's time in the Garden, or is it just creation that's the analogy, you know, and now we've started out into the literal, you know, first man/ first woman, you know, kind of this idea of, like, you know, yeah... Where does the analogy end? And where does the literalism begin? And what things...

DS: How old do you think this planet physically is?

AL: Trillions.

Unknown: 2.54.

DS: I mean, the nearest anyone can date it is in the billions of years. Okay. So do you think this planet has been used in one cycle of creation (being ours) and never before and never again afterwards?

RL: Well, didn't Joseph Smith say that this planet consists of fragments of other planets?

DS: That's one way to describe it.

AL: But it's used over and over?

DS: Yeah. Why does the end of the millennium and John's revelation read rather like the beginning of the creation in the book of Abraham?

Yeah?

VH: How much downtime between cycles?

DS: Apparently, almost none.

Tausha Larsen: So, this earth has a ways to go?

VH: So then the question: Have we advanced further technologically than other rounds? Because you would think Hoover Dam and our interstate freeways and then some works of man that... Do you think they've destroyed/get destroyed pretty quickly?

DS: Let's say that the earth is an intelligence (and actually a feminine intelligence, at that). And let's say that she... And the only time we hear from HER is in the Enoch text of the book of Moses when she laments the wickedness that is on her face (as her, being the mother of man, you know)... So it's a female entity. Let's say that SHE has fulfilled the measure of her creation and that SHE, now, can move on (in whatever sphere that is) to something newer and better and higher. And so she un-occupies "this" and moves to something better—and for a moment, it ceases to be animated by an intelligence, and there will be another that comes to occupy it. What happens to your interstate when it's no longer maintained in an order that an intelligence holds control over? What happens to it during that—I don't care how short it is—during that time period before "another" comes to fulfill the measure of the next cycle of creation?

Unknown: Mars?

Lori Larsen: It falls apart.

AL: Yeah, Mars.

Unknown: Mars...

DS: Yeah...

Unknown: Venus.

DS: It certainly doesn't hold all the bonds of...

LL: ...together.

DS: ...concrete together. I would bet...

LL: And is that a higher or a lesser order of intelligence than where we currently find ourselves?

DS: Well, it's certainly a different one than the one we're in.

LL: Yeah.

DS: And apparently the highest and best and greatest is the one that we're trying to figure out how to behave in. If God would just not give us, oh, ambition, sexual appetite...

AL: Beer.

DS: ...taste, sense of taste, I mean, every one of the... Gluttony—oh, where'd that come from? Well, okay, stuff tastes good. And all that sexual misconduct, where did that come from? We're in puberty. You know, the body is an unruly animal. We got desires, appetites, and passions that belong to this physicality that... Look at every weakness that men have. I mean, why did they hoard? Why are they greedy? Because they're insecure: they're afraid they won't have clothes to wear and food to eat and shelter to protect them, so they need a whole lot of excess of everything in order to gain carnal security. It's that carnality thing. "Take no thought what ye shall eat," you know, or what you should wear. God clothes the grass in the field. He'll take care of you, too, so "forget about it." And yet, you know, people that have more are afraid of losing the more that they have. It just doesn't... In these bodies, it just doesn't end. It's like putting you on the back of a stallion and saying, "You have to ride this thing, and you've got to work out how this is gonna work." Because it will use you up if you don't gain control. And, you know, there you are. It's just dust. But holy crap is this dust insistent, relentlessly! Especially when you break part of it.

AL: It gets really mad.

CS: So, going back to an intelligence that holds the, you know, this earth together, essentially...

DS: Yeah.

CS: ...and perhaps a different intelligence each cycle, would that not apply to also...

Unknown: (There are no seats.)

CS: ...also things within the earth. So, I mean, you have... So, if death didn't enter the earth/this world until after the fall and we have what appears to be remnants from BEFORE the fall...

DS: Yeah, yeah.

CS: ...of previous life inhabitants of a sort, of fossilized inhabitants... So what's the reconciliation there?

DS: [chuckling] The...

CS: Like, why wouldn't they also return to...

DS: Be ground to dust?

CS: Dissolved, yeah.

DS: A lot of [indecipherable--enhancement?]. And a lot of it will be [indecipherable]. But that doesn't mean that...

[crosstalk]

We're gonna go?

Stephanie Snuffer: Yes. If this is what this is...

DS: Well, have a seat! Let's talk. Okay...

SS: We're not here to listen to you.

DS: Reed is now gonna answer the last question.

RL: ...what?

AL: Go, Reed!

RL: What is the last question?

Unknown: I've got a question for Reed. Well, actually, Tausha, ask your question to Reed.

RL: Uh oh.

TL: Ask my question to Reed? I don't want to ask my question if Stephanie's in here.

Unknown: It's for Reed. It's a question for Reed.

SS: We came back here for a very specific reason.

DS: [indecipherable]

SS: No, you were not.

VH: Actually, Denver was asking us questions.

SS: No, he was not. I can tell. This is him holding court, and we're gonna leave.

DS: But hold on. I'm gonna ask a question.

SS: Okay. I'm not kidding. That's not why we're here.

DS: Why would some elements persist in a semi-organized state and other elements not if the cycle of creation involves a different spirit stepping up? And in order to fulfill the measure of creation and move on, does that get accomplished in a single cycle? Or does it take more?

AL: Interesting. So...

DS: Has it taken YOU more?

Unknown: Yes, yes.

AL: Certainly.

DS: Will it take more still for you?

AL: Certainly.

ML: I guess there's an "it depends" in there.

Unknown: In Second Nephi, it says, "Christ layeth down the life according to the flesh, so that by the power of the Spirit he can pick it up again." I think that's it. If you lay it down, you can take it up again.

DS: If everything about it is willful. Yeah. WE only go kicking and screaming.

AL: So, this notion of a different intelligence animating the earth in a different cycle being tied to the sorts of things that get preserved from the sorts of things that do not get preserved—even in the fossil record, for example; in the earth's crust, for example—that's an interesting idea that's tied, then, to which intelligence animates this, and does it come down to preference? You know, "I like the moose; it's sticking around."

DS: Joseph was very complimentary about the fidelity of the earth—the spirit of the earth—to the charge that was given to her in the creation and that the earth had fulfilled the measure of her assignment.

AL: That would imply that there are rebellious planets that are that have less fidelity.

DS: I'm not sure I would always dismiss it as "rebellious." As inexperienced, incapable, ignorant, learning...

AL: Interesting.

DS: ...moving along in the path... I mean, Joseph said you're saved no faster than you get knowledge; well, the absence of knowledge doesn't imply the presence of willful wickedness as much as it implies inability, stupidity, sloth, just not measuring up, you know?

Unknown: Not measuring up to the...? What is it? The measure of its creation?

DS: Yeah, fulfilling your full measure of creation. I mean, if you look back—you probably don't even need to go back a year—you can probably think of mistakes that you've made you would like to have done better (in just the last few months). Well, how would it be to look back over the course of a life and to think about every opportunity/every choice/every moment and to think, "I lived it to the highest and the best"? And as far as I know in THIS creation, we've got a few that are pointed to and the Scriptures say they were "perfect in their generation." But that's, in my view, that's faint praise. Okay? It's not perfect; it doesn't say perfect. "Perfect in their generation." What does that mean? Well, in the context of the raw sewage that they bathed in daily, they were kind of tolerable.

Unknown: Graded on the curve. Yeah.

DS: Exactly. And therein lies the problem. Very few are adequate for absolutes, and Christ was one of them.

AL: Meaning every moment He had lived to the full measure/lived correctly and being able to look back and see that moment-by-moment.

DS: Yeah.

AL: That's absolutely remarkable.

DS: Yeah.

Okay, this has to be a conversation.

David Christensen: Adrian, I'm reading your blog.

AL: Yeah.

DC: When does number six...? It was only gonna go to six. Will there be a seven and eight?

AL: As far as I know at the moment, it goes to six. And, you know, much of what was said today is exactly where it was going, and that is: Everything up to five was gloom and doom; Six is: if you want some hope of not being swept off, you need to have a right to this promised land. And the right to the promised land is granted by covenant from the one who owns the land. The covenant is offered. And I'm looking for a nice way to say... There are a lot of folks I know... Not a lot. There are folks I know who—even folks that are baptized—who've said, "I don't need that covenant. It doesn't apply to me because I have XY&Z going for me," which is nice, or "I have a bloodline going for me," which means, "I don't need to accept what Jesus is offering me at this extreme point in history right before everything gets swept off. I'm fine. I'm good without it." And I'm hoping to challenge that notion and maybe convince people that what's coming is probably a lot rougher than we think—and there's specific language in the covenant and specific promises of protection made, and I think that those promises are there because they will be desperately needed. And so, not only accept the covenant if you haven't, but keep it if you have. That's kind of where that's all going.

DC: Well, I have to admit, when I read your very first one... I'm late to the party, because you broke my bubble with Christopher Columbus, like...

AL: I'm sorry.

Unknown: Yeah, that was a lot of people.

DC: [indecipherable] ...I was listening in Denver's talk today, and I'm [indecipherable]... Have you done a new thing? You've been kind of... Where did that all come from? And then, with the whole Roger Williams, I'd love to kinda know where you... Had you been studying that? And to rename the guy that we've been always...?

AL: Years ago, I was preparing for a Scripture study that we were doing (a Saturday night study). I was in the Scriptures; I came across that man. I was reading... So, I'd...

TL: He came across Christopher Columbus.

AL: No, I came across the "man among the Gentiles." And so, I was reading about Christopher Columbus to talk about him in Scripture study, and the more I read, the more I'm like, "Eww." And so, I was pondering that and questioning (and not something I'd blog about...), but a name popped into my head, a name I'd never heard (that I know of): Roger Williams. I'm like, "That's nice. Who's that?"

That was years ago, and I filed it away and probably forgot about it. And (...what? Three weeks ago?) we were on vacation, and I was reading the 116 Pages book (that I referenced) and saw the pattern and thought, "Well, gee, that's really interesting." And Roger Williams popped back into my head from way back when, and so I did a couple of research did some more research and put it together. And a lot of people get warm fuzzies from the Spirit, and that's their definition of "inspiration." And more times than not, my definition of inspiration is, "Oh, shit." And that was one of those moments when that all came together. And I'm like, "Ohhhh..."

TL: Although, it's still conjecture.

AL: Oh, yeah, I'm not saying I'm right. I'm just saying...

Unknown: Adrian, was it like, "Oh, shit, I have to SAY this," or this is the cognitive dissonance like... What was that? Like, when, you know, when something comes, you're like, "Oh, crap. Now I have to deal with this."

AL: See, I was planning to blog about destruction earlier, and I had a whole different idea planned, and this stuff all presented itself. And I was... I had a very heavy, crushing conviction that this is what I need to write about. And that was the "Oh, shit." There were several other... Yeah, there were several others, you know, realizing the implications. I don't like... Anybody here want to go out publicly and say, "Hey, guys, it looks like about eight years left, more or less." I mean...

DC: 30 [2030], right?

AL: Yeah, I expect a buttful of arrows for that. And I don't... I'm wildly uncomfortable writing stuff like that. And so hopefully, I'm wrong. And take it all with 1000 grains of salt.

Lynne Robbins: I just want to know if coffee was involved in this.

AL: Coffee?

LR: Well, you said caffeine helps you study Scripture.

AL: Oh.

LR: Just curious.

AL: You remember when Denver got asked if he was praying when something happened (to the Stake President)? And he said, "Well, that's not a fair question, because any spare moment that my mind's not otherwise occupied, there's a prayer going on." Yeah, I can't think of a day without coffee in quite a while. Sooo...

RL: Or a moment without caffeine, huh?

DS: Caffeine-induced frenzy.

AL: Yeah, it's the product of a frenzied mind.

Unknown: Or ADHD. It helps you think.

Brian Bowler: I think it's interesting that the pattern that... It's not fun to talk about the gloom and doom part...

AL: No.

BB: But part of it is: I think we need to become convinced that there's no other way that we can be saved. You know, it was like Moses had to be convinced of his own nothingness. And we all have to be convinced, eventually, that any other reservations (that "maybe I could do this or this," or there's a lesser, less Babylon-ish way to get by, you know; "there's a little corner I can hide in and get past"), I think that all has to be swept away, that the only real person that will ultimately help us pass over this trial we're going through will be the Lord. He's the only power that will be able to bring any one of us through it. And so part of that is breaking down any reservation and blowing up our bubbles. The way we see the world is going to be crushed and broken, and then that's where He can fill in the gaps. Anyway, so that's the... It's weird; I do want to talk about the good. And that's coming. But you've got to be convinced that there is no other way.

DS: One of the frustrations with talking to Evangelicals is that they turn the word "gospel" into "good news." And the assumption that comes from that is that everything must be GOOD news in order for it to be related to anything Jesus wants us to hear. "It's got to be GOOD news. I've got to feel GOOD about it. It's got to make me feel good." And when they hear something that says, "You're awful, and you have to repent," they say, "Oh, I know that's false. That's a false spirit. That's not good news. They just gave me bad news! That's the devil himself."

Unknown: That's just not with... The LDS community is the same way.

DS: Yeah.

Unknown: I couldn't... They wouldn't let me teach things because it made people FEEL bad.

VH: Yeah, I had a friend who said to me/he told me, you know, "Everything you're telling me, all these Scriptures, I don't feel the Spirit." Because it's just an uncomfortable feeling.

AL: I had someone on my mission, we gave him a Book of Mormon; they promised to read it. We go back a week later and ask them. "Oh, I threw that book in the trash."

"Why?"

"Oh, I had a dark feeling when I tried to read it."

Oh, well, yeah. Clearly, it's of the devil then.

Unknown: Wow.

DS: There's a lot of people that think that anything related to a continuing restoration brings a "dark feeling" because, well, "You're actually telling us that Russell Nelson can lead us astray?" That's horrifying! Teach men truth but leave the claims of the hierarchy intact, then they'll listen to ya.

Unknown: Negotiating.

BB: I think no one likes feeling vulnerable. And the problem is, like, when you start truth starts breaking up what you know, you're left with this... There's no foundation below you, and it's so freakin' scary that you would rather choose almost to be your delusion or illusion than the reality—because it's SO uncomfortable, and like, as I went along, it's like, "What can I trust, Lord? I can't even trust ME at times." I'm an unprofitable servant. I don't have all the answers. I can go down many wrong roads and realize that and that feeling. You have to have a certain cognitive dissonance that you're—even in your best moments—you're probably not all right. And we like being right (as Gentiles). It's painful. It's really painful to have your world blown up, and as soon as you put it back together, it's going to be blown up again, you know? And that's this whole path that all of us are on, and you gotta say, "You think you got it back together?" Yeah, I thought I've had this figured out several times. You know, I'm like, "Crap." And then the Lord goes over here, or something goes over there.

AL: The sandy foundation—you're constantly scared of falling.

BB: Yeah.

TL: So, as Whitney was giving her talk today and just... We reviewed a lot of the mistakes that the saints have made. And I'm just... I guess I'm wondering, what mistakes are we making now? Are we making the same ones that they did? Do we have the adulterous hearts that they did that caused it all to fail? And it was after the Kirtland Temple—when all that light came—it was immediately after that that everything just went downhill. And so it seems like the more light that comes, the more difficult it is, too. So, I guess, these lessons from history, what are we doing that's the same or different or...?

CS: Actually, I had a question for Whitney, and I was gonna ask you this probably later, but I figured this would be a good place to ask it now. Have you had—if you're comfortable; if you're comfortable!

Whitney Horning: If I'm not, I won't answer.

CS: Okay, great, great, great. I don't know if you've already written about this or not, but I had heard the idea that... Because when it came to Joseph's sealings, you know, he hadn't just sealed women to him. It was like, you'd seal sons, daughters, men, like, families to him. And I was trying to search into, I was trying to, like, back up that claim; I did some stuff. Have you come across any things like that or...?

WH: Yeah, so Denver actually had a talk where (in the "Civilization" in Colorado) where he goes over the law of adoption. I think it's also in A Glossary of Terms in the Scriptures.

DS: Yeah, and Bushman described what Joseph was up to as "yearning for familial plentitude in Heaven," the purpose being to expand his family so that when he got into Heaven, he had brothers and sisters and fathers and uncles and aunts and relations—and it was about familial plentitude, which just shows you that Bushman is grappling with something that... He could not get his hands around it.

The diaries of the brethren in the late 1800s—just before they finally cut off adoption practice—in the diaries, they're talking about, "What was it that Joseph was up to?"—'cuz in the Joseph Smith Papers, it doesn't even show up until October of 1843. He'll be dead eight months later. And the first mention of this kind of practice is October of 1843. And it's an obscure reference to the necessity for adoption to get into the Kingdom. So, it's not fully explained—but he's doing something—and then he's dead, and he's gone, and they start doing something to imitate it. And by the time you get in the 1880s, their diaries are saying, "We didn't understand what this was all about."

George Q. Cannon says, "I didn't believe it when Joseph did it, and I don't believe it now." I mean, they're saying things like, you know, This is—whatever the hell this is—we don't know what it is, and we shouldn't be doing it." Until finally Wilford Woodruff put some "absolute" into it in a talk he gave to the Utah Genealogical Society in the 1880s, and they edit out THE paragraph that deals directly with it when they publish the talk. And so the talk today is sans the adoption stuff. But they got to the point where you did your genealogy as far as you could do your genealogy, and when you reached the end of the road, then you seal that person to Joseph Smith. And so, we're all connected into the family (the way that Joseph is trying to do it)—which flips everything on it's ear.

RL: Well, interestingly, all of the temple presidents of the time kept notes as to what was accomplished each day in the temple. And if you go read their diaries, you'll see in Manti and in the different temples around, they talk about, "Today, we baptized this many people for the dead, this many for healing, this many endowments were done, this many sealings, this many adoptions," and they keep track of all of this, right? So they knew it was a specific ordinance that was necessary. And they were actually doing this (even though they didn't know why). And that persisted for decades. So adoptions (as a specific tool to accomplish the construction of a family) has nothing whatsoever to do with marriage. The problem is that people conflate the two. They think marriage, you know, sealing, adoption...

DS: That was deliberate!

RL: ...it's all the same thing, and now it looks like polygamy.

CS: My main question was like, do we, anybody, do either of you have a list of names of the families, the children, the husbands that were also sealed to Joseph, or is that kind of like... Do we have record of that?

DS: Devery Anderson's Quorum of the Anointed gives a list, and I think it's a pretty good one. Devery... It's a three-volume set. Devery Anderson...

DC: [indecipherable] ...she wrote books about the temple. She's written a couple books.

[crosstalk]

ML: The Quorum of the... The three books Denver's referring to were published by Signature Books, and they're probably out of print, but you can find them online. And there's The Nauvoo Endowment Company. This is one of the three volumes that...

Unknown: [indecipherable]

ML: I'm sure you can.

RL: By the way, fantastic talk today, Vern. You too, Matt. You two were really, really good.

LR: We're calling you Vern now instead of Whitney's husband.

RL: Yeah, yeah.

Unknown: You've risen.

WH: I want to go on record, I spent many years being "the bishop's wife." And people would come in [indecipherable], "I have a name." They'd be like, "Yeah, the 'bishop's wife.'" So I feel like this is [indecipherable].

VH: So the question is: Was Joseph really doing endowments in the Red Brick Store? Or is that a lie from the apostles so they could give legitimacy to what they invented and put into the Salt Lake Temple?

Because it would make sense that if he's trying to get a temple built, that he would do something that sacred outside it?

AL: Well, they did baptisms in the river.

VH: And then it stops.

AL: Yeah, but for a time, it was acceptable. And then it had to stop. I wonder if endowment was the same sort of thing—and perhaps even knowing there was a fuse burning on his own life...

Unknown: So I can... I have a question. Nobody knew what the endowment session... They didn't actually have endowment sessions before Joseph Smith died, did they?

Well, that's what I was gonna bring up. Hugh Nibley talked about parallels between the LDS endowment and early Christian practices. And there's some in Pistis Sophia and several other places where, you know, there's a creation story, and then there's sets of covenants that are made, and there's a prayer circle. So, it looks like there's things that are parallel.

Well, so my question about that is: If post-Joseph Smith they developed an endowment session, was that ever right in the face of the Lord, in the view of the Lord? Or was it... I mean, if Brigham Young was part/had part, too, in developing that, then was it ever really right?

MF: Can I...? Okay. There's a quote that Johnny Page, I think it's probably in Joseph Smith Fought Polygamy, where Johnny Page was one of the Twelve. And he said he went... He told his wife (after they went through the endowment with Brigham Young), he said, "I went through the endowment with Joseph, and this was nothing like it." So like, what he learned from Joseph was totally different from what Brigham did.

Unknown: And he was the only apostle that didn't go along with the Brigham Young movement.

MF: Yeah, yeah. So, there probably was something...

Unknown: So, technically, the endowment session (that they have changed repeatedly and repeatedly and repeatedly over the years) never really was correct to begin with. Is that right?

Terry Fausett: I've always assumed that was part of what was going TO BE restored when the temple got finished and Joseph could get those answers and directions. And since Brigham never received the Savior and was still looking for Him when he died...

Unknown: (He was still looking for wives, this is what he was looking for...)

TF: [indecipherable] ...didn't receive the Savior, so how can he receive that information to do that?

Unknown: So, we don't really care that they keep changing things and changing things because they weren't right to begin with. I mean, I cared when... I couldn't understand it when I was active in the church. And now, you know, first, I don't really care, but it's just so bizarre thinking about it, you know, that it was never right from the beginning.

Although, there is this very uncertain consideration [indecipherable] in that a lot of this stuff has also been helpful in getting people to a (I don't know...) "higher point" in spiritual lives. There's a number of different things there that, at least esoterically speaking, you do make a certain progress up to the Lord, right? And that whole process getting there is associated with that ascension process.

And you're on faith as an individual rather than...

Unknown: Correct.

Unknown: ...the origins.

Unknown: And so, okay, I don't know that it was given specifically to anybody credible, let's say, but I do believe that there is some aspect of it that is actually spiritual and helpful in that ascension process.

AL: And I think there's records that talk about Joseph doing something in the Red Brick Store and setting it up as a garden and so on. So, it's my understanding that Brigham managed to preserve and corrupt something of what Joseph had—so it's based on something that was correct. It was a poor imitation. And it's been... And it's degraded ever since. But nevertheless, the idea that there are increasing degrees of glory, ultimately conversing with the Lord through the veil and entering His presence, and that that is our journey—if it preserved only that, that's instructive and helpful. And it's good to know. That's how I view it.

Unknown: I thought it was really interesting (and I can't remember who was giving the talk), but seeing how God doesn't change things from one prophet to another. You know, I mean, he/they add things—knowledge or something like that—but He's not going to reverse the revelations of another prophet. So, like, Joseph Smith didn't reverse anything that whoever was the last prophet before him.

MF: Joseph Smith's papyrus book of, you know, like Hugh Nibley's books—that's a big one. At the back in the appendix it's got, like, the Sofa P...whatever...

Unknown: The Sophia.

MF: Yeah. And a bunch of different ones from countries like Iraq and, you know, those old, old places, their records, and they all have this Garden of Eden story in it as part of their ceremony. So He's done this in all different places. So I can understand how Joseph did that garden drama—that parable or whatever. But it was, of course, Heber C. Kimball that was really intimate with the Masons (wanting to be a high-level Mason) and then Brigham Young (wanting the wives). So between the secret rituals of the Masons and the spiritual wifery, they came up with their endowment, and I think that's kind of how we've got where we're at.

DS: Let's just go back and remember the way some things unfolded. Yeah, Joseph Smith got the papyri in Kirtland, and he began to work to translate it. And he didn't finish it, and he didn't publish it. And then in late 1842, he published in the Times and Seasons the first and then the second installment that we now know to be the Book of Abraham as an installment of what he had gotten by revelation/translation, promising there would be another installment that came out, which never came out in public, but which it appears was what he did—because if you read the account of the Book of Abraham, it goes right up to the Garden of Eden. The next installment/the next increment shows up in private as a translation—the promised next installment—in what we know as the temple, which picks up in the Garden of Eden. And we know from independent sources in diaries and journals that the Red Brick Store, what was going on there—included a garden scene and an angel with a flaming sword that was guarding the Tree of Life because people interrupted what was going on there—that that was an ORAL tradition.

Brigham Young went through that initiation. There were others who had gone through that initiation who were still alive and were still present. Joseph died, the ceremony stopped, nothing picks up again until November (late November) of 1845. And by February of '46, they are driven out of Nauvoo. So the ceremony recommences late November 1845, and then it ends in February of 1846, during which the Twelve presided over what was going on. But more than Brigham Young had been through the Red Brick Store initiation. Had he made MASSIVE alterations, that would have been detected and denounced.

Between February of 1846 and the commencement of ceremonies in the Endowment House on Temple Square, there was only ONE endowment done (and that was on Ensign Peak for a missionary that was leaving—to endow him). And then the Endowment House picks up, in which Brigham Young more or less managed things.

Then they dedicated the St. George Temple. At the dedication of the St. George Temple, they start taking down—because there is a temple—they start taking down the Endowment House, but it's still orally transmitted, orally preserved, orally continued. Then the Logan Temple comes online, and now they're gonna have two temples very far apart geographically. I mean, it's like 500 miles apart between them 300 miles apart between them.

RL: Well, and each of the temple presidents kind of had control over how it was done.

DS: So now at the dedication of that temple, the decision is made to reduce the endowment to writing—for the first time. Now, this is like 1877. So, Joseph's dead in 1844; you're now 33 years later that you're finally going to reduce it to writing FOR THE FIRST TIME. It got reduced to a typewritten copy in the 1877 timeframe. And it did not change again until the Reed Smoot hearings in Congress when Joseph F. Smith is asked about the oath of vengeance that's taken as part of the temple rites, and Joseph F. Smith DENIES that that is part of the Mormon covenant-making (because if it were a part of Mormon covenant-making, then that would mean that Reed Smoot could not be seated as a senator, and a member of the Quorum of the Twelve is not going to be a U.S. Senator).

The first change that is made to the manuscript that's typewritten is Joseph F. Smith changing it by eliminating the oath of vengeance. That's the first one, and that was done contemporaneous with the Reed Smoot hearings. Whether he went to Washington and answered the question and said it wasn't part, intending to come back and delete it, or whether he knew he was going to be asked that question and so he deleted it before he went out so he could deny it, we don't know the timing on that. But we do know that it was eliminated; it was crossed out. That's the very first change made in (what?) 1906 to the thing that had been written down for the first time in 1877.

And then, by the time you get to cutting back the...

AL: Penalties.

DS: ...the penalty... I mean, they didn't eliminate them; they just remove "the bowels gushing out" and "the tongue being..." All that. They eliminated the graphic description. But they didn't eliminate the penalties. That was another kind of slow-inching. And then in 1990, "Katy, bar the door," there's been a flood of changes that have occurred since then.

Unknown: There was... Wasn't there another change, though? Didn't Brigham Young have a lecture...?

DS: Yes, a lecture at the veil.

Unknown: Yeah, at the veil.

DS: But that was a one-off event.

VH: And there was the congregation singing.

DS: Yeah. If you went to the temple and heard Brigham's lecture on Wednesday and then you went back on Friday, it might be a different lecture.

Unknown: And so it wasn't really the "endowment."

DS: But they did reduce that to writing, too, in 1877. But until then, it was "stream-of-consciousness Brigham," you know.

Unknown: "This is our God, and we have no other God."

DS: If someone stole a goat earlier in the morning and now he's giving his lecture, you might hear a whole lot about thievery and goats and... I mean, how that fit into the creation and was, you know, living properly...

Unknown: So, how are those things recorded? Like, 'cuz, as you know...

DS: Typewritten, preserved in notebooks in the Salt Lake Temple, on the floor between the level on which the First Presidency meets and the upper level where the Seventy meet, in a room that James Talmage used to write Jesus the Christ.

Unknown: But, Denver, wasn't the... When the endowment was reduced to writing, that was pretty much John Nuttall that did that, just reading back to Brigham, to see if he added in changes.

DS: There was actually a committee of three people that worked on it; Nuttall was part of it as scribe—but I mean, they all got to voice their remembrances. The biggest vulnerable points were: Joseph's gone in 1844, and it's in November of 1845 when they... Everything then was what they could recall of what Joseph had done. And so the question is, how much did they recall? And Brigham...

Look, Brigham Young, John Taylor, Wilford Woodruff... EVERY one of them said, "The temple rites are not finished. This is not done. This is not right. This is the best we can do. Someday, Joseph is gonna come back and he's gonna fix these rites." It was... They NEVER said they got it nailed right. They always said, "Joseph's gonna return, and he's gonna fix this, and it's gonna get done right."

It's not until after Joseph F. Smith that they begin to say, "We've got it," you know, "You're secure in your afterlife if you come fetch from us what we have to offer." I mean, it became one of the major sales points, and it remains one of the major sales points for the religion brand that they offer. "We can promise you stuff. And you'll get it."

AL: Does anyone know where this notion came from that Joseph is coming back? Because that still gets kicked around, and there's, you know, people making claims now. But where did that come from?

DS: Brigham.

VH: I was wondering if they were saying that it'll take a resurrected Joseph Smith to restore this. Were they thinking, well, "When the Christ comes, the Millennium begins," correct, "Joseph comes back as a resurrected in the morning of the first resurrection. And then we'll get it all straightened up."

AL: Oh, is that it?

VH: That's what I think it is. And then it makes me think people now ('cuz there are some groups like the "Doctrine of Christ" group), they really believe that—that this resurrected Joseph... And then I asked someone, well does it have to be... "Does he come back as a glorified personage, like Jesus Christ?"

"Well, no, he's just gonna be born again"—like it's a rebirth; it's a Dalai Lama thing.

AL: Well, that's not the morning of the first resurrection.

VH: No, so it's kind of changed a little.

Unknown: "Doctrine of Christ" people actually have somebody picked out.

Unknown: Yeah.

DS: Phil Davis.

SS: Wait, I want to go back to Tausha. Hey, Tausha had a good question that nobody's answering.

Unknown: Yeah.

TL: That's a hard question. Nobody wants to talk about it.

SS: Well, that's the interesting thing: Nobody wants to talk about it. You want to talk about all these other things that actually don't really matter in the grand scheme of things.

DS: I was in the bathroom. I don't even know what the question is.

SS: Tausha's question is: "Are we messing up the same way? Or different ways?"

DS: Oh, I heard that question.

SS: Yeah. And nobody answered it.

DS: I ignored that. Yeah.

SS: And I don't care if anybody answers it. But it's really interesting that you'd rather talk about all this other stuff than that question. Because that's an important question.

LR: Well, I didn't ignore it. And something happened here for this actual conference that kind of puts that in perspective, which is: Denver says, "Yeah, I'm not speaking on Sunday, and there's a 90-minute gap, so deal with it," and then what does the organizing committee do? And then we have Joe Alexander who hears the voice of the Lord saying (as he's asking, "Who do we ask to speak,"), the Lord tells Joe Alexander, "I want to be asked to speak at the conference." So now the organizing committee is going, "What the hell do we do?" because we've invited the Lord to speak. Does He show up in person? Do we have that kind of faith? Does He speak through somebody? Are we supposed to have a prayer meeting? We don't know how to do LDS 2.0—uncorrelated, without minute-by-minute scheduling—for a conference. So Tausha, are we doing the same thing? Or have we learned what to do with a 90-minute gap? How close are we to hearing and listening to the Lord's voice in this conference? We don't know—'cuz it's scaring us to death as an organizing committee. The Lord wants to speak; He told Joe Alexander, "I want to be invited to speak." What does that mean? What do we do with that? Like, panic. And so we may not be as far along as we think we are when a 90-minute gap in the program, which is totally set out minute-by-minute, gives us pause. We don't know yet. So this is a new thing for us. And where are we in that? Brian?

BB: If we're uncomfortable with space, as I've seen through a lot of conferences, we like to program everything out. And that's a gentile thing is that we don't know how to come to a meeting and to say whether to let to preach, teach, exhort, have music, you know. But that's, like, down here we...

I find in our progression, we either want to be "here" or "here"; we want to jump this chasm without going through a process of growth. And so, part of... Kind of back to the endowment; we're all talking about the endowment—but there's fruit that came from that endowment. There's people here that connected with Heaven because of what we have, you know. So there was enough there; it's like... But we get caught away with details and forget to connect with Heaven and to let Heaven guide us versus wanting someone to preach to us or someone to tell us what to do.

So, I mean, I think what Tausha... I would say we've made every... I've seen every mistake made in the Nauvoo period, and I've made probably most of 'em myself, too—and I don't say that hyperbole. I feel like when Denver was talking, I was convinced of my own weaknesses 'cuz I see how I was a committed so much to... I was into the LDS Church so much that I was a religious freak sometime. And then I also chased after things I shouldn't chase after. So the two things that you mentioned, kind of, priestcraft and the sins of the flesh is like, yeah, get a [indecipherable]. So we all, I think, we all are still trying to progress, but as I... I have hope 'cuz I felt/I still feel like we're here talking, you know, we're here trying, so... I feel like the Lord's trying to take us along a path. In Colorado there was...

We're recovering from Babylon. I joke about this sometimes: Babylon Anonymous. We're kind of like the children of Israel leaving Egypt, and they have all these bad habits—and I think that's part of what, I think, we're trying to do is overcome these bad habits and learn how to live differently with each other, not to be passive-aggressive, not to talk about each other. You know, I think much of what Stephanie is doing is trying to develop a new culture that we're not used to; we're used to this other way of dealing with each other. And so we ARE recovering from being in this world, and we're trying to learn how it is to be in a to [be] godly with each other, how to say, "No," to each other and not get offended of, you know... So it's an uncomfortable and vulnerable process—I feel like—that we're all going through. And we don't know...

We both have all have left feet right now. I mean, I feel uncomfortable sometimes because I know I'm not "right" (still) inside. And I'm like, wow, my natural instincts are... I can't trust some things that I used to trust. I'm having to learn how to walk all over again in a different manner. And it's... It IS uncomfortable. And so that's... But then I know there's also somebody that really wants to help in this, and I just have to listen to that enough and not give up.

There was an answer given by Denver today about how that desire to give up—I've seen it in others; I've seen people... When we become aware of just how what a vulnerable state we're in, it takes much effort to keep going and not want to say, "Okay, I tap out, God," you know; "I've had enough for this existence..." you know, "...but let me take this up in the next one." It's har... Every minute we stay here is kind of like a continual miracle that we can keep on adding upon. I almost died years ago and wanted to die, for [indecipherable], for intercession. And so, I've looked at every minute since then... It has been so valuable, that I want to HAVE this.

So yeah, we are here, and it's a miracle that we're here. And for me, it gives us/should give us a sense of gratitude that we even HAVE a chance and that He is paying attention to us.

LR: So Monday morning, the conference organizing committee asks the question, "What did we learn and what ought we to have learned from this conference?" And I hope we ask that question and get a good answer. Because this is a new thing; Kentucky's new ground. This isn't Utah and Boise. This is the mission field, and we've gathered people here that are cold-calls, never heard it before, never heard the name. What ought we to have learned about the Lord being invited to speak? That'll be the question Monday morning.

Unknown: You know, I really appreciate your comments, Brian, and what was... It was very well-put. There are a lot of things we're still learning and still figuring out as this stuff goes along. You know, something that kind of occurred to me when we were talking about this scripting and scheduling thing is: You know what? We're all just sitting here together, talking about stuff in pretty much an unscripted environment right this instant. This is kind of like an unscheduled meeting, as it were. And it seems to me like a lot of these things kind of happen all over the place. Why did it have to be skipped?

BB: See, that's the.. What I... For years I saw (in putting the conference together) that eventually that we can... The old conferences, they used to show up, and typically, Joseph Smith was chosen—but it's like they could choose somebody to kind of conduct/guide it, but everybody would work out/decide what business needs to be taken care of in the community, which the community was there to... There was complaints and everything that would come up, and you deal with those things. And so it was more you arrange to show up and be there. We're not... We haven't been ready for that as a people 'cuz it's like it's too much chaos. 'Cuz if there's an open mic, you never know what's gonna happen with an open mic, you know. And there's been a lot of stuff. All these false spirits or half-truths or partial truths that people get excited about and want to rush ahead causes its own chaos. And so...

But in looking forward and backward years ago, we had to start someplace. We had to come out of the wilderness, start to practice doing something different, you know, and recovering from it being in the LDS culture, recover from being unequal. We're not used to being equals—like, we want somebody (like I said) to always tell us/organize it, you know, and it's... That's hard. But eventually, we can get to a point... In Moroni it talks about, "They gathered together and spoke one with another concerning the welfare of their souls." And they also (like I said) decided whether to preach, teach... The CHURCH decided. We don't know how to do that still, quite yet, but we get there by incremental steps. And that's where the patience comes in, is letting Him guide us all, and each one of us getting our working out our own ambitions and false pride and fears of not having enough or being left out (and all those instincts that are within us we have to struggle with), that if we can come to that kind of calmness to trust that the Lord won't forget any one of us here, and if we have faith that He won't forget us, then we can let things happen that we would otherwise be uncomfortable letting things happen, so... It's when it comes back to, first and foremost, trusting Him that He never forgets any one of His kids. So...

Lisa Roseman: [Indecipherable] my outward success as a gauge of how I was doing and how pleased I was with my performance, then I would be terribly depressed. I don't look at my outward performance; I look at my INWARD sensitivity to feel what I've done wrong and how quick I am to repent of it. That's where I look at my (and I don't even want to say) "success." It's really "my failure" is what it is. But the failures have made me more sensitive to what I do and what I say, even though it seems like I'm not making much progress a lot of times. But I think what we should look at in ourselves is: Do we repent quickly when we know we've done something wrong? Is it "real-time" repentance? Or is it "three days later" repentance? Or is it "never" repentance? Because, really, repentance is going to help us in our salvation and that communication with the Lord. I mean, the doctrine of Christ, it always is, it's a very simplistic type of systematic approach to success through failure. And, I mean, if I thought that I could be successful because of what I did right, then gosh, you know, I'd be totally deluding myself. So don't get down on yourself, because I feel your heart in your desire, and your intent is good to want to do right. And that's what the Lord desires.

BB: We have to rely wholly upon the merits of Christ, not on ourselves. So to answer your question, I mean I... That's hard. I mean, I think we have made all the mistakes, but... All we can give Him is our willingness. I mean, the sacrament prayer talks about willingness, and that's the one thing we can... We can keep screwing up, but if we keep trying to come back to Him and be willing to be taught again, when you fail again... I mean, having failed a thousand times on some things, it's like, it's so hard to come back to Him and say, "Well, I keep trying, but..."

"Bless his heart." I've heard, "Bless his heart," quite a few times.

Unknown: Tausha, what was your question again?

TL: Well, it was just, looking at church history and the ways that they failed, are we failing in the same ways, or are we succeeding? I mean, having them as our guide (or the guide as how to NOT succeed), I mean, where do we land? And as I look back at church history, I mean, they got off on the wrong foot pretty quick. You've got Oliver asking Joseph, "Hey, go ask through the Urim and Thummim if I can be one of the three witnesses."

"Hey, Joseph, go ask through the Urim and Thummim if..."

AL: I can translate.

TL: "...if I can translate." So immediately, they were relying on the prophet too much and not having the direct relationship with God themselves. Then you go through the years and you have the Kirtland... The temple came, but then you had the Safety Society mess-up in the banking, and Oliver and counterfeiting money, and then the polygamy thing all comes in, and then diverting funds from the temple to build homes, and so it was just this... Yeah, I look at all these mistakes and then just try to see where we are at. Are we making these same mistakes? And where are we at? How can we do better? Are we gonna do this, or are we not? Is it an individual thing of rising up, being redeemed, receiving the Lord? Or is it more of a group thing of "let's make sure we have enough money for the temple"?

SS: I think... I find it interesting that all of that is outward. I mean, obviously, a lot of it comes from your heart, but you're talking about outward behaviors. And I don't think your outward behaviors... No, they're a representation of what's inside, but if you... I don't know how to... None of it's gonna matter if you can't figure out who you are and how you operate in the world. It... None of it's gonna matter. None of it's gonna matter unless you understand how I perceive you, or I understand how you perceive me. It's not gonna matter what you do because the mistakes are gonna start... They're gonna perpetuate themselves. It feels like what the world is missing is for the ability to people for the ability of people to be quiet and be still. "Be still, and know that I am God."

"What lack I yet?" We run around doing lots of really fantastic things—fantastic things—much of them motivated by [indecipherable] and the power of God. And obviously, don't put them down. But they have to be balanced with the ability to be still.

I have this theory; I mean, it's not a theory—it's actually real. We go around and DO things so we don't have to do the real work of figuring out how we are in the world.

TL: How we are in the world or with God—or both?

SS: Both—with "you and me" and "Him and me," and you know, and missing this big piece of, basically, the yoga of Christ and the centeredness and the awareness and the stillness of being able to hear God tell you what is wrong with you. Not "You're not reading your Scriptures enough." Not "You should have done this." But basically, you know, "Your relationship with your kids really needs work." You know, "You're a good dad. You provide. You do the things that you need to do, but your kids have no connection with you whatsoever. They don't even know you." I'm just... These are just... I'm just throwing these... These are the things that are going to make people fit to be in community with other people. I mean...

DS: There was... I don't know if it's still around. There was a moment when there was that sexual impropriety going on involving... The catchphrase was "bonded spirits," like we were bonded together in a prior...

Unknown: Existence.

DS: ...existence. And so, you know, "We belong together now, honey, so let's get naked." That crap showed up, and I hope we dealt with it. But for all I know, that crap's still out there. And I mean, what really blew apart Nauvoo and ultimately destroyed both the community, the peace, the lives, the whole thing was—ultimately—sexual immorality.

SS: ...AND people's un... (Again, this... I think these are tied in.) Your... People's unwillingness to have the internal fortitude to do something about it. "I don't want to offend. I don't want to hurt. I don't wanna be ostracized. I don't wanna be the one to..." I mean (I think), knowing what you're talking about, I mean, the EXCUSES people were laying out for not dealing with it was just kind of mind-blowing. And I think this goes back to: We don't have... As people, we're doers; we're not be-ers. We just like to do. Doing makes us feel so good.

Unknown: What did she say at the very beginning in Kirtland, where things first began to manifest going sideways; it wasn't even sexual impropriety, but it really was the spirit of excelling and the spirit of materialism that gripped the church with get-rich-quick schemes—because everybody could see: "Others are gonna be moving in; we can buy the land now and resell it." And there wasn't the community. "Oh, we have a commandment to build a temple; let's go build a temple." It wasn't until Joseph received an additional revelation saying, "Hey, build the temple," that they then put in a push. But I don't know that the people actually changed.

And that's what I think blew things up the first time—was a disappointment about materialism and getting rich, and "All we have to do is trust the Prophet, and everybody's gonna be, you know, happy in Zion." And from there, given that there was a hierarchy, there was always envy and strife about who's in charge and who's closer to Joseph. And they got pushed from place to place out of pride-of-position and being above others and being able to be something that, you know, "I'm this in the world; I should be this in the church, too." And I think then, by the time they got to Nauvoo, that's when the sexual immorality had really become the mature matured—because of missionaries going to places where there was an awful lot of communal societies that were doing that, and you had some false spirits that persuaded Brigham and Heber and friends to do things wrong.

But I look at US, and I think we've... Having a flat, completely flat, everybody's- gonna-be-dependent-on-the-Lord, we're actually gonna realize that you have to know God and be connected to Heaven—that has put 90% of the "excelling over one another" away. I think some people, honestly, they still want to be "there's an inner circle" maybe, or "I'm closer, and I hear these things and that things," but Denver, you know, in your blog—from the very beginning—you always put, "Don't rely on anything anybody tells you, just what I said in my writing." That I think has killed 90% of that.

Unknown: No, he said EVEN his himself and his writing.

Unknown: Yeah, search it out and find it.

Unknown: Yes. Well, he wants people to find and make the connection themselves and not be overly dependent on the dispensation head.

DS: If you've got a rank-and-file hierarchy, how do you be one—one heart, one mind? I mean, I can understand the value of teaching to come together in one heart and one mind. But to have no poor among you with a rank-and-file...

I mean, eventually we will have a temple—I believe. Eventually, I believe people will want to bring their gifts to the temple. My expectation is when that happens and there is something that accumulates of value of that temple, that that'll be turned over to the women to distribute among the poor. I don't think men oughta touch it. I don't think men oughta be involved. I think the women oughta care for the needs of the community in the same kind of vision that the Relief Society had, where the purpose of the society was to take care of the needs of the... Essentially, the children come first. But I think as soon as you invent structure, you invent disunity and inequality.

SS: Well, and I think it would be... It probably would just be wrong not to just...

You're right, and there's really nothing new under the sun. And it is a CONSTANT battle.

Unknown: But this is a new thing. There are very few organizations I've ever seen or read about that have attempted to do something like this.

SS: Right, but the urges still exist.

Unknown: Yeah, well, we're all bad habits.

SS: Yes. Yeah. No, no, no, and to resist those is great, and you know, to the extent that you're doing it, you're doing a good job, but there's nothing new under the sun.

Unknown: For me it was a culture shock.

SS: The newness has to...

BB: Alcoholics Anonymous tried to do the same.

SS: No, it's just new creatures in Christ, the same old... We're the same old people.

BB: It's the same patterns.

SS: Same old things.

BB: I noticed, and it's funny, I...

When I was in Alcoholics Anonymous and all these other anonymous groups, I noticed they had the same issues. The reason it's called "Anonymous" wasn't because they were worried about their reputation; it was because they were worried about a strongman taking over each group. It's like it was the disposition... They'd have a spiritual experience, have a change, and then they want to come over, and then they started fighting with each other for power. And they had these same urges/same instincts within each one of them that destroyed community. And so, they actually tried not to have an unorganized, locally, everybody-had-their-own-fellowship/group. And it was all local control, no central office—and of course, eventually, they got a central office and whatever else and screwed it all up. But that's, you know, same patterns. They were trying to do what we're trying to do, and not... And they came up with twelve traditions of how to try to accomplish that. Money, power, and prestige was their the main things that diverted from their primary purpose, which was to help each other connect with God. That was the whole purpose of gathering was to help each alcoholic connect with their higher powers.

DS: We've been able to take the money out of it...

BB: Yeah.

DS: ...completely.

BB: Yeah.

DS: No one gets anything.

BB: Yeah.

DS: We're not supporting...

BB: When I was in treatment, this AA guy told me... He had the spirit with him, and I was like, "How can he have the spirit with him? He's like a general authority." And I asked him, "So you used to be Mormon?" And he's like, "Well, yeah." But I said, "Well, why aren't you Mormon now?" He pointed to this one tradition: money, power, and prestige. He said, "The Mormons are all screwed up because of this. The Book of Mormon's true. Joseph was a prophet. They screwed up," and it blew my mind 20 years ago. I was like, "Wow, that can't be true." But yeah, it was true. So, anyway...

Unknown: But to Stephanie's other point, because it... And it ties on what you said. I think, I know for myself, some things that I've wrestled with...

Unknown: Talk louder, please.

Unknown: Talk louder.

Unknown: ...some things that I've wrestled with for years, one day an inspiration came to me about how to deal with it. And it's not anything I'd ever thought of before. And it's like, okay, how do I build that into a habit, 'cuz it's such... It happens, mentally, so fast, and yet I... It was the right thing to do. And as I've done it, a broken little piece of me now works much better than it used to be. And I think probably all of us have had those kinds of experiences where the Spirit has whispered something—it's almost like microcode—something deep down inside that if you just change this or just attempt to do things differently than you've been doing it like this (in your thinking or in your acting), and it shifts, and it made me a better person. And I think that is that inner thing that Stephanie is talking about. And if we're all doing some of that, then I think that we're rising and ascending and being more palatable and more tolerable to God and to our spouses and friends than we have been in the past. And so, I think in Joseph's time, they were always having external pressure, and external pressure definitely focuses you and causes you to call upon God. And it always worried me that we're gonna HAVE to...

DS: My ride is leaving.

Hey, I enjoyed coming and being here and seeing all you and hearing the talks. You know, Whitney, yours (in the prior conference) and this one go together. People really need to hear that. One of the gravest problems that the LDS community has is reconciling their polygamous history with virtue and goodness and honesty. I mean, the whole of Mormonism in the LDS format is predicated on the idea that you can lie—you can lie under oath, and you can do it for God. And I I don't believe you can do that.

Unknown: ...[indecipherable] same stuff every day; same stuff, different day. It's... We never get out of that. It's like you know, like so she's saying, if we're gonna repeat ourselves or whatever, you know. Same stuff, different day. Same stuff, different day. And you do repeat, and you go right back where, you know... So we have to...

DS: I think the value of honesty and the loss of honesty from the polygamous comings and goings... Even the Manifesto was a damned lie. They didn't stop practicing polygamy until a later letter from Joseph F. Smith finally discontinuing it.

Unknown: In 1897?

DS: When they finally excommunicated two members of the Quorum of the Twelve for practicing plural marriage, their excommunication was not based on the Manifesto. It was based on the letter from Joseph F. Smith discontinuing it. And he did that because of what happened back in Washington. I mean, he was accused under oath of hiding the practice.

(It was the 1905 letter that he wrote.)

Unknown: Oh.

DS: Yeah, so from 1890 'til 1905—for 15 years, a decade and a half—the church was lying again. They called it: Beating the devil at his own game. "The devil's a liar; we'll beat him at his game; we'll lie, too." You can't do that! You can't even play that game. If you do, you know, you ARE the devil. You just are.

Unknown: Safe travels, guys.

Unknown: Thank you.

MF: In D&C 76, it starts listing the end. It starts with lying, and it ends with lying. So lying is in there twice.

WH: So, I have a thought on that question. I felt really strongly that that needed to be the theme of this talk: false spirits. And I felt very strongly it needed to be said for this group, not just people here, but anybody who will listen to it.

So we may have done away with hierarchy. Yay. We're not gonna struggle with aspiring to a calling.

We may have done away with money. Yay. We're not gonna have those issues.

We have not dealt with WHY we have those issues, no matter what organization we belong to.

So when I stand before the judgment bar of God and He says to me, "How did you overcome your aspiring?" and I say, "Oh, I went, and I got involved in a group that didn't have a hierarchy." And He's gonna say, "Well, couldn't you have overcome it when you weren't involved in a group?" Like, how hard is that to overcome it if I'm in a group that doesn't even give that to me as an issue? Right?

So it all goes back to: We do have jarrings; we do have contention; we do have envy; we do have strife; and we do have lustful and covetous desires in each one of us. So it takes... What Stephanie was trying to get to was it takes a lot of self awareness, and that's what Paul's mentioning when he sat and self-reflected and asked God to help him with something. So, the...

I have never had a prayer answered more quickly in my life than when I kneel down and say, "What's wrong with me?" And it's immediate. It's like immediate, right? God's like, "Well finally! Hey, you need to work on this."

So yes, we have those things among us. Yes, we listen to false spirits. They are at work whenever God begins a work. And it's in our Glossary of Terms. (Anything smart I had to say today comes almost exclusively from the Glossary of Terms. So if you read my paper and all the footnotes, you're gonna realize I really just quoted Denver without saying, "Denver said.") So yes, we have all those, and we've got to... What will make us different than the thousands of years of history before us—because God tries to save His children as often as He can—what will make us different is if we can overcome pride and arrogance enough to really honestly self-reflect and ask and compare take the time to say, "We have got so many diversions today that are diversions." That is a false spirit.

So we may have woken up to the false tradition of our fathers. Yay for us. Are we really any better? Am I really a better person? Am I really anymore able to be successful in a community called Zion? Or am I just dragging with me a lot of social and personality and characteristics that are gonna, like, cause it to fail? So for me, writing this talk was a opportunity to self-reflect and really ask myself... I don't ever like to give talks where I think I have it all figured out. I much prefer to give a talk that is for me. And if anybody else benefits, that's awesome.

So I know I have had enemies. I know things have happened in this movement that have made me feel left out and my feelings hurt. That is a symptom of envy. I know that I have been contentious. I know that I have had jarrings with people. And for those things, I have been really ashamed when I have stopped and really looked in the mirror. So I'm here to say that I know I still am influenced by false spirits. I sure hope nobody else is. And I love being around a lot of you because you're so inspiring to me.

But I do think that Stephanie, her mission... If you guys haven't started listening to her podcast, you really need to. It is free therapy every week, but it is so much deeper than that because she is mindfully (and with the Spirit) teaching us what we skills and techniques and things we can do so that we can hopefully become people that our neighbors won't want to kick out.

BB: See, and that's where...

TL: Amen.

BB: Amen. What we just did, too, was... We talked about this pattern in the "Civilization," in the Grand Junction conference years ago: confession. We don't confess in particular sins; we confess our character issues, our struggles, our "I gossip too much," "I don't pay attention to what I should with my kids," "I'm worried too much about what other people think"— that's being willing to... You take away the power of the accuser when you acknowledge your own weakness, you know. And we don't know how to do that, because we get too graphic, and "Oh my gosh, I don't want to hear that," you know, or we, yeah, we confess stuff that's like just surface, and we're doing it because to be heard. So anyway...

But the wisdom thing. So, today we had tons of knowledge. Tomorrow, we need wisdom how to apply, how to go/where do we go from now? You know, it's like that's what we lack. In Aravada, Denver... The first part of the talk was knowledge; the second part was the wisdom talk. So we lack wisdom—how to apply, how to live with each other, and how to interact.

So tomorrow... The whole program got blown up. It's like... Or it's probably getting blown up. And so I would invite everybody coming tomorrow... We're gonna have the sacrament. But as far as the rest of the program, it may be under flux. We know Denver's not gonna be there. The later program that Laura and I were thinking of doing, the intent was to have all of us learn from each other. "What did we learn? What has the Lord taught us about?" Trusting and "Hearing and Trusting the Lord in the Storm." We were gonna have a discussion because we wanted everybody to have a chance to, if they wanted, you know... How do we learn to talk succinctly like I'm doin'... I'm not doing it good right now. But how can we get to the point and share the light that the Lord gives us and stop talking? So anyway...

So tomorrow I invite everybody to come and pray for us as not just as the committee but that we, as a people, can know what to do tomorrow to bring the most spirit into us personally. And... 'Cuz I walked away today being convinced I needed to change. I was taking the same inventory. I looked around... I saw relationships I haven't always... I felt to repent after hearing today's talk.. So anyway, so I invite you guys to come tomorrow, knowing that we're needing inspiration how to fill these things, what to change, whatever, and I think you're all a part of it. Everybody here is a part of it, whether it's... Whatever you feel led to do. So anyway, thank you.

Unknown: Thank you, Brian.

CS: Hey, what's Stephanie's podcast?

WH: It's called "In Sanity, A piece of mind."

And if you understand—I mean, like, since they're gone, I can speak a little more openly —like honestly, my question is if the Lord wants to speak tomorrow, why didn't He change the flight to Monday instead of tomorrow? I mean, why is His mouthpiece gone? Just sayin', like, I don't know. It makes me a little nervous.

Unknown: Relying on him too much.

WH: No, see, we have that... We have the misunderstanding of what that of what Joseph meant. He was talking... When he gave that statement, "You're relying on the Prophet too much," he was saying it to the women who were giving in to the seductions of Brigham and Heber and John C. Bennett because they would say, "Well, Joseph said it's okay."

"Oh, okay. Joseph said it's okay. All right, I can have sex with you, and we're not married."

And then he took the women out and he said, "Learn the commandments, and learn to think for yourself." Joseph does such a good job being humble and meek and letting the men, in particular... Brigham got into trouble because Brigham thought he was better and smarter and more awesome than Joseph. You don't get that way if you have a guy who's always a strongman. So we got to be really careful that we balance that—because the problem the Saints really had was a whole lot of men who thought they knew better than Joseph. And so, once they let that arrogance and pride start... Like even Oliver Cowdery—his issue with "I want to translate with you because I'm smarter than you, and I have an education," it wasn't because he wanted to serve the Lord. It's because he thought he was better than Joseph and could do a better job.

TL: And then the Whitmer brothers thought that they could replace Joseph, and they were the next in line...

WH: Yeah, yeah.

TL: ...because they could do a better job than he was doing. But I agree. I mean, Denver does speak for the Lord, and...

WH: So that's my first thought, and I'm nervous. So we will definitely be praying.

And then my other thought is if you understand Stephanie's role, if you understand what a son of God or an exalted man has an elect lady with him (and she's he's knowledge, and she's wisdom), then that is why I suggest we listen to her podcast—because she is acting in her role to help us learn a lot of stuff to heal from the scars. I mean, like the Answer to Prayer for Covenant talks about, we've all been scarred. We have. We've all had difficult things in our lives (sans the church) just being children and people and whatever. Like, we've... A lot of people have suffered some really horrific things. And so, I think a lot of healing needs to happen...

TL: Yeah, dealing with trauma, boundaries, communication skills, letting go of the passive- aggressive tendencies, I mean, she covered so much stuff.

WH: Oh yeah, she is just, like, amazing. Yeah, yeah. So, for sure, I would listen to that. And try to actually become that. That's harder. Listening is a little easier. It's actually the implementing, right?

MF: Are all of them, like... The older ones? You can hear the older ones?

WH: Mmhmm.

MF: Okay.

WH: She's been going for about a year, so I think she has...

TL: Yeah, over a year.

WH: ...I don't know how many shows. She does...

TL: One a week, every Monday, she has a new podcast.

CS: "61" is what I saw when I looked it up.

Unknown: What's her podcast on?

WH: So, she's a clinical psychologist...

AL: What platform?

Unknown: That was a poor question, let me rephrase. Where is it? Where is the stream at?

TL: Like if you have an Apple, you can go to the podcast app.

Unknown: If you don't...

Unknown: Perhaps Spotify?

TL: Spotify, Google Podcasts...

WH: "In Sanity, A piece of mind"

[crosstalk]

Unknown: I just asked her where would be a good place to start some of this. That was kind of... I felt like there was a lot. And she wrote down a few websites for me to go to. I could share them.

WH: Yeah, that would be great.

Unknown: They weren't necessarily her stuff, but they were some other stuff that she says would be a good place to start. So I mean, I don't know if anybody would like me to share that with you...

WH: I think that would be great, like, maybe they could put together a resource page for their conference website page. That would be awesome.

Unknown: I can put that down if you guys want.

WH: I mean, we're all broken, right?.

Unknown: I've been wondering the same stuff.

TL: She's very talented.

WH: She is. She can drill into an issue really fast.

BB: It seems like she brought up... We spend a lot of time on all this history stuff, it was like, I'm more interested in how do we learn today how to deal with each other and how to deal with these pragmatic things because her podcasts are not like deep doctrine. It's pragmatic stuff about how to deal with each other.

TL: It's living here in this Telesial world and all the baggage we've gotten and how we just don't know how to have relationships or deal with our own trauma or anything like that. We all need help with that.

BB: Here's an exercise. Think of the person... Think of one person that you can't stand right now. And it's about you. Okay, it's like, whoever that is, you're that person. There's something about you that you cannot accept in yourself, and it's... But you can see it in them; it's easy. But turn that mirror around, and why does that bother you about them? That's one way...

TL: So, I used to have a really hard time wanting to ever get counseling or hear from someone all of these earthly techniques to fix myself. I'm like, the Lord can just fix it all. And I was very much in that mindset until just recently. I've dealt with a chronic illness for a long time, and I've just been finally open to anything that might help me get better. And I realized, okay, I have some trauma stored in my body that I need to release so I can heal physically. And I've cried out to the Lord. And He's directed me to some people who can help me, and so I feel like He is absolutely involved in the whole process. But some of these human angels have been able to help, too. So...

RL: Robert, what did you want to ask?

Robert Hone: Well, I remember at one point in time, Stephanie was talking on her podcast about a values-based activity that they'd done in their family. I don't know if any of you listened to that particular podcast. I think it was on the new year or something like that. I'm kind of curious what that was. I wanted to ask them that before she left. I don't know if anybody has talked to them extensively enough to know what that was? And I guess my second thing was...

RL: Can you speak up a little bit, Robert? We can't hear you.

RH: Sorry, it's a problem I have. I have to be a lot louder than I think I am. And so, the other question was, like, I think a lot of my sources of conflict usually come with that cognitive dissonance of, "Okay, there's this commandment over here, and there's this one over here. And in this particular situation, which one takes precedence?" Right? So like, she talks about being direct and talking to people about commandments that they're breaking and things like that but and how to confront these situations. And sometimes I run into issues dealing with those because there's other commandments that kind of seem to conflict, like: How do you approach a situation without being contentious, while at the same time saying, "Hey look, this is a bad direction for you to go." Does that make sense? Am I like off on tangents?

CS: No, like how do you confront them without... But we're also commanded to be persuasive...

RH: Right.

CS: ...and long-suffering. And so, it's like how do you approach someone in both confrontation (which is seen as aggression) but also in a place of love for them that they just don't ball up and get defensive about? How can you deliver that message without walls just shooting up?

RH: Yeah. Yeah. So, I don't know. Those are just some things that I've run into that I'm not particularly good at. I became an engineer for a reason. It wasn't because I'm a people person.

Yeah, so those are the two things that kind of came up when Stephanie was talking.

2022.04.03 Easter Fireside
"Stand Independent" Fireside Series
Denver and Stephanie Snuffer
April 3, 2022

Denver Snuffer: ...I had just turned 12 at the start of the month, and...

Three out of four of my grandparents had died before I was born. The only living grandparent that I had when I was born was still around when I was 12. And she wouldn't die for many years.

I had not seen or heard of anyone in my family or in my immediate circle of friends who died. The only real death that had intruded into my awareness was President John Kennedy, and that seemed fabulously theatrical, distant, and more like theater than reality. But in August of 1965, we moved from elementary schools to the junior high school; there were East Elementary (where I went to school), and there was North Elementary, and there was West Elementary. And there were kids in the town that (and the surrounding area) that you never met, because if they didn't go to your elementary school, you wouldn't cross their paths. But when they combined into the junior high school, kids from all over came. And there was one kid in particular that I became pretty good friends with in fairly short order. Among other things, we shared a study hall, and he was an absolute cut-up. He was capable of extraordinarily effective mischief. He knew how to make a pencil stick to the ceiling of the study hall. And he knew how to time things when the teacher's back was turned. And he and I became really quite good friends for as short a time period as we had from August 'til October. I think I liked him more than anyone else that was in my immediate circle of friends.

And on Friday, September 29th, all the buses lined up; this kid lived way out of town in a little place called Bruneau. He was bused in from Bruneau so he had a long bus ride to get home. And as he was getting ready to get on the buses, I was hanging out with them until the buses were to depart. My last words to him (which were intended to be funny) was, "Don't go and get yourself killed this weekend." And so my buddy, Waldo—Waldo Shetler—got on the bus and took off.

On Saturday, he was killed. And on Monday, we heard the story that down in Bruneau, he was riding his bike, and a hay truck hit him and killed him. That was the first time that death entered into my consciousness. And I don't recall at that moment being as sad as I was shocked, surprised, troubled, trying to figure out what this new reality meant. But because Waldo Shetler was the first person in my life who died, the first person of any proximity, I've thought about him every time death gets close again.

I've known a few people who were resigned to dying—they were in hospice; they had a terminal illness; they had a terminal problem that they knew they were not going to survive. And I've told quite a number of people in that position, "Hey, when you get to the other side, will you let Waldo Shetler know his buddy Denver still remembers him and thinks about him? And someday I'll come look him up personally, but you tell him I said hello." So I don't know how many messages Waldo's received over the years since he died. He was about seven months older than me, and he turned 12 much earlier in the school... Well, actually, he turned 12 before the school year began. But he's buried in Bruneau at the Bruneau Cemetery. And I've never made it back there to visit the grave of Waldo, but I think I'd like to do that—because what he represents in my consciousness is the introduction of death into this life, awareness of it at a personal level.

Well, Easter's coming up on Sunday the 17th of this month. And when Steve asked us to talk, one of the things that came first in the conversation was we oughta talk about Easter, say something about Easter, so that it doesn't come and go without notice. There's a passage—it's early in the Book of Mormon; in our Scriptures, it's Second Nephi chapter 11, verse 8—where, recording about their religion and how they practiced it, they write, We talk of Christ, we rejoice in Christ, we preach of Christ, we prophesy of Christ, and we write according to our prophecies that our children may know to what source they may look for the remission of their sins.

You know, if you're talking, and you're rejoicing, and you're preaching, and you're prophesying... For those who are living, the remission of sins is the great thing that we can experience and long to have and want to receive an inheritance of. But in the bigger picture, it's the resurrection on Easter morning that is the great triumph because it breaks that enemy that God introduced at the time of the fall that will ultimately cost every one of us our lives. John's prophecy about the judgment and the end of times (when we finally get down to the very end) reflects this. He writes this in Revelation chapter 8, verse 8: And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away. "Wipe away all [the] tears from their eyes...there shall be no more death." I mean, death has taken quite a number of people; in fact, of late, it's taken a number of people that I know and have been friends with, and I'm sorry to see them part. And the first great thing that gets wiped away is death—and then our sorrows and our crying and our pain. But that loss of life—that ending that cuts off your association for a temporary time—always leaves us, I think, in a position of thinking back about losses and of our own death—because it's inevitable; it's coming; it's unavoidable; and in some respects, depending upon the condition that you wind up in, it's a release (and a welcome one at that).

Well, Christ's accomplishment, His great achievement, began in Gethsemane and culminated with the resurrection. What I find interesting is that when the Lord has taken the time to talk about His experience, what He talks about is not the experience on the cross, and He doesn't talk about the crucifixion. When He spoke (in modern revelation) about what it was that He had accomplished, the place where He goes to is Gethsemane.

In the T&C (T&C 1—it's the Joseph Smith History) in Joseph Smith History 17, at paragraph 5, he says, Repent, lest I smite you by the rod of my mouth, and by my wrath, and by my anger that your sufferings be sore.

What I find interesting is that the way in which He's going to smite us, He defines as by "the rod of my mouth," meaning that the words He speaks are what will cause us this pain and the suffering.

Your sufferings be sore, how sore you know not, how exquisite you know not, yea, how hard to bear you know not. For behold, I God, have suffered these things for all that they might not suffer if they would repent. But if they would not repent, they must suffer even as I, which suffering caused myself even God, the greatest of all, to tremble because of pain and to bleed at every pore and to suffer both body and spirit, and would that I might not drink the bitter cup and shrink. Nevertheless, glory be to the Father and I partook, and finished my preparations unto the children of man. Wherefore I command you again to repent, lest I humble you by my almighty power, and that you confess your sins, lest you suffer these punishments of which I have spoken, which in the smallest, yea, even in the least degree, you've tasted, at the time I withdrew my spirit.

See, the place in which He suffered body and spirit and would that He "might not drink the bitter cup and shrink" was in the garden. And so, He doesn't mention the crucifixion; He focuses upon the suffering that went on in Gethsemane—which also was covered, yet again, in the revelations that have come in this continuance of the Restoration, and that's in T&C section 161, which starts out describing:

...a view of the Lord kneeling in prayer...in a dark place. The air was heavy and overcast with [shadow]. The man beheld the Lord praying in Gethsemene on the night of His betrayal and before His crucifixion.

All the Lord had previously done in His mortal ministry by healing the sick, raising the dead, giving sight to the blind, restoring hearing to the deaf, curing the leper, and ministering relief to others as he taught was but a prelude to what the Lord was now to do on this dark, oppressive night. (T&C 161:1-2)

And then it describes how the Lord, in prayer, began vicariously suffering. And He goes through these waves of torment, which was the Lord kneeling in prayer, exposed to the guilt, the shame, the recriminations, the difficulties, the pains of both offending God and your fellow man AND being offended by your fellow man, and the torment of the mind and the spirit and the soul in trying to overcome and reconcile yourself back into the presence of God the Father; shedding all of what you feel when you are smitten by the rod of the mouth of that pure being who is God the Father, and the recognition that you are out of adjustment/you are out of sync with the Almighty; you are not good and pure and holy, and you are in the presence of a good and a just and a Holy Being.

The Gospel reflects that an angel came strengthening Him—which is not altogether an accurate description of what went on. He... The Father's presence never left the Son throughout all His sufferings. And indeed, part of the Son's sufferings was caused by the necessity to reconcile peacefully His experience of this unclean, unworthy state (with the feelings of shame and guilt that are caused by not being reconciled with God), and then overcoming that and being able to reconcile Himself again with the Father and coming to a place of peace and harmony and at-one-ness with the Father that this awful experience had disrupted. It shattered the harmony that existed between the Father and the Son that had existed throughout His entire ministry, and it put the Son into the same position as the worst of the sinners who had jarringly disassociated themselves unworthily with the Father. And now here He is—feeling all of that—but being in the presence of the Father, as if He were advanced to the moment of the final judgment and coming before the bar of a perfect and pure God—but doing so unprepared, unworthy, unreconciled, unrepentant, and filled with guilt and shame. And all of that was put upon Him so that He could reconcile Himself to the Father, reconcile Himself and overcome the feelings of guilt and remorse of sin.

The Lord is ever willing to forgive us. But once we are forgiven, then the obligation is imposed upon us to forsake our sins and then go on as worthy as we would be had we not sinned in the first place. We have to leave that behind us. He readily forgives. But once forgiven, we're supposed to not only confess but to forsake our sins. And the forsaking of the sin and the leaving of the temptation behind becomes an enormous challenge for us—and it was the challenge that He faced in Gethsemane. And it's the place He goes to—now that He's gotten through the entirety of this Atonement, and He's worked it all through. He doesn't go to the cross; He doesn't go to somewhere else. He goes to this moment—this profound, jarring disassociation that existed between Him and the Father that He had to find a way to overcome and to reconcile in order to be, once again, in harmony with Him—and He facilitates our ability to do exactly the same thing by taking upon Him (vicariously, through that suffering/through that price that He paid) the ownership and forgiveness for everything so that He can forgive.

But forgiving is the limit of what He can do. He can't make us better. He finished His preparations. And then, having finished His preparations, He says, "Therefore I command you to repent. I don't want you to go through what I went through. I'll forgive you, but I command you: Repent, confess them, forsake them, leave them behind you, and become something bigger, better, more reconciled to God through the love that you ought to have in your heart," for the fact that He has been willing to re-accept you, He has been willing to comfort you, take you in and embrace you as a member of His family, able to stand clean before Him because you've abandoned what it was that separated you.

If you read through that section 161 material (which I'm not going to do; I've done it just recently, reading an excerpt in one of the conferences recently), you'll find that the Lord overcame the separation that drove Him away from the presence of the Father—because of guilt and because of shame, because of this intense feeling of unworthy betrayal—He overcomes that through love. He overcomes that through finding His way back to the harmony that preceded all of this. So, I'm not gonna read 161 any further, but I would commend it to you.

What I find interesting is that we have discussions that brush up against what the Lord had done (in Alma and in Isaiah and other places) that talk about how He goes through what He went through in order to understand and gain the knowledge necessary in order to succor us and to reconcile us. So, He's not coming to minister as the forgiving Savior, ignorant of what it takes in order to overcome sin. He comes fully understanding the nature of what it is that makes us recoil from the presence of God. He gets it. He's been there. He's been through that. And when He looks upon us, He can look upon us with compassion and understanding because by His knowledge, He can justify us by leading us from this state of disharmony (and this state of opposition, shame, and guilt) back into a state of cleanliness and the feeling of reconciliation with God.

So, as we approach the Easter season, it all begins after He has implemented the sacrament, and He's gone up to Gethsemane, and He's gone through this experience. He then gets arrested in the garden, and the incident gets described, perhaps most interestingly and most revealingly, in John's account:

They come. They're armed. They have spears. They have their armed people ready to inflict violence should the necessity present itself. And Christ asks them whom they seek? And they tell him that they're looking for this Jesus. And He says, "I am He." And the account is that they stumbled backwards and fell down. It's almost a comic moment in the account because here you have a personage who is unarmed and subject to arrest, and people with both the authority to come and take and arrest Him and the arms with which to accomplish it even if He should oppose them. And He identifies Himself as the one they come... "I am He," and they step back on one another's feet and trip and fall backwards. That little moment right there tells you something. Our Lord, after having gone through what He went/engaged in what He suffered was so intimidating a presence that it made the men who came to arrest Him cower in His presence. They were physically intimidated by what it was that His countenance portrayed. (That countenance would be one of the reasons why, once they'd subdued Him, they took some delight in abusing Him.) It's...

It really hearkens back to an analogous, earlier circumstance when there was a messianic (semi-messianic) figure in the form of Samson, who the Philistines could never defeat. He crushed them; he killed them; he subjected them; he defeated them; he alone... I mean, "heaps upon heaps with the jawbone of an ass, I've killed a thousand." He was able to overcome them. But when they finally got him to break the last thread of the covenant that he had been strengthened by (and not until he had broken the last thread of the Nazarite Covenant by allowing the secret out and the hair to be cut) and they took him prisoner was he finally defeated. And what did they do? I mean, they took great delight in doing to this clearly superior individual the kinds of things that humiliate him to make them feel better about the crushing defeats he had administered to them over time. They blinded him. They tied him to a millstone. They drove him like a dumb ass. They mocked him. They spit at him. They did all they could. But they made the mistake of allowing the hair to grow out and for him, in his penitent state, to draw upon the covenantal status that had put him in that position at the beginning. And one of his last acts was then to bring down the temple that they brought him to (to mock him) by pulling down the main support beams and crushing them.

Well, that vengeance, that fury, that desire to abuse—to take what is clearly the superior and to subject him to the inferior—was what, after the surrender, the Lord was put through for some period of time, and then he was lashed, and then he was presented, after having been sufficiently humiliated, as one of two candidates for release. But they said, "Give us Barabbas, the other one who claims to be the son of God. Give us [indecipherable]; give us the scapegoat, and let's kill the other one." And so, once again, the ceremonies under the Law of Moses come back to reflect the reality of the end of what the Lord was going to be put through.

There are prophecies about what He would endure. There are descriptions that are given of what He went through and why. But when we finally get to the point that He's about to surrender His life, we get one of the most extensive and remarkable prophecies in all of Scripture in the 22nd Psalm, which the Lord (after all He had been through while still alive) began to sing while He was on the cross:

My God, [my God,] why have you forsaken me? My God, hear the words of my roaring. You are far from helping me. Oh my God, I cry in the daytime, but you answer not, and in the night season, [am I] not silent. But you are holy that inhabit the Heavens. You are worthy of the praises of Israel. Our fathers trusted in you. They trusted and you did deliver them. They cried unto you and were delivered. They trusted in you and were not confounded.

But I am a worm, and loved of no man, a reproach of man and despised of the people. All they that see me laugh me to scorn. They shoot out the lip, they shake the head, saying, He trusted on the Lord, that he would deliver him; let him deliver him, seeing [that] he delighted in him.

But you are he that took me out of the womb. You did make me hope when I was upon my mother's breasts. I was cast upon you from the womb. You were my God from my mother's breasts.

Be not far from me — for trouble is near — for there is none to help. ...They gaped upon me with their mouths like a ravening and roaring lion. I am poured out like water and all my bones are out of joint. My heart is like wax, it is melted in the midst of my inward parts. My strength is dried up like a potsherd, my tongue cleaves to my jaws, and you have brought me into the dust of death. For dogs...encompassed me, the assembly of the wicked have enclosed me. They pierced my hands and my feet. I may tally all my bones. They look and stare upon me. They part my garments among them and cast lots upon my vesture. ...be not far from me, O Lord. O my strength, hasten to help me. Deliver my soul from the sword.

...I will declare your name unto [the] brethren. In the midst of the congregation will I praise you. You that fear the Lord, praise him; all you, the seed of Jacob, glorify him; and fear him, all you, the seed of Israel. For he is not [departed] nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted. Neither has he hidden his face from him, but when he cried unto him, he heard. My praise shall be of you in the great congregation. I will pay my vows before them that fear him. (Psalms 22:1-5 RE)

...and so on. This is the hymn that the Lord went to in the final moments of the last breaths that He was able to take on the cross. And then, having achieved exactly what He intended to achieve and reaffirming that what He was going through was, indeed, exactly what needed to be accomplished in order to fulfill the purposes of God, He then announced with a loud voice (some of the Gospel writers say He shouted with a loud voice), and then He gave up the ghost. But one of the Gospel writers tells us what it was He shouted, and it was, "It is finished!" which was a shout of triumph, not of defeat. And so, He sings a psalm that tells everyone exactly what is going on is what the Messiah was expected to go through, and then He shouts out a triumph call, and He gives up the ghost.

Those that were there on that day, looking upon the scene... First of all, if you understood the words of the psalm, if you've memorized the words of the hymn (which most Jews would have done), would know that He was confronting their rejection of Him as the Messiah right up to the very end. And those that heard Him shout out the victory and give up the ghost would have undoubtedly wondered, "How is it? How is this possible? How was that a triumph?" What was it that He was achieving in the moment that He ends the life here and moves on to whatever it is that comes next—some of them thinking that is nothing, and some of them thinking that is Elysian Fields, and some of them thinking that's just a slumber that will await later resurrection. But whatever it was, the Lord (in the minds of those that heard) was announcing His triumph, that He was moving on there.

And we have other news from other sources—including Peter's Epistles where he talks about the Lord then going into the world of spirits to declare a message among the dead —about the possibility now of changing their lot and improving their condition. And He spent (as they reconcile time, according to the Jews in that day) three days and three nights in the tomb. And then on the first day of the week as it was then reckoned—it was actually the seventh day, but we were off by a day ever since the fall of Adam because the day of rest was disrupted by the fall—but on the first day of the week according to what they reckoned at that point (the actual intended day of rest according to the creation that was disrupted by the fall), the Lord came forth out of the tomb and was resurrected while it was still dark. We have an account of that also in that section 161 about how once He had come out of the grave...

When I saw His resurrection, I was surprised to see it was still dark. When Mary realized it was Jesus, she embraced Him joyfully. She did not timidly reach out her hand, but she readily greeted Him with open arms, and He, in turn, embraced her. It is difficult to describe what I saw of the incident, apart from saying the Lord was triumphant, exultant, overjoyed at His return from the grave! She shared His joy. I was shown the scene and do not have words to adequately communicate how complete the feelings of joy and gratitude were which were felt by our Lord [on] that morning. As dark and terrible were the sufferings through which He passed, the magnitude of which is impossible for man to put into words, these feelings of triumph were, on the other hand, of equal magnitude in their joy and gratitude. I do not think it possible for a mortal to feel the fullness of either. And, having felt some of what He shares with His witnesses, I know words are inadequate to capture His feelings on the morning of His resurrection. He had the deep satisfaction of having accomplished the most difficult assignment given by the Father, knowing it was a benefit to all of His Father's children, and it had been done perfectly.

Mary and Christ embraced. There was nothing timid about the warm encounter she had with Him. Then He said to her, "Hold me not" because he had to ascend, return and report to His Father. (T&C 161:29-30)

...and so on. You really don't get Easter and understand what Easter represents until we have begun in Gethsemane and ended at the resurrection and the joy that was experienced there. It's as if the Atonement takes the scale of negativity and the scale of positivity and it drives the needle as far down as it is possible to drive the needle down to one extremity at the end of the worst, most awful, most dreadful possibility that exists in the entire universe—and then takes that same needle and drives it on the scale upward to the point that it exceeds joy so great that when men are exposed to a little of it, they are overcome, and their physical body faints from the exultation of what it was that the Lord experienced.

Easter represents all of that. Easter represents the great and the dreadful, the magnificent and the awful, the most terrible, the most wonderful; it represents it all. And our Lord—after having gone through all of that—continues to bear testimony to us in the Restoration Scriptures to say, "Here's, now, what I've done. I've accomplished all my preparations, and I've made it possible now for you."

I command you to repent — repent, lest I smite you by the rod of my mouth, and by my wrath, and by my anger, and your sufferings be sore — how sore you know not, how exquisite you know not, yea, how hard to bear you know not. For behold, I, God, have suffered these things for all, that they might not suffer if they would repent; But if they would not repent they must suffer even as I; which suffering caused myself, even God, the greatest of all, to tremble because of pain, ...to bleed at every pore, and to suffer both body and spirit — and would that I might not drink the bitter cup, and shrink — Nevertheless, glory be to the Father, and I partook and finished my preparations unto the children of men. (JSH 17:5, emphasis added)

That's all He could do. That's all He has done. That's the great accomplishment that He has obtained for us. He finished His preparations unto the children of men; it's all been prepared. So now that it's all been prepared and He's told us, I've given you... It's all ready to go. Wherefore, now—as a result of this preparation, as a consequence of everything I just told you:

Wherefore, I command you again to repent lest I humble you by my almighty power, and that you confess your sins, lest you suffer these punishments of which I have spoken. (Ibid.)

See, He wants us to be freed from the valley of the shadow of death through which we will pass. And He promises us that no matter how bitter death may be, He's gonna wipe away every tear, and He's gonna defeat the grave. But that can't make us individually worthy. The only way that we can become individually worthy is if we do as He instructs us to do, acknowledge our own many shortcomings, and then turn around to face God and leave behind us all the things that are unworthy, unacceptable, disobedient; all of our jarrings; all of our contentions; all of our pride; all of our efforts to raise ourselves at the expense of others; all of our ambition, our desire for control and compulsion and dominion, our desire to be profiting at the expense of others. In many respects, it requires Zion for us to fully repent, and yet Zion requires us to be something very different than what we are because we don't treat one another the way that equality imposes upon us. We do cheer against one another and look to get ahead and then to leave others behind. We do falsely assume ourselves to be something bigger and greater and more holy than we are when, in fact, if we are serviceable to the Lord and we're able to move something along in His era and it turns out to be something great, that isn't us. We don't have anything of which to boast. None of us ever have; none of us ever will—no matter how great a thing the Lord may cause to happen through the service that He asks you to provide. In the end, you probably don't do as good a job of doing what He's commanded as He could do it Himself. And yet, if it's serviceable, and it works, and it accomplishes something good, then the gratitude and the praise and the rejoicing of all that belongs to God, not to us. I think we've accomplished many, many remarkable, wonderful things. But that's not us. We've been led along by a merciful, kind, guiding light that has made the task doable by the light that He has provided to us, and we have nothing of which to boast for ourselves.

In the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

(I took my half, and now it's your half.)

Stephanie Snuffer: Okay, I am gonna take the same topic and just go a little different direction, and I should probably be brief.

I have the opportunity to spend a lot of time trying to figure out how and why people operate the way they do in the world and with each other and in relationships with each other. And I can consume a lot of information that gives a lot of different perspective. And what that does is sometimes it just confuses, and sometimes the stuff aligns, and sometimes it overlaps. And sometimes it just leaves me still pondering.

But in light of Easter coming and in light of... It's not really even Easter-related, for me; it's just been application-related. And that is the Atonement. So without belaboring the Scriptures or how the Atonement is described or explained in the Scriptures, I'm gonna leave that all to you. And you can go back and read different things and engage in that however you want to.

But the fact of the matter is that there were Heavenly Parents who sacrificed their Son so that He could come down here and take on all of those burdens. And if you read the account in T&C 1 and if you read the account in T&C 161, it's a monumental endeavor that is designed for application and use in this world by us. So, if you look around today (turn the news on; don't turn the news on), you're probably pretty aware there's some horrible things happening around the world, and they're being done to people by people, which is easy to ignore if you just stand back and say, "Oh, that's what's going on." If you engage in those thoughts for any length of time, it is almost paralyzing to believe that human beings can behave this way to and against and with other human beings.

And I would suggest that the worst atrocities that you can conceive of (as you observe what is going on in this world) started with somebody having a thought: one thought, and then more thoughts, and then (potentially) conversations, and then behaviors. The dictators of the world do not get there at birth. They don't... They're not born that way. So my thought is that, as human beings, we need to tend to our thoughts because our thoughts become our words, and our words become our actions. And I can't think of a single day in the last six months that I probably haven't had a thought that resulted in a behavior or a word or an action that did not offend or hurt somebody I care about—because I'm just weak. We're weak. We're down here in our humanity, and we are fallen beings, and we make these kinds of mistakes every day. And I would suggest that the Atonement is or should be more activated in people's lives at the very basic of our interactions.

So when you read in T&C 1 about Christ's words being what condemns you, then your interactions with other people... When you have negative interactions with someone you care about (or someone you don't care about), what you should draw on in order to control your thoughts so your thoughts don't become behaviors that turn into atrocities... I don't believe that's where we're headed, but we can commit all kinds of harm when we get defensive, when we feel compelled to justify our position, when we are hurt, when we are afraid, when somebody challenges us, when our insecurities come flaring up—and we behave badly. And sometimes we can repair that quickly, where there is "no harm, no foul." Other times we have hurt or offended to the extent that repair seems almost impossible.

I would like to suggest that the voice and the feeling that pierce us in those moments is that voice in T&C 1 that condemns us with His words—and that we don't spend much time being angry at the person who offended us, and we don't spend much time berating ourselves for the mistakes that we've made; but we let Christ, through the Atonement, correct us, chastise us, and move us forward to better interactions so that we don't ultimately create something unfit for a Zion.

Christ did all the work. T&C 161 is pretty explicit in the many horrible, horrific experiences that He went through in order to take on our sins. And I have to believe that there is something that is universally available to all mankind—regardless of culture, ethnicity, or gender—which can elevate us to the point of being in relationships that are not toxic, that are not prideful, that are not defensive or punitive or patronizing, that are not superior or inferior, but that are unified by the gift of the Atonement that has been given to all mankind, if they would but utilize in prayer and humility...and that's all.

Name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

DS: Okay, well there's one thing I want to look at real quick. [indecipherable] There they are. Okay... [chuckling] Huh. Okay, well, I've looked at the messages and don't see anything there to comment on. We said that we weren't going to answer any questions, but if someone has an interesting question they want to type into that comments board, it's eight o'clock; we could take a few minutes and do that since we do have time. Does anyone have anything that they want to type into the messages and see if we can make...

Oh, "What'd you refer to in T&C 1?"

SS: I don't know. Whatever Denver was reading...

DS: That was 17... Here, I'll find it real quick.

SS: T&C 1. 17— Joseph Smith History...

DS: 17, verse or paragraph 5.

SS: Paragraph 5. Will you read it?

DS: Oh, it's that statement about "...how hard to bear you know not. I've suffered these things for all of you that you might not suffer if you would repent. If they will not repent, you must suffer even as I, which suffering caused myself, the greatest of all, to suffer and to bleed at every pore and would that I might not partake. Nevertheless, glory be to the Father."

[reading from the comment board] Uhhh... "Confession robs the accusers, power to accuse..." Yeah, that's a good point. Wow, that went by fast but... [indecipherable]

Yeah, I don't think details on confession are necessary. I think the character flaw is really what we need to confront.

Yeah. [reading] Yeah.

SS: Okay. Try and make 'em relevant to the actual topic we're discussing 'cuz these others are just big and not gonna be answered.

DS: There are a lot of things about which... There are a lot of things that are interesting and curious but don't... They don't make us better people. Our biggest problem is that, as people, we're not what we ought to be in order to live in peace with one another.

SS: Maybe I won't answer that. I can't tell...

DS: "Speaking of your comments of what Christ did in the garden, would it be accurate to say that by descending below all things, there was a dissolution of Himself as He infused Himself into all things, thus connecting Himself to all things to enable thus to draw all things to Him, like a quantum entanglement of cosmic proportions?"

Well, that's an interesting way to put it, and I don't see anything wrong with any description that will give you an understanding that the Lord comprehended it all. He says in the book of Abraham, "I am more intelligent than they all." The reason He is more intelligent is because His experience has exposed Him to a greater variety of contradictions (as Joseph Smith put it) than the contradictions that you and I have to face. We get to face them within a limited range; He experienced them off the scale to both ends, and therefore, He did descend below it all in order to ascend above it all and to comprehend it all. And therefore, in Him is the fullness of understanding of all things. We don't come to Him with shame and embarrassment or weaknesses and He look at us and say, "Wow, I've never heard of that before" or "Ooh, you're icky." He's been there; He's done that. There is nothing about the trouble that we face that He hasn't also previously faced in a way that comprehends it.

[reading] ...are we still...

Oh, yeah, we're better than we were. We're... We ARE better than we were.

SS: Okay. Alright, the question is a personal question. The question is not an objective question to a group: "Are we still absolutely failing in our relationships with each other? Or is some time and experience allowing even small changes to take place?"

The answer: Yes—he's right. There are small changes taking place. But to ask that question to somebody else who is not YOU... I mean, if everybody attended to their own relationships and their own interactions with different people and their own experiences in communities and fellowships and could answer that question positively of themselves, then you would know. So asking an overarching question is fine, but that's for you all to decide in your own relationships and own experiences.

DS: [reading] Yeah...

SS: If it's not on topic, don't answer it.

DS: Yeah, but I want... I think it might fit in here—not directly, but sideways—and fit in in a way that will help solve a number of the issues.

I want to be clear about what I'm going to refer to as "spiritual ambition" or the desire to excel and achieve something spiritually. I learned about the concept of the Second Comforter many, many, many years before anything like that was experienced. And I sought for that blessing in prayer, in study, in petitions; I wanted to achieve that. And it never happened for over two and a half decades. It didn't happen. And I finally came to the point that I realized that it just may never happen. Maybe I was just not the right person. Maybe this was something that would happen in the last moments of my life if it happened at all. Maybe this is not the way to go about living my life.

And so, I rethought what I was doing, what the religion meant to me, what the faith meant, and I began to—instead of seeking to get more (gimme, gimme)—instead, I turned my focus otherwise and began to think about all of the great things that I HAD received, all of the wonderful things that I DID understand, all of the grace that God had shown me that had taken me from being, essentially, a rudderless young man who had no direction in life, drinking and indulging in fairly pitiful ways of wasting my time. The gospel had taken and changed me into someone that had direction, that I had the Scriptures, that they meant a lot to me—I had studied them; I had taught them; I had gained profound insight—and my attitude changed.

And over time, instead of demanding for more, I simply became content and grateful for what I had. And the more gratitude I showed to God for what it was that I had been given, the more grateful I became and the more aware I became of the fact that I had received extraordinary, great blessings from God. And I had had an angel minister to me on more than one occasion. I mean, is that not enough? Is knowing that my standing before God is consistent with obedience to His commandments not enough?

I came to the point that I became deeply and abidingly grateful, and I did not seek for more. Instead, I rejoiced in what I had—and it was sincere; it was authentic. I was a grateful soul. And if nothing ever more had come to me, I would still—right this day—be rejoicing and grateful and happy and CONTENT with what it was the Lord had given me.

I had not asked the Lord or imposed upon the Lord for some great blessing for years—many years—when the Lord came to me. He didn't come because I was pressing for it. In fact, when I pressed for it, it didn't happen. But when I became content, when I became grateful, when I began to acknowledge the goodness of God to me in my state and my standing and my station, when I was content with that and grateful, then the Lord interrupted things and changed things completely.

And so, if I were to commend one thought to people, it would be: Set aside all of your desires to control Heaven, set aside all your ambition to get God to surrender to your will, and willingly accept God's will for you, and be grateful for it—because of all people, we have more to rejoice and be grateful for than most people who have ever lived on this planet.

SS: That's a good point because there's a lot of... I don't think the word would be "ingratitude," but there is a lot of want.

DS: Yeah.

SS: And it seems like there's a lot that just should settle down and distill.

DS: Well, we've now been here long enough that I think we've taken enough people's time away from things. Thank you for inviting us. And thank those who have listened. And we'll turn the time back over to Steve and Linda.

Linda VanLeer: Thank you, Denver, and Stephanie, very much. We appreciate you taking the time to be with us and those... Both of your words. Thank you.

Again, all these are recorded and can be viewed on standindependent.com. So those who know of people who were not able to get in, let them know that they can listen to the recording.

Is there anyone who would like to volunteer for a closing prayer? (I don't know, how do you do that with them muted, hon?)

Steve VanLeer: If you'd like to volunteer, just unmute yourself, and pray for us, if you would. Let's not have an uncomfortable long lag.

Brian Bowler: I can if you want.

Dearest Father, we're so grateful for this time to gather together and to listen and to be able to ponder again the resurrection, both the Gethsemane and the ultimate victory. We pray for understanding of this, and pray that we can individually seek you and come to know you and hear your voice and trust your voice.

We pray that, also, for to be able to understand how to let things be, to be content, and to look at our own ambitions and to trust in you and your grace and your plan—as you said, to wait upon you and to trust in you. And we pray that we can have that in greater proportions, individually, and to, again, to trust this plan that you have for us. We pray for this gratitude, too, that we need and simply to, again, wait upon you.

We ask a blessing upon all the efforts, individually, and those that are striving to repent and to work on their own character and to be peaceful one with another and to hold each other precious in our hearts, that we value each other; and even when we disagree, that we can learn to peacefully disagree and to honor each other's place in their path in this life.

We love you and thank you and pray that we can keep our eyes on you and work on our own patience.

And we say these things in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

2022.05.15 Seminary Graduation Remarks - Stephanie

Stephanie Snuffer

Centerville, UT

May 15, 2022

Stephanie Snuffer: Good morning. Okay, I'm working on the assumption that you will participate. Okay, so when I stand here and expect answers, I'll just stand here till I get some answers. All right? So I'm gonna start with a couple of ideas.

I have come to my own personal conclusion through prayer/meditation/answers that the highest form of godliness on the earth is our experience in relationships and our experience in working those relationships out. Because as I try and envision what the promised blessings are in the Hereafter, I have a really hard time doing that because I'm here, and I'm pretty dang happy here. I have a pretty good life. I like my family; we work hard to be, you know, good to one another. That doesn't mean there's not a lot of crap going on, but I'm pretty dang happy here. So when I read scriptural promises of something "better," I cannot conceive of what that is because my tiny human brain is incapable of conceiving what that is.

So as I'm trying to figure this out through prayer (and whatever), I'm thinking, "Okay, it's probably..." And I feel like I got an answer, but I'll leave it all up to you—doesn't matter to me—I feel like the answer that I got was relationships and the work of relationships (okay?), which is pretty dang hard.

Okay, so, family being the first and most important relationship, which includes your intimate family and then your extended family. And then it goes out into society, community, friends, whatever, however you identify relationships is fine. But let's say the pinnacle relationship is family. All right, so being in a family is great. But that doesn't mean your family relationships are great. That does not mean your relationships with your parents are great. That doesn't mean your relationships with your siblings are great. (It doesn't mean they're not, but it doesn't mean they are.)

So I have two... I work with a couple of different family dynamics. I have one client who is part of a intact family: siblings, parents, you know, whatever. And this particular person feels like in order to get love from his family, he has to be dissatisfied with himself—okay?—because if he's satisfied with himself, then his parents are worried about him because they're not sharing the same values and stuff. So does that sound like a particularly godly family relationship? No, not really; not really. Okay, I work with another sort of dynamic where four people come in every week, and they pretty much fight themselves silly. Okay, like, I help moderate; I quiet this person down, I let this person talk. I, you know... We talk, we work out... I teach them skills, they learn new family rules, you know? Does that sound like an ideal family relationship? No. The difference is one family relationship is working on the family relationship together. One experience is working just as an individual trying to manage their own personal experiences in this family. Okay? Lots of work to still be done if our highest the highest connection we can have to godliness is within our relationships. There's a lot of work to be done in both of these cases. Okay?

So, a few things that people really hate. Mortal human beings really hate vulnerability. They hate self-reflection. They hate accountability. They hate introspection and self-awareness. And we want... We would rather ask ourselves, "Why?" than "What?"—meaning, "Why is this happening to me?" "Why is she mean to me?" "Why do they not like me?" "Why am I so miserable?" instead of saying, "What am I doing to create the circumstances where I feel like crap?" "What am I doing that I cannot get along with my mother?" "What am I doing that I am constantly fighting with my brother?" ...friends, aunts, uncles (I don't care—we all have people). Okay? Human beings hate vulnerability. They hate self-reflection. They hate accountability. They hate introspection and self-awareness. And we REALLY hate agency. We HATE having to choose for ourselves how to be. We would rather someone tell us—'cuz that's so much easier! Okay?

So, with that in mind, I'm gonna read a couple Scriptures. Well, I'm not gonna read the Scripture specifically, but I'm gonna talk about the concepts. So, in Moroni 7:9, he talks about... Ahhhhh, what does he talk about, everybody? Charity! Moroni 7:9 (put on my silly glasses because I cannot read), and it says,

And if a man be meek and lowly in heart, and confesses by the power of the holy ghost that Jesus is the Christ, he must need have charity. For if he have not charity, he is nothing; wherefore, he must need have charity. And charity suffereth long, and [it] is kind, and [it] envieth not, and [it] is not puffed up, [it] seeketh not her own, [it] is not easily provoked, [it] think[s] no evil, and [it does not rejoice] in iniquity...[it] rejoice[s] in the truth, [it] bear[s] all things, [and believes] all things, [it] hope[s] all things, [and it] endureth all things. [So] wherefore, my beloved brethren, if ye have not charity, ye are nothing, [because] charity never faileth...

Obviously, I'm not reading this word for word; I'm dramatizing it. Pretty good, huh?

Wherefore, cleave unto charity, which is the greatest of all. For all things must fail, but charity is the pure love of Christ, and it endure[s] for ever. And whoso is found possessed of it at the last day, it shall be well with them. (Moroni 7:9, emphasis added)

Okay, so I'm gonna leave that there, and then I'm gonna go to First Corinthians. I believe it's 1:53; I took my marker out, so... First Corinthians—and yes, I'm driving in the car on the way up here, picking apart my stuck-together Scripture pages, because I'm LISTENING to them; I'm not reading them. So all of my pages are still stuck together. 52; let's start with 52; oh, no—let's start with 51. First Corinthians 1:51.

Though I speak with the tongues of men and...angels, and have not charity, I have become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. And though I have the gift of prophecy and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and though I have all faith so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing. And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profits me nothing.

Charity suffers long and is kind. [It] envies not. [It] vaunts not itself, [it] is not puffed up, [it] does not behave itself unseemly, [it] seeks not her own, [it] is not easily provoked, thinks no evil, rejoices not in iniquity but rejoices in the truth, [it] bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, [and] endures all things.

And then the very first sentence in First Corinthians 1:53 is:

Charity never fails. (1 Corinthians 1:51-53)

Okay, let's just put all that aside. Just leave it there for a minute.

Okay, so how much time do you all spend studying the gospel or your Scriptures in any given week?

Speaker 1: Ten minutes a day.

SS: "Ten minutes a day." Okay. Ten minutes a day. So ten minutes a day, 70 minutes a week, maybe? Is that...? Did I do my math correctly? Okay. Anybody else? The answer can be none. I don't care. A lot. Not a lot. [audience answer] "30 minutes a week?" Okay. [audience answer] "40 minutes a week?" Okay. Well, I'm not asking... These aren't guesses—these are literally how much time do you guys spend in your Scriptures or the gospel each week?

Speaker 2: Ten to twenty minutes in the morning.

SS: "Ten to twenty minutes every morning." Okay, so that's like 140 minutes a week. Okay. Roughly two hours. All right. Cool. Like, for me, like, none—like however long it takes me to drive to work and listen to my Scriptures. I don't know.

Okay, how much time... Okay, so when you're doing that, how do you believe your investment in the gospel or the Scriptures impacts your daily life?

Speaker 3: When I start out reading the Scriptures, the whole entire day just feels lighter and easier.

SS: Okay, so it doesn't really matter how much time you do it, just if you've started your day with that settled-down space of gospel study, you feel like your day is better. Great.

Speaker 3: Start or end.

SS: Okay, either one. All right. Okay, start or end was that you? Okay? Go ahead.

Speaker 2: I feel closer to God whenever I read.

SS: Okay, "closer to God whenever you read." Can you tell me why?

Speaker 2: Just because I'm in the Scriptures reading His words.

SS: Okay, "in the Scriptures reading His words." Doesn't really matter what the words are, just feels...? Okay, great. Anybody else?

Speaker 5: I'm reading the Bible right now, and so I have a lot of questions... why would that happen? [indecipherable] ...talking to God about it. I'm just very confused.

SS: Okay, so your investment in the Scriptures and gospel creates lots of questions, and you go to God to get those questions answered. Perfect, great. Anybody else?

Speaker 6: I read at night so it gives me something to look forward to.

SS: Nice. Okay, all right. So kind of the gift you give to yourself at the end of the day. Great. Fantastic. Okay.

All right. How much time do you all spend with people who disagree with you? Or who you don't get along with? In a day.

Speaker 3: Eight hours a day.

SS: "Eight hours a day" when you're at work—people who don't like you, don't agree with you, you don't like them, whatever. Great, fantastic. Anybody else?

Unknown: Three to five hours every day...

SS: A day? Fantastic! This is awesome!

Unknown: All day every day.

SS: Nice! "All day every day." Is it the gentleman you're clinging to or is that someone else? Okay, great. Okay, all right. Come on, keep going. This is... [audience answer] "Two to three hours a day?" Okay. With someone who doesn't...who you don't really like, doesn't agree with you? Okay.

How much actual conflict is there? Or is there just this underlying, "Hey, you know, we're on different..." you know?

Speaker 5: I avoid it.

SS: What? "You avoid it." Good. Good. Yeah. Perfect.

Unknown: None.

SS: No conflict. Just an understanding. Okay. All right. Come on, guys. Throw out the conflict.

Speaker 3: 50/50.

SS: "50/50," okay. Yeah?

Unknown: Whenever we're at home together.

SS: "Whenever you're at home together," yes.

Speaker 3: Light debates.

SS: Okay, you like debates?

Speaker 3: LIGHT debates.

SS: Oh, light debates. Okay.

Speaker 3: When it gets too deep in doctrine, it kinda breaks apart.

SS: Okay. Okay, great. All right. Your answers are changing (sort of) my approach, but I mean, that's fine. It's just it's gonna go a little bit a different direction. Okay. All right. So how many of you... Okay, so I may have made...

How relevant do you feel like the Scriptures are to your everyday life? Like legitimately relevant?

Unknown: Very close.

SS: You think the Scriptures are very closely relevant to your daily life. Do tell.

Unknown: Uh, I guess... I'm in Mosiah [indecipherable] ...kingdom, trying to teach people. It's like, I go to work every morning, "Oh, I'm Mormon." I was going on my mission. "Do you want to talk about Scriptures?" And he was like, "No." [indecipherable]

SS: Okay, yeah. Perfect. Anybody else?

Speaker 4: I try to read it like you're the character, like you're in that situation. You can see a lot of similarities. I feel like it's very relevant, especially when you put yourself into their situation.

SS: Okay, give me an example. (Hang on; just hold that thought.) Give me an example. Because I am NOT Lehi's wife, Sariah. I'm just not. Okay, go ahead.

Speaker 4: I don't know, like Jared and the brother of Jared, when he didn't know he was a prophet, he still did stuff.

SS: Okay.

Speaker 4: Yeah, we're doing stuff and we don't see that, or we don't...

SS: Perfect, great.

Speaker 3: When I feel like when I read the Scriptures, I start noticing the things that I read in my everyday life a lot more. Such as like when you read about the dove, you start noticing doves. When you start reading about charity, then you start noticing charity in your everyday life.

SS: Okay, great.

Speaker 5: Sometimes I find it hard to relate it because we live in such a different time that the struggles are different, but I think the themes are similar, but it's kind of hard to relate when we're driving to work, and they spent six weeks traveling to a different city, you know?

SS: Yeah, right. Or you know, however long in boats with no light or whatever. Exactly. Okay, anybody else? I feel like I'm in school, like, the good kids... Like there are like four kids who have all the answers. Speak up! I'm a mean teacher. I call on people who keep their eyes down and their heads... You know that no eye contact thing? That doesn't work for me. So everybody stare, so I don't choose you. Okay? All right.

Um, well, since you guys aren't providing me with exactly what I need, I'm gonna have to offer it up myself. I find... Okay, I've spent the last several years sort of pursuing education in a different path. What... And I've mentioned this before, but everything that I have read, everything that I've learned, all of my textbooks, everything that I've invested in SCREAMS gospel principles to me, okay? But it doesn't scream them by, like, in reading the Scriptures. It's just totally... It's a total different... It's a completely different language.

In my world, the only thing I can say is mental health or the pursuit of mental wellness (which includes relationships and personal accountability and motivation and all of those kinds of things) is just another language that the gospel is spoken in. Okay? But it's useful for people who don't believe in a God or to who don't believe in church or religion or something like that. It's just a secular language to teach people gospel principles. And for the most part, they really get down to the nitty-gritty of your daily life. Okay? So, we are gonna... I'm gonna take a minute... I probably jumped ahead. I'm gonna take a minute, and we're gonna talk just briefly about... Was it tzedakah, (as in "Neil")?

Denver Snuffer: Yes.

SS: Okay. So, the Hebrew word for charity is tzedakah. And it has... Okay, I have this... Oh, go ahead...

[Audience member asking how to spell tzedakah]

Oh, T-Z-E-D-A-K-A-H.

DS: That spelling is the phonetic way of rendering a Hebrew word. There's actually a Hebrew letter that is that TZ.

SS: Yeah. Yeah. It's, I mean, I could of... I just chose... I'm gonna do charity and love both in the Hebrew, okay? So, and it came off a... You know, I mean, it just... I just Googled it. It just came off a "Judaism 101" board. Okay? So, I'm not trying to be particularly... This is just... I want to throw something out there. Yeah.

Unknown: I heard you really well for the first time when you spelled the Hebrew word.

SS: Oh, okay. You want me to do this? Oh, fantastic. That's okay. Okay.

So, all right. The idea of charity being something that you, you know, like giving your excess to somebody else, you know, helping, giving, whatever—I want to just sort of not flip it, but I want to add to it.

So, traditional Jews give at least 10% of their income to charity. And the... Okay, hang on. I want to find a... Tzedakah is the Hebrew word for the acts that we call "charity" in English: giving aid, assistance, and money to the poor and needy or to other worthy causes. However, the nature of tzedakah is very different from the idea of charity. The word "charity" suggests benevolence and generosity; a magnanimous act by somebody who has more to somebody who has less. It is derived from the Hebrew root word Tzadei-Dalet-Qof (you could probably do that better than I could, Denver), meaning righteousness, justice, or fairness. So in the Jewish tradition, giving to the poor is not viewed as generous, magnanimous, or something that you're doing to be benevolent; it is an act of justice and righteousness. Therefore, it is a duty. It is a duty. You are doing it because it is your godly obligation. Okay? Now, if you want to talk about giving stuff away, that's fine. That's, you know, it's like give 10% of tithing, etc. But take it out of stuff and think about it in terms of relationships and what you give in relationships—and it is your duty. (I can't control this [the mic], the way this thing works.) It is your duty to give to someone who needs from you, okay?

All right, then I'm gonna go to love. (Same... It's a different website, but it's the same idea. It's just a Jewish...) Understanding the concepts of love... Understanding the concepts that are invested in words helps us in our lives. As an interesting example, the word "love," which is thrown about so freely in English, has a special meaning in Hebrew: ahava, which is made up of three basic letters. The three letters are broken down into two parts (which is written here in front of me). The meaning of the two-letter base is "to give." Love, to give. The letter "aleph," which precedes these two letters, comes to modify the meaning of the base word give: I give. So if we just settle right there with charity and love—okay?—how much of your day (Scripture, engagement with people, gospel study, whatever it is you do) do you feel like you are actively participating in charity and love? Intentionally participating, making it an act or acts or investment that you set aside time for?

Speaker 6: Sometimes. Not like every day, but when I remember to, like, actively think about it, like what can I do for someone else, like everyone else (even if they don't know it) for God?

SS: Yeah. Yeah. Anybody else?

Speaker 7: I remember a lot better the times that I don't feel charity or love or that I don't show it. I don't know, that's what I remember to [indecipherable], I guess.

SS: Yeah. So tell me about that.

Speaker 7: Umm, I don't know. Experience is, like, it works. Sometimes I'll think something about somebody; they act in a certain way, and I react in a way that isn't necessarily [indecipherable], I'm not showing that, and I think, "Crap." Again, I just got to rewire that brain because I screwed up again. And so, I don't know, it's hard.

SS: Yeah, I'm gonna... "Screwed up"—no, not so much; just acted very human, right? Yeah. Okay. So when you want to go out and learn about a gospel topic, where do you go? [audience answer] The Scriptures. All right. When you want to learn about a relationship topic, where do you go?

Unknown: The Scriptures.

SS: Really? Yeah, that's great. What do you learn about relationships in the Scriptures?

Unknown: You can see in the Scriptures that parts that there's love and chastity.

SS: Yeah. Yeah. Anybody else?

Unknown: I go to my parents.

SS: You go to your parents, okay.

Unknown: Friends.

SS: Friends. And how... What are we learning from parents and friends about relationships?

Speaker 1: What not to do.

SS: "What not to do." Here's the thing. You can't... (You can, but you can't.) You can't just sit around and say, "It'll all work out." You can't. Because if you pray and get a confirmation that I am right (that the highest way to connect with Heaven on Earth is in the work of relationships), then you have to work on relationships. And you can't just say, "Oh, it's okay. I don't need to do anything different because it's not BAD." Well, not being bad is very different than being good. Not being bad and complacency within that relationship tells me that we're scared; we don't want to be vulnerable; we don't want to ask for our needs to be met; we don't want to meet someone halfway; we feel like we don't we feel like we're not good enough; we feel like it's too hard.

You know, I have this, I just kind of have this thing at my house: One of my kids will come, and they'll tell me something that one of their siblings did to upset them, and I say, "Did you talk to them?" And they say, "It's not that big a deal." And I say, "You told ME. It's got to be a big enough deal that you told me." Because there's something going on there that is making the relationship less than ideal.

So I would contend that there are principles in the Scriptures that are fantastic—okay? — universal, certainly the basis upon which we want to live our lives. And I think studying the Scriptures and the gospel is an absolute imperative. It is a necessity. It is how we... It's starting out our day; it brings us closer to God; it increases opportunity for question because you're reading, and you're, like, "I totally don't get this. This doesn't make any sense to me." And I would suggest that to the extent that it is possible, you go directly to God instead of to somebody else who might be able to give you an answer— but it will be their answer. And even if it is a right answer, it will still be their answer. Okay? And I think that is absolutely important.

But I don't think there's anything in the Scriptures that tells us how Lehi and Sarah managed their little conflict when she was crabbing up a storm about him sending out the boys to go find the plates, and he's going, "Sweetheart, I have to do this," and she's going, "You are crazy! They are gonna get killed," you know, and there's this relationship conflict that never gets addressed. Because what? We think: "They're scriptural," so somehow they don't have problems? Nephi and his brothers HATED one another. They were murderous, fratricidal... Joseph's brothers threw him in a pit (to be charitable!!), then decided that it was better if they just sell him to the passing caravan. Okay? These people have horrible relationships. I know there's context. I know there's things I don't understand. I get it. I can't know all of the pieces. But my brain works from a relational standpoint. Okay?

What kind of gods and goddesses, priests and priestesses, Mothers and Fathers in Heaven do we attain unto if we're not willing to do the work of relationships down here? How do you picture your heavenly parents? Are they like your parents? Wait, what? Are you kidding me? If my kids hold ME up as their model as what their heavenly parents are, that's kind of scary.

[audience comment about the microphone]

Oh, my gosh. Okay.

Any answers? What... I mean, do we think about that? Do we have any idea what it takes to be the kind of person in a relationship who attains unto godhood? It doesn't just happen, people. There has to be some work. And the work is in your relationships. To the extent that the Scriptures help you help inform you of how to become a better person, they are of immeasurable value. To the extent that the Scriptures are a way that you avoid being in relationships, to the extent that you use the gospel and study of the gospel as a way to tell yourself that "you're doing okay" but your relationships suck—not so good. There has to be work done here.

When was the last time anybody learned anything about motivation from the Scriptures? (Oh, you should all raise your hand. There's plenty of motivation in the Scriptures—plenty of it.) Okay? When was the last time you learned about accountability in the Scriptures? Again, plenty of it. Okay? When was the last time you learned about empathy in the Scriptures? Again. Perspective-taking? Yeah, it's all in there. But it's all in there as a story and words on the page. It's not necessarily being applied to your daily life. Okay?

So I would suggest that the fact that you go to the Scriptures to find answers to the gospel questions is a model you should follow to go somewhere else—and it can be an Internet search; it can be a book; it can be a magazine—to find out how to communicate better with the people in your life. You know there's actual real ways to communicate, and it's not okay just to say, "Oh, it'll be fine." You know there are actual ways to listen—right?—that actually improve the way you communicate and, therefore, improve your relationships. All of this stuff is available, but it's not available in its best applicable form in the Scriptures—those are "big picture" ideas; they need to be brought out, and then you need to say, "Hmm, how do I apply charity?"

Okay, that's the question I want an answer to, "How do you apply charity in your real-world life—separate and apart from giving stuff to people." I can tell you how I do it. I have multiple bags of DI stuff sitting in my hallway upstairs. That's how I do it. I carry money around with me so I can give it to strangers on the street. Easy peasy. Super easy. That does not challenge me one bit.

Unknown: Like, not snapping back at people, like, at work or like, don't turn around and walk away, mumbling [indecipherable], like, get angry at him and stuff.

SS: Exactly. Exactly.

Unknown: Taking the time to understand their perspective...

SS: "Taking the time to understand their perspective."

Speaker 3: Even if it's just the time that I spend with someone because you can give time just as much as you can give anything else.

SS: Yes, exactly.

Speaker 7: Measuring your words, and thinking about what you're saying before...

SS: Yeah. Yeah. What else?

Unknown: I even think if you're just thinking about someone and you reach out to them and let them know that, like, you care.

SS: Yeah, exactly. Okay, I'm gonna wind down.

How many in here fight with your parents? [hands go up] (I don't think that's enough, but okay. That's fine.)

How many in here fight with your siblings? Oh, more! Wowzers!

How many in here have actual unresolved issues with people you actually love? Whoa. Yeah, we do!

How many of you are avoiding unresolved issues with people you love? Whoo! Yeah. Okay?

Yeah, that's what we do. Do you know why we do that? Because we hate vulnerability. We hate self-reflection. We hate authenticity. We hate being accountable. We hate it. It hurts. It's so painful.

(What are you doing???)

Things have to be balanced. There are multiple ways to attain...

(What are you doing?? [laughing] I'm done.)

DS: I'm sitting behind you.

SS: There... We have a... There's a lot of work to do. There's a lot of work to do in understanding gospel principles. There's a lot of work to do in studying your Scriptures. If studying Scriptures is not your jam, no big deal—there's a lot of work in relationships; there's a lot of work in just trying to come to a place where you can say, "Who am I? And how am I in relationships? And how can I use the gospel? How can I use the Scriptures? How can I use other resources? How can I use other people to fill in the gaps that the Scriptures do not provide me?"

We have an ongoing conversation where all the gospel knowledge in the world (this is not me; this is Paul)... I don't care if you can move mountains. I don't care if you can speak with tongues. I don't care. God doesn't care. Paul didn't care. If you don't have charity and love—which is WORK—you are nothing.

In the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

2022.05.15 Seminary Graduation Remarks - Denver

Denver C. Snuffer, Jr.
Centerville, UT
May 15, 2022

I was thinking about MY parenting: A voice comes from the kitchen that says, "Reagan's trying to kill me," and I yell, "Reagan, don't kill Carson." It's pretty charitable. It's pretty good. That's kind of the way that whole thing works, with me anyway.

Nature is full of symbols with meaning.

(Yeah, yeah, okay. It's like you have to eat a snowcone in order to use this microphone. Hello, hello.)

[crosstalk about the microphone]

(Yeah, okay. Just yell. [To the microphone:] You see what you can pick up because I'm gonna abandon you... No use for you.)

Nature is full of symbols. The most obvious, frequent, and repetitive symbol that you can find everywhere is the difference between the light and the darkness. When the sun is up, you can see stuff. When the sun is not up and the moon is not up, you can't see stuff. If you go into a room and there's no outside window, or it's dark at nighttime and there's no light, you can hurt yourself in the dark. Light and darkness are everywhere—testifying to you about the difference between truth and error, comprehension and confusion, what's right and what's wrong, what's true and what's error; it's just THE biggest symbol of all in nature.

Right now, it doesn't matter where you go or what you look at, every single institution in this world is in the process of losing light, losing grip on true principles, and sliding into increasing error, confusion, disorder, disorganization—and it doesn't matter if the institution you're looking at happens to be businesses or governments or churches or civic organizations. It doesn't matter what it is. Right now there are unrelenting voices advocating the cause of confusion, unrelenting voices advocating for destruction, decay, and overthrow—everywhere.

One of the places that should have been safe from this nonsense—this crusade to overthrow everything—has penetrated into the public school system, advocating sexual confusion so that: You might be a boy, or you might not be a boy; you might be a girl, or you might not be a girl. But for heaven's sakes, the one thing they want to advocate now is the overthrow of the family—because the one thing which sexual confusion will result in is the destruction of a happy relationship that produces a stable family inside of which children are produced and raised with an understanding of the difference between godliness and ungodliness, truth and error. Don't let yourself get sucked into that effort that is deliberately aimed to try and achieve a specific result. The specific result is the destruction of the family. And you have been targeted in order to achieve that result. It exists everywhere. You're either a boy, or you're a girl—and your ultimate destiny is to be either a father or a mother. Don't ever lose sight of that. That is what God ordained in the beginning.

One of the things that has puzzled me and caused me to study long and hard in the Scriptures is the question of:

- WHY...when God says, "How oft would I have gathered you, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, but you would not,"
- WHY...with God trying to gather people together and protect them (like a hen would protect her chicks),
- WHY...when the purpose behind the gospel is Zion—and there have been multiple opportunities in which God has interjected Himself into contact with us to try and bring that result about,
- WHY have we only seen Zion on two occasions? One was at the time of Enoch, and Melchizedek brought a city about that was also taken up into Heaven. (However, in truth, Melchizedek secured that covenant before the flood, and so he's really a subset of the city of Enoch—because rather than get caught up into Heaven before the flood, with a covenant He remained behind. But he gathered a city, and the city included those that were not antediluvians. And so you can say that it was twice.)

But God intended to establish Zion every time He interferes with, speaks to, interrupts, and creates a new dispensation of the gospel. Why doesn't it happen? Why is it that Zion fails? (Zion "flees," but more often than not, Zion fails.) Why didn't we have Zion at the time of Jesus Christ? Why didn't we see Zion at the time of Joseph Smith?

Well, one of the things that struck me about that first group of generations in which they did have Zion was the account of how things were organized.

(Boy, there's some important things in this material that I don't want to just gloss over in pursuit of the point that I want to make.) Here's an interesting little thing about the record:

Adam does not record his own baptism. Adam is focused on something altogether more cosmic than that, so he passes over the events that involve his baptism. It's actually generations later (when Enoch is speaking in vision and recounting things that had happened generations earlier) that Enoch records the account of Father Adam's baptism—which tells you that sometimes as you go through the record, things are non-chronological. You have... If you... If chronology really matters to you, you've got to go back and straighten all that out—because the record is gonna preserve the important data points in the experiences of the people involved but not necessarily preserve them in exactly the way in which they unfolded. Okay?

So, going back to the time of Adam and Adam's record:

The gospel began to be preached from the beginning, being declared by holy angels sent forth from the presence of God, and by his own voice...

Okay, those two things go hand-in-hand: angels get sent forth to prepare people, and then after they are adequately prepared, God's own voice begins to speak to them. Angels do a preliminary work. This is discussed in Alma later about how the work of the angels is to prepare people in order to receive something further. But the first step, in order to have faith, is to have the ministering of angels (which occurred in the case of Adam in the record that Adam is giving us). "...and by his own voice," meaning that then God comes into contact with him,

...and by the gift of the holy ghost. And thus all things were confirmed unto Adam by a holy ordinance, and the gospel preached, and a decree sent forth that it should be in [all] the world until the end thereof. And thus it was. Amen...

So at the time of Adam, he gets preached to him the gospel, which at the time that this is taking place, Adam's mind (in making this record) is so caught up with other things, he doesn't even bother mentioning that he got baptized; Enoch will fill that in later. But I guarantee you that at this point, with this ministration taking place at the time of Adam, that he was baptized. But what he got was confirmed unto him by an holy ordinance, which is just mentioned lightly and skipped over. I've connected that holy ordinance in Genesis 3:13 with a line that I've drawn down into the next thing, which is verse 14. And I've drawn a line between "by a holy ordinance" and "this same priesthood"—because there's something going on here.

By them [and] their children were taught to read and write, having a language which was pure and undefiled. Now this same Priesthood which was in the beginning shall be in the end of the world also. (Genesis 3:13-14 RE)

Something went on to confirm upon Adam, through a holy ordinance, something that will later be referred to as "this holy priesthood," which is going to show up again at the end of the world. Okay? So the very first Zion begins with Adam, and then I write down the list of the names: Adam, and then Seth, and then Enos, and then Cainan, and then Mahalaleel, then Jared, then Enoch, Methuselah, and then it'll go to Noah. But those names are mentioned in Genesis chapter three. And what you have in that list of names is a series of father, son, grandson, great-grandson—and you've got one in each generation.

So the original organization of the very first Zion was familial, meaning it was a family. It was patriarchal, meaning it descended from father to son to grandson. And it was dynastic, meaning that it stayed inside one family (father-son) line. That's how the original worked. There are a lot of advantages to that because in that setting, what you've got is an intimate connection between the people. You've got a family unit, which can be one of the greatest sources of solidarity and connection—but it can also be one of the worst sources of contention and animosity. So you've got your pluses, and you got your minuses.

So, when you read about the very first one, one of the first things that comes to mind is, "Oh, what we might need if we're ever gonna achieve Zion is a holy family." What we need is, like, how about if the Lord establishes a name to be held in faithful remembrance from generation to generation upon whom a patriarchal position is conferred, and we know the identity of that fellow—and we learn in January of 1841, the Lord attempted to do something like that by conferring upon Hyrum the office of Priesthood and Patriarch to be held in faithful remembrance, which kinda sorta happened until the conflict between Spencer W. Kimball and Eldred G. Smith resulted in the elimination of the office of Presiding Patriarch to the Church, and Eldred G. Smith was made Emeritus, and then (as David Christenson interviewed Eldred G. Smith), he did not confer anything upon his son. And the LDS Church altogether abandoned the office and the ordination that had begun with Hyrum and had been passed down to LDS Church Patriarchs until the time of Eldred G. Smith. And with his death...2014? With his death in 2014 came an end to that abortive effort to try and create an orderly manner in which it would be possible to establish Zion—'cuz the one thing that's apparent is the only time we've ever had it, we had it as a consequence of this kind of a relationship.

So, you guys have been studying Ether, the book of Ether. I go to the book of Ether, and I say, Aha, here we have, at the very beginning of the book of Ether, you got the brother of Jared; you've got the Lord coming to appear to the brother of Jared; and you've got, once again, an opportunity in which the Lord is saying, "How oft would I have gathered you as a hen gathereth her chicks under her wings." And so, we now have—potentially—a new dynasty in which we can achieve Zion. But if you've read the book of Ether...

Well, let me just read a little bit of how that dynastic, patriarchal establishment worked. You can go to Ether chapter 3, beginning at verse 11. And this is some of the goings-on between the potential patriarchal leaders that could take them into Zion.

And it came to pass that Noah rebelled against Shule the king, and...his father Corihor, and drew away Corihor his brother, and also all his brethren, and many of the people. And he gave battle unto Shule the king, in which he did obtain the land of their first inheritance; and he became...king over that part of the land. And it came to pass that he gave battle again unto Shule the king; and he took Shule the king, and carried him away captive into Moron. And it came to pass [that] as he was about to put him to death, the sons of Shule crept into the house of Noah by night and slew him, and broke down the door of the prison, and brought out their father, and placed him upon his throne in his own kingdom. (Emphasis added)

And that didn't sound like Zion. It's patriarchal. It's dynastic. It's familial. It's treacherous. It's ugly. It involves continual killing and violence, ambition. And as you read the account in Ether, generation after generation, until finally, they arrive at the point that they completely destroy themselves in a genocidal warfare. And that ain't Zion.

Section 139 of the Teachings and Commandments is a part of the letter that Joseph wrote while he was captive in Liberty Jail, and he's talking about, at this point, the abuses—not the abuses that the government was imposing on him, not the imprisonment and the guards and all the rest of that, the governor disobeying the Constitution, the outrages of what was going on in the society at large—he's writing about the church. It would be the fault of aspiring men inside the church that put him into prison, that even surrendered him into custody. When he got taken into custody, he was surprised and didn't know; that was why he walked out of Far West unarmed. He thought he was going out to negotiate, but treacherous men inside the church conspired to deceive him and lead him out to be surrendered. And he was taken captive, and he was put in prison. And all of that stuff that was going on both inside the government of the state of Missouri and, more importantly, inside the church, weighed on the mind of Joseph when he wrote these words, and they are only about religious abuse. They're only about betrayal and treachery by your fellow believer. Look at section 139, beginning with paragraph 5.

Behold, there are many called, but few are chosen, and why are they not chosen? Because their hearts are set so much upon the things of this world, and aspire to the honors of men, that they do not learn this one lesson — that the rights of the Priesthood are inseparably connected with the Powers of Heaven and...the Powers of Heaven cannot be controlled nor handled, only upon the principles of righteousness. That they may be conferred upon us, [it's] true, but when we undertake to cover our sins or to gratify our pride, our vain ambition, or to exercise control, or dominion, or compulsion, upon the souls of the children of man in any degree of unrighteousness, behold, the Heavens withdraw themselves, the spirit of the Lord is grieved, and when it is withdrawn, Amen to the priesthood or the authority of that man. ...ere he is aware, he is left unto himself, to kick against the pricks, to persecute the saints, ...to fight against God. We have learned by sad experience that [it's] the nature and disposition of almost all men, as soon as they get a little authority, as they suppose, they will immediately begin to exercise unrighteous dominion. Hence many are called, but few are chosen.

No power or influence can or ought to be maintained by virtue of the priesthood; only by persuasion, by long-suffering, by gentleness and meekness, and by love unfeigned, by kindness and pure knowledge, which shall greatly enlarge the soul. (T&C 139:5-6, emphasis added)

Joseph was not concerned about the government and the soldiers and the court system that unjustly held him in prison. He was concerned about the fact that the religion that was being restored was being corrupted. The religion that he was trying to establish—that would bring about Zion—had turned into a bunch of aspiring, manipulative, dangerous men who thought they had a little authority, and therefore, with that authority, they could abuse, exercise control, compulsion, and dominion, and get other people to follow what they insisted be done, abrogating the agency which men are all too eager to surrender to the hands of those that want to abuse them. They willingly permit the abuse.

So, "Joseph, the Lord was willing to gather them like a hen would gather the chicks under their wings, and they would not. And Joseph, you're sitting in Liberty Jail. You know they won't. You've got a church that's been corrupted. When you get out, you can go to Nauvoo and try to elevate the people and preach—but it's gonna repeat itself. And ultimately, in Nauvoo, you're gonna get killed by the same inside conspirators occupying positions of authority inside the organization. The same thing is gonna happen again."

But Joseph did something really interesting towards the end. It didn't get preserved much—except as a kind of confused footnote that only lingered until the time of Wilford Woodruff, and then it just got thrown on the trash heap. And today, it's occasionally visited by Mormon scholars in BYU Studies and other places—Mormon Dialogue—usually dealt with in a way that makes kind of fun of the whole thing, like, "How weird was this?" You can even find an allusion to it in Rough Stone Rolling, where Bushman talked about how Joseph's ambition was "familial plentitude in the eternities." That was how Bushman described it. Joseph was doing things not because he was a (as Bushman would put it) some kind of lothario (meaning a womanizer, someone that was always looking to seduce women). Bushman said that wasn't what Joseph was doing there at the end. He wasn't a lothario; he was looking to try to achieve familial plentitude in the eternities by sealings, which later in the vernacular that got adopted by the Brigham Young-led group in Utah meant marriage, which meant polygamy, which meant all kinds of corrupt teachings based upon that. And that's another day and another story.

Joseph was trying to use the authority that had been given to him at the end not to reinforce the church. He essentially walked away from the church. He rode across the Mississippi River on June 23rd in a skiff, sent for his horse so that he could just leave. He was headed west; he was gonna go somewhere else and start over. And he was gonna do that in a whole different capacity. The new capacity (and one which he began mentioning for the first time in October of 1843) was to create a family by adoption. Okay?

In the first generations that brought us Zion, it was familial, patriarchal, and dynastic. And it worked because of the righteousness of the men involved. But in the hands of the unrighteous, a familial, patriarchal, dynastic system for organizing people can create hell on earth and ultimately end in genocide. But with the cautions that are given to us by Joseph and the experience that he had (first, in Missouri, and later, soberly assessing the people around him in Nauvoo), he created something that potentially allows for the organization of a righteous society that is familial, that is patriarchal, but that is non-dynastic—not confined to a single line of men but encompasses any righteous man by adoption and by sealing into an imitation of that order that existed in the beginning.

Now, I have used, for convenience sake, the word "man" and "patriarchal" and "he." But if you go back and read the talk that I gave about our Divine Parents, there is no such thing as a patriarch without an associated matriarch. And if you study that further, what you will learn is it's not the man who even chooses the next in authority, the next one upon whom status is conferred. That's entrusted exclusively into the hands of the matriarch. It is the Mother who ordains that succession.

Well, in that T&C 139, there's a comment that Joseph makes in passing. This is in paragraph 12 of 139: There are many teachers, but perhaps not many fathers. He doesn't elaborate on that. Take the comments that I've given today, go to that paragraph 12 of 139, and look at that aside comment that there are many teachers, but perhaps not many fathers, and let that sink deep in your mind to consider what that might include.

Then there's a...about the only talk that Joseph Smith ever had written out in advance, which oughta tell you how important this talk is—there's a talk that Joseph gave that appears as section 140 of the Teachings and Commandments that I want to read from beginning in paragraph 5, and then I'll conclude.

Now, the purpose in himself, in the winding up scene of the last dispensation, is that all things pertaining to that dispensation should be conducted precisely in accordance with the preceding dispensations. And again, God purposed in himself that there should not be an Eternal fullness until every dispensation should be fulfilled and gathered together in one, and that all things whatever that should be gathered together in one, in those dispensations, unto the same fullness and Eternal glory, should be in Christ Jesus.

Therefore, he set the ordinances to be the same for ever and ever, and set Adam to watch over them, to reveal them from Heaven to man or to send angels to reveal them. Hebrews 1st chapter, 14th verse: Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to those who shall be [the] heirs of salvation? These angels are under the direction of Michael, or Adam, who acts under the direction of Christ.

From the above quotation we learn that Paul perfectly understood the purpose of God in relation to his connection with man and that glorious and perfect Order which he established in himself, whereby he sent forth power, revelations, and glory. God will not acknowledge that which He has not called, ordained, and chosen.

...This then is the nature of the Priesthood: every man holding the presidency of his dispensation and one man holding the presidency of them all, even Adam.

...The ordinances must be kept in the very [same] way God has appointed, otherwise their Priesthood will prove a cursing instead of a blessing. (T&C 140:5-12, emphasis added)

You see, in the beginning, all things were confirmed unto Adam by an holy ordinance, and the gospel preached. Adam had to receive that fullness of understanding before he went out to preach the gospel because there were things about the pattern which don't emerge into clarity until Adam understood all things. And that same priesthood which was in the beginning is to return again at the end of the world, also. And that same clarity that was entrusted into the hands of Adam will again be restored upon the earth with the same clarity to allow for a connection—by Adam's permission, it will be restored, under the direction of Christ who presides over it all, for the purpose of having the end agree with and fit together with the beginning, in which all things get combined together.

And so, at the very moment when the greatest effort to bring darkness and confusion into the lives of all men and children, there will break forth a light—clearer, brighter, comprehending more, revealing more, and establishing again that same gospel and priesthood which was in the beginning. It is going to return. The world is not worthy of it. Therefore, it necessarily must be housed inside sacred space belonging to God in the form of a temple, which is the reason why (in the Answer to the Prayer for Covenant) the Lord makes mention of a coming command to build a temple.

God's purposes will not fail. His effort is equally relenting with the effort of the adversary to bring about darkness. And I don't care if it appears as though darkness covers the whole face of the earth, and there's but one spotlight in one small corner. That will be enough to begin the overthrow of the kingdom of this world and the powers of darkness that rule here. It will be the beachhead from which our Lord will launch a victory that will be total, that will encompass the whole Earth. And from that tiny beginning, it will spread until Zion fills the whole of North and South America, as Joseph Smith described it. He didn't live to get there. He didn't have the right people listening and giving heed and diligence to the things that were taught. How oft will God gather together people like a hen gathering chicks under her wings? Apparently, He will keep doing it and keep doing it until, finally, some group of people decide that they will rise up. Hopefully, that will include some of you.

In the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

“Where an Evangelical Encounters the Restoration” Interview between Steven Pynnaker and Denver Snuffer
July 8, 2022

Steven Pynnaker: Welcome to Mormon Book Reviews: “Where an Evangelical Encounters the Restoration.” I'm your host, Steven Pynnaker, and I'm very excited to have this guest on. I tell you, folks, I was, uhh... You know, I've relayed the story to people how/when I was having lunch with John Dehlin, I... He had already invited me onto the program, and I said, you know, “The Lord showed me that I was gonna be on your program, John.” And John Dehlin goes to me, and he says, “Well if Heavenly Father said you're comin' on my program, you're definitely comin' on my program!” Well, I'll tell you, folks, the Lord also showed me that Denver Snuffer was gonna be on my program, so I am very excited about having Denver.

Denver, welcome to the program.

Denver Snuffer: Well, thanks. Good to be here.

SP: Thank you, sir.

DS: Well, I'm not sure it's “good” to be here. It's tolerable to be here.

SP: That works for me.

DS: I don't like to do interviews. Yeah.

SP: I know, and I appreciate you coming on—because it is a real privilege for you to come on.

One quick thing, folks, the merch store is open: mormonbookreviews.com. You can buy phone cases, you can buy hats, you can buy buttons, you name it. It's on... We're constantly adding stuff to the store, so I want to appreciate the... Hoodies, you name it. So go to mormonbookreviews.com.

I also want to thank my supporters on both Patreon and PayPal. If you wish to financially support the channel, there will be a link in the description.

So Denver, “Where an Evangelical Encounters the Restoration” is my tagline, and of course, you have an evangelical background (if you consider Baptist “evangelical,” which I do). And I thought we would start with “Before you encounter the Restoration.” I want you to tell a little bit about your childhood and your engagement being raised in a Baptist church. And just talk a little bit about that, and I'll ask you some questions about that, as well.

DS: Yeah, my mother was fairly devout as a Baptist, invited the minister over for Sunday dinners, and you know, took us to church every Sunday. It was rare that we weren't in church every Sunday. She had this box of New Testament verses called “Our Daily Bread,” and every morning at breakfast, she would pull out the front card and read us a verse from the New Testament and then put it in the back so that you circulated through the box of New Testament quotes over the course of a year. And I never was offended at that. I was intrigued by it. I kind of enjoyed it. There was a... You know, the Billy Graham revivals that were on the TV, we watched. There was a revival, as I recollect (I was pretty young), but there was a revival somewhere near the place I was growing up at the time. And we attended one of those. There was always this... I think it's referred to as the "altar call"...

SP: Yup.

DS: ...where you can come up and make some confession and be baptized. When I was nine years old, we were living in Germany; my father was in the military. And I remember, at age nine, wanting to actually respond to that altar call. And the minister did not think I was old enough yet to be baptized (which is kind of ironic because, in the LDS tradition, people are baptized at age eight). Well, being turned down at age nine, thereafter I had a conviction about the authenticity of the New Testament/the legitimacy of Christ as a Savior, but I had a DECREASING confidence that the Baptists had it right. My father was a believer in God and an active Mason, but he did not go to church with us on Sunday (except maybe Easter, maybe Christmas). But he had a belief in God, and he was aloof from denominationalism. And it may be that some of my skepticism about the Baptists having it right was due to my father's neglect of attending church. But the ministers came over, ate dinner; they were welcome. My dad was always cordial with them. And he was someone that did read the Bible. But I never did join a church or get baptized until...when I was 19, and I joined the LDS Church.

SP: So I'm just really curious, did you ever recite the Sinner's Prayer within the context of becoming a Born-again Christian as a child?

DS: Yes. That was done on more than one occasion. And, you know, the Billy Graham revivals asked not that you recited, but that you essentially agree with the content. And you know, to myself—listening and watching and observing—internally, I was "Christian" in the sense of having a conviction about the legitimacy of Christ as Savior. It just was not enough to provoke me to join in some institutional confession or public institutional confession.

When I was a teenager, some of my buddies went up and answered the altar call. But, you know, I was acquainted with how they lived their lives. And so it didn't persuade me that that had the desired effect of transforming my teenage buddies from what they were BEFORE answering the altar call to what they were after, because I could detect no discernible difference in behavior. And that, too, probably added to my doubts about the utility or value of the institutional commitment.

SP: Okay! Now, this is the '70s, and this is, of course, at the height of the Jesus Movement, the born-again stuff. I mean, even back then, people didn't even know what a Born-again Christian was until, like, Jimmy Carter became President. Then people started talking about it. But you had this born-again movement that was a lot of revivals taking place. My father was involved with the Full Gospel Business Men's Association, which basically took Pentecostalism into the mainstream of all the Protestant denominations, including Catholicism. So it was really an exciting time to be a Christian at this time. It sounds to me like you primarily got Baptist stuff; were you also influenced by any of the charismatic and Pentecostal stuff that was going on during this time, as well?

DS: Well, yeah, there were... It was hard not to encounter that sort of stuff because you're right: Culturally, the excesses of the 1960s led to a kind of Christian reactionaryism in the 1970s. And then as...

I was in the military, myself. I... My father was in the Army, and then later in the Army Air Corps, and then later in the Air Force (when they separated it). And I became a member of the Air Force, as well. The Air Force had educational opportunities on base—and I got residency, matriculated into a college while I was on active duty, and I satisfied everything that I needed (except for one semester of credit) while I was still there in Texas at a private Methodist college. And the Methodist college required that you have both an Old Testament and a New Testament course as part of their undergraduate general education requirements.

Well, I'd left Texas before I had finished the religion training, and I went to Provo, where I was hoping to go to law school at the new J. Reuben Clark Law School at Brigham Young University. And I finished that last semester at BYU and mailed the transcript back to McMurry University in Texas. I asked them if I could take an Old Testament and a New Testament class from Brigham Young University to satisfy the religion requirement. And they said not “No,” but “Hell no” (although I don't think they used the word “hell”). But they made it abundantly clear that whatever theological nonsense they were teaching as New and Old Testament curriculum at Brigham Young University, it would certainly not pass muster at a Methodist school. So I had to take their Old and New Testament courses, but I did it by correspondence. So I had the material, and I had to go through the material, and I had to pass it off and complete it.

And I... It was surprising to me, particularly the Old Testament material, where they essentially bought into... I wouldn't have known how to describe it at the time, but now I do understand: They had bought into the German School of Textual Criticism. They described the convergence over time in the Jewish community of the J source, the P source, the E source, the D source—and how there were all these competing sources of material that got amalgamated into a single text, but that by careful study, you could parse it apart. You could find the Jehovistic [Yahwist] source. You could find the Elohist source. You could find the Priestly source and the Deuteronomist sources and tie them all together. You know, I understand this German school, the Higher Criticism approach, but the more I reflect on that as a scholarly method for parsing apart the Bible, the more unreasonable it seems to me because... I understand the possibility of losing parts of the text. But a wholesale adaptation or change or alteration, I don't think would be possible.

Back before there was widespread competency and literacy, the way that people preserved a tradition was orally. And we think that oral preservation of biblical texts would be well nigh impossible. But right now, today, I would guess that if I played for you the entire library of Beatles' songs, that you could sing along, word for word, with dozens (perhaps hundreds) of their lyrics. And whoever your band was when you were growing up—you know, Led Zeppelin or Creedence Clearwater or Jefferson Airplane (or Jefferson Starship, later still)—if their song comes on, you have at your command a vast library of lyrics. And all that is, is just your recreational time, usually driving around in a car listening to music. Well, their television/their movies/their entertainment was based upon these texts that they would recite. To be able to come along and introduce into memorized texts a whole new verse in “Here Comes the Sun” or a whole new set of lyrics for “Come Together” would be glaring; it would just stand out. You would know that someone was altering what Lennon and McCartney or what George Harrison wrote. And those are things we don't take particularly seriously. They're simply recreational.

So, I do think that there was more integrity and continuity and difficulty in making the kind of approach that Higher Criticism suggests was “the manner in which the text got assembled” than what Higher Criticism would urge as their scholarly endeavor. I think it's useful to try and detect where some traditions derive from. But I think the traditions follow; they didn't lead. I think the parsing apart was done because people have certain preferences. I mean, their... Evangelicals love the text in the letter to the Romans by Paul because it was that text that allowed Martin Luther to see—you know, clearance to allow him to depart from—the priestly control and to obtain salvation by the confession of faith, divorced from a magisterium of priestly authority, and doing something by grace that you're saved. And so Evangelicals seize upon that.

But you know, much of what I have come to understand about religion generally (and Christianity specifically) has been a moving target/a motion picture in which, over time, things look different. Today's Evangelical community, for example, would not even be regarded as Christian for the first 950 years of Christianity. And if you go back to the first century of Christianity, it was a cacophony of Matthean Christians and Johannine Christians and Petrine Christians who disagreed. And then you've got your Gnostics that came along and urged something that was later regarded as heretical.

As Christians, if we're being candid, if we're being honest with one another, the reason why Christianity took on a stable form in the era of Constantine was because the Roman emperor had the ability by force of arms to stabilize both the canon of Scripture and the form that Christianity would take. And it's not because an argument got won; it's because by force of arms and by burning texts that differed from the official canon...

SP: Right.

DS: ...much like the criticism that Christians today level at Islam and the way in which the Koran became a singular text, as opposed to having multiple versions by burning and by killing. Christianity shares that same kind of tortured history—which is one of the reasons why, in my view, Christians should study Mormon history.

SP: Yes.

DS: Mormon history is—in real-time—undergoing those same schismatic, breaking-apart, conflicts, accusations. And in much of what the largest denomination of Mormonism (which is the one that I joined—the LDS version), it was established, in part, by violence—the same kind of violence we see in the early Christian/in the early Islam era—by Brigham Young while they were in isolation in the territory of Deseret (which became the territory of Utah, which became later still the state of Utah) in which the Home Missionary Program and the questions that they asked were designed to ferret out heresy and to determine who was a candidate for blood atonement (or killing) to “save their souls!” And it was another attempt to—by force of arms—establish an orthodoxy. So, the study of Christianity, the study of Evangelical movement, the study of Catholicism, and the study of Mormonism, it's a fascinating endeavor. And nothing is ever as simple as this is right; this is wrong; this is truly what happened. Because there are a lot more moving parts to the whole of this than...

SP: ...than people realize. Yes.

DS: Yeah.

SP: And I agree with that. As a matter of fact, when I was on Mormon Stories, I made a similar parallel that the early... You can almost parallel, just have a parallel between early Christian history and early Mormon history. I say the first decade of Mormonism is like the first century and vice... You know, so from 1820 to 1830, and then 18... You know, you can almost divvy it up. But a decade... The first decade is like the first century and henceforth.

I want to get back a little bit to your time as engaging Evangelicalism in Christianity in the '70s. And that is, there were a couple of things that were happening in the 1970s. First of all, the all-time selling book during the 1970s was Hal Lindsey's The Late Great Planet Earth—sold more books than any other book in the '70s. And there were two groups that were making claims that in 1975 the world was gonna come to an end: the Jehovah's Witnesses and the Worldwide Church of God. So, at this time in the 1970s, it was also a very apocalyptic end-time things. As a matter of fact, I remember seeing my mom/my parents had food storage, like, you know, like ready to go, you know, from the '70s, because they thought the end was coming. I just want you to maybe comment on that period, the apocalyptic period that was the '70s, how it was felt like, “These are the end days!” and a lot of major groups thought this, and most evangelical Christians were just buying a TON of The Late Great Planet Earth (and as a matter of fact, there were a lot of non-Christians that were buying that book).

DS: Right, right. That was the predecessor really to the Left Behind series. I mean, Left Behind was an expansion on Late Great Planet Earth. And yeah, I did read that. And...

Apocalypticism is useful because it motivates—and nothing gets people to donate more, attend church more, clean their act up more, and take seriously the choices that they make in life more than Apocalypticism. However, one of the things that I notice is that when that becomes the overwhelming concern, there is a tendency to sell short your preparation for the future, your education, your career, your buying a home, your saving. If it's all gonna go up in ashes here within the next year or two, then why do you need anything more than a travel trailer and a pickup truck—because you're gonna have to move to get away from the firestorm anyway.

You know, the Apocalypticism affected me. It... You know, I read the book! I considered that a peril! And clearly, if you accept the statements that Christ makes in the 24th chapter of Matthew and much of the Book of Revelation's imagery, you know, there is going to come a time of some considerable distress. But that time of considerable distress appears to be broken up into a single generation and (even further still) into periods of three-and-a-half and three-and-a-half years (or a total of seven). And when that clock starts counting and when that generation is born is dependent upon the accomplishment of a number of signs that God is in charge of. And I think we are better off living our lives as if we're going to die in an old folk's home somewhere at the end of a fully well-lived life, rather than relying upon the Lord to come and interrupt everything to give us the chance to get out of here and escape before life reaches its full measure.

Understand, too, that in the '70s, we still had the threat of East/West thermonuclear war, the threats from the Pentagon and from Russia (and the Kremlin). The Vietnam War had just wrapped up. There were tensions in the Middle East; we had the Yom Kippur War. We had tensions in Israel (and of course, many of the prophecies talk about how the "valley of decision" is located right there), and with the tensions building up and with the division of interest between the East and the West (the East favoring the Muslim/Arab communities; the West supporting Israel more fully back then), it looked like a conflagration was imminent. And into that, you know, The Late Great Planet Earth comes and tells its tale. And it got all of us concerned! It got ME concerned—but I noted the reaction of people in their lives to that. And I was still intent on finishing an undergraduate degree, finishing a law degree, preparing for life; I was still intent on trying to prepare for life. And so, the emotional enthusiasm that those kinds of focuses drained from you, in my view at the time, didn't have a positive effect.

I think it's useful to prepare to die. I think it's useful to prepare to face the Maker. But I don't think it's useful to give up your life in exchange for a hurried preparation for God to come wipe the slate clean and, you know, catch you up into the clouds of glory and then wipe the Earth clean and come plant you in a place of peace for a thousand years. I think those kinds of thoughts and imagery: you know, useful to be hopeful about someday but very inhibiting in terms of living and preparing and going about your daily life. It doesn't help your children prepare for life; it doesn't help you be a better father. It doesn't help you be a better husband to look forward to God destroying everything next week—because sometimes you need to undertake a home repair job that'll take more than the next week. And you're better off living your life that way. But yeah, it influenced me.

SP: That's very interesting. And this is where I kind of want to get to maybe your some of the spiritual stuff that you've engaged in. And it's really interesting, 'cuz you were baptized in the fall of 1973, and a few months later, in 1974, you had your first encounter with an angel. You describe that you were caught up and came to a transparent walled room, from which you could see the blue curvature of the Earth below. And you met a man who was old, as tall as you were are, with a beard, a full head of hair that was long but not quite to his shoulders, and who spoke to you non-vocally. After receiving a brief message about the timing of your upcoming ministry, you asked nothing further and were compelled to depart, and you left the scene (see “BFHG, Part 3,” www.denversnuffer.com, August 22, 2012). You tell this to downplay your own preparedness and show how foolish you were to not asking a follow-up question. But why did you get the privilege of entertaining an angel not even one year from your baptism, while the recent converts and most longtime members are, by and large, limited to receiving barely discernible promptings from the Holy Spirit? In other words, what made you so unique that, I mean, to be a recent convert and have this encounter? I mean, does it...? Just tell me what do you feel was prepared you? I mean, in one sense, you had this divine encounter. What... How did this happen?

DS: You know, the Mormon missionaries brought that pamphlet, the Joseph Smith story. (I think they still print that.) It's by and large the Joseph Smith History portion of the Pearl of Great Price that the LDS Church publishes. The story that the missionaries told me was about Joseph Smith going out and praying and encountering the Father and the Son in a vision. And then some years later, after he felt that he didn't know what his standing and state was before God, he prayed, and then an angel comes and visits him. (And then the gold plates and all the rest of what happens proceeds from there.) That introduction suggested to me that if Joseph Smith was encountering God and if the missionaries were coming and bearing their testimony that this stuff was true, that it was the—I thought—it was the common experience of people who accepted God moving anew and visiting with and calling a prophet and giving us new Scripture, that if you were Mormon, one of the things that Mormonism represented was this opening of the heavens. And I assumed—wrongly, as it turns out—but I assumed that if you were Mormon, that you ought to expect...

SP: Okay.

DS: ...angels. And so, to me, the encounter with an angel... It wasn't surprising; it was ratifying. It wasn't unexpected; it was confirmatory that, in fact, God is now moving and that these things have and do and will take place. I...

In the Scriptures, there are passages where, in describing the event, it says that “I was caught up to an exceedingly high mountain.” That language is actually a euphemism, because the encounter that I had, if I were going to describe that original encounter, the words I would use is, “I was caught up to an exceedingly high mountain,” not because I was on a mountain (because it was somewhere a bit higher than that), but because that is the recitation/the scriptural descriptor that gets used in order to talk about how such an encounter takes place. And to be caught up and to be in the presence of, you know, a man dressed in white who had a very specific message... I mean, I can quote it still! It was not audible, but it was clearly communicated and in language I understand. “On the first day of the third month in nine years, your ministry will begin. And so you must prepare.” That seemed like... I mean, this person was as somber and as serious and grave a personage as you would ever encounter on the Federal Bench. It was a person who was clearly entrusted to deliver a message, and the message was spoken with some considerable sobriety and clarity. And you know, I don't think that I felt intimidated. But what I did feel was a sense of the legitimacy of this person and the inadequacy of myself, the bonafides of this personage and the ill-preparedness of myself. And it puzzled me at the moment, but it puzzled me a great deal more as I thought about it. I mean, that just sounded like something that was not to be questioned but to be accepted. So I accepted it. But the whole of the incident to me at the time seemed like, "That's normal!" I mean, if you're Mormon, that's the way that this religion... This is how the New Testament began. This is what was encountered when Zachariah went into the temple, and he prayed on behalf of Israel, and Gabriel emerges from the veil on the right side of the altar, and announces that he's Gabriel, who stand in the presence of God (Luke 1:4 RE). It was a source of truth and light and unquestionable authority. And so, I accepted it.

SP: Wow!

DS: But the more time went on them, the more questions it raised.

SP: Sure! It was a very peculiar thing, and you would soon realize it because it wasn't something that was normal.

Just a few things: Would you describe it as a dream? An out-of-body experience? When you say "caught up," where were you before and after it happened? And if, like, somebody was with you... You said "Whether in the body or out of the body, I cannot tell," if somebody was with you (like a roommate or someone next to you), would they see you get caught up?

DS: I doubt it. It was extraordinarily physical, tangible. But I doubt that they would have observed anything had they been there. I was...

SP: So it was physical, but you would... Could you say it was kind of an out-of-body experience?

DS: I... Yes, I can say that if I had to guess, it was likely that I was out of the body, but it did not at all seem so. I had the same tangibility: The thing on which I stood was as solid as a tile floor in a military barracks; the walls (although they were transparent) were as physical as a sheetrock wall. Everything about it was tangible and physical in that sense, but whether in the body or out of the body, I'm... I absolutely could not tell. But I believe it was out of the body. And when the incident ended and I was dismissed, I returned.

SP: Wow.

DS: I recall a return. And then I was still awake and still as tangible as I had been before, but I didn't feel any, like, transition out of the body I occupy and transition back into the body I occupy. It felt exactly the same throughout. And afterwards... I was in a military barracks at the time that this occurred. I was still in the military barracks when it ended. And I was left, you know, puzzling over it and assuming that this was normal.

SP: So were you praying at the time? Were you looking for this? Were you expecting it? Or did it just all of a sudden happen?

DS: It happened without me trying to provoke it. It happened as if it were on someone else's scheduled timetable and not on my own. But I have to admit, I had been... When I joined the LDS Church and I got baptized, I had been very serious about the religion. I got the conviction that what the missionaries were telling me was true and that I ought to respond to it, but I was somewhat skeptical of my capacity to be a good Mormon. I did go ahead, I did get baptized, and I did get an outpouring of the Spirit that occurred subsequent to the baptism—and I did find within myself a spiritual strength that I didn't feel like I had before entering the waters of baptism and accepting and [indecipherable]...

SP: I'm just curious: Did you speak in tongues, by chance?

DS: I was able to prophesy...

SP: Okay.

DS: ...but I don't... No, not tongues, but I was... I did prophesy.

SP: Okay. Okay, interesting.

DS: So yeah, it was a whole different life from the one I'd had before. It was as if someone had turned a light switch on. And now I understood things that I couldn't have... And the Scriptures, which had been relatively boring before then, came alive. There were things in the biblical texts that I found understandable for the first time—and fascinating, wonderful, encouraging. And before that, the Scriptures had been, you know, Our Daily Bread—if you can get through one verse and think about it, you've done a good thing. Now I was reading multiple chapters and enjoying them.

SP: Okay, so you started feasting on the word; you started devouring it and loving it and getting better understanding. That's really interesting to me, and that... Those kind of things resonate with me. You know, I come from a charismatic background. And I... There's a... One of the things I find interesting about you and your movement (you know, I know it's "loosely based") is that you speak a lot of the same language that a Born-again Christian charismatic would resonate with. And so I feel like when I talk to people from your group, I feel like I'm...that we speak the same language.

DS: Yeah.

SP: And I guess... I wanna be respectful of your time. So, I kind of want us... First of all, I wanted to kind of establish the early days of you/your ministry/your experiences with Evangelicals; it's very fascinating to me. I kind of... I just want...

So, of course, you go to law school, you have your law practice, and you're basically living a conventional LDS life—you would probably say, right? Okay. And then around the 2000s, you start publishing stuff—and it's really some interesting books that you start publishing—and then you start with lectures. Maybe just talk about what caused you to start engaging the Restoration differently than you had before and really, really starting to put stuff out and put yourself out there.

DS: Umm, the... There's a backdrop that you probably need to understand...

SP: Sure.

DS: ...in order to see what happened and why. When I became a Latter-day Saint, the top of the Latter-day Saint hierarchy was populated by scriptioners and preachers whose focus was upon parsing Scripture and parsing LDS history—and I mean:

Boyd Packer had been a seminary instructor before he became a general authority and an apostle;

Bruce R. McConkie had been a lawyer, but he had also undertaken to write multiple volumes of New Testament commentary, an ambitious book called Mormon Doctrine, multiple volumes preserving his father-in-law's ministerial content (much of which was parsing Scripture);

Marion G. Romney, who was the scriptioner who rarely gave a sermon that wasn't Scripture-based;

Mark E. Peterson, who wrote a series of books on the Patriarchal Fathers and explaining them.

DOCTRINE was the substance of general authority talks, general conference talks, books that were coming out. Over time that changed. One of the things that radically... And many people (even Latter-day Saints) wouldn't necessarily understand what I'm about to say, but it's nevertheless the case:

A man got called into the general authority ranks—Gordon B. Hinckley—who started the Public Relations Office of the LDS Church (who eventually rose to become the President of the LDS Church) who implemented a different way of approaching things. He, as a public relations official, had kept up on what businesses had discovered were useful in managing a multi-national corporate entity, including “opinion poll” taking, “focus group” testing, and using the tools of advertising in order to shape the message of what it was that you're going to deliver. And so, Mormonism shifted from being doctrinally-based to being, essentially, sales-based and advertising-based and public relations-based—and the transition necessitated a different kind of leader to be called. And so the ranks that the highest level of the hierarchy in the LDS Church today reflects that different set of priorities. You have business instructors that college business instructors that are members, bankers, car salesmen who are engaged in marketing. You've got... When Gordon B. Hinckley died and Thomas S. Monson took over, at the press conference (when he was being interviewed as the newly-called President of the LDS Church), Thomas Monson made the remark that “You should not expect any big changes; it'll be steady as you go,” which was, in reality, it was his way of saying, “We have an infrastructure. The infrastructure got built by Gordon B. Hinckley. He did it from the 1930s until the year 2000, working in the hierarchy of the LDS Church. And that infrastructure's there, and I'm gonna rely on it, and so it's going to be steady as you go. Don't expect any big changes. I'm gonna continue this process.”

For me, individually, I could not have explained it to you in the way that I just did, but I FELT it. I could sense that the church was drifting.

SP: Okay, and roughly, what year was this?

DS: Late '70s/early '80s and into the '90s.

SP: Okay.

DS: And one of the things that had most appealed to me as a convert to this religious movement (the Restoration, Mormonism, the Latter-day Saint Church) was the... The encounter of Joseph Smith in the grove with a visionary encounter with the Father and the Son is the commencement of the whole of it. And that was based upon some verses that you find in the 14th chapter of the Gospel of John, and it's where Christ, preliminary to going to be crucified... Now, He's telling His apostles about what's going to happen. And the record of that gospel says that the apostles couldn't get their hands around this. He's telling them things, they're going to record it in their gospel (John, in particular), but they weren't understanding it as Christ is conveying this to them. But he says, "I'm gonna go away, but don't worry. I won't leave you comfortless. I will send the Comforter, AND...." He goes on to say that "...I will come to you." So there's a Comforter (the Holy Ghost) that He's going to send. And then He says that He—the Lord—will also come to them (this will be post-crucifixion). And then He goes on to say that when He comes to them, He's going to prepare them so that He—Christ—and the Father can take up their abode with them. So John records that. (By the time he records his gospel, he does have his hands around all this, and he is explaining something that is a fundamental part of his gospel and, I think, the message of Christianity.)

But that promise and that message largely lay fallow in the Christian community but was realized in the experience of Joseph Smith. And to me, that was bedrock; that was foundational; that was the message of the gospel. And I could see that message everywhere in the Book of Mormon where, in the first book, you begin with Nephi in a struggle to try and get his hands around and believe what his father is testifying to after his father had had this heavenly encounter. And then Nephi, similarly, walks that path and has an encounter with the divine, and then he becomes a prophet. And then the next writer in the Book of Mormon, Jacob, does exactly the same thing. And I'm seeing that it is embedded not only into the story of Joseph Smith but into the text of the Book of Mormon itself. And so I believed this stuff, I wanted this stuff, and I prayed for this stuff.

But I have to candidly admit that I had been a member of the LDS movement for decades and I had sought for and asked for these things, and while I had had profound spiritual experiences and encounters beyond the veil, I had not encountered the Lord coming to comfort me; I had certainly not encountered the Lord and His Father taking up their abode with me. And as a consequence of that, I knew my journey had not completed; so I asked for that.

You've had people on... I listened to one interview where a fellow was talking about Masonry and Mormonism and some of the similarities, and he talked about some of the list of things that you can find in an LDS temple endowment and what you find in the Masonic tradition. So without elaborating where it would be inappropriate to do so, I took that "true order of prayer" idea, I dressed in the robes, I gave the signs and the tokens, I made the recitation for the true order of prayer, and I prayed (in my house, alone, with a makeshift altar using an ottoman), and literally asked, you know, that I'd be able to converse with the Lord and enter into His presence, just as the temple ceremony suggests, and you know, wrapped that up and waited expectantly. And after some period of tiring on my knees, I got up and put all my temple clothing away and put them back in the closet, went on with life. Puzzled over that for some time and ultimately concluded that, for whatever reason, that just was not in the cards. And so I began to reflect upon all that I HAD received. And I realized that I was really kind of ungrateful. I was one of those people that was wanting more instead of being thankful for what I'd been given.

SP: Okay.

DS: And I HAD been given much. And so my attitude changed from disappointment and frustration to gratitude and acknowledgment that if nothing else ever happened, that I had been given enough and that I had an assurance that the Lord knew who I was and that He had committed to me an opportunity that was phenomenal. I had taught gospel doctrine and priesthood for nearly three decades. I had learned and studied and grown and been faithful. And I just gave up on that and instead focused on my gratitude to God for all that had been given. And unexpectedly and without me doing (as far as I could tell)...

SP: So now, this is February 13, 2003?

DS: Yes.

SP: Okay. So do you...

DS: Without doing anything to provoke it...

SP: Well, can I just... I want to ask you, and I want you to talk about it, it says (in the 2006 book you wrote, The Second Comforter), you wrote that "when your faith [is] in His ordinances is secure enough that seeing Him will produce no further conviction of His word, no greater confidence in Him and no additional confirmation than what you have already, you are prepared to receive Him" (The Second Comforter, Chapter 12: In the Ordinances Thereof, p. 266). And that's... You feel that was what was preparatory to having your face-to-face encounter with Jesus.

DS: Yes, I think that is exactly what's required. Because if what you're doing is trying to find the Lord to have faith in Him, I think you've got a struggle ahead of you before you're ever gonna get there. I had within me a conviction of the truthfulness of the whole of this, that the Scriptures coming alive had done something within me; the effort to obey the Lord had done something within me. I had had personal difficulties in life; I'd had tragedies in life—none of them had made me doubt and all of them had made me draw closer to and rely upon the Lord more. And I had the conviction that, without any question, He is real, His work is real, He is actually doing something to prepare the Earth for His return. That isn't limited to a handful of really faithful Mormons. That stirring is going on everywhere in the world, and people are feeling it. It's an awakening that touches many people AND agitates many people; the tares and the wheat are separating from one another. And wheat—whether you find them in the Evangelical community or in Catholicism or in Islam—there are wheat growing everywhere, and there are tares everywhere, and the tares are becoming more militant and less caring and less godly. So, I knew that God existed, and I knew that He had taken note of me, and I did not need to feel the prints in His hands (like Thomas did) in order to say, “Our Lord has risen.”

SP: Oh! Okay, so I just have to ask you, so would you describe this as a visitation or a visionary experience? When you say that you didn't HAVE to touch his palms, DID you? Did you... Were you afforded the opportunity to actually touch and feel the Savior like He would have had done in Third Nephi?

DS: Yeah, yes. And the answer is the initial encounter had as its very specific purpose... Umm, again, this is probably somewhat at odds with what I was saying before—but it was apocalyptic. The first encounter was what I would call right squarely in the tradition of Apocalypticism. And its purpose was to orient me for purposes that would later unfold. But it was abundantly clear to me... (And the encounter is now, actually, it's been canonized in a set of Scripture we call the Teachings and Commandments.) It has... That was the first encounter, but there have been others, and the others have been tutorial. The purpose has not been to reassure me; the purpose has been to educate me.

SP: Okay, so I'm really curious—because it's almost like you have a reverse encounter that people don't normally have with Jesus. In other words, you almost had like an encounter with Jesus of the book of Revelation—right?...

DS: Yes.

SP: ...at the first encounter, and then your further encounters are almost like you're being taught by the Savior, like He would have been doing His earthly ministry.

DS: Right.

SP: And so, you have this opportunity to engage in conversation with Him. Do you... Are there times when He gives you a hug? Do you hug Him? Do you embrace Him? Do you feel Him? Have you had a chance to feel the prints, His handprints? And how tangential of an experience is this?

DS: Okay. I've told this to a few people; I guess there's no reason not to just tell it and have it out there. Well, the answer is, “Yes” to your questions. But let me talk to you about a singular intimate moment, okay?

Almost everything... While the Lord doesn't convey in communication in a way that vibrates the air, it's a higher form of communication that is abundantly more clear. It conveys thought itself, clarity itself, understanding itself, and it's left to you... You comprehend it, but it's left to you—if you want to—to convert it into English; it's left to you to explain it in words. It is bigger than and more inclusive than the words themselves. And so, it's not necessarily accurate to say, "Okay, He said this to me." He conveyed this to me, and I'm telling you what it was that got conveyed. So, understand that. And then second of all, there came this moment where, in a series of what I would call educational encounters—I had been tutored; I had been taught; I had been shown; I had experienced; I had witnessed things that helped me get my hands around things—there came this moment when, in the presence of the Lord, He reached out His hand, and He touched my eyes.

SP: Okay!

DS: And when He touched my eyes... There are phrases in the Scriptures that... For example, Lehi says, "He saw and heard much." In the Pearl of Great Price, book of Moses, Moses encounters the Lord, and he describes it as having seen "the ends of the Earth and all the things that went on from the beginning to the end." And it's just a summary statement. Paul describes it as "seeing and hearing unspeakable things." And so, understand that Scriptures bear testimony of such things being shown. They don't give you, necessarily, an adequate preparation so that in encountering it, you can say, "Yeah, yeah, that's exactly what happened!"

What happened: He touches my eyes, and everything (past, present, future) in a—the only word I can think of is—a cacophony. It's just vast, without beginning and end. It is a vast assortment. And it is not arranged chronologically. It is...

The prophecies of Isaiah, as he's parsing through, he will grab an event that occurred before his time, he will prophesy about things occurring in his time, and he will mix in things that will happen in the future in the same verse/in the same paragraph/in the same thought. And so, what Isaiah did—and Nephi copied the Isaiah prophecy and adopted it as his own—what Isaiah and Nephi did was to organize (what they got their hands around) thematically, so that the chronology is not anchored... We live in a linear world; it is unanchored from that. It is past, present, and future amalgamated into a singular statement. And so, the Lord, touching my eyes, this is happening, and to me... I mean, I live the kind of life that every other human lives—it's linear. I used to be 9 years old, and then I was 10; and I used to be 30, and then I'm 31; my life happens chronologically. And when I think about my life, I look back upon my life, and it's always organized linearly and chronologically—and this stuff is not. And I mean, I, literally, I... This sounds so stupid, I literally said to the Lord, "I can't take this in. You have to use words."

SP: Okay.

DS: I mean, it's like I'm talking to a child: "You have to use your words," you know? "I can't take it in." I mean, I'm protesting. "This is too much for a human to try and organize. I cannot take this in. You really have to TALK to me; you have to TELL me. This needs to be, like, the way you've communicated... It needs to go back to that." And the Lord responded to that. I mean, I'm in the midst of having this all unfold, but He still responded to that. And understand: I'm going to take and put into English words the reaction of the Lord to my protest. And if I were putting them into English words—the nearest I can come to what His response was—was, "Yeah, I get that a lot..."

SP: [laughter]

DS: ...like, "You're not the first one..."

SP: Okay...

DS: "You're not the first one to complain about that!"

SP: This is truly fascinating!

DS: Here is what that led me, then, to understand—and I believe this to be very, very important. I believe that when the Lord invests that into someone and exposes them to that, that the person to whom that has been given can either walk away, leave it alone, and say, "That's extraordinary! Someday on the other side of the veil, when I'm not confined to this body of dust, it'll be neat to live in an environment where that is possible." And that's it. But my read of the Scriptures tells me that there HAVE been those—and among them are Isaiah, on the one hand, as a clear example; Ezekiel, John the Revelator, Nephi—there are those who have prayerfully gone back to draw upon that and to try to parse it apart and to try to comprehend and to prayerfully take what had been bestowed and to turn it into something other than a cacophony and to turn it into comprehension. And I believe that when Joseph Smith wrote his letter (when he was in exile in that September 1843 time period)...

[responding to noise in the background] That's my...

SP: [indecipherable]

DS: ...ring-necked parrot whistling in the background.

I believe that when Joseph wrote that letter and described the events of the Restoration and all of the visitations that he had received, he was attempting to convey to us his way of parsing it out and trying to dispense it in a way that allowed others to try and get their hands around [indecipherable]...

SP: Well, this is the thing. I mean, you know, these historical figures that have had these encounters with the divine, and in your kind of relaying what their experiences would be... The difference is I had the opportunity to interview somebody who has had these experiences. I can't go—and maybe YOU can—but I can't talk to them. And I want to know just a few things about this, 'cuz this is one of the top questions people have had is that they want to know a few things.

Well, first of all, I want to know, is this a visitation? Or is this a visionary experience? If I were in the room with you, would I see Jesus? What does Jesus look like? And, you know, those are some basic questions people have that they really want to know.

DS: We haven't talked about the Gethsemane account...

SP: And that's key. That's key.

DS: Yeah, we haven't talked about that. But let me tell you...

Sometimes I think details are better left out than included because, you know, fools mock, but they'll mourn. So I'm still not gonna give altogether a complete...

SP: And you don't have to, but I think it's important that, you know, you've had this privilege to encounter the Savior.

DS: Sure, sure.

SP: And there are so many people out there who love Jesus, and they want to have that encounter with Him. And I just thought this could be an opportunity for it to be an encouraging, edifying word that you give the audience about the Savior. So when I'm asking you questions, it's really genuine because I know a lot of people just want to know. And I know that you have this... If you don't want to just talk about too many details, that's fine. But give us something that the people can kind of, like, "Okay, I get it now!" I... Maybe something you haven't said before, a descript... Some kind of description that you could share with the audience.

DS: Yeah, let me do that because it's probably useful to hear some of this. There was a morning when I woke up at a usual hour (it was a work day for me because I know that later I went to the office, and I worked), and almost always when I have a workday, my kids had a school day. And so, I got up at the usual hour, and it was odd because no one else in the house was awake. And you know, I have nine kids, and at any given moment, most of them are home. I got up. I took a shower. I was alone, despite the fact that the house was occupied. Everyone was asleep. And after I had taken a shower and I was preparing for the day, I encountered the Lord. Everyone in the house was in a deep sleep that was unusual. My belief is that had they been awake, they would have known what was going on.

SP: Okay!

DS: Therefore, they were in a deep sleep. And in that moment, there were things that were unfolded about the Lord and the Lord's sacrifice that literally brought me to tears. I was emotionally drained from the encounter. After it ended and after I had no more presence going on than an empty house with a bunch of people asleep in bed, when it ended, everyone woke up!

SP: Oh!

DS: And everyone went about their daily business. And I could not speak—not because I was deaf or mute; it was because I was so emotional that I had a very hard time saying anything. I was rather thunderstruck by it all. And so while everyone was getting ready and my wife was... I just bid people farewell, and I got in my vehicle and went to the office—and I cried on the way to the office because it had been so troubling. And when I tried to work that day, I didn't... I couldn't get anywhere. Fortunately, it was one of those paperwork days where I could punt, and I came home early. And when I came home, I sat on the fireplace in the far end of this room, and I just wept for a while. And, you know, my wife thought there was something really, really wrong. And when I could compose myself enough, I tried to explain to her some of it. But it was literally DAYS before I could talk about it in a way that was coherent for her, because it was draining, it was troubling, and it allowed me to understand that what the Lord has done in order to redeem us is... The enormity of that sacrifice defies our ability to even articulate it. And the debt of gratitude that we owe to Him for what He has done is something that, you know, we talk about, we celebrate, and we are grateful for, but when it becomes deeply personal and in the way that He can convey, it's a troubling, troubling thing to us.

SP: Interesting.

DS: We don't deserve what He went through...

SP: Okay.

DS: ...to redeem us, and it's practically incomprehensible for us to get there.

Now, I do want to say something that you haven't asked...

SP: Okay.

DS: ...but thematically it fits right within the line of inquiry that you're asking about. And I assume that this would be very useful for the pure in heart.

I do think that every time I talk about something that is spiritual or that is otherworldly, that there are craven individuals out there who are imitative, who are looking to get attention, and all that they do with it is invent a better bunch of misrepresentations. But I'm gonna go ahead and risk that because, mostly, they're out for their own gain. I think I've made it clear that I get nothing out of anything I'm doing and that everything I do requires me to sacrifice. I don't get compensated, I pay to attend, I pay to transport, I bear my own way in life, and no one... I never solicit for myself. (I do for other causes that help people.) But for myself, if I can't sacrifice, then I won't do it. I don't get gain.

So, having said that, there was an encounter with the Lord... You can find examples of this in Scripture, too. And these are real. You find it with the twelve apostles in the New Testament, you find it with the disciples that Christ called in the Book of Mormon (Third Nephi), where the Lord essentially says (and this is a paraphrase of Scripture to a person who arrives at this specific point in the progress of the Lord's plan of redemption; you arrive at a point where the Lord says, to paraphrase), "Ask of me what you will, and it shall be granted to you." And we have the responses of various apostles.

Now, I got an encounter with the Lord in which that opportunity presented itself, "Ask of me what you will, and it shall be granted to you." And whether this was the best answer or the right answer, it was truly, at that moment, authentically, genuinely MY answer. I said, "I have not come thus far by doing my own will. I ask nothing of you." And I meant it; I felt it. In my heart, that was the most genuine, heartfelt response I'd ever given to any question posed to me at any time.

That was a moment when something very, very startling occurred—because I am standing in the presence of the Lord, the Lord is addressing me, and the two of us are in this conversation. And I've just told Him, "I want nothing. I haven't come thus far by doing my own will. I'm content." And I meant it. I was genuinely content.

At that moment, it was as if a veil lifted, and now there were numerous others who were there who apparently had been there all along...

SP: Okay.

DS: ...and who had been listening, watching, eavesdropping, participating. And at that moment, it was as if a veil that had been there disappeared. And now there are a number of others who are present. And the reaction... Again, these are communications that come that I have to convert into English. So I'm gonna use English words, that...

SP: I'm just really curious, was Joseph Smith there?

DS: There were a host of others there.

SP: "A host of others." Could you identify them?

DS: I could for you if I needed to. But let's stay with what I'm about to say.

SP: Sure, understood.

DS: Because the reaction that came was genuine approval:

"This is what we've been looking for."

"At last."

"We can use this."

"Now we have found it."

"This will do."

"We approve."

If... I did not understand, first of all, why they were there; second of all, why they had any say in this matter; and thirdly, why they were reacting the way they were. But the overall impression that I had, as I reflect upon it, is that the Lord had one view of what He thought He could achieve using me—despite all my limitations, despite all my inadequacies, He for some reason had some level of confidence in me—but that there were numerous others who were behind the veil who have a stake in their posterity or maybe in the future (I don't know what their investment was or is), but they were there skeptical, and at that moment, the skepticism was at last resolved.

SP: Okay. And this was like a Heavenly Council, wouldn't you say?

DS: That's exactly what it was.

SP: It was a Heavenly Council, wow.

DS: And the reaction was one of approval or... I mean, “This is what we've been looking for. This will work. We can use this. This...” The overall reaction was like minds just got changed...

SP: Okay.

DS: ...like attitudes just got altered; like whereas before, “not so much,” now it's “this is something with which the work that we need to have accomplished can now move forward...”

SP: Now this sounds SO significant, I need to know, what date did this happen?

DS: Uhh, I... Honestly, I haven't talked about it in public, and I haven't written... I... It's all in my journal; I would have to go back and read and research...

SP: I'm just really curious to see, like, was anything else happening in the world events, signs (maybe) that maybe other people were seeing? Yeah, I'd be curious.

DS: That's a great question! Because there are—as it turns out—there are a lot of correlations between things in the world...

SP: Right.

DS: ...and things that I've encountered. But I haven't gone back and tracked that. And now that you've raised that up, I probably will...

SP: Yeah.

DS: ...and I'm probably gonna regret having talked about it.

SP: Oh, no, this is okay. Hey, I just... One thing I wanted to ask you...

[crosstalk]

DS: The answer to one question leads to ten more, and sometimes... There are many, many things that... People who are sincere and attentive and who are familiar with their Bible—I mean, even if all they're familiar with is the Old Testament—if they're familiar with their Bible, if they're familiar with both the Old and the New Testament, and in particular, if they're attentive to the Restoration Scriptures, much of what is sacred and is holy and is found in Scripture is delicious to them, and they prize it, and they value it. They don't mock it. They don't take, you know, “wheels within wheels” of Ezekiel and turn it into a carnival ride and mock and ridicule. The problem with discussing things that are sacred with those for whom little or nothing is sacred...

SP: Yeah.

DS: ...is that they then mock at their own peril.

SP: Right.

DS: You know, Nephi ended his record by saying, “Look, I'm gonna seal up this record with my testimony, and you're gonna be held to account in the day of judgment for how you respond to what I'm writing here because I do this with God's approval.” So when you do or convey information that has as its source God Himself, then the burden shifts from the one who is reporting the news to the one who hears the news, and they become accountable for responding to it.

I know that there are a number of people who are very serious about their evangelical faith and who live good lives who, being warned with a message that is current and modern and being spoken by someone who can say, “I have been in the presence of the Lord,” is off-putting to them. And what arises first is both skepticism and the suspicion that the person is in this and telling this story somehow to aggrandize themselves.

SP: Yeah.

DS: I can tell you that I have never had an encounter with the Lord that did not leave me feeling foolish, feeling inadequate, feeling ill-fitted for the Lord's purposes. I do not think I'm much of anything. In fact, at times I am completely puzzled by why I would be asked to engage in accomplishing anything that is sacred or on the Lord's errand because I am as ordinary... I have said in multiple meetings to multiple audiences that people in the audience have lived better lives than I had. And I meant it. And if I were guessing right now, I would say to YOU that your life is probably lived in as a better example of the Christian ideal than has my life been lived as an example of the Christian ideal. But I take into account (when I say that), the things that I did before I was baptized, the things that I did before I felt myself “born again,” the things that I did when I was, you know, struggling to just be an onlooker in the Baptist faith, trying to do what my mom taught me that I ought to do. Since being baptized, I've tried to live the Christian ideal. But again, there are people whose lives—if you are looking at them top-to-bottom, day in/day out—you would say, “They live a better life than does Denver.” And I readily admit that. I don't think I'm much of anything. But I do think that the encounters I've had are real...

SP: Okay.

DS: ...the Lord is real, and that your confidence ought to be in Him. And even if you think that He makes a bad choice in me, for whatever reason, maybe He does that deliberately because, in His view, we do tend to want more from one another than we're able to give. So look to Him, because He's the giver of every good gift. We aren't much more than the receiver and abuser and unappreciative recipient of the good gifts that He does give. And so, I hesitate in talking about things that are sacred and holy.

SP: Sure. Well, I wanted to ask you this, because I think maybe... A lot of people have had visionary experiences with the Savior. Many artists, under inspiration, have created paintings and artworks. So the question I have for you is: Is there a particular art piece of artwork or a painting of the Savior that you look at and say, “They got it right!”?

DS: Yes, there is one, but I don't want to go there!

SP: Okay.

DS: But you mentioned a lot of people who get inspiration and who have had wonderful encounters. There's a verse in the Book of Mormon that I want to read. And I... This ought to make Mormons more broad-minded than they are. But unfortunately, Mormons aren't.

For behold, the Lord doth grant unto all nations, of their own nation and tongue, to teach his word, yea, in wisdom, all that he seeth fit that they should have; therefore, we see that the Lord doth counsel in his wisdom, according to that which is just and true. (Alma 15:13 RE)

That verse in the Book of Mormon suggests that there are people who are having authentically profound, religiously valid, true encounters across Evangelical/Catholic/Islam/Buddhist/Hindu lines that originate from the Father of Lights, the Giver of good gifts, and they are REAL—and that we should not assume that because we have received some portion of His word that we can chauvinistically say, “Yeah, we own salvation, but others do not.” Everything is going to be brought together in one, at some point. And if you were going to be fair about things, you would say the Western/Christian mind is task-oriented and thing-oriented; and the Eastern/Hindu/Buddhist/Taoist mind is virtue-minded and conceptual, and it's the things of the heart and the spirit and the feeling. And that the coarseness of the West and the spiritualism of the East are really fragments of ONE; they're not whole until you unify them all together in Christ. And that there is a... There was a Savior. He did come. He did sacrifice Himself to fulfill the law that requires justice. He allowed Himself in innocence to be slain as if He were a sinner. That offended the law of justice, and it made possible mercy. And a merciful God (who paid a price that is incomprehensibly large to us) is not going to waste that sacrifice by bestowing it in a stingy way. It's going to be spread as far and as wide—as mercifully—as it is possible for Him to do. And if you get some portion of His word that tells you virtue consists in treating your fellow man as you would like yourself to be treated (which is one of the principles He articulated in the Sermon on the Mount and in the sermon at Bountiful), then you've lived a precept that is high and noble and virtuous.

And one thing that the Apostle Paul mentions in his letter to the Corinthians is being baptized for the dead. And one thing that Joseph Smith taught (and the LDS Church practices in their temples) is being baptized for the dead. If it is true that you live a virtue that reflects Christ's teaching of doing unto others as you would be done by, and you've lived that, and you find that the author of mercy is Jesus Christ and you're willing to accept baptism, then the letter to the Corinthians and the practice of the Mormons allows someone to tie into the baptismal requirement. And so, how broad and how wide and how merciful will a Lord who sacrificed Himself as a lamb without blemish be willing to apply His Atonement in order to save as many as possible? And I think we tend to narrow our focus and to say, “As long as the door to salvation is wide enough for ME to squeeze through, even if it's a tight fit, then I'm perfectly content to squeeze through that door and then shut it behind me and say, ‘Let all the Muslims and let all the Hindus and let all the Catholics and let all... You know, those Evangelicals even bother me because I'm Mormon. Let them all stay out and go to hell!" But the Lord, I think, has a contrary view and that...

SP: Okay.

DS: ...verse in the Book of Mormon suggests to me that God's Spirit out-pouring and His light is extended as far and as wide as He can reach to every nation, and everyone gets SOME of it.

SP: Okay, this is great. Now, I want to be respectful of your time, and I just want to ask cover a couple of things and then I people have been asking about. And basically, one of the things is that while you have gone out of your way to emphasize the decentralized nature of your movement ("it's not a church"), you offer three elements that effectively define the church: [one,] authority to perform ordinances; [two,] maintenance and distribution of Scripture; and three, community in which to affiliate with other adherents. Can you concede that although your movement is not a church, it does quack like a church?

DS: Not in the sense of any denomination that exists...

SP: Okay.

DS: ...because every organization has boundaries that require you to acknowledge your status "in" or "out" of, to the exclusion of others.

SP: Okay.

DS: And I have said, if a Catholic priest wants to be baptized by us, I would baptize the Catholic priest, and I would be content to allow him to continue...

[crosstalk]

SP: ...as a Catholic priest—but they would need to be baptized into your movement, though.

DS: Yes, they would need to be baptized in order to accept an ordinance. You can be a Methodist and accept baptism. You can be a Baptist. You can be whatever you want to be in addition to accepting this message. It's not jealous in the sense of a church being jealous.

SP: Okay.

DS: It's not structural; there is no hierarchy. The purpose is to lead people to a point of spiritual maturity so that we're not teams divided against one another...

SP: Okay.

DS: ...but we come with open arms, willing to accept any who are willing to acknowledge the Lord and be received by Him.

SP: So this is not an incorporated church. This is not a physical church. This doesn't have the hierarchy. But could you argue that it's spiritually a church?

DS: As the Lord defines a church in the revelation of Joseph Smith, it would fit that definition...

SP: Okay.

DS: ...but as the world defines a church, it doesn't work.

SP: Right.

DS: We gather in fellowships that are informal, and people pay tithes into the fellowship. But the money that gets paid in as tithing then gets turned around and distributed to people who are in need, first of all within that fellowship, and then... I know that there was one particular fellowship that didn't have any needs with the group that they were gathering tithes [with], and they had accumulated a lot of money in the fellowship, and they had learned about someone that who was handicapped and had a pretty significant transportation need and an inability to get anywhere; they used the aggregated tithe money to go out and buy a handicap van to relieve this handicapped person of the inability to get transportation from place to place. And the purpose of the tithing isn't to support a ministry. In fact, if you're gonna be a minister, you're gonna have to sacrifice in order to accomplish it. There's a website, I think it's called bornofwater.com or bornofwater.org. In any way In any event, that website allows people, wherever they are in the world, to request baptism, and someone will—on their own nickel—travel wherever they need to travel to perform the ordinance and then to return. And no one needs to compensate them for the cost of the sacrifice.

SP: Well, it sounds to me like you're a New Testament church.

DS: Pretty much! It's pretty much modeled on the New Testament system in the sense that they were really divergent groups that... I mean...

SP: Yeah...

DS: They were...

SP: ...and they were decentralized.

DS: Yes, yes! And not only decentralized, but they were markedly different from congregation to congregation and place to place. And the twelve apostles were sent out in twelve different directions with twelve different messages that were based upon their experience with the Lord, and they created systems of worship that were reflective. And I say, "twelve," because I include Paul within that and not Judas.

SP: Got it.

So I guess I want to... Again, I don't want to take too much more of your time. But I want to talk a little bit about "end times." On the 10th of September, 2011, the Lord told you that Your name shall be called David (T&C 162:1). Are you the long-prophesied end-time Davidic servant?

DS: I don't... First of all, I don't know. Second of all, I don't claim that. And thirdly, to me, the name wasn't welcome. I didn't view that as a positive. I viewed that as... I was thinking of King David, the adulterer who killed Uriah. I had taught the Old Testament as a gospel doctrine teacher, and one of my heroes in the Old Testament was Joab. Between Joab (who literally was the only person that scared David; he threatened him if he didn't stop mourning over Absalon, you know, "Clean yourself up! You've got men out there who fought for you and your kingdom. Stop mourning the death of this rebellious son!" Joab, against the orders of David, ran Absalon through with the sword. He was a hero to me, Joab) and then Nathan, the prophet (I named a son of mine "Nathan." Nathan the prophet went into David and told him the story of the poor man with the one ewe lamb and the rich man with his flocks who came and stole his lamb and slew it to make a feast, and David said, "That man shall surely die." And Nathan the prophet says, "Thou art the man. That's you, David." This is a king who has murdered one of the captains of his army being confronted by Nathan the prophet)... David, to me, was the far end of the spectrum. He was not the ideal.

Joab? Gimme that name.

SP: I see.

DS: Nathan? Gimme that name.

David? David, the loathsome, indulgent king who betrayed the trust of his general, who killed to cover his adultery? Not a good name.

So, I have said this, and I mean this, and I think this is the right answer:

Someone is going to accomplish some things on the Lord's errand. The accomplishment of the things that the Lord seeks to have done IS the identifier. Sitting back and claiming that you are something, having accomplished nothing, is not only vain and arrogant and foolish, it's completely unjustified. There's not a person breathing—you and me included—who cannot fail the Lord, who cannot turn in their weakness and in their depravity to doing something that makes them utterly unfit for the work.

I haven't accomplished anything that would justify calling me much more than someone who can testify that the Lord lives, He's gracious, and that He is trustworthy and faithful. If I get some things done someday and it proves to be of value to the Lord and for the salvation of our fellow man, then you can say the Lord used a fool to accomplish some good things.

SP: Okay.

DS: But I haven't done that yet, and someone is going to...

SP: I see.

DS: ...and when they do, it could be anyone. And I will salute whoever gets it done.

SP: So we are... Many people believe we are living in the last days. Within the context of your movement, there is apparently going to possibly, one day, a temple be built. If that happens, does that mean the return of the Savior is imminent?

DS: Assuming that the temple built is populated by men and women of faith, virtue, and cleanliness before the Lord, yes!

SP: Okay. So as an Evangelical, I just want to ask, so should... If that temple gets built, should we be paying close attention to what's happening in the world?

DS: I would say yes. I would say that, all along, there have been some milestones that have been achieved all along the way. And while the Earth has paid very little notice to some of them (and it's clearly not understood, many of them), I've taken note of them, and I've tried to keep a faithful record in a journal. And there have been signs all along the way. Things have corresponded. And yes, I believe if a temple gets built and gets accepted by the Lord (and it has to be accepted by Him in order to be His house), then I would say, "Pay attention to goings-on."

SP: And should we pay attention to the physical, like, location of where it's built?

DS: Probably.

SP: Okay.

DS: Yeah.

SP: I mean, like, would there be significance in the particular place where the Lord would choose, right?

DS: Yeah, I think there's significance to everything the Lord does, yeah, every single thing. I think the exile from the Mississippi river banks out to a barren, salty desert (that is now becoming increasingly more toxic), all of that stuff is deliberate...

SP: Okay.

DS: ...planned, and the Lord speaks... He speaks in everything. All things bear testimony of Him. If you want, perhaps, the most perfect sermon about Jesus Christ, just look at the life of a monarch butterfly.

SP: Okay.

DS: The whole thing, from beginning to end is an allegory of our Lord.

SP: That's really cool. Monarch butterfly...

DS: The pupa...

SP: The King!

DS: ...the chrysalis, to the monarch, to the migration across continents. A butterfly! And I know when it will not snow here when the monarch butterflies return.

SP: Okay, so if you build a temple, do you think you will have an image of a monarch butterfly on the temple?

DS: Boy, I should, shouldn't I?

SP: I think it would be a good idea!

DS: That might be a great idea!

SP: Well, Denver, you know, I had a blast talking with you today. Now, I know you don't normally do interviews, but thank you so much for honoring me and this program for coming on today.

DS: Well, I listened to a few of your interviews and enjoyed them before committing. You talked to a fellow about Mormonism and Masonry. I have a lot I could say about that interview...

SP: Come back on!

DS: ...which I enjoyed, by the way.

SP: What's that?

DS: I thought it was very good. And someday I might just plunge into that area and articulate what it is that I think those similarities might truly mean. But that's another day, another interview...

SP: Yeah!

DS: ...a bigger subject. Anyway, I enjoyed it; relatively painless! But I am gonna go to work now.

SP: All right, sir. Hey, thank you so much again!

Denver, you have an open invitation to come on the program anytime you want to talk about whatever you want. Thanks for coming on today.

DS: Well, you're welcome. And I do want to point out that I've talked to you about some serious and spiritual things that I have not spoken with some other interviewers about, and that is because of the spirit you bring with you and the propriety and the decorum that you deal with sacred things, which some others are not capable of.

SP: Thank you, Denver. I appreciate that. I appreciate that very much.

Folks, thanks for sharing your time with us today.

2022.08.20 Pure in Heart, Wise, Noble, Virtuous...

Hildale, Utah
August 20, 2022

DENVER: I've got this talk to give [placing a large pile of papers on the podium].

You've been sitting awhile. Why don't you stand up and stretch before I inflict another long-seated session on you? These are better chairs than some that have been used in talks I've given. And I assume if there's a chiropractor present, that they'll make themselves known as the afternoon wears on.

I don't care how long you stay standing; stretch until you feel able to sit again. I'm gonna go ahead and start.

I haven't come here to ask anything from you. I don't want any donation, nor for you to join anything. I just want to talk and hope to say something of interest to you.

For too long those who practice plural marriage have been looked upon as deceived enemies to be shunned. Shunning and excommunicating are how various church institutions prevent discourse and exchanging ideas. It's rooted in fear. And fear is the opposite of faith.

I have faith in Jesus Christ as Redeemer and Lord, and I don't fear having a dialogue with those who practice plural marriage. I've studied the subject that divides us from one another. I think I have reached a correct conclusion about it.

Whether you believe it was originally begun by Joseph Smith (perhaps as early as the 1830s) or was introduced by Brigham Young in 1852, it began in secret, protected from the expected opposition by lying to the public and denying the truth of it.

Like its beginning, it ended with lying to the public again. The 1890 "Manifesto" was a lie, intended to facilitate statehood for Utah. LDS plural marriages did not really end until April of 1904. The plan was to obtain statehood, become self-governing, and then adopt laws that permitted plural marriage. If pledges were made along the way to obtain statehood that were lies, it was worth the temporary difficulties and compromises. All would be fixed by statehood. The federal government, however, was aware of this intent and would not permit it. Before being granted statehood, the church would need to do more than compromise. They would need to utterly repudiate the practice, hence Official Declaration 1. They would need to "put it behind them." But it was a long time AFTER issuing Official Declaration #1 that the church (the LDS Church) came to the realization that it had to be abandoned.

There are libraries of material written about the beginning, spread, discontinuance, and opposition to this practice by the LDS Church. And there are libraries of material used to justify continuing the practice by various splinter groups after the LDS Church abandoned it. It requires a great deal of study—for me it took decades—to become informed enough to make what I think to be a correct decision about the events.

When I joined the LDS Church in 1973, the missionary who baptized me told me about the LDS General Conference that happened every October and April. I was baptized on September 10, 1973, and I was able to travel from New Hampshire and attend the October 1973 Semi-Annual General Conference of the Church a month after I was baptized. I stayed in Centerville [at] the home of the missionary who baptized me (because he managed to get his mother to invite me to come). Each morning during the conference, we got up for breakfast (which his mother prepared for the family), and when we entered the kitchen, the chairs were all turned away from the table so we could kneel, using the chair for a seat for our folded arms, to pray over both the meal and the coming day. The missionary had a lovely family, and I brought good tidings from them back to him when I returned following the conference.

Years later when I was a student at BYU and the returned missionary was working in Salt Lake City, we would go to lunch together. During one of those lunch discussions, I learned that his mother had become a plural wife while he was on his mission. He was opposed to her doing that but shared with me a selection of materials his mother had studied that led her to accept the principle of plural wives. This began my search into the subject.

At first, I was persuaded that it was a true teaching, restored through Joseph Smith, and would be part of our eternal families. Like many members of the LDS Church, I accepted section 132 as authentic, although the church and the law prohibited its practice. I thought it was important, and my study of it has continued ever since (now nearly five decades later). As recently as 2011, I still thought the practice originated with Joseph Smith and was authentic.

In the last few years, a great deal of new historical material has become publicly available. As a result, I've changed my mind. I no longer believe it to be attributable to Joseph Smith, nor to be an authentic part of the Restoration, nor approved by God. But I assure you, I do understand that Fundamentalists sincerely believe otherwise. I don't question that conviction, and I don't question that you believe it to have come from God through Joseph Smith. I just don't share that conviction. I think you've inherited a tradition from your misled fathers and have, no doubt, entered into the relationship relying on that tradition. But in the Book of Mormon, "traditions" were almost always "false" or wicked.

I doubt you'll change your mind without a great deal of study and effort. That, however, will be up to you. It would be foolish for me to think this talk will accomplish that, and I'm not attempting to do that today. I only hope you'll take advantage of the recently available historical documentation to investigate carefully this issue.

If you reach the same conclusion as I have, then I want to caution you about abandoning your current family. The Scriptures tell us: ...women have claim on their husbands until they are taken, ...All children have claim upon their parents until they are of age... (T&C 79:1; see also D&C 83:2,4). And again, But if any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, [he's] denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever (1 Timothy 1:13 RE; see also 1 Timothy 5:8 LE). Therefore, you cannot abandon the obligation you have toward your wives, nor can you parents neglect your duty to your children.

If you become convinced the practice of plural wives is not of God, then keep your family intact, and teach your children against it. Do not let your posterity continue to believe in a false tradition. It was required for the believing Nephites to teach the Lamanites of the errors of their traditions and to bring them to understand the truth. If you awaken to the error of practicing plural marriage, teach your children against that false tradition while you stay loyal to the obligation you have to your family.

As I studied the issue, it was apparent the chronology of section 132 was not and is not known, other than it was purportedly put into a lost writing for the first time on July 12, 1843. Then, once written, the original was destroyed and only a copy in the handwriting of Joseph Kingsbury (who was not present when the revelation was received) survives as a copy of whatever was first revealed. The first portion of section 132 may have been written as early as 1829 (under the church's theory) and inspired by the material in Jacob chapter 2 in the Book of Mormon. That seems more likely than by the later translation of the Old Testament, as LDS tradition holds. Because the text is very inconsistent in places, I speculated there were potentially five separate portions from different dates, later consolidated into one final document. Based on that assumption, I tried to make sense of the document.

However, because of its internal inconsistencies, I suspected it had been altered between the July 1843 date and the 1852 date when it was published. I assumed the contradictions meant that one or the other—but not both—could be trusted. In an effort to sort out what could be trusted and what was an alteration, I published my attempt to salvage a corrected version. A copy of that failed attempt to edit the text of section 132 is going to be attached to this talk when it's published. (And by the way, I have printed about 25 copies of this talk with the Appendix that I refer to, and I'm gonna leave them here today for anyone that wants a copy. It'll also be made available as a downloadable PDF from my website after today.) Ultimately, it seemed to me that the document could not be fixed; at least not by me.

From 2014 to 2017, a committee worked on restoring the Restoration Scriptures and eliminating errors and improper additions that had crept in. As the effort to restore the Scriptures into the form Joseph Smith intended for them to read, God commanded us to discard section 132, and we received a replacement text by revelation. That replacement text is now in our Scriptures as part of the Teaching and Commandments [in] section 157. (T&C 157:34-43). (These are a copy of the Scriptures I brought with me today.) A copy of that section is in the Appendix of this talk.

I have not been casual about evaluating the marriage practice that the Fundamentalists have embraced. This is a subject I've treated with seriousness and respect. I don't condemn you for believing what I too once believed about this matter. To be clear, however, I do not believe it originated with either God or Joseph Smith. It was a later-introduced error.

Joseph Smith was comforted by the Lord in Liberty Jail by these words:

The ends of the earth shall inquire after your name, and fools shall [hold] you in derision, and hell shall rage against you, while the pure in heart, and the wise, and the noble, and the virtuous shall seek counsel, and authority, and blessings constantly from under your hand. And your people shall never be turned against you by the testimony of traitors. (T&C 139:7; see also D&C 122:1-3)

I believe Joseph Smith was pure in heart, wise, noble, and virtuous, and that's why the Lord could commend his counsel and blessings to those who are similarly pure in heart, wise, noble, and virtuous. It is important, I think, to recognize that part of being wise, noble, and virtuous is to be truthful and honest.

The Book of Mormon warns us about a number of un-virtuous characteristics that define the damned:

...woe unto the deaf that will not hear, for they shall perish. Woe unto the blind that will not see, for they shall perish also. Woe unto the uncircumcised of heart, for a knowledge of their iniquities shall smite them at the last day. Woe unto the liar, for he shall be thrust down to hell. (2 Nephi 6:10 RE, emphasis added; see also 2 Nephi 9:31-34 LE)

Churches ask their members to not listen to anyone but them. This is the “deafness” of those who will not hear. Mormon factions ask their members to look away, and refuse to see anything that challenges their teachings. This is the “blindness” the Book of Mormon warns against. I ask you to hear, as I've been willing to hear. I ask you to see, as I've been willing to see. Hearing and seeing have cost me my membership in the LDS Church. If it costs you your membership in your chosen organization, then take comfort in knowing that you're in company with Lehi, Nephi, Abinadi, Alma, Mormon, and Moroni, among many others. You join company with those who acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah when He lived in Jerusalem.

Churches use fear to make you deaf, blind, and uncircumcised of heart. They claim to have authority from God, and if you depart from their umbrella of authority, you risk God's anger. They claim you cannot be saved apart from their authority. So, they say, “Be afraid! Be very afraid!” But as Christ taught in the Sermon on the Mount, “Fear not,” because what He offers is much greater than what churches and institutions offer. He intends to save those whose ears hear or, in other words, who are humble enough to allow Him to teach. He intends to save those who open their eyes to see or, in other words, those who are not blinded by the craftiness of religious pretenders. He will save those who can recognize when a witness has been sent by Him, as I have been.

Following Joseph Smith's death, Mormonism splintered into several groups, the most successful branch being led by Brigham Young. Brigham Young's branch is most distinguished from the others by their public adoption of plural wives in 1852. It was by abandoning that practice that resulted in further splintering Mormonism.

When Wilford Woodruff adopted Official Declaration 1, it was to mislead the public. It was not to actually end the practice. The LDS Church just moved plural marriages underground. After the Manifesto, marriages were performed clandestinely (or in Mexico—where they were legal—or on the water between California and Catalina Island, in one instance).

As a consequence of the Reed Smoot Senate Confirmation Hearings and President Joseph F. Smith being called to testify under oath in that proceeding, the underground practice finally had to end. Because he was cornered by questions from the Senators, Joseph F. Smith had to either admit the truth or end the practice. He chose to end it. In March of 1904, he denied under oath such marriages continued. Then in April, he ended it. His letter of April 6, 1904 states:

Inasmuch as there are numerous reports in circulation that plural marriages have been entered into contrary to the official declaration of President Woodruff, of September 26, 1890, commonly called the Manifesto, which was issued by President Woodruff and adopted by the Church at its general conference, October 6, 1890, which forbade any marriage violative of the law of the land; I, Joseph F. Smith, President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter day Saints, hereby affirm and declare that no such marriages have been solemnized with the sanction, consent or knowledge of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter day Saints, and...

That's very artful language. It's kind of true 'cuz he would send them off without permission stated verbally. It was artful.

...and I hereby announce that all such marriages are prohibited, and if any officer or member of the Church shall assume to solemnize or enter into any such marriage he will be deemed in transgression against the Church and will be liable to be dealt with, according to the rules and regulations thereof, and excommunicated therefrom.

Then Francis Lyman presented a resolution, and the resolution was adopted by unanimous vote of the conference, and so it ended.

It was this "Second Manifesto" that caused the resignation in 1905 of LDS apostle Matthias F. Cowley and the excommunication of apostle John W. Taylor in 1911. Between the first and second Manifestos, LDS authorities sealed plural marriages in secret, while church leaders lied about the continuation of the practice. The official version of LDS events, therefore, establishes that plural marriages began with nine years of church leaders lying about the practice and ended with fourteen years of lying by the church's leadership. It's no wonder that you, like me a few years ago, believe it should continue. So many years of LDS Church lying makes it difficult to find the truth.

The wording of a revelation from God often requires careful, ponderous, and solemn thought to discover its meaning. God's word should not be given only a perfunctory reading. Or as Joseph's letter from Liberty Jail explained it:

...because the things of God are of deep import, and time, and experience, and careful and ponderous and solemn thoughts can only find them out. Your mind, O man, if you will lead a soul unto salvation, must stretch as high as the utmost Heavens, and search into and contemplate the lowest considerations of the darkest abyss, and expand upon the broad considerations of eternal expanse. You must commune with God. How much more dignified and noble are the thoughts of God than the vain imagination of the human heart? None but fools will trifle with the souls of men. (T&C 138:18)

From prison, Joseph wrote about how much more might have been accomplished if believers in the Restoration had taken salvation more seriously. He wrote about the Saints of that day (and composed words that are relevant if not altogether applicable to us today):

How vain and trifling have been our spirits, our conferences, our councils, our meetings, our private as well as public conversations: too low, too mean, too vulgar, too condescending for the dignified characters of the called and chosen of God, according to the purposes of his will from before the foundation of the world, to hold the keys of the mysteries of those things [which] have been kept hid from the foundation until now, of which some have tasted a little, and which many of them are to be poured down from Heaven upon the heads of babes, ...the weak, [the] obscure, [the] despis[ed] ones of this earth. (Ibid. ¶19)

I hope that you are willing to be careful, solemn, and ponderous about the truth. We've all wasted enough time already. I know I have. Please take seriously the words given to you today.

In the years Joseph Smith led the church, he established the offices of elder, priest, teacher, deacon, apostle, high priest, president, seventy, and patriarch. These were organizational offices and not priesthood. There were, in the church during Joseph Smith's lifetime, two forms of priesthood. As the LDS Scriptures explain: There are, in the church, two priesthoods, namely, the Melchizedek and Aaronic, including the Levitical... (D&C 107:1).

There are only two priesthoods in the LDS Church, or at least there were at the time that Joseph Smith stated that. What their condition may be today is another matter that I'm not gonna talk about. But there were only two priesthoods! There weren't 10 or 16! This is a list of church offices:

elder priest

teacher

deacon

apostle

bishop

high priest

president

seventy patriarch

Relief Society President

Sunday School President

Elder's Quorum President

Gospel Doctrine Teacher

Young Men's President

Young Women's President

...and so on.

The LDS Church, like your various Fundamentalist factions, are merely organizations and not the priesthood.

Joseph Smith organized offices and gave them authority to preside. However, church leaders in 1838 turned on Joseph. Their positions of authority gave them credibility. When they signed affidavits falsely claiming Joseph was a threat to Missouri non-Mormons, he was imprisoned on charges of treason. Before his imprisonment, Joseph insisted on the church authorities being obeyed. But after reflecting on the abuse of church authority that led to his imprisonment, Joseph removed all authority of the priesthood to control or impose upon others. Here's the new standard to keep in mind when someone claiming authority demands your submission:

Behold there are many called, but few are chosen, and why are they not chosen? Because their hearts are set so much upon the things of this world and aspire to the honors of men, that they do not learn this one lesson—that the rights of the Priesthood are inseparably connected with the Powers of Heaven and that the Powers of Heaven cannot be controlled nor handled, only upon the principles of righteousness. That they may be conferred upon us, it['s] true, but when we undertake to cover our sins or... gratify our pride, our vain ambition, or to exercise control or dominion or compulsion upon the souls of the children of men, in any degree of unrighteousness, behold the heavens withdraw themselves, the Spirit of the Lord is grieved, and when it has withdrawn, Amen to the Priesthood or the authority of that man. Behold, ere he is aware he is left...to kick against the pricks, to persecute the Saints, and to fight against God. We['ve] learned by sad experience that it['s] the nature and disposition of almost all men, as soon as they get a little authority, as they suppose, they will immediately begin to exercise unrighteous dominion. Hence many are called, but few are chosen.

No power or influence can or ought to be maintained by virtue of the Priesthood, only by persuasion, by long-suffering, by gentleness and meekness, ...by love unfeigned, by kindness, by pure knowledge which shall greatly enlarge the soul without hypocrisy and without guile. (T&C 139:5-6, emphasis added; see also D&C 121:34-42)

I've given several talks about priesthood and authority claims made by others. Rather than make any claims myself, I only teach truths to allow you to decide the matter unencumbered by any demand that you respect authority or "keys." Gentiles are prone to following claims of authority. As the Lord explained to His apostles,

You know that the princes of the gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them. But it shall not be so among you. But who[so]ever will be great among you, let him be your minister. And who[so]ever will be chief among you, let him be your servant, even as the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life, a ransom for many. (Matthew 10:3 RE, emphasis added; Matthew 20:23-28 LE)

If this was good enough for our Lord, then I cannot in good conscience claim more. I am here to be His servant and to minister teachings that come from Him. I do not demand your respect, but I hope to persuade you by the things I know and are able to say. Those who claim to have "keys" are largely ignorant of even the meaning of the term.

The word keys is horribly misunderstood. I have made it a practice to not use the word because of all the foolish and vain ideas that have accumulated around it. Joseph used the term in a variety of ways: for example, to mean authority, or opportunity, and in others it refers to a correct idea. This is the most important meaning [to have a correct idea, as a key concept]. The term in the context of priesthood is completely absent from the Book of Mormon, and that book is the keystone of our religion, containing the fullness of the gospel. The only time the word keys is referenced in the Book of Mormon, it refers to a physical set of keys to unlock a door to the treasury controlled by Laban (1 Nephi 1:18). Although Joseph used the term often and meant many things by it, the challenge is to understand priesthood without being distracted by a poorly defined, and often used term. Mormon institutions now use the term most often to connote their exclusive right, license or control. The LDS Handbook of Instructions states the following, "Priesthood keys are the authority God has given to priesthood leaders to direct, control, and govern the use of His priesthood on Earth." This definition is the opposite of the way that scripture directs priesthood be used (see T&C 139:5-7). The LDS Handbook approach turns this scripture upside down and backwards: by virtue of priesthood keys they have the right to direct, control [or] exercise influence over others. Mormon institutions in general all use their preferred meaning of the term keys to denounce anything or anyone they view as a rival. That's nonsense, and I avoid using the term because of [the] widespread abusive practice. (The Holy Order, Oct. 29, 2017, paper p. 1)

A "key" unlocks information or opens your understanding. It is tied to gaining an insight. Today men claiming to hold keys almost always take away light and truth and spread darkness.

The continuation of plural wives is related to claims about “keys” or “holding keys to seal” marriages. No matter which fundamentalist group is involved, the claim to have keys is tied to an incident that purportedly took place the night of September 26-27 of 1886. The incident was reported to Arnold Boss by Lorin C. Woolley 43 years later on September 22, 1929. An extended explanation of why I do not believe the incident happened was published on my website in a series of posts titled: “Sorting Things Out,” which has parts 1 through 5 (published from July 23rd through July 27th of 2012), which are all included in a chapter of the same name in Volume 5, Remembering the Covenant (pp. 1907-1927). I’ve also included those as an appendix to the talk that’s available, and you can read (if you download it or if you get a copy today).

As to the history of plural wives, the libraries of material I referred to earlier deserve very careful inspection. One key to understanding (and I use that word correctly in this context) is to look at what existed as proof on or before June 27th of 1844. If you do that, you have a great deal of evidence that Joseph Smith did not practice, condone, or introduce plural wives. Instead, you have a great deal of public and private declarations that denounce and oppose it.

The only proof that ties Joseph Smith to the introduction of plural wives into the Restoration is a single document. That document was a copy, not an original; and that copy was hidden—if you trust the official story—for at least nine years, eight of those years after the murder of Joseph and Hyrum.

Brian C. Hales is the one who has most researched and written about the record in our day. He published a three-volume discussion of his findings. And he’s sympathetic to plural wives and believes Joseph Smith introduced it. Here’s what Brian Hales found from his extensive research into the subject, after identifying section 132:

Beyond this revelation, no other document exists in which Joseph Smith specifically discusses the principle.

...Establishing the Prophet’s precise instructions is difficult due to a lack of contempora[neous] accounts recording Joseph Smith’s specific teachings on these lofty topics. Furthermore, a challenge arises regarding what sources should be considered as authoritative for defining his theology...

And he says (in a lamentation):

...Unfortunately, no accounts of a public discourse discussing plural marriage have been found. (Joseph Smith’s Polygamy: Volume 3: Theology, Brian C. Hales, Greg Koford Books, (Salt Lake City 2013) pp. 3, 69, 70)

That last statement by Hales is absolutely false! Joseph said a lot! Numerous firsthand accounts exist of letters, of publications in the Times and Seasons, of notes from discourses, of letters... Numerous documents exist! It is extraordinarily well-documented! Except they ALL denounce plural wives! And so Hales’s blindspot in what he has written is because he’s rooting for a certain outcome, that is, to vindicate what he believes to be true, namely, having plural wives. If he were being honest about it, he would say, “There’s an enormous record of information dealing with the subject of plural wives coming out of the mouth of Joseph Smith, Hyrum Smith, and Emma Smith. Unfortunately, they all denounce it. They all repudiate it. They all look for who is practicing it.” Joseph Smith brought case after case before the high council in Nauvoo to have tried for their membership those people who were practicing plural wives if he could discover their identities. And when they held a trial and when they found out who had been participating, then they brought in the next participant and so tried to root it out.

These are quotes from the Joseph Smith Papers:

October 5, 1843, Joseph Smith journal entry: “...eve[ning] at home walked up and down st. with scribe.—and gave inst[r]uction to try those who were preaching teaching or preaching the doctrin of plurality of wives. on this Law. Joseph forbids it. and the practice ther[e]of— No man shall have but one wife.”

October 15th, Joseph Smith journal entry: Joseph preaching says, “...stop this spinning street yarn and talking about spiritual wives... I proclaim in the name of the Lord...that I will have nothing but virtue and integrity and uprightness...”

February 1st of 1844 in the Times and Seasons, Joseph and Hyrum Smith, designating themselves as “Presidents of [the] Church” put the following NOTICE in the paper:

As we lately have been credibly informed, that an Elder of the Church of Jesus Christ, of Latter-day Saints, by the name of Hiram Brown, has been preaching Polygamy, and other false and corrupt doctrines, in the county of La[n]peer, State of Michigan. This is to inform him and the Church in general, that [he’s] been cut off from the church, for his iniquity; and [he’s] further notified to appear at the Special Conference, on the 6th of April next, to make answer to these charges. (Times & Seasons, Photo Reprint of the Original, (Salt Lake City: 2008), Volume 5, p. 423)

February 15th of 1844 in an article “WHO SHALL BE OUR NEXT PRESIDENT”: After recommending Joseph Smith to be elected, the article states, “Joseph Smith will not ‘marry spiritual wives;’ nor commit any other outrageous act this election to help any party with, you must get some other persons to perform these kind of offences for you...” (ibid p. 441).

March 15th of 1844, Times and Seasons...

Joseph Smith... I’m skipping a bunch.

Joseph Smith advocated for and persuaded the Nauvoo City Council to adopt an ordinance on May 14, 1842, punishing adultery with six months imprisonment: “...for every Act of Adultery, or Fornication, which can be proved, the Parties shall be imprisoned Six Months, and fined, each, ...the Sum of five hundred to fifty thousand Dollars...” Three days after the ordinance passed, John Bennett resigned as Mayor of Nauvoo under the accusations of adultery and fornication.

When John Bennett resigned his membership in the church, he publicly testified,

I publicly avow that any one who has said that I have stated that...Joseph Smith has given me authority to hold illicit intercourse with women is a Liar in the face of God. Those who have said it are damned Liars: they are infernal Liars. He never (either) in public or private gave men any such authority or license, & any who states it is a scoundrel & a Liar. (The Nauvoo City and High Council Minutes, John S. Dinger, ed., signature Books, [Salt Lake, 2001], p. 84)

Joseph Smith confronted John Bennett in front of the City Council and asked, "Will you please state definitely whether you know anything against my character either in public or private?" To which Bennett responded, "I do not; in all my intercourse with Gen. Smith, in public and in private, he has been entirely virtuous" (Times and Seasons, Vol. 3, p. 841).

In the aftermath of John Bennett's misconduct, Joseph pursued an effort to track down what had happened in Nauvoo. By May of 1842, the high council met, and:

[A] charge [was] [preferred] against Chauncey L. Higbee by George Miller for unchaste and un-virtuous conduct with the widow [Sarah] Miller, and others...

In the trial,

Three witness[es] testified that he had seduced [several women] and at different times [had] been guilty of unchaste and unvirtuous conduct with them and taught the doctrine that it was right to have free intercourse with women if it was kept secret &c and also taught that Joseph Smith authorised him to practice these things... (The Nauvoo City and High Council Minutes, pp. 414-415, all as in original)

On May 25th, the charge was preferred "against Ms. Catherine Warren by George Miller for unchaste and unvirtuous conduct with John C. Bennett and others."

(And it's... You can read this. It's gonna be in the talk.)

At the April 1844 General Conference, Hyrum Smight gave an anti-polygamy talk.

Joseph Smith (in May of 1844) gave a discourse. One of the things that he said in the discourse, which provides you again with a key to know what was going on, Joseph said:

For the last three years I have a record of all my acts and proceedings, for I have kept several good, faithful, and efficient clerks in constant employ: they have accompanied me everywhere, and carefully kept my history, ...they have written down what I have done, where I have been, and what I have said; therefore my enemies cannot charge me with any day, time, or place, but what I have written testimony to prove my actions; and my enemies cannot prove anything against me. ...Matters of fact are as profitable as the Gospel, ...which I can prove. You will then know who are liars, and who speak the truth I want to retain your friendship on holy grounds.

Another indictment has been got up against me. It appears a holy prophet has [risen] up, and [he's] testified against me: the reason is, he is so holy. The Lord knows I do not care how many churches are in the world. As many as believe me, may. If the doctrine that I preach is true, the tree must be good. I have prophesied things that have come to pass, and can still.

...I had not been married scarcely five minutes, and made one proclamation of the Gospel, before it was reported...I had seven wives. I mean to live and proclaim the truth as long as I can.

This new holy prophet has gone to Carthage and swore that I had told him that I was guilty of adultery. This spiritual wifeism! Why, a man dares not speak or wink, for fear of being accused of this.

William Law testified before forty policemen, and the assembly room full of witnesses, that he testified under oath that he never had heard or seen or knew anything immoral or criminal against me. He testified under oath that he was my friend, and not the 'Brutus.' (Taken from The Words of Joseph Smith, Andrew F. Ehat and Lyndon W. Cook editors, [BYU Press 1980])

And so on.

April 7, 1842.

April 10th of 1842 (This is from April 10th): "I preached in the grove, and pronounced a curse upon all Adulterers and Fornicators, and unvirtuous persons and those who have made use of my name to carry on their iniquitous designs" (taken from the journal of Wilford Woodruff).

On March 7th through the 20th of 1844 in successive meetings, Joseph Smith read A Voice of Innocence from Nauvoo, which was presented to/adopted by the Relief Society and then presented to and adopted by the conference. And I've got a copy in the Appendix to the talk of A Voice of Innocence.

Emma Smith denied plural wives was taught by Joseph:

At one time my husband [Joseph] came to me and asked me if I had heard certain rumors about spiritual marriages, or anything of the kind; and assured me that if I had, that they were without foundation; [and] there was no such doctrine, and never should be with his knowledge [and] consent. I know that he had no other wife or wives than myself, in any sense, either spiritual or otherwise. ("Last Testimony of Sister Emma," The Saints Herald, October 1, 1879)

Joseph Smith was asked on the 8th of May, 1838: "Do...Mormons believe in having more wives than one?" And his answer was, "No, not at the same time. But they believe, that if their companion dies, they have a right to marry again" (Joseph Smith, TPJS 119, 8 May 1838).

To the extent Joseph exposed his thoughts about sex, they were dominated by sexual purity and self-control. His public and private statements point to a man who prized chastity, fidelity, and condemned promiscuity. His letters are consistent with his statements.

And there's a series of scriptures that I quote in that.

If you search for a contemporaneous private document or public declaration from Joseph, Hyrum, or Emma Smith supporting plural wives, you'll find none. All of them were consistently publicly opposing the practice. And remember the Book of Mormon warns, Woe unto the liar, for he shall be thrust down to hell. Someone was lying. Therefore, someone will be thrust down to hell.

So we face a decision: We must choose to condemn Joseph, Hyrum, and Emma to hell, or we must condemn those who denounced them as liars. As part of making that choice, recall the words earlier that I quoted, spoken to the imprisoned Joseph Smith:

...fools shall have you in derision, and hell shall rage against you, while the pure in heart, and the wise, and the noble, and the virtuous shall seek counsel, and authority, and blessings constantly from under your hand. And your people shall never be turned against you by the testimony of traitors...

None of us should want to attribute to Joseph Smith lying and serious sexual sins if it is not true. I do not want to call him a liar without sufficient reason. He should be entitled to only be convicted on the same standard we would convict a person of a serious crime. As a lawyer, I know to convict someone of criminality, the burden of proof is "beyond any reasonable doubt." If you have any reasonable doubt, you must not convict. I think a prophet of God is entitled to the same standard of proof. Therefore, if there is reason to doubt, I say we ought to doubt. We should say, "I cannot in good conscience conclude Joseph Smith was an adulterer and a liar"—unless we have proof that removes all reasonable doubts on the subject. If the record is confused enough to tell two opposing stories, leaving us to write what is in our own heart, then I choose to write "innocence" for Joseph on my page.

Both the apologists and critics almost universally today agree with the anti-Mormons about Joseph Smith. They claim Joseph Smith was a liar and deceiver. This judgment has become nearly universal. But the contemporary accounts do not require that conclusion. Quite the contrary, the contemporary records vindicate Joseph as truthful, honest, and moral. One of the things that frustrates me the most are the many accounts from those who claim to be faithful, believing Latter-Day Saints who accept Joseph Smith as the prophet of the Restoration but require Joseph to be dishonest and immoral. They insist Joseph Smith said one thing in public and another thing in private. Because they believe that a prophet of God can do that and get away with it, it has created a malignancy on the LDS version of Mormonism. Even today the leaders of the LDS Church believe God allows them to practice deceit because their version of Joseph Smith justifies it. This hypocrisy is embedded within the Fundamentalist off-shoots from the LDS Church. As one who has come to know God, I do not believe it possible to be a hypocritical liar, deceiving even your own wife (as it is claimed about Joseph), and have God's approval.

As we struggle with making the choice, it becomes clear that the reliability and authenticity of the single document that ties Joseph Smith to introducing plural marriage (Doctrine and Covenants 132) matters a great deal. We do not have an original. The first time the document was made public was in 1852. The text was made public in the handwriting of a practicing polygamist, Joseph Kingsbury. He was never a scribe of Joseph's. He was not trusted to maintain Joseph's journals or history. The original was lost or destroyed, and Kingsbury claimed that he copied it shortly after the original was written.

Kingsbury was one of the witnesses called to testify in the Temple Lot case. Upon taking the stand, he "refused to take the ordinary oath to 'tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.'" When later questioned about why he wouldn't take the oath:

I do not swear to that; I affirm to it. To my mind there is a difference between swearing to anything and affirming to it...I generally affirm, and I suppose it is because my understanding is that a man cannot be convicted of perjury on ...affirmation, and he can when he is sworn. (Abstract of Evidence Temple Lot Case U.S.C.C., p. 333)

When asked if Joseph Smith practiced polygamy, he said: "I presume...he did."

James Whitehead was one of Joseph Smith's scribes during the last 2 years of his life [and] was also required to testify under oath. His testimony includes this:

I had a good opportunity of knowing if any such a thing [plural marriage] had been taught by the prophet or anyone else because I was there in his office and with him continually. ...I was well acquainted with his family and with his wife Emma and I never saw anything or heard of any such a thing being taught there in Nauvoo. ...When I lived at Nauvoo, I resided maybe three hundred yards from where Joseph['s]...house was. I saw him there frequently, perhaps not every day but almost every day. ...Joseph Smith had one wife and her name was Emma; I do not know of any other woman who claimed to be the wife of the prophet, there at Nauvoo, nor at any other place. (Abstract of Evidence Temple Lot Case U.S.C.C.)

Wilford Woodruff testified in that same trial. He said testified:

I never saw a copy of it [section 132] or the original during the lifetime of Joseph Smith. I do not think [that] I saw the one that came here to Utah and purported to be a copy of the original.

I do not know whether the church of which I am the President has the purported copy or not. (Abstract of Evidence Temple Lot Case U.S.C.C., p. 308)

Although it was written as part of a humorous account during his travels in the West, Mark Twain made this assertion after his visit to Salt Lake City: "Polygamy is a recent feature in the Mormon religion, and was added by Brigham Young after Joseph Smith's death. Before that, it was regarded as an 'abomination.'"

I assume that if Joseph Smith opposed and denounced plural wives and Brigham Young introduced it, that that would matter to you. It certainly matters to me. Joseph Smith was not merely a prophet, but a dispensation head who laid a foundation upon which the rest of God's dealings with mankind will be predicated.

What you decide to be true about history is completely dependent upon the sources of information you trust. Almost all of the historical evidence for Joseph Smith introducing plural wives are not only created following Joseph and Hyrum's death but more than a decade after they died.

The seven-volume set written by Arnold Boss, The History of Plural Marriage Among the Mormon People, is an attempt to gather comprehensive evidence to support the practice of plural wives. It relies, as it must, on sources that did not exist on or before June 27, 1844. His sources in his extensive investigation are years—sometimes decades—later reflections by those who had begun to practice plural marriage publicly in 1852. Many of those sources did so privately before the public announcement in 1852. Once the practice was publicly taught and defended under Brigham Young, LDS historians have interpreted a great deal about Joseph by relying on Brigham Young and other defenders of plural marriage. To be fair, Joseph should be isolated from this subsequent development when trying to understand what Joseph believed, said, and did.

Here is the problem in the clearest way that I can put it: IF you accept the proof that existed on or before June 27, 1844, there is a single document which may have existed (or may have been created between then and 1852) to tie Joseph Smith to plural wives, but there is an overwhelming number of documents, public talks, scriptures, newspaper articles, church disciplinary proceedings, affidavits, and public acts that clearly show Joseph Smith was opposed to and denounced plural wives. In this version, Joseph was virtuous and truthful.

BUT IF you accept the record of those who practiced plural wivory and accounts they wrote after Joseph and Hyrum's murder, then there is an overwhelming number of documents, talks, remembrances, affidavits, and books that attribute the practice of secretly having plural wives by Joseph Smith while misleading the public with false denials. In this version, Joseph was dishonest with his closest companions (including his wife), a public liar, a criminal under Illinois law, and therefore un-virtuous.

You get to choose. I suggest you choose carefully and consider the Lord's teaching: Judge not unrighteously, that you be not judged, but judge righteous judgment; for with what judgment you judge, you shall be judged, and with what measure you mete, it shall be measured to you again (Matthew 3:40 RE; see also Matthew 7:1-2 LE).

I assume from what I've learned about our Lord's plans, that there will be some living the practice of plural wives who are gathered to Zion. That presents a potential problem between those who are monogamous and those who are polygamous. It will be necessary for those who have plural wives to commit to:

First, abandoning any effort to add another wife.

Second, agree to teach your children that it must end with you and not be continued in the next generation.

I tell you this in advance so you have no doubts about our expectations of you.

Historically, when plural wives have been permitted, it is as if the women were married and the men were perpetually single. Because a man could add another wife, the men retained a “roving eye” to look out for any other woman who aroused his interest. The best example of the unmarried polygamist man was Parley P. Pratt. He took Eleanor McLean as his twelfth plural wife, although she was already married to Hector McLean. Hector was a drunken wife-beater, and Parley was, well, willing to continue to add wives. Hector caught Parley riding alone, shot him, took a knife to him, and left him bleeding on a farm in Kansas [Arkansas]. The farmer reported that after two and a half hours following Hector’s handiwork, Parley died from loss of blood. Brigham Young believed Parley deserved to die for adultery.

There are always going to be tensions that will arise, and people will need to adapt across this barrier. I assume there will be some plural wives who envy women who are monogamous. I assume there will be some men who envy men who have multiple wives. I assume some children will envy those with fewer siblings, and others who envy those with many siblings. And I assume there will be tension between these very different kinds of families. Everyone will have to make some adjustments to peacefully coexist in a community.

I do not belong to any organized church. I am part of a community bound together only by beliefs. To this point, we only practice ordaining to priesthood, baptism by immersion, the sacrament of the Lord’s supper, and laying on hands for blessing and healing. Only men hold priesthood, however, we believe Gifts of the Spirit are not confined to those who are ordained, but that anyone—male and female—can have all the various gifts given to people of faith.

Men are not sustained by men to the priesthood, but instead must be sustained by seven women—and if married, one of those women must be his wife—in order to act as a priest outside his home. If a man holding the priesthood engages in inappropriate behavior, then it is a council of women who conduct discipline. The women’s council is empowered to remove a man’s certificate, which does not remove priesthood; it only prevents the man from ministering outside his home during a period of suspension. This is for the protection of the community of believers so that no harm is done to the community by trusting in a man’s status as priest to drop their guard and become vulnerable to mischief.

We collect tithes, but only on the amount remaining after all your family’s obligations have first been paid. Then what remains—following payment of your obligations—is tithed on 1/10 of what is left. However, tithes are then distributed among the various fellowships based on the needs of the individuals and the families for food, clothing, shelter, healthcare, transportation, and education. No one is paid; no one profits. Only the needs of the poor among us are addressed with tithes.

We plan to build a temple when the Lord commands. A fund for that purpose has been set up, and a group of women control that fund. Anyone can donate to that fund if they choose to do so.

We have an obligation to the descendants of Lehi and have called and set apart individuals for that purpose. We have an obligation to the remnant of the Jews and have been working for more than two years to have the Book of Mormon translated into Old Testament Hebrew. Although there are at least two modern-Hebrew translations, they are not of a quality that reflects the seriousness of the obligation imposed on us. We have some of the best Old Testament Hebrew scholars in the world working with us on the translation, and the project is now entering the final editing stage. It will be expensive to complete and publish, and those who have been supervising the effort wanted me to mention that anyone who is willing to do so can contribute to that effort. Following publication of the Hebrew language version, we have those called by God and set apart to take the message to the remnant of the Jews. There's a website that just got active called hebrewbookofmormon.com that explains the project.

We are not waiting for someone else to do the work required by the Lord. We have and are working to accomplish the work the Lord's given us. As part of that, we've recovered and published a more correct version of the Book of Mormon than has been available before now. We have recovered and corrected revelations given to Joseph Smith. We've recovered and corrected the interpolations made in the Joseph Smith Translation of the Bible, including both the Old and New Testaments. Additions made by the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints were removed, and many corrections Joseph made that had been omitted were added.

The Scripture project was presented to and accepted by the Lord. It was then presented to and accepted by a conference of believers in 2017. They are now available in a high quality, leather-bound version. I brought my copy with me today.

We invite all who are interested to labor alongside us. But we're more concerned with getting work accomplished than in building a hierarchy, or gaining authority over one another. Whatever influence I have in the group of believers I associate with is solely because of my efforts to persuade people. I claim no office and have made no claim to have authority. If what I teach is true, then it should stand on its own.

We're busy, and if you want to labor alongside us, you're welcome to do so. I do not have the time—with all the work left to accomplish—to engage in debate. I try to teach enough to let people decide. I claim to be the Lord's servant and to teach what He directs. You need to decide whether that's true or not.

I can also warn you that all the churches of Mormonism—from the LDS to the Community of Christ to the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints and all the offshoots, including the pretenders who now seek to get a following by their pretended enlightenment—all of them are working at cross purposes to what the Lord is doing. If they or you want to please the Lord, you'll assist the labor we're performing. None else—and no one else—are doing the Lord's work, vindicating His covenants, fulfilling His promises, and laboring alongside Him. We have a covenant given from Him in 2017 that promises us His protecting hand. If you follow Christ as Lord, then you will support our work: for it is His work.

I believe the Restoration has begun anew, and the heavens are open and communicating with us. There are resources available to investigate our claims. If you're interested and want to investigate this further, the following resources are available free online:

There are books I've written available through Amazon.com, however, essentially all of the content is available for free through the website restorationarchives.com. Most of the talks I have given are or will be available on Youtube, including this one.

Following my ex-communication from the LDS Church, I delivered a series of ten talks across five states. Those were recorded and can be heard at the thetentalks.com, restorationarchives.com, or on YouTube.

We will build a temple when the Lord commands. We are and will continue to reach out to the remnant of the Lamanites. We will send authorized messengers to the remnant of the Jews. We hope to welcome the Lord at His return.

And I tell you these things in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

1:08:17

Now, I have a few moments. They've set up a microphone. They said there'd be a Q&A. I'm actually changing their agenda. My father-in-law is in the hospital in Salt Lake, and my wife did not accompany me 'cuz she's up at the hospital. And I need to get back North. So, if anyone has any questions... (And they need to be good questions. I mean, don't ask something inane. We get a lot of that.) But if you've got a good question... Oh! There's a microphone over there! Hey, let's not make Bonnie walk. Just take the... It's a wireless microphone.

Question 1: Thanks. My question goes back to where the council of women...

Denver Snuffer: Yeah, yeah.

Q1: Do those have to be the same women that signed his certificate?

DS: No.

Q1: OK. Thank you.

DS: Don't have to be. They might WANT to be.

I know... "Do you always obey the speed limit?" Oh, no—I rarely do. It's inadvertent. I will follow the speed limit going through and coming down from...

Question 2: I actually don't have a question.

DS: Yeah?

Q2: I was prompted to say this: "In the beginning, the practice of plural wives came into existence by the seed of the disobedient Cain. Could we be under a gross darkness passed down from the beginning? Could we be in an awful state of blindness in many different ways? Who are we to the Lord? Could the adversary have led us all into strange paths, like Father Lehi's vision in the Book of Mormon warned us about? Are these messengers sent to us today sent by the will and power of God to bring about His righteous purposes and lead a people to build his kingdom on Earth again? How are we to know if these things spoken to us today are true? Perhaps we are to do as Joseph did all those years ago. If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God that giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him."

Question 3: Hello. I've always been curious why Joseph Smith didn't have children from other wives that we can prove. And so your theory today would support answer that if your theory is correct. But how do you do... You know, like you said, there's libraries about this. I mean, I read a book that was just testimony after testimony of Joseph Smith's plural marriage. And Brian C. Hales [Todd Compton's]... I read a book of his, In Sacred Loneliness, that each chapter is a history of each wife of Joseph Smith's. Some of that is the wife's own language. It just seems like there's some really good proof that he lived plural marriage.

DS: Once the, umm...

Q3: Oh, there's really good proof that Jesus Christ lived plural marriage, too.

DS: Yeah, that once the practice became public, understand that all of those people who migrated following Brigham Young from Nauvoo into the West were isolated from the main body of the United States in a place that became really quite dark. I mean, the idea (and part of the brag) that Satan announces in the LDS temple endowment is that he intended to reign with blood and horror on the Earth. If you study what happened during the period of the Mormon Reformation, they come out West, and things went really bad when they came out West. It is as if, once they got driven out of Nauvoo and a lush, well-watered countryside, that they were driven into a salt-flat cursed land, in which they suffered privation and, essentially, starvation. Lorenzo Snow writes a story about how he was out digging up Sego lily bulbs to take them back to give to his starving family, and he was so hungry that the first bulb he dug up he ate himself, and it caused him shame that he'd taken care of his own hunger when he was out there digging this stuff up for to feed his family. They took the cattle herd that the church owned (which was the foodstuffs that they were lying up) up to winter in Cache valley, and the herd froze to death from an unusually harsh winter, which only made the problems even worse.

And Brigham Young, in response to all of the privation/all of the suffering/all of the terrible consequences that were going on, blamed the PEOPLE! The Mormon Reformation and all of the re-baptisms that occurred during the Mormon Reformation were done because Brigham Young thought the people were insufficiently attentive and obedient to what the priesthood leaders were telling them to do. Well, it was the priesthood leaders that decided to send the cattle where they would all be killed. It wasn't the... The followers were doing what they were told. Brigham Young did a number of things, backfired, and then he blamed the people for their own errors. So they launched the Mormon Reformation. Everyone's gotta be baptized! And they initiated what's called the "Home Missionary Program." The Home Missionary Program had a list of questions that the Home Missionaries came to ask of the members to determine whether or not they had done something that was worthy of being "blood atoned," meaning you've committed a sin for which God can't forgive you through the atonement of Jesus Christ; your own blood had to be shed in order for you to make it into the kingdom of God. And Brigham Young taught this, as did Jedediah [Jedediah] Grant—the sermon about raining pitchforks' tines down upon the people in order to stir them up to repentance, and the Mormon Reformation included actual invoking of the blood atonement act: killing people to save their souls, according to the doctrine that Brigham Young was propounding.

Utah (Deseret) descended into a very, very dark state. When Johnson's Army came out to the valley and put an end to Brigham Young's control over the people and installed a new governor, more than 3,000 people fled from Utah headed East because they were now safe to leave. They wouldn't be hunted down by hitmen or by some of the others that were sent out by Brigham Young to kill. We don't have a good count on the numbers of those who fled to go West because by that time—with the forty-niners and the gold rush that happened, Sutter's Mill, and all of the California activity—it was safe to go West. And quite a number went West, but we don't have a count on that. How many people were murdered in the name of the religion between the period that they migrated out and the period when Johnson's Army arrived and people fled, we don't know. I mean, they disappeared, they... The stories weren't told. The situation at Mountain Meadows where people were slain for the oath's sake to get to avenge the blood of the martyrs was expanded so that the martyrs weren't Joseph and Hyrum, but it included Parley Pratt. There's irony in that because Brigham Young had denounced Parley as an adulterer who deserved to be killed! But Brigham wasn't one to let irony stop him from launching into a diatribe.

If you think you know Brigham Young, you really need to look at what rolled out about 2008 with the Complete Discourses of Brigham Young because about 3-5% of what Brigham Young said was available before then. And they were able to decipher the shorthand, and now we have a five-volume set, large (8 ½ x11 size) volumes, double columns... So when you open it up, it's like four columns across the open book of smaller print. They were prepared, primarily, for library use. I bought a copy. (I don't think there are any available. There might be; someone might be re-selling. But you can get 'em on a CD-ROM.) You should read the materials.

So, when you say there are libraries of material and affidavits and these sincere, you know, reminiscences by people that were in a position to know, they... The Temple Lot case didn't happen until the end of that century. These people had lived through the terrorism of the territorial Deseret years and Brigham Young's "raining pitchforks' tines down" preaching, and the actual slaying of people, and the practice of plural marriage being announced from the pulpit. And while he doesn't identify who it was—he says it's a "U.S. Senator"—it's pretty obvious that the one who would've been in communication with him would've been Stephen Douglas, who became a U.S. Senator and who had been in the Illinois Legislature at the time that the Nauvoo Charter was passed and who was a friend to the Mormons who had actually presided over one of the trials back in Illinois, became a U.S. Senator. But an unnamed senator, probably Stephen Douglas, gave to Brigham Young the advice that "if plural wives is a fundamental part of your religion, then it will be constitutionally protected under the First Amendment to the Constitution as a religious practice that Congress can make no law respecting or curtailing that religious practice. And so, once it rolled out into the public, it was essential (in order to win the lawsuit) to protect it under the First Amendment that it become a fundamental part of the religion. And so the dialogue that goes on from the 1852 public time period until after the death of Brigham Young in 1877/78, all of that dialogue was ginned up in order to create a historical record that could be taken to and shown to the United States Supreme Court in order to justify the preservation as "constitutionally- protected plural wivery." That didn't work! The Supreme Court in their final decision on the question analogized that to the practice in India of the widow throwing herself onto the funeral-pyre-burning-of-her-dead-husband to kill herself! It... There's some acts of religion that can't be defended under the law, no matter how sincere your belief may be. And so, if it were a fundamental part of the religion, then, if it were truly, really, honestly, sincerely, devoutly a fundamental part of the religion, then there's an easy answer: Pack your crap up and go south to Mexico because it was NOT prohibited there! Or march up to Canada, "Eh, become a Canuck, eh? And so you'd all be talkin' a little strange now, eh?" You'd sound like you're from Fargo.

But look, they didn't do that! They turned on a dime, and then not only did they turn on a dime, but they excommunicated people—including members of the Quorum of the Twelve—for the practice. It's NOT a fundamental part of the religion. And when the chance for the courts to weigh in on the issue of whether it was originally part of what Joseph Smith taught, the court reached pretty much the same conclusion that Brigham Young, (or excuse me) Mark Twain reached, which was that before Brigham Young did that, it was an abomination.

Look, you're going to face an absolutely contradictory story. One of them has to be true, and one of them has to be false. One of them has to be based upon a correct preservation of what was really going on, and one of them has to be based upon a host of lies and liars who had motivations that ranged anywhere from fear born out of the necessity to support the system because there are few people that are in a more vulnerable state, a more desperate state, than a plural wife of a Mormon polygamist in territorial Utah. You think they're going to contradict the official story when they know what's been going on, and they know that lives have been lost for apostasy? I mean, the behavior was extraordinarily analogous to what happens in Islam if you depart from the faith.

Anyway, do you have a question? Oh, you want me to stop?

Question 4: Nope. We want you to just answer... One came in online: "Do all the wives of a man with plural wives have to sign his certificate for him to use his priesthood publicly?"

DS: Since under the law there's only one wife, no—his WIFE, singular. Let's say a man today has plural wives. The law will recognize one (and only one) wife. That's the person who needs to sign the certificate. If the other's object... He has a wife, and the Lord will recognize A wife.

Yeah?

Question 5: I, too, was really taken by Todd Compton's book back in the day. There was 32 wives that came forward with their stories, etc. etc. And yet, I think it's important to talk about the fact that under oath, and when they were brought into court (not all of them), but when that time came (you talk about this fear), only one... Only one held up and actually claimed to have any connubial relations with Joseph, and that was Eliza Partridge—and there were many reasons that have been uncovered that she had that. Could you comment on that?

DS: Yeah, that... Her story fell apart. She told it... She told multiple versions of the story, and it not only fell apart... In an earlier account, she was far less graphic and dramatic. She became more graphic and dramatic as time went on. And much of the testimony she...

She's worthy of an individual study. She really is. Much of her story becomes less and less believable the more you know and the more you study about her.

Now, I've gotta get back up to Salt Lake, but I've brought—I don't know—maybe 25 copies of this. It has some typos in it that I will fix before I put it online, but I'm gonna leave it over there on the counter, and anyone that wants a copy right now can get one. It includes more than I covered today, but I didn't want to talk until six tonight.

Yeah?

Question 6: Just some observations about Sarah Pratt.

DS: Oh, yeah. She's another story.

Q6: ...about her situation... [indecipherable] ...She did not turn on Joseph, to my knowledge... [indecipherable].

DS: I think it... The question is about Sarah Pratt. I think a fair reading of the events is that while Orson was on a mission, she was seduced by John Bennett. When he returned and found out that his wife had been unfaithful to him, Joseph spent a lot of time counseling him, talking with him, dealing with him, and reconciling Sarah and him together. She DID in fact get seduced while her husband was on a mission, but the culprit wasn't Joseph; it was John Bennett. The reconciliation was facilitated by Joseph. That got flipped in the wake of the John Bennett revelations and John Bennett touring the country, giving anti-Mormon lectures and attacking Joseph Smith. The story flipped. And by the time you get to 1852 and the public acknowledgment, it was really convenient at that point and somewhat believable for Brigham Young and the people out in Utah to say, "Yeah, yeah, it DID originate with Joseph Smith," because John Bennett had already plowed that field, had already laid the ground for that.

Well, Sarah Pratt had always been treated well. She was the priority wife. He may have gone out and impregnated the other women, but he came home to her. But what tipped everything was the 18-year-old that he married and the announcement that now he was gonna spend evenings at home with her. She put up with a lot; she'd suffered a lot—all of the wives had; the private diaries of the wives, to the extent they've been made public, make it really clear that there was a public voice that said, "Yes, it's good. We support." And there were private journals that talk about the heartbreak and the heartache and the misery of the arrangement. And what tipped the scale for her was the decision that he made to go spend nights, when all was said and done, with the young wife.

Maybe I'll write something about that at some point. But I think it's a fair reading to conclude she was one of John Bennett's...

Q5: [indecipherable]

DS: Yeah.. At least not with her. I don't think he did it with anyone but Emma. I think she was his singular wife.

Thank you.

2022.09.25 Self Awareness

Stephanie Snuffer

“Stand Independent” General Conference, Layton, UT

September 25, 2022

STEPHANIE: Okay, good afternoon! I'm gonna read a few scriptures. And I didn't make... I don't think I made the transfer from King James to the RE edition. So, For...

Galatians 6:3—For if a man think himself to be something, when he is nothing, he deceiveth himself (see also Galatians 1:23 RE).

2 Corinthians 13:5—Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves. Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates? (see also 2 Corinthians 1:48 RE).

1 Corinthians 13:12—For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known (see also 1 Corinthians 1:53 RE).

Psalms 26:2—Examine me, O LORD, and prove me; try my reins and my heart (see also Psalms 26:1 RE).

Proverbs 14:8—The wisdom of the prudent is to understand his way: but the folly of fools is deceit (see also Proverbs 2:124 RE).

Now, what all of these scriptures have in common is this element of awareness and the importance of knowing yourself. So I'm gonna spend a few minutes and talk about self-awareness. And I'm gonna start by telling you what self-awareness is not. Self-awareness is not self-absorption. It is not any kind of conceit. It is not any kind of excess investment in yourself to elevate yourself or make yourself better than other people. Self-awareness, in its truest form, is an understanding of who you are: your strengths, your weaknesses, your characteristics, the qualities that you have, your emotional states, the things that trigger you or upset you. And it is an understanding of that, and it's an understanding of how you came to be this way. Your history, your family, your context, your experiences in life all impact how you see yourself (or alternatively, how you don't see yourself).

The other part of self-awareness is how your being impacts and influences the people around you. For example, you might be a school teacher who is really, really in tune with how his or her students see you or take you in or understand you. You might be a manager, and you might be really, really conscientious of how you are perceived by your team. You might be a coach, and you might care a lot about how your players see you, whether they respect you, how they respond to you. Those are a little bit easier to invest in because they're not as close relationships as our families and our partners and our spouses. It's harder to be a mother and to care or really want to know how you are perceived by your children—because there's this power structure, and I want to maintain my power structure, and so it's hard for me to be vulnerable and be willing to ask my kids, maybe, what their opinion is of me. And that's a really important thing to begin to understand. I might be a wife, and I might have a really hard time wanting to know how I am perceived by my husband. How do I fight? How do I communicate? How do I listen? That's hard, because someone's gonna tell me the truth. And then I'm gonna have to do something about it.

The hallmark of a self-aware person... I'll give you this information, and then we'll talk about some other things. Self-aware people recognize that there is a difference between their emotions and their feelings. Emotions are your instinctive reactions to experiences and situations. Your feelings are how you mentally portray that representation of that emotion. The key difference between these two things is that you cannot ex... You can't control your reactions to things, but you can choose how you feel about it. I'm gonna say that again: You can't control your instinctive reaction, but you can control how you feel about it. So most of our difficulties in our contentions or our problems in life is not the issue itself but how we think and feel about the issue. So we have the opportunity to choose how we're gonna feel, and then we choose how we're going to behave based on how we feel. So that's the hallmark of a self-aware person.

Okay...

So, I've done a little bit of research on self-awareness. And there are some funny things. So the research that I was reading, the researcher—her name is Tasha Eurich—she went out, and she found what she thought were self-aware people. And the way she did it was she found someone she found people who thought they were self-aware, and then they had to have someone in their life who could corroborate the truthfulness of that statement. So someone had to agree that they were self-aware. This same person had to believe that they had improved in their self-awareness, and then someone had to agree that they had improved in their self-awareness. If you go out and ask people if they're self-aware (or if they think they're self-aware), 95% of people will tell you they are self-aware. Only about 10-15% of the people actually are. So we live in a world where 85% of the time and 85% of the people: we are lying to ourselves about whether we “get ourselves” and how we are interpreted by the people around us. This is not a small thing. This is a very, very big thing.

Three components of self-awareness include your emotional self-awareness—this means you know what you're feeling and why you are feeling it. So think, for a minute, the last time you were upset about something: could have been at a kid, could have been at a co-worker, whatever. When was the last time you were upset? When was the last time you remember thinking about why you were upset? And I'm certain it was because somebody made you upset, right? Of course, somebody made you upset—or maybe not. If you are emotionally self-aware, you understand the connections between your feelings and then what you say and then how you behave because of that. Again, when we get feeling unpleasant emotions—anger, sadness, frustration—we generally behave from an emotionally dysregulated place. And so we tend to be mean; we tend to be sarcastic; we tend to be defensive; we tend to push people away instead of bring them closer. If you are emotionally self-aware, you recognize how your feelings impact your success in life or your lack of success in life. You know how to experience your emotions.

Another component is an accurate self-assessment. If you're a self-aware person, you understand pretty clearly your strengths and your limitations. You may know where you are good in relationships; you also know where you struggle. If you have an accurate self-assessment, you tend to learn from your experiences. Everything is an opportunity to change, do something different, stop doing something that was not serving you and start doing something that will make your life better and the life of the people around you better. If you are good at self-assessment, you are open to feedback. Feedback means someone tells you something about yourself, and you take it in, internalize it, and use it to improve yourself. Feedback is a very, very difficult thing for people to take. We don't like feedback, and we certainly don't like asking for feedback. And you cannot be a self-aware person or understand yourself without feedback.

A self-aware person is pretty self-confident. They believe that they are a good person and that they can do good things. They believe that they have value and can add to the world. If you are a self-aware person, you believe you're capable and have many opportunities to be successful. A self-confident, self-aware person has goals, and they want to accomplish things.

~~This~~ These are qualities and characteristics of a person who is self-aware. And unless you are practicing self-awareness, you are not self-aware, because it is not a natural state of the human condition. It is a trait and a skill that needs to be understood, and it needs to be practiced.

We grow up, and we learn all kinds of things: we start as toddlers, learning how to dress ourselves, share, ~~play with~~ play nice with others. We grow up; we learn how to drive. We might balance a checkbook or learn how to log into our Wells Fargo or our America First bank account so that we know how much money we have. We learn to get jobs, go to college—but we very rarely learn how to be good people in a relationship. We just think that we can do and say and be exactly how we are, and the people around us will just tolerate it—because that's what we're supposed to do. And unless someone is willing to look at you and tell you that you are lacking in a skillset or that you have a difficult time with this particular issue, we don't learn these things.

The benefits of self-awareness are pretty far-reaching:

- First and foremost, it increases your ability to have empathy and compassion with other people. Empathy is being able to be with someone else in their emotional states. That's important. That is a connecting, intimate skill that brings people together.
- Your life will be more fulfilled.
- You tend to be more creative.
- You're better at communicating.

- You're less likely to lie, cheat, or steal.
- You are going to be a more effective leader.
- You will take more accountability and greater responsibility for your own life.
- You will stop blaming people for the things that are happening to you.
- If you are self-aware, you are more willing and open to take feedback and criticism with humility and curiosity.

We need this skill. Christ has this skill. We need to be more Christ-like, and we need to learn this.

So I'm gonna go through a list pretty quickly. But I want you to listen carefully because these are signs that you are self-aware:

- You take responsibility for how you respond to things in people rather than trying to change those things in people.
- You do not assume that you are better.
- You are conscious of the fact that how you speak says more about you than what you say.
- You acknowledge and accept other people's feelings, even if you don't understand or agree with them.
- You do not start conversations about politics, religion, or strongly-held beliefs with the intent to prove you are right. You only do this in an effort to better understand another person's perspective.
- You are responsive; you are not reactive.
- You see any kind of discomfort as an opportunity to grow.
- You do not assume that you know how other people perceive you, but you try to remain conscious of social cues to make sure that you are not being ignorant of other people's needs or their level of comfort.
- You do not overshare or speak to others with the intention of getting a response from them.
- You do not insult other people in order to make yourself feel better.
- You accept critical feedback as crucial information you will need to learn and grow, not as a condemnation of your ability or character.
- You are kind to people who do not necessarily deserve it.
- You know it is not your job to determine who is worthy of kindness, but show it, no matter what.
- You are highly introspective. You evaluate your feelings, and you want desperately to grow personally and know that understanding yourself is the key to understanding others.
- You do not expect to feel good all the time. Therefore, you do not extrapolate the meaning of a bad mood or a bad day to be anything other than a moment in time.

Signs that you are not self-aware:

- You get defensive easily.
- You control and are controlling.

- You act passive-aggressively.
- Your behavior changes depending on the scenario.
- You make excuses for your behavior.
- You micromanage.
- You refuse to take feedback or deny that anything anybody says to you has any valid reality.
- ~~You don't like it if you~~ You don't know who you are. You feel like you're not following any real purpose or path in life, and you feel generally unhappy and unfulfilled.

Now, those are pretty general statements about self-awareness, but given the last few years of my life, I can attest that they're pretty accurate, and they're pretty important to pay attention to.

Okay, so that leaves us (briefly) to: How do we do something better? How do we cultivate self-awareness? And what are the barriers that we come across when we are trying to do this?

The first and most important thing you need to do is slow down, stop moving, and be quiet. Your best connection to understanding your self-awareness is through mindful practices, prayer, meditation, and just slowing everything down. Take time to connect with yourself every single day in some sort of quiet, non-active space. Avoid digital distractions (which includes Scriptures, podcasts, any other good thing that you're investing in). Take some time to literally do nothing. Carve out some solitude. Practicing mindfulness, pay attention to your inner state as it arises. Try being mindful when you're walking, when you're eating, when you're listening—just do something that shuts all of the distractions out.

Journal some of your newfound awareness; process your thoughts through writing. Write down how you're feeling. After a terrible argument with a child or a spouse, write down what that was like for you. What did you feel? When did you feel that way? Why did you react that way? What about your own personal experiences or history made you say that to that other person?

Practice listening. We do not listen well in our society. I have had so many experiences... The other day, I asked a direct question to one of my kids, didn't listen to a single thing she said when she answered me—literally immediately—after I asked the question. And I'm like, “Oh, I'm so sorry. I didn't even hear you.” So, pay attention to the speaker; observe the emotions and the body language of the speaker. Do not listen with the intent of solving, changing, or offering up your own viewpoint—for the most part, nobody cares; if they do care, they'll ask you. So, no judgment or evaluation.

Gain a different perspective. You can only gain a different perspective if you ask. Ask the people around you to give honest feedback. How do you communicate? How are you when you are upset? How do you react when you're hungry and tired and have had a bad day at work? Ask those people who love and care about you to tell you these things so that you can increase in this awareness.

Some of the barriers we have to self-awareness are:

- A lack of mindfulness, meaning we never slow down long enough to actually be with ourselves, to understand how we feel, why we're cranky, why we're tired, why we don't like listening to someone when they talk about that particular subject. That's all inside of you. You just have to be quiet and listen for it.
- Our cognitive biases get in the way.
- Our unwillingness to listen to people tell us or criticize us or give us feedback gets in the way.
- Our confirmation bias gets in the way.
- And then we tend to forget to experience ourselves as "Self." That's a hard one to explain. But it just goes back to being quiet and listening to yourself and understanding where you are.

So the reason this is an important topic and the reason this is important to know is because this is a community of people who are engaged in a lot of good work: a lot of good work trying to do a lot of good things, a lot of conversations ~~going about~~ going around about a lot of really difficult subjects. And I'm... My observation—to the extent that I have observed the powers of observation—is that we are lacking in empathy and charity and self-awareness. And we fill ourselves with our Scripture study and our podcast listening and our things, and we go out, and we talk, and we communicate, and we blurt out things—and we are deaf, dumb, and stupid to the fact that if you do not understand yourself or why you react certain ways or why you think certain things, you're going to continue to spin your wheels and spin your wheels in contention and arguments and disagreements, all while patting yourselves on the back because you think because you read your Scriptures that morning, that everything's gonna be fine. And it's not.

To deconstruct the self and to deconstruct the “natural man that is an enemy to God” requires you to do the work of understanding why you are like you are.

- What makes you mad?
- What gets your ire up?
- What makes you happy?
- What makes you sad?
- Why does this conversation always bother you?
- Why does this kid always bother you?
- Why do you always get mad at your spouse when he or she does this?

These are important things to understand, and they're important things to take the time it will take to deconstruct all of the mess and all of the angst you've got going around it.

I started out with the Scriptures because this is in the Scriptures. The whole idea of understanding your emotions and your feelings and the way you act in the world is actually part of deconstructing the natural man. If human beings are one of the only mammals (or God's creation) that has feelings that have such a tremendous impact on our ability to be in the world with people, we better pay attention to 'em. And it doesn't matter how old you are; doesn't matter how young you are. There is no time when this is not gonna benefit you. No time. And I think the time to start is now.

In the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

2022.09.25 What to Worry About

Denver Snuffer, Jr.

“Stand Independent” General Conference, Layton, UT

September 25, 2022

DENVER: Aloha! To quote a friend from earlier this morning, Ke Akua Ho'omaika'i Oe, which is a Hawaiian blessing of God upon you.

I want to welcome, in particular, those who have been recently baptized and are attending this get-together for the first time. You may have noticed that we tend to have disagreements among one another and hold differing opinions. And that's welcomed. It produces discussions. Discussions can lead to kind of healthy healing and understanding. And one of the reasons why (when the opportunity to speak was presented) I thought it best to have my wife speak first and to speak about the subject that she talked about was because we are an unruly, uncontrolled, free group of people. We have no structure; we have no organization; we have no one in authority—because what ought to control the way in which we treat one another and the way in which we conduct ourselves is obedience to God and God alone.

One of the problems with institutional churches or organizations is that once you have established a mechanism for determining control, then it doesn't matter if the person who obtains the position of control is a good man or a bad man, a wise man or a fool. Once they occupy the position, it is the position that commands the respect. It is the position itself that has the ability to say yes or no and to move things forward in a wise or in a foolish way (which is one of the reasons why institutions that can be corrupted are always corrupted— period). The adversary has learned long ago that there's a limited number of tricks that you pull in order to bring about the corruption of institutions. And so when you ordain a new institution... And it doesn't matter what it is! It can be founded by our Lord Jesus Christ, and it will turn, over time, into Catholicism, in which wealthy and perverse and corrupt men cover their sins and gratify their pride and satisfy their vain ambition because they have the position in which to do it, and they can point back to the founder who is Jesus Christ who gave authority to Peter, and they hold the keys of Peter, and therefore, what they do ought to sway you, ought to control you. Wars get fought; people get executed. And so the adversary rules with blood and horror, all the while the dialogue focuses upon the position of authority and the legitimacy at the beginning of both Jesus Christ and Peter, his apostle. And so, whenever you stray from your obedience and adherence to the rule, you are reminded, “Wait a minute! There is authority, and that authority ought to command respect.”

Aren't these things annoying? [referring to the mic]

Look, we have a restoration that commenced with Joseph Smith, and I doubt anyone would be here today if they didn't think that there was an authentic event that occurred in the life of Joseph Smith, in which the Heavens were opened and a new message was delivered, and through him—by the gift and power of God—came forth a new volume of Scripture, the Book of Mormon. And we all accept that. But so do millions of other people who are not among us. There are those who have determined that the institution ordained by the Lord through Joseph Smith ought to command your fidelity and your loyalty—no matter what course it takes or how it may stray from or pervert the original teachings that were established—because of the legitimacy of Joseph Smith and the institution that he founded. And so today, the “most successful” of the groups controls over a trillion dollars in resources because people accept the narrative that “once an institution is legitimately founded, it doesn't get corrupted.”

Every institution gets corrupted. We lack an institution. And insofar as I hold any influence, I will oppose the establishment of an institution which legitimizes any person to occupy a role of authority and to exert (by their demand or command or insistence) the obedience of others. It is true that there have been revelations given by the Lord and that I've received some of them, and they've been published. I don't consider myself above any of them. Nor do I consider myself to have a greater understanding than any of you who can read the same document as I can. Once it's been received, I have to study it to understand its contents. I don't come with a ready-made ability to dictate anything to anyone. I am just as subordinate to and dictated to by God as any of you. I hold no position of authority. And among us, any voice that can speak up and testify to truth is welcomed. And anyone that has a truth that they can defend and explain—particularly in expounding the Scriptures and bringing new truth to light—is on an equal footing with every other one of us. It has to be so. You have to be individually responsible for understanding and preserving the truth. It has to be part of you—because if it is part of you (and only you), then you stand independent, and the apostasy or the corruption of another man or woman has no effect upon the persistence and the preservation of the truth—because it is in you. In order to create an apostasy, it requires that every single person must individually become corrupted when we all stand on equal footing before God, accountable for our faith, accountable for the truths that we welcome.

If we establish institutional controls, the adversary knows exactly how to compromise that—because it always happens. The Constitution of the United States was established by enlightened men whom God raised up for the very purpose. There was a system of checks and balances because evil, corrupt, and aspiring men always gravitate to positions of control and authority. It's like that light that draws the mosquitoes at night and then electrocutes them. It draws them in; they can't help themselves. And once there, the corruption that attaches destroys the men and the women.

One of the important checks and balances that got established (and I've given a talk about this down in Utah County years ago called “Constitutional Apostasy”) was a system in which the senators of the various states were not elected directly by the people; they were chosen by the legislatures of the respective states. You didn't get to vote for a senator; you got to vote for the state legislature, and then the state legislature selected and sent someone to the Senate. Can you imagine how differently the migration of power, taxes, and authority would have happened in the United States if the United States Senate was subordinate to the legislators of the various states? None of what you see going on in the aggregation of federal authority would have been approved in a United States Senate that was subordinate to the various legislatures. And so as soon as you changed (by an amendment to the Constitution) one of the checks and balances that had been set up by the founding fathers, you immediately launched the United States into a different direction, and you have subtracted a terribly meaningful check and balance on federal power and authority.

Small thing, grave consequences, and we're suffering under that even today. These are the kinds of small means that get employed by the adversary to corrupt institutions, to detract from our freedoms, from giving us the opportunity to preserve faith intact, and for being able to preserve truth—small things.

At the death of the Prophet Joseph Smith and his co-president, Hyrum Smith (whom Joseph had identified as THE possessor of Priesthood and Patriarch, upon whom the keys of the ability to ask and get answers had been conferred) upon their death, immediately a change was made. Whereas before there was never any occasion in which a member of the Quorum of the Twelve got asked to be a member of the First Presidency, upon the death of those two, the only ones that ever thereafter occupied a position in the First Presidency had to also occupy a position in the Quorum of the Twelve. And so the check and the balance of having quorums “equal in authority” got corrupted immediately, and we see the legacy of what happens thereafter.

It's very easy to corrupt men. Vain and ambitious desires, lustful and covetous attitudes, they're resident in every person in embryo, and the adversary knows how to excite that into corruption. When Joseph Smith was confined to Liberty Jail and he had nearly half a year, finally, to be out of the frenzy of the daily life, Joseph Smith wrote from Liberty Jail about destroying the ability of priesthood to claim it occupied positions of authority when he wrote, ...no power or influence can or ought to be maintained by virtue of the priesthood (T&C 139:6).

In the Joseph Smith translation of the book of Genesis describing the power in the gifts that were exercised by Enoch, they were exercised by faith in advance of the time in which he got ordained. All of the powers and the gifts of faith are available to every one of you—men and women—without regard to whether or not you hold priesthood or authority. You want to demonstrate the gifts of the Spirit? You don't have to have ordination in order to do so.

Well, from time to time I look into and read the nonsense that gets written about us. And one of the great curiosities that people have (and it's a matter of conjecture and speculation on—what is that?—Wiki and MormonWiki online when they're trying to describe what it is we're up to and who it is that we are) is conjecture about our numbers. Well, I got news for you: I don't have any idea how many people there are that have been baptized. I've heard that there are a number of people who were recently baptized and some of them will be here today. I understand that baptisms take place with some regularity in very far-flung places. I understand there's a website through which people can request baptism and that there are those who travel in order to perform the ordinance in far-flung places where there isn't someone already present able to perform the ordinance. But I don't know what the numbers are. Probably the only one who does is Keith Henderson—and I've never asked him, and I don't ask, and he doesn't tell—because he conducts the Recorder's Clearinghouse.

But I happen to know from fairly good authority that there are many people who have been baptized and who are awaiting turning in their paperwork to the Recorder's Clearinghouse until after their retirement from employment by the LDS Church or one of its various institutions—because they're afraid if that were to become an issue for them, they'd lose their employment. And much of the employment that happens in the LDS Church is based upon the possession of a temple recommend, and if they knew that someone had been rebaptized, they would deny him the temple recommend, and that would be that.

So even the Recorder's Clearinghouse numbers, however many that may show, there are others in addition. And I'm just not interested in that because the numbers don't matter. People who are interested in aggregation and numbers and quantities and... They miss the point. They miss the point entirely of what it is that is happening and its importance. The numbers do not matter. It isn't about how many there are. It's about how closely even a few can become to what it is the Lord wants us to become.

Look, there's an incident—it's referred to in the Teachings and Commandments 54, or excuse me, 154 where this incident is reported:

Three years previous to the death of Adam, he called Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahalalel, Jared, Enoch, and Methuselah, who were all high priests, with the residue of his posterity who were righteous, into the valley of Adam-Ondi-Ahman, and there bestowed upon them his last blessing...

So Adam called them together to give them his last blessing.

And the Lord appeared unto them, and they rose up and blessed Adam, and called him Michael, the Prince, the Archangel. And the Lord administered comfort unto Adam, and [he] said unto him, I have set you to be at the head; a multitude of nations shall come of you, and you are a prince over them for ever.

And Adam stood up in the midst of the congregation, and notwithstanding he was bowed down with age, being full of the holy ghost, predicted whatsoever should befall his posterity unto the latest generation. These things were all written in the Book of Enoch, and are to be testified of in due time.

Now this same priesthood, which was in the beginning, shall be in the end of the world also — or in other words, at the end of the world, the final dispensation will restore again the pattern of the first, or Adam's, dispensation. (T&C 154:19-21, emphasis as in original)

That promise is also something that we find in Genesis chapter three. Let me go to [paragraph] 13:

Thus the gospel began to be preached from the beginning, being declared by holy angels sent forth from the presence of God, and by his own voice, and by the gift of the holy ghost. And thus all things were confirmed unto Adam by a holy ordinance, and the gospel preached, and a decree sent forth that it should be in the world until the end thereof. And thus it was. Amen.

And Adam listened [un]to the voice of God and called upon his sons to repent. And Adam knew his wife again, and she bore a son, and he called his name Seth. And Adam glorified the name of God, for he said, God has appointed me another seed instead of Abel whom Cain slew. And God revealed himself unto Seth, and he rebelled not, but offered an acceptable sacrifice like unto his brother Abel. And to him also was born a son, and he called his name Enos. And then began these men to call upon the name of the Lord, ...the Lord blessed them. And a book of remembrance was kept, in which was recorded in the language of Adam, for it was given unto as many as called upon God to write by the spirit of inspiration. And by them their children were taught to read and write, having a language which was pure and undefiled. Now this same priesthood which was in the beginning shall be in the end of the world also. (Genesis 3:13-14 RE)

So what is it about that priesthood that from these verses we can count on? Well, for one, there is a list of seven high priests who are named (who gathered with Adam in the valley of Adam-Ondi-Ahman) to whom the Lord appeared.

If you go through the chronology in Genesis, what you realize is that the children of Adam and Eve fell almost immediately into apostasy. There were generations born, none of whom accepted the gospel being taught by Father Adam and Mother Eve—generations!—until at last, Eve's optimism was raised because of Cain. And she thought, "Now, at last, finally, we've got someone who will follow and obey the Lord." After generations! And yet, the one whom she had hope in murdered his brother, and so there had to be born yet another descendant to Adam and Eve: Seth, whose name we just encountered.

And so Father Adam and Mother Eve are bearing children for generations. And their posterity are marrying (we're told in Genesis) two-by-two; they marry, and they duplicate the family unit, and they have children. And so generations exist now. (And they lived a long time, and they bore children for generation after generation.) And now we get three years previous to Adam's death (something over 960 years), and you have seven high priests and then a handful that are called "the residue."

This same priesthood, which was in the beginning, is going to return in the end. What the world fails to recognize is that you don't need 16½ million people to accomplish and fulfill the promises and the prophecies. When Jesus Christ came in the meridian of time and He taught people, the biggest number that is ever mentioned in the New Testament is mentioned in an epistle by the apostle Paul at the time that the Lord ascended into Heaven from the Mount of Olives: “Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye here looking up? That same Lord shall in like manner return” (see Acts 1:3 RE). Two angels came by and spoke to them that were watching, and Paul enumerates, “How many were there?” Maybe five hundred is what Paul says the Lord Jesus Christ was able to convince to have faith after His resurrection and after He had spent some 40 days as a resurrected personage appearing in and around Jerusalem and ministering to disciples. Five hundred. What difference do the estimates of the numbers of people make? If that same priesthood which was in the beginning shall in the end of the world be also and if our Lord managed only with proof of His resurrection to get 500, what difference do the numbers make? It's not the numbers that matter.

I'll tell you what matters:

And now Alma began to expound these things unto him, saying, It is given unto many to know the mysteries of God; nevertheless, they are laid under a strict command that they shall not impart — only according to the portion of his word which he do[th] grant unto the children of men, according to the heed and diligence which they give unto him...

Okay, heed and diligence unto the Lord—that matters.

...therefore, he that will harden his heart, the same receiveth the lesser portion of the word. And he that will not harden his heart, to him is given the greater portion of the word, until it is given unto him to know the mysteries of God, until they know them in full. And they that will harden their hearts, to them is given the lesser portion of the word until they know nothing concerning his mysteries; and then they are taken captive by the Devil and led by his will down to destruction. Now this is what is meant by the chains of hell. (Alma 9:3 RE)

The Restoration through the Prophet Joseph Smith right now is bound firmly in the chains of hell everywhere, excepting among this group (and including this group, to the extent that we fail to give heed and diligence to the Lord)! The only thing that matters isn't the numbers. What matters is the heed and the diligence given by some few unto the Lord, so that the mysteries of God may increase in them until they know the mysteries of God in full.

Take a look around at what you see in the various claimants to be inspired leaders of the various denominations that reckoned from Joseph Smith as a founder, and you will see such profound ignorance, such darkness, that the only way to describe it is as the chains of hell. They know nothing concerning the mysteries of God. “We don't know about that. I don't know that we teach that,” to quote Gordon B. Hinckley. They reject and they march away in their pride and their arrogance, all the while claiming that they're possessors of keys—and because they have keys, you better watch out, you better not cry, you better be good, and I'm telling you why. Nelson, the Destroyer.

Therefore, he [and this is talking about God—he] sent angels to converse with them, who caused men to behold...his glory. And they began from that time forth to call on his name; therefore, God conversed with men and made known unto them the plan of redemption which had been prepared from the foundation of the world. And this he made known unto them according to their faith, and repentance, and their holy works. (Ibid. ¶7)

That's what matters: faith, repentance, and holy works. Those are the things that bring about the results that God is trying to achieve in restoring things in the last days so that that which was here in the beginning may return again in the last days to the earth. Angels come, and they converse with men. That results in teachings that are inspired and true. That allows people to comprehend a plan for their salvation, which in turn results in them repenting and being able to accomplish holy works.

There are holy works that are being accomplished and have been accomplished among the people that we are part of, that we're privileged to participate in. Among other things, the Scriptures have been recovered in a way that they have not been available to mankind for... Well, ever since the time that the Lord was here in the New Testament (which itself got corrupted shortly thereafter by a great and abominable church). We've recovered Scriptures; we've presented them to the Lord; we've asked that He accept them. The Lord has made some changes to the Scriptures and told us to alter or add things or eliminate things from the text, and then having done so, all of what He said was gathered together and printed in a bound volume of Scriptures. That involved the efforts of many people over several years with a great deal of effort (primarily a research effort). But in the end, it was something that required God's own voice in order to finish the task up. And God determined that He would speak unto us, and we heard and recorded His voice. And we have Scriptures as a consequence of that.

Right now, there is an ongoing effort: I'm privileged to meet with the effort/those involved every week over Zoom, with people from all over the world—scholars and people of unquestioned capacity and ability to take the Book of Mormon and to translate it back into the language that would have been used about 600 years before Christ in the Hebrew tongue of that day. It's an extraordinarily arduous task. And the words that get used have to be attested to by existing Old Testament Hebrew texts. There are several translations of the Book of Mormon (either in whole or in part) into Hebrew, but they use modern-Hebrew language. And there isn't a rabbi who's serious about understanding the words of God who would respect those forms of the translation of the Book of Mormon as something that is authoritative and attested to. That effort has been going on for several years, and it's now in its final editing process. But it will eventually result in the rolling forth of yet another holy work (not being accomplished through institutions that prize their riches and who've entered into treaties in order to secure the ability to build part of a BYU campus extension on the Mount of Olives in Israel; they've signed a treaty with the nation of Israel guaranteeing that they will not proselytize—in absolute contradiction to the obligation imposed upon us in the Book of Mormon to take the message of the Book of Mormon to the remnant of the Jews—because they value their presence in Israel). And so the work is left to us. And so we've undertaken yet another holy work.

There are other things afoot that will, in due time, roll forth in order to fulfill the promises and the commitments made by God. Because it doesn't matter how few of us there are. What matters is the holiness of the work that we are accomplishing.

There's a scripture that I read a while ago, that is a little more directly related to the subject of this conference than what I've been saying so far. But all things matter. So... It's from Ezekiel; in the Restoration Edition, it's Ezekiel 18:10.

Thus says the Lord God: In the day that I shall have cleansed you from all your iniquities, I will also cause you to dwell in the cities, and the wastes shall be built. And the desolate land shall be tilled, whereas it lay desolate in the sight of all that passed by. And they shall say, This land that was desolate has become like the Garden of Eden, and the waste and desolate and ruined cities have become fortified and are inhabited. Then the heathen that are left round about you shall know that I the Lord build the ruined places and plant that which was desolate. I the Lord have spoken it, and I will do it.

There's a lot of excitement about the idea that there's global warming going on and that we need to take some fairly dramatic steps to cure a problem. A problem may exist, but all of the solutions only make the problem worse and have nothing to do with actually fixing what's wrong. It's so extraordinarily wrongheaded. It's like, oh, someone has leprosy at a time when we have no cure or treatment for it and telling him, "Quick, quick, go bathe in the city's drinking water, so that, you know, we can solve your leprosy problem." It's a nonsensical solution there.

I would commend you to just go to YouTube, and search videos on YouTube about reclaiming desert land in some of the absolute worst places/most arid places on Earth. They have gone and done things to get nature to respond to cultivation and to plant life. In some cases, it's by running herd animals over the ground, like nature used to do in the Great Plains of the United States, where the grasslands of the United States were far and wide because the grazing herds would come through. They would graze; they wouldn't necessarily digest all of the seeds; it would come out in the waste product of the animals, and their hooves would penetrate the ground to plant the seeds. And the next time it rained, the grass would regrow, and the roots would shoot down, and anytime moisture came through, the plants would attract it and hold it and invest it back into the earth. And extraordinarily arid places have been reclaimed simply by mimicking what nature wants to do.

There's a fellow—he's a religious fellow, and he's created a camp in Texas. He bought a completely arid, dry piece of ground on which he intended to develop a camp, and there was nothing out there but weeds and dirt and, I think, a mesquite tree or two. And he thought, "Well, the way to solve my problem is to drill a well." They began drilling the well, and as it got to the underground caverns in the limestone, the drilling rig would drop 40 feet in an empty cavern because there was nothing down there. And they drilled on and on, and the solution to the problem never came from drilling wells. The solution to his problem came from planting weeds that grew grasses (what we would consider weeds), grasses that grew high that captured and invested into the soil, and he refilled the aquifer—he refilled those limestone caverns—with water. And on the surface of his property today, he has a lake and a stream that runs off of his property and trees and vegetation, and it looks like Ezekiel described: whereas before it was desolate and barren, afterwards there are literally pools of living water that broke forth on the ground.

Which reminds me of something we have in the Teachings and Commandments in 58, beginning at paragraph three, about the middle:

And he shall utter his voice out of Zion and he shall speak from Jerusalem, and his voice shall be heard among all people...it should be a voice as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of great thunder which shall break down the mountains, and the valleys shall not be found. He shall command the great deep, ...it shall be driven back into the north countries and the islands shall become one land, and the land of Jerusalem and the land of Zion shall be turned back into their own place, and the earth shall be like as it was in the days before it was divided. And the Lord, even the Savior, shall stand in the midst of his people... [He] shall reign over all flesh. And they who are in the north countries shall come in remembrance before the Lord, and their prophets shall hear His voice and shall no longer stay themselves, and they shall smite the rocks, and...ice shall flow down at their presence, and a highway shall be cast up in the midst of the great deep. Their enemies shall become a prey unto them, and in the barren deserts there shall come forth pools of living water and the parched ground shall no longer be a thirsty land. And they shall bring forth their rich treasures unto the children of Ephraim, my servants, ...the boundaries of the everlasting hills shall tremble at their presence.

Well, those things occur as a consequence of natural events. And the Earth longs to be able to have those events begin to take place. Look at the words of the covenant that the Lord offered to us:

I, the Lord your God, will be with you and never forsake you, and I will lead you in the path which will bring peace to you in the troubling season now fast approaching.

I will raise you up and protect you, abide with you, and gather you in due time, and this shall be a land of promise to you as your inheritance from me.

The Earth will yield its increase, and you will flourish upon the mountains and upon the hills, and the wicked will not come against you because [of] the fear of the Lord will be with you.

I will visit my house, which the remnant of my people shall build, and I will dwell therein, to be among you, and no one will need to say, Know ye the Lord, for you all shall know me, from the least to the greatest.

I will teach you things that have been hidden from the foundation of the world and your understanding will reach unto Heaven.

...You should be called the children of the Most High God, and I will preserve you against the harvest. (T&C 158:12-17)

Well, the Earth wants to yield her increase. There's a lamentation recorded by Enoch, right before the flood, where the Earth herself spoke up and lamented the wickedness of men upon her face and wanted to know when the season would finally come that she could rest and that righteousness would return to her face.

There's a saying about how sensitive horses are that they can feel when a fly lands on them. And they can make their skin shake, and they can shoo the fly with their tail because they can feel something as light as the presence of a fly that lands on them. Do you think from the account that is given by Enoch of the Earth's lamentation that the Earth itself is any less sensitive about the wickedness that exists upon her face than a horse is sensitive to the presence of a fly upon her skin? If the Earth senses the presence of righteousness again upon her face, do you think it matters that there's only seven of them? That there's only 500 of them? That there's only a diminutive number? I mean, how many people heard the Lord in any given sermon that He taught, even the Sermon on the Mount? Were there as many people that heard Him on that occasion as are here today? Perhaps not. I mean, they didn't have folding chairs; they didn't have fixed chairs. How many people can you gather without a microphone? Without the ability to project a sound? How many people heard the sound of the Lord? It is perhaps the largest number of people that ever heard Christ speak at the gathering in Bountiful, when approximately 2500 people saw the risen Lord and had Him minister to them. Can you imagine that? That the Lord spent His entire ministry preaching and teaching to a comparatively small group of people that was dwarfed by the number of people he was able to address in the resurrection when He visited in Bountiful?

Well, I would not be troubled about the numbers. I would be troubled about the degree to which we progress and regress. The reason why my wife stood up first to talk to you is because there's a great deal in the Answer to the Prayer for Covenant and in the most recent instruction that we got that refers us back to the Answer to Prayer for Covenant and the Covenant itself that suggests that we need to figure out how to deal with one another in a meaningful way, how to deal with the fact that we have differences—because we do and we will, and there is always going to be some reason why the particular group of irritants coming from that man or woman is just setting your teeth on edge. It's just always gonna be the case. So why not ask (as Stephanie had suggested) in response to that, not what's up with them? But instead, what's up with ME? Why does that person set me off? Very often, the reason why that person sets you off is because you project onto them the very, very irritating things that you possess or do or exhibit.

We're not supposed to talk about politics, according to my wife, but I'm gonna talk about politics. Right now there's a group/there's a political party in possession of the Presidency, the Senate, the House (everything, probably, except the Supreme Court at the moment). And constantly, there's the drumbeat that says their politically-weak, out-of-office, minority political opponents are fascists! "They're fascists! They're trying to destroy democracy! They're fascists!" And yet, under the umbrella of that particular political view, someone with a gun went to the congressional softball game and shot Congressman Scalise precisely because he opposed his political views. Billions of dollars of damage were done in the name of that political party's desire to see certain political changes take place all across the country. And recently, someone was run over in North Dakota by someone who says that he feared an 18-year-old potential fascist.

Now, I'm not saying that Republicans are good and that Democrats are evil. They're all evil. They're all corrupt. There was a time when the other political party that's currently out of office had the Presidency, had the Senate, had the House of Representatives, and I think they, at that time, even had the Supreme Court. And they didn't solve any of the political problems that existed then because they still exist now—because we're all so stupid that, as long as the political issue gets preserved, they can say, "We stand for this," and you'll donate money to them and say, "Oh, good. I agree with that. They don't want 'this,'" whatever "this" is! I don't care if it's illegal immigration. I don't care if it's women's rights. I don't care if it's abortion. I don't care if it's strong military. I don't care if it's intervening in foreign wars. It doesn't matter what the political issue is. They feed on exciting you into upset and anger so that you'll part with your pocketbook and give them money. Do you really think that what the Republicans have to offer or what the Democrats have to offer are going to make your life better? Do you really think that electing an egomaniacal strongman will fix electing a doubting, doddering old fool? Do you think we fix problems that way?

We fix our own problems by giving heed and diligence to God and by gaining in light and truth and in comprehending the mysteries of God. Like the horse can shrug off the fly, the Earth herself can shrug off the unrighteous in order to protect even a small group of those who are God's (God's=possessive, apostrophe "s," belonging to Him). We need to live our lives individually so that the Earth recognizes us as someone whose feet are beautiful upon the mountains and who are welcomed upon the Earth because we delight her by serving that same God who organized her, who—in response to His voice—organized herself into the planet, and when He spoke, it caused the dry land to appear. She responded to Him. She was created and organized by Him. She was populated with vegetation and animal life...largely by His consort. But this Earth knows the difference between righteousness and wickedness—and it doesn't matter how many or how few. It only matters how much light and truth we have among us.

Don't be hasty to think that you know more than you do. Don't be hasty to reach a conclusion and defend a proposition when... I can't tell you how often I've studied a matter through at some considerable length, carefully parsing the Scriptures to come up with what I believe to be the right answer, and then, having prepared myself to understand the answer, taking my conclusion before the Lord, only to be corrected because I did not see and I did not understand. We have to be willing to be corrected—not because we stick our nose into one another's business but because we hear light and truth, and we accept it as such. It tastes good; it feels good. But even then, it's possible that what we're tasting, feeling, hearing, and comprehending is only an introduction to the greater truths that come thereafter.

It is given unto many to know the mysteries of God...until they know them in full (Alma 9:3 RE). Well, that “until” process can take some time. I would imagine that even if the Heavens were opened to you and you could behold, as Joseph said, for five minutes the opening of the Heavens, that it would yet be many years before what was revealed to you would be comprehended.

When Nephi recorded his initial impressions upon the revelation that he received when he was trying to understand what his father was teaching him, he would later, then, etch those into the large plates of Nephi. And then, decades later, he got the command to create the small plates of Nephi. It's at least three decades—it could be four decades—between when the events occurred with the revelation that Nephi received before they migrated across the Arabian Peninsula and when he etched them into the small plates of Nephi. And when he does that, he says, ...my heart pondereth continually upon the things which I have seen and heard (2 Nephi 3:6 RE). “Pondereth continually.” Four decades! And what tumbles out of that effort are the small plates of Nephi, which were never abridged by Mormon; we get them in an unabridged, unreformed, unprocessed form, directly from the translation of the small plates of Nephi, in order to replace the lost 116 pages. And these are what Nephi says are the sacred teachings. These are the lessons he wants you to learn.

A few days ago when meeting with the translation team (the Hebrew translation team), I explained to them that what Nephi did in his book was to take and substitute Isaiah text as his—Nephi's—testimony about what he—Nephi—saw because he was commanded by the Lord that he shall not write it. But as soon as he's commanded not to write it, he's given the big hint that others have seen and written it. So Nephi, then, given the restriction that he's not supposed to write it, takes and substitutes the language of Isaiah, but it is his—Nephi's—testimony. And as he progresses through his testimony, he then gives a transition chapter and then an interpretive key. In the transition chapter, he stops quoting Isaiah and begins to paraphrase him, and then he gives you an interpretive key saying, “This is what all of that stuff I just gave you means,” because it's a decidedly American-oriented prophecy about Nephi's vision for the Americas. And then he wraps his plates up (his testimony up), and he hands it to his brother, Jacob, who does exactly the same thing as his brother had done. He tells the people, “Come to the temple tomorrow, and I'm gonna give to you a prophecy.” And the people come to the temple tomorrow, and he reads an allegory for Zenos. And after reading it, he says to the people, “I told you I was going to prophesy to you today. And so, here's my prophecy: What I just read you from Zenos, it's all true.” So, you've got Nephi using Isaiah to bear his testimony about the things he's seen and heard. You've got Jacob, who's been in the presence of the Lord, bearing testimony and prophecy by quoting the words of Zenos.

What we don't have available to us are the brass plates on which a more extensive version of the Old Testament had been recorded. We have Mormon abridging content and putting it together through the rest of the Book of Mormon. I would suggest that the pattern that was established by Nephi and followed by Jacob is the pattern that got followed in all of the Book of Mormon and that what we're getting throughout the remainder of the Book of Mormon are extensive passages from the brass plates incorporated into the account, the teachings, and the testimony that has been preserved as the Book of Mormon. I think if we had a copy of the brass plates and we could compare them with the text that Mormon abridged, that we would all be shocked by the amount of content that reckons from the brass plates. I think there is so much of that into the balance of the record that we have in the Book of Mormon that there's practically nothing of value left in those plates that we haven't already got in the Book of Mormon itself.

So why would someone who gazed into Heaven for five minutes spend time teaching using Isaiah or teaching using Zenos or teaching using quotes from Scripture in order to get the message across? Well, if it's been said by someone else in a way that is sufficient to teach the precept, it's rather like what Christ taught about the rich man who dies and goes to Sheol who, lifting up his eyes, being in torment, sees Lazarus, and asks him, "Hey, go deliver a message to my brothers. Warn them about this." And the parable the Lord taught was, "Hey, they've got Moses and the prophets. If they don't believe Moses and the prophets, they wouldn't believe, though one should return from the dead," making a prophetic comment about those that were rejecting Himself.

The Scriptures are in front of us. But just like civil violence is described in current political vocabulary as "reasonable dissent" and just like competing viewpoints are denounced and censored on college campuses today because words are called "violence," it is possible for us to take the words of Scripture and to use the words of Scripture in order to justify our own pride and vanity and insecurity, vain ambition, and desire to control and subjugate.

It isn't the words of Scripture that are gonna get us where we need to get. It's gonna require something more and maybe a lot more of what my wife talked about before I got up here than what I'm talking about now that I'm up here. Because we really do need to listen to one another and to hear and to put ourselves into someone else's shoes. And instead of being triggered, ask ourselves, "Why? Why do I want to react in that way? Why do I want to behave in that unbecoming way? Why do I want to attribute ill-motive? Maybe the problem lies within myself, as opposed to within what I'm finding to be so irritating that I can't keep silent anymore! I must speak up..." with little regard to how ugly our reactions are, with little regard to how unbecoming we can be in our self-righteousness.

You know, we do have an obligation to take care of the children. We do have an obligation—like that latest comment from the Lord suggests—to be careful about taking vulnerable people and exposing them to things that are unbecoming. I don't know if you've seen the pictures of that high school shop teacher with the prosthetic boobs that look like he's gonna lose them in a table saw if he's... I don't know how you can be a shop teacher and be doing that. There's some behavior that is so outrageous and so sexually deviant that, just a little while ago, it would have landed the person in jail. And today it's being defended as an expression of freedom and a desire to overcome the patriarchy. It's just nonsense. There's so much abuse of children going on in the communities of the United States right now that parades itself as a virtue and gets clothed in the language of virtue, that we ought to look at that and think for ourselves that sometimes we too use the language of virtue to describe and conceal what's really going on inside ourselves.

None of us are that good. None of us. But the Lord is forgiving and kind, willing to correct, willing to forgive, and eager for us to catch on to what happens when we give heed and diligence. We can't make someone else give heed. We can't browbeat someone else into diligence. That can't happen! The heed that must be given and the diligence that must be shown is internal to yourself and internal to myself. And I know there are times when I'm anything but giving the kind of heed and diligence that ought to be given, even to a kindly and forgiving Lord.

Well, I'm gonna close, because we're destined to get out of here by two o'clock, and I think there's something like a closing "something or other." And at my wife's insistence, I'm not gonna take questions. She thinks more often than not, I do something foolish when responding spontaneously.

But I don't want to end without saying that the thoughts that have been gathered today I consider to be as important as anything I've ever said and worthy of saying in the name of Jesus Christ, Mahalo.

2022.10.22 Unity in Humanity Interfaith Celebration

Online Conference

Denver Snuffer Jr.

October 22, 2022

Jill Van Haren: All right, so our last speaker, I'd like to welcome Denver.

Denver C. Snuffer, Jr. He lives in Sandy, Utah. He was admitted to practice law in 1980 in Utah and remains a practicing attorney. He was a convert to the LDS faith in 1973 when he was 19 years old, and he was excommunicated from The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints exactly 40 years later for writing a book called Passing the Heavenly Gift. During those 40 years, he served on the Stake High Council [and] taught Gospel Doctrine and priesthood classes for 21 years. He's the author of many books, including The Second Comforter: Conversing with the Lord Through the Veil. Welcome, Denver.

Denver Snuffer: How are you doing, Jill?

I've been listening to everyone's talk before now, and while I would use a different vocabulary, much of what got said would be something that could be said in my faith, just using a different vocabulary.

There are only a handful of predominant religions in the world. But to a believer, I don't think the numbers matter. The truth—if someone's got what they believe to be truth—is something that people like to hold on, even if there are “few who find it,” to quote Christ. The numbers in various predominant religions run something like this:

- There's a total of 2.38 billion Catholics in the world, or excuse me, Christians in the world, of which 1.3 billion are Catholic, and 1 billion are Protestant.
- There are 1.8 billion Muslims in the world, but surprisingly, 1.5 billion out of that are Sunni, and only 270 million are estimated to be Shia.
- 1.2 billion Hindus,
- 506 million Buddhists,
- 26.4 million Sikhs,
- Mormons slightly outnumber the number of Jews in the world at 16.6 million Mormons (nominally Mormon) and 15.8 million Jews, and
- Daoists there are 8.7 million.

I belong to a small group of people that believe in Mormonism (and Mormonism is expansive in the sense that anyone that believes in the Book of Mormon is regarded as Mormon). But I don't belong to the largest sect of that, which is The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. (I did once; Jill mentioned I was excommunicated.) I'm part of a small group—maybe a few thousand people—trying to recapture the original, dramatic, living religion that Joseph Smith taught at the time that Joseph Smith was alive and restoring what's regarded as the “original religion that goes back to the time of Adam.” Part of that religion is belief in the Book of Mormon. The Book of Mormon has a verse in it that says this:

For behold, the Lord doth grant unto all nations, of their own nation and tongue, to teach his word, yea, in wisdom, all that he seeth fit that they should have; therefore, we see that the Lord doth counsel in his wisdom, according to that which is just and true. (Alma 15:13 RE)

From that verse, I take it that no matter where you go, what nation you're involved with, what tongue is spoken, what vocabulary gets applied, that all the religions that there are in the world have some relation to God and that God intended for these diverse belief systems to be out there, and that if you, as part of your belief system, have something that is true and you have an opportunity to offer that to me, that I ought to be willing to accept it, that truth belongs in one aggregated whole and not splintered as it is, but it's up to us to undertake the effort to do that gathering.

There's pressure on every religion to change, and that pressure begins immediately. Before Mohammed was dead, the religion was under pressure to change; after he was dead, there was pressure to change it before it was reduced to writing. By the time it was reduced to writing, there were multiple forms of the Quran. The, umm... Wars were fought, and books were burned in order to bring Islam into a unified, single text. That mirrors what happened in Christianity with the fights that occurred in the second and third century of Christianity in trying to settle on what was the correct bundle of beliefs and warring factions, fighting one another, until finally there became one universal or Catholic Christian faith, and it predominated.

Forces and arguments that apply to religions today suggest that religious beliefs are outdated. There are arguments that they're harmful to the individual, or they're harmful to society, or they're an impediment to the progress of science or humanity. And in recent decades, there's been a precipitous decline in the West of biblical moral values, and that's been mirrored by similar declines in the East. This decline has paralleled the rapid escalation of culture shifts, such as relativism, and materialism, individualism, and secularism. These have caused all religions in general to become increasingly marginalized throughout the world.

Since the Industrial Revolution, social change has been initiated increasingly by the youth. Economic[s] changed the opportunities that children were afforded because of the Industrial Revolution, and that separated children from their parents' professions. Before then, a butcher's children grew up to be a butcher; a carpenter's children grew up to be carpenters; brick masons produced brick masons; and so on. But the revolution allowed new opportunities for the children. And they separated not only from their parents physically but also, increasingly, culturally and religiously.

But it's a biblical curse to be led by children, and since World War II, children have been at the leading edge of social change and religious change. And an observer of the upheaval wrote a song about what was underway in 1963. He wrote it because of what he perceived to be the zeitgeist, the spirit of the times that was then underway. It was written in September and October of 1963:

Come gather 'round people
Wherever you roam,

And admit that the waters
Around you have grown,
And accept it that soon
You'll be drenched to the bone.
If your time to you is worth savin'
Then you better start swimmin' or you'll sink like a stone,
For the times they are a-changin'.

And more directly, a verse later:

Come mothers and fathers
Throughout all the land,
And don't criticize
What you can't understand.
Your sons and your daughters
Are beyond your command,
For your old road is rapidly agin'.
Please get out of the new one if you can't lend your hand,
For the times they are a-changin'.

...As the present now
Will later be passed,
The order is rapidly fadin'.
And the first one now will later be last,
For the times they are a-changin'.
(The Times They Are A-Changin' by Bob Dylan)

That was true in the post-World War II baby-boom generation. But modern social media and modern communications and social networks have increasingly skewed the development of social change into the hands of the youth. And not to be left on the side, there are a lot of deliberate forces who have studied social change who interject themselves directly into the process of leading that social change from behind nameless, faceless walls where they interject into the stream ideas that are increasingly amoral, increasingly selfish, self-centered, sexually deviant, destructive of the family, destructive of religious traditions and religious histories that we want to hold on to. As Kevin talked about his return to an earlier form of religion because of his discouragement from what he saw in Christianity, so likewise, the social media change is encouraging everyone to abandon the mores and the anchor that the religious values they were raised with provided to them.

John Lennon wrote a song that was based upon a book that was written by Timothy Leary who paraphrased from the Tibet[an] Book of the Dead. And so, ideas from Buddhism crept into the social change underway in the 1960s in the form of the Buddhist ideas that infected the lyrics of John Lennon. Later, all of the Beatles attended a lecture in August of 1967 by the Maharishi Mahesh Yogi at the Hilton Hotel in London. Afterwards, they met with him privately; they were favorably impressed, and they went up to Bangor in north Wales for a weekend seminar. While the Beatles were in Wales at the seminar of the Maharaja, Brian Epstein (the one who had managed the Beatles) died, and the death of the Beatles' manager (coinciding with the transcendental meditation instruction) no doubt had a great deal to do with the Beatles' decision to move to India in February of 1967 [1968] for several months of training. While there, it was one of the most productive songwriting periods of the band, but it ended badly when the Maharishi was accused of inappropriate sexual misconduct. Cultural currents of Christianity, Buddhism, Hinduism (and in John Lennon's case, Atheism) all merged into the music of the Beatles. And an onslaught of cultural drift from social media giants today is also spreading a new wave of innovation, confusion, irreligion, mixed religion, and we find ourselves in the midst of materialism, hedonism, sexual confusion, and intolerance predominating in the new values that are attempting to replace the old ones that are based on the traditional religions.

Well, this conference is supposed to be comparing notes, so to speak, across religious faiths. All lives are temporary; we learn from the past what the dead leave us in writing, song, architecture, and social structure. But we will soon be joining our dead ancestors. And the question arises: What are we gonna leave to benefit our posterity who will have arrived after us when we've departed from this temporary place? Why would we choose to leave something? What could possibly be the most important thing we can bequeath? I'd suggest that words of truth resonate across every culture, across every religion, across every language. They're not only the most valuable thing that we can leave behind, but they're also the most enduring. Truth outlasts brick and mortar. It endures beyond empires, it moves nations, it gives meaning to life, and it raises our eyesight above the ground and lets us peer into eternity.

Kevin mentioned the star theology of the Blackfeet. Star theology is very much a part of a true religion. Ultimately, we hope to build a temple, and in the temple, I expect there will be a great deal that memorializes in architecture a true star theology.

I want to thank everyone who's participated from their vantage point in giving us what they have given us. I believe that God is knowable. I believe that it's part of the quest of meaning in this life for us to seek to know God and to obtain understanding directly from Him and not derivatively simply from books or from the past—but to let a religion live in us, in which God's presence through us is manifest in the earth by the things we say, the things we do, the things we think.

Now, I was told to leave time for questions. And so I want to do that. But I also want to point out that there's a point in the Old Testament where the patriarchal father over the twelve tribes of Israel is in the process of giving blessings to prophesy what is going to befall his posterity on to the end of time. And his oldest son, Reuben, was given a blessing, which says, Reuben, you, my first born, my might, and the beginning of my strength, the excellence of dignity, and the excellence of power. Unstable as water, you shall not [prosper] (Genesis 49:4 RE). Now, the way I have read that most often in the past is that he's telling him that Reuben and his posterity is gonna be too unstable in their convictions and their way of life to prosper. But recently, I've had a change of mind. And I think what he's saying is, if you are unstable as water, you will not prosper. And I think that admonition/that warning/that counsel to the son, Reuben, is applicable to all of us. And that when we allow our religious convictions to become unstable, unanchored in the solidity of what is enduring and eternal, then we become incapable of prospering. And so I would end by saying, be true and believing to your faiths, to the traditions you've held that are true; be solid as a rock in resisting the winds of compromise and doubt, because they surely are upon us.

Oh, there's one question I see here (I've called up the questions), asking about what song it was. It's "Tomorrow Never Knows," a song that got its title not from the book but from one of Ringo Starr's malapropisms: "a hard day's night," "eight days a week"... These are just things that Ringo Starr would say. And the title of John Lennon's song was "Tomorrow Never Knows," 'cuz Ringo would utter that. And it's one of the most innovative songs that The Beatles introduced—the last song on the Revolver album—and it would point the way to where that band was headed.

Okay, so here's a question that says, "If Joseph Smith was oriented to the religion of Adam, will it not require us to grow in understanding of what Adam understood?" Yes, absolutely. Without any doubt, it will take a great deal to make the leap across from where we are now into a religion that is far more comprehensive and far more oriented towards nature and eternity. The stars... When you look at the stars, for example, you're literally looking back billions of years (just to the naked eye). And so, being quiet and going out at night and looking up at the star fields is one way to project yourself back into eternity—billions and billions of years—visually, because they are... What you're seeing now is something from the long-distant past. And it's right there available for you to behold and for you to meditate upon. And it's a way to connect you up by being still with a much greater consciousness that fills the immensity of space and originates from God Himself.

So, another question: "How do you suggest someone moves from connecting with God through Scripture to connecting with God directly through experience or spirit?" Every bit of Scripture that you read, every profound idea that you encounter has an affect on you. And if you slow down and you allow it to sink deeply into your heart and your mind, and if you consider it carefully, the idea will eventually occur to you that you're not separated in time and space from that which is timeless and eternal, but that you, too, are part of that.

There's a sermon given by King Benjamin (in the book of Mosiah of the Book of Mormon) in which he points out that God is sustaining you by His power, from moment to moment, by lending you breath so that you might live and move and do according to your own will. What that statement by King Benjamin tells you is that the very breath that you breathe connects you to God because He's lending it to you. Without that connection directly and immediately with God, you wouldn't be able to breathe. Therefore, there's an immediacy and a familiarity between you and God that exists innately. How you connect is to begin to pay attention to that.

And then there's this question, "What is one of the most important truths you ponder throughout the day? Where do you spend your time thinking and pondering?" Well, there's a lot of things that have to be done. There's a lot of things that are currently underway or that will shortly be underway that require careful and ponderous and solemn thoughts. I contemplate about the potential for failure. I contemplate the potential for my own weakness and my own inability. I contemplate about how odd the responses are by those who are both opposed to and those that are over-eager with what God is up to and doing today—and about how hard it is to cut the middle line and to keep everything in balance so that it proceeds in an orderly and steady and careful fashion. I worry about my own inadequacies and inabilities, and I worry about the people around me. I've pondered about all the illnesses that I have seen, the deaths of friends, the temporary nature of our existence here, and about how we really do need to take carefully and use the time carefully because it is extraordinarily valuable, the time we have here in mortality.

Thank you.

Jill Van Haren: Thank you so much, Denver. Along those same lines, I had a question. Thinking about mortality—and with Gayle referencing, you know, in terms of her understanding of reincarnation and then taking upon a body until we get it right, and then she expounded on what that meant—but I just wonder if you can tell us what your thoughts are on the purpose of coming here into these physical bodies and what we're to be doing with our time that you were just mentioning that's so precious.

Denver Snuffer: Everyone here is to be added upon as a result of what happens to us in mortality. And it doesn't matter if your life is short and brutal or if your life is long. Everyone who comes into a mortal body in this sphere gets added upon. We will depart here, and we will go to a place where there aren't bodies in this form, where we'll be given a chance to think back upon what we experienced. And if it was harsh and brutal and short and mean, that will give us a chance to meditate upon the meaning of those things and why they are negative and why there ought to be something better. If your life is long and successful, you'll have a chance to reflect back upon what good you did, if any. And what more good you could have done, but you failed to do, if you were self-indulgent. We are in the process of gaining understanding, light and truth, and sometimes that comes at the expense of hurting others. And sometimes that comes at the value of helping others. But everything that goes on here will not be forfeited; it will be kept. And we will move from—as the Scriptures put it, “worlds without end”—from sphere to sphere, experience to experience, over whatever time it takes, however many lives it may take, in order to be added on so that we can become like what our Scriptures define as “the prototype of the saved man.” That prototype of the saved man is Jesus Christ because death could not hold Him in the grave. The grave took Him, and He reclaimed His body, and He ascended into Heaven because He is the prototype of the saved man. And eventually, we are to arrive at that same end—but it may take worlds without end. We're here along a long, long path—an eternal path—to gain experience while we are here temporarily and to learn.

Thank you.

Jill Van Haren: Thank you so much for that last question, Denver. Thank you so much for coming.

2022.11.20 Righteousness

Fireside with Q&A Session

Denver Snuffer Jr.

November 20, 2022

So, we're ready? All right, then. I want to thank Dave and Amberli for hosting this and allowing it to take place at their home.

This is about righteousness. And keep in mind that the test of righteousness is the same in every generation—it's invariable; it doesn't change. To define righteousness, therefore, it's useful to go back and to look at the very first generations, because the criteria get established—and get established very early on.

In the Lectures on Faith, there's a series of questions at the end: How many noted righteous men lived from Adam to Noah? The answer is, Nine, which includes Abel, who was slain by his brother. And then the next question is: What are their names? Abel, Seth, Enos Cainan, Mahalalel, Jared, Enoch, Methuselah, and Lamech (LoF 2:72-73). If you add Adam and Noah to that list, then it's not nine; it's eleven. And if you eliminate Seth, or excuse me, Abel (because he died and was replaced by Seth), then you have ten. And there were ten of them that were there at the relevant time. And I'm reading from Teachings and Commandments 154:19:

Three years previous to the death of Adam, he called Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahalalel, Jared, Enoch, and Methuselah, who were all high priests, with the residue of his posterity, who were righteous, into the valley of Adam-Ondi-Ahman, and there bestowed upon them his last blessing. And the Lord appeared unto them, and they rose up and blessed Adam, and called him Michael, the Prince, the Archangel. And the Lord administered comfort unto Adam, and said unto him, I have set you to be at the head; a multitude of nations shall come of you, and you are a prince over them for ever.

So now we have a list of specific men who are called "righteous," but then we also have the residue (that is unnumbered and unnamed) who are also called righteous. So, the criteria for "righteousness" begins to take some shape.

I have set you to be at the head; a multitude of nations shall come of you, and you are a prince over them for ever.

If you go to the Book of Abraham chapter one, verse one and you look at what Abraham desired to be, his desire was to be a "father of many nations." Now, we view "nations" in the geopolitical sense of countries with boundaries. The way in which the word "nations" get used throughout the Old Testament is tribal. There's a nation of Benjamin, and a nation of Joseph, and a nation of Simon, and a nation of Reuben. These are simply divisions of the family. But when the division of the family became large enough, it ceased to be just a man or a family or a tribe; it becomes a nation. Adam was given the promise at the beginning that he would be the father of many nations, and when Abraham was seeking to restore—from apostasy—himself into the Holy Order, the one thing that he associated that with was the fatherhood and principedom in which he would reign over them for ever.

In the fullest sense, this is talking about the Holy Order, which requires both a patriarch and a matriarch, together, to be part of the organization of righteousness (which is the government of God, which is the kingdom of God). So how is the residue of unnamed and unnumbered people regarded as being righteous? Well, Christ explained that and defined how you include others within the status of righteousness (that those who are called to these positions were given) as equals.

This is Christ speaking:

He who receives you, receives me. And he who receives me, receives him who sent me. He that receives a prophet, in the name of a prophet, shall receive a prophet's reward. And he that receives a righteous man, in the name of a righteous man, shall receive a righteous man's reward. And whoever shall give [a] drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only, in the name of a disciple, truly I say unto you, he shall by no means lose his reward. (Matthew 5:8 RE)

This has been true since the beginning. It has always been the rule that when you receive and acknowledge a prophet, in the name of a prophet, you receive a prophet's reward.

When God delivers a dispensation of the gospel to the earth, the head of that dispensation is granted the right and privilege of organizing the dispensation. As the head organizes their dispensation according to righteous principles and receives God's approval of the pattern, the dispensation is established and remains in effect until apostasy necessitates another restoration. (T&C 154:1)

That's in the Teachings and Commandments 154:1.

Prior dispensations have been modeled after earlier patterns. And after Abraham, ~~all of the prior~~ all of the post-Abraham dispensations were organized after the pattern of Father Abraham (which is another interesting thing about nomenclature: We refer, invariably, to Adam as "Father Adam," and we refer to Abraham as "Father Abraham" because those two stand preeminent among all of the children of God as fathers from whom subsequent dispensations were descended or reckoned). Abraham's dispensation was patterned after Abraham's [Adam's] because he instituted the family order. However, because he [Abraham] had twelve sons in the third generation—Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob; its referred to in that manner in Scripture because God covenanted in turn with each of the three of them—and then in Joseph's generation, there were twelve sons. And so Peter, James, and John—and the First Presidency with the President and the two counselors—and the Quorum of the Twelve, both anciently and in later dispensations, all got patterned after the family of Abraham.

(There's plenty of seats...not that we really want you to join us [laughter]—but there you are.)

This is from a new volume of Scripture called the Testimony of St. John, which appears in the Teachings and Commandments as section 171.

Jesus said, I am here in the world to prove who is righteous and who is not. Those who have been blinded by falsehoods I can teach them to see, and for those claiming they see clearly, I will leave them in their blindness. And some of the leaders who were nearby overheard him say this, and asked him, Are we blind also? Jesus said to them, If you were blind, you would not have sinned. But because you claim, We see, therefore your sins remain.

In the name of Father Ahman I tell you, If you do not enter by the doorway into the protective sheepfold, but climb in [by] any other way, then you are only a thief and a robber. But when you enter at the door and the shepherd lets you enter, then you belong. The shepherd guards the entry, and his sheep respond to his voice. He calls his sheep by name and leads them up. He leads his sheep by his example and asks them to follow in his path, and they follow because they trust his words. His sheep will not follow another, but will flee from a stranger. They do not recognize the stranger's voice. Jesus told this parable to them, but they could not understand what he meant by the parable.

Then Jesus spoke to them again, In the name of Father Ahman I tell you, I am the door of the sheepfold. Every teacher now or before who has not testified of me are only thieves and robbers trying to take my sheep away, but my sheep have refused to heed them. I am the door. Any man that enters the sheepfold through me shall be saved and shall continue to progress and be supported. The thief only intends to steal, slay, and consume the sheep. I have come to preserve the lives of my sheep so that they might have abundant life.

I am the good shepherd, and a good shepherd will sacrifice his own life for the lives of [the] sheep. The true shepherd does not profit from the sheep, regarding them only as property, and cares nothing for the lives of the sheep. The false shepherd runs away when he sees a wolf approaching, letting the wolf destroy and scatter the sheep. I am the good shepherd and know my sheep, and they know me. But he who profits from the sheep flees, because he is only self-interested and cares nothing about the sheep. Just as the Father laid down his life for me, he trusts me with the lives of the sheep. I will sacrifice my life for the sheep. (TSJ 7:8-11, emphasis added)

So, when Christ is explaining how His sheep are known or identified, they “respond to his voice,” they listen to and they “trust his words,” they will not respond to/they will reject the stranger’s voice. And He begins that by saying, “I’m here in the world to prove who is righteous.” And so, if you are going to define righteousness by responding to the Master’s voice and rejecting and not responding to the stranger’s voice, then you need to take considerable heed and extraordinary care in how you distinguish those who come professing to be on an errand from someone else—because almost invariably, those that follow the true Shepherd, likewise do “not profit from [His] sheep.” They likewise do not regard His sheep “as [merely] property, [caring] nothing for the lives of [His] sheep.” This is a standard or a scale to test or measure whether or not you’re hearing a voice that originates from the Master, the Good Shepherd.

Those who profit from the sheep, very often quite handsomely...

In law school, there was this saying about the two oldest professions are prostitutes and lawyers. But lawyers, back in that sense, were ministers because the canon of law was the Scriptures. And so everyone wanted, you know, a legal ruling on what the Scriptures meant. And therefore, the two oldest professions are prostitutes and the ministry, as it turns out. And ministers almost invariably make a great deal of money profiting from the sheep.

There’s a great variety in both person and personality who are chosen by the Lord to be messengers—to be prophets, if you will. Some of them are likable, and some of them are quite unlikable. They come in every variety.

One of the most dramatic comparisons that happened were the closing out of one dispensation and the opening of another dispensation in the form of John the Baptist and Jesus Christ. And people who were able to reject both John and Jesus had their reasons for doing so for each one of them. And Christ made an observation about that. He said,

But unto what shall I liken this generation? It is like unto children sitting in the markets, and calling unto their friends, and saying, We have piped unto you and you have not danced. We have mourned for you and you have not lamented. For John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say, He has a devil. The Son of Man came eating and drinking, and they say, Behold a gluttonous man and a winebibber, a friend of publicans and sinners. But I say unto you, Wisdom is justified of her children. (Matthew 6:4 RE)

I don’t care who the messenger has been or will be, there will always be a reason to take offense. If even the Son of God gave offense to people, how much more will mere mortal men give to others, even if they happen to be a messenger sent by Him? But I want to remind you of a passage in the Teachings and Commandments 69:26 (which is the same thing as Doctrine and Covenants section 76):

...the glory of the Celestial is one, even as the glory of the Son is one. And the glory of the terrestrial is one, even as the glory of the moon is one. And the glory of the telestial is one, even as the glory of the stars are one, for as one star differeth from another star in glory, even so differeth one from another in glory in the telestial world. For these are they who are of Paul, and of Apollos, and of Cephas. These are they who say they are some of one and some of another: some of Christ, ...some of John, ...some of Moses, ...some of Elias, and some of Esaias, and some of Isaiah, and some of Enoch, but [receive] not the gospel, neither the testimony of Jesus, neither the prophets, neither the everlasting covenants.

Now, this is followed almost immediately after by describing the people who will inherit this condition, and it says that they will be thrust down to hell. They are liars. They are sorcerers. They are adulterers. They are whoremongers. They are people who love and make a lie. All of that is equated to those who “[receive] not...the prophets.” So when the Lord sends a message and it is His voice that is announcing the message—it’s not some mere mortal; it’s not some flawed individual; it’s not someone about whom it is easy to find an accusation... Because all men have fallen short of the glory of God. All men are weak. And there is no one that doesn’t deserve some condemnation or judgment or basis for rejecting them. That’s not the issue. The issue is what is said. And what is said must reflect the Master’s voice. If what is said reflects the Master’s voice, then the individual is of no consequence whatever. But rejecting the voice of the Master—no matter who it is that He chooses to send—is a most serious obligation that is essentially the same thing as being a liar, a sorcerer, an adulterer.

The Prophet Joseph Smith wrote, “John...wrested the keys, the kingdom, the power, [and] the glory from the Jews, by the holy anointing and decree of heaven...” That’s from the Teachings of the Prophet [Joseph Smith], page 276. In the Teachings and Commandments 82:14, it points out that John was ordained by the angel of God at the time he was eight days old unto this power: to overthrow the kingdom of the Jews, and to make straight the way of the Lord before the face of his people, to prepare them for the coming of the Lord, in whose hand is given all power. John was sent forth in part to be rejected by the Jews so that he could wrest the keys, the kingdom, and the power and the glory from the Jews, and this by the holy anointing and decree of heaven. Because an angel had established it and because the powers of heaven were behind it, the rejection of John was a necessary step to permit one dispensation to close and another to begin. God follows patterns in every age.

Now, we read the New Testament account—which is written from an insider’s viewpoint, contemporaneous with the people that were accomplishing these things—and to us, John’s mission/ministry/authority/legitimacy is unquestionable—because we’re on the inside, and we see it. But if you were there living in that day, What went ye [forth in] the wilderness...to see? A reed shak[ing in] the wind? (Luke 7:24 LE). What would you go out there with your expectations? He wore camel’s hair. This was not a man who would fit in well in any of the cities of Galilee or Judea.

Very few of that generation even noticed. I mean, the Scriptures make it sound like he was a big splash—and there probably were those who were devout, believing Pharisees, Sadducees, Herodians who went out to be baptized perfunctorily as kind of a, “Hey, let’s get in on this. I mean, they’re practicing baptism anyway. Let’s go get ours from him too,” but whose heart was not in it. Well,

The kingdom of Heaven is like unto a certain king who made a marriage for his son. And when the marriage was ready, he sent forth his servants to call them that were bid to the wedding; and they would not come. Again, he sent forth other servants, saying, Tell them that are bid, Behold, I have prepared my oxen, ...my fatlings have been killed, ...my dinner is ready, and all things are prepared; therefore, come unto the marriage. But they made light of the servants and went their ways — one to his farm, ...another to his merchandise. And the remnant took his servants, and treated them spitefully, [who] slew them. But when the king heard that his servants were dead, he was angry. And he sent forth his armies, and destroyed those murderers, and burned up their city.

Then said he to his servants, The wedding is ready, but they who were bid were not worthy. Go therefore into the highways, and as many as you shall find, bid to the marriage. So those servants went out into the highways and gathered together all, as many as they found, both [good and bad], and the wedding was furnished with guests.

But when the king came in to see the guests, he saw there a man who had not on a wedding garment. And he said unto him, Friend, how did you come in here not having a wedding garment? And he was speechless. Then [the king said] unto his servants, Bind him hand and foot, and take and cast him away into outer darkness. There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, for many are called, but few [are] chosen; wherefore, all do not have on the wedding garment. (Matthew 10:17-19 RE, emphasis added)

See, the invitation is always extended. And the opportunity always exists to accept the invitation and to say, Lord, I believe, but falling short of saying, Help thou mine unbelief (Mark 9:24 LE), they aren't helped, and they don't put on the wedding garment. Well, what (in this sense) is the wedding garment? It's not just to hear and to say, but it's also to do, because it's easy to give some lip-service to any noble idea, but it's difficult to then follow through, commit to, and take the steps required if you do believe.

So, going back to the beginning, that first generation,

And in that day the holy ghost fell upon Adam, which bore record of the Father and the Son, saying, I am the Only Begotten of the Father from the beginning, henceforth and for ever, that as you have fallen, you may be redeemed — and all mankind, even as many as choose. And in that day, Adam blessed God, and was filled, and began to prophesy concerning all the families of the earth, saying, Blessed be the name of God, for because of my transgression my eyes are opened, and in this life I shall have joy, and again, in my flesh I shall see God. And Eve his wife heard all these things and was glad, saying, Were it not for our transgression, we should never [have] had seed, and should never ha[ve] known good and evil, and the joy of our redemption, and the eternal life which God gives unto all the obedient. And Adam and Eve blessed the name of God, and they [this is Adam and Eve; this is not merely the man Adam—they (she too)...] made all things known unto their sons and...daughters.

They (Eve too) preached righteousness.

And Satan came among them, saying, I am also a Son of God. And he commanded them, saying, Believe not. And they believed not, and loved Satan more than God. And men began from that time forth to be carnal, sensual, and devilish. And the Lord God called upon men by the holy ghost everywhere and commanded them that they should repent. And as many as believed in the Son... repented of their sins should be saved. And as many as believed not and repented not should be damned. And the words went forth out of the mouth of God in a firm decree, wherefore they must be fulfilled. And Adam ceased not to call upon God, and Eve also his wife. (Genesis 3:4-5 RE, emphasis added)

So, she too—she too—ceased not to call upon God.

Now, this may sound like a curious matter, where God has access to mankind, and Satan also has access to mankind. And the narrative reads as if Adam and Eve and their descendants stand in the presence of and have access to God and angels openly and Satan openly, and Satan appears and says, “Don’t believe it,” and he preaches (in their disbelief) things that will make them gratified, carnal, sensual, and devilish.

Well, there was a different order of things long ago and far away, in which the veil that exists predominantly now was easily traversed. It is for the protection of mankind that a veil was installed, so that apparently powerful, spiritual, great beings who are malevolent and evil and corrupting and who urge you to carnality and sensuality, and devilishness don’t get access to you—because there has to be an equal opposition in all things. If your mind ascends to the highest heights (as Joseph put it in his letter from Liberty Jail), your mind also must descend into the darkest abyss—because you cannot ascend without exposing yourself to a larger spectrum of opposition, so that you are left in the balance to choose. It is for mankind’s protection and potential salvation that limits are placed upon the adversary and his access to you. And yet there are so many people who are willingly captured by carnality/sensuality/power-over-their-fellow-man that mankind is easily corrupted into seeking for things that titillate the mind, gratify the senses, and suggest overindulgence in any of the bodily weaknesses that we all possess because we’re here in a body of dust [and] are vulnerable to.

And so, “believe [it] not,” and they believed not. So what was the requirement? Believe in the Son and repent of your sins. It’s one thing to say you believe in the Son; it’s another to repent of your sins.

Well, this is the Lord observing the state of affairs when He was here ministering among mankind. It’s something that could have been said equally by Joseph Smith when he was here ministering among us.

But blessed are your eyes, for they see, and your ears, for they hear. And blessed are you because these things have come unto you that you might understand them. And truly I say [to] you, many righteous prophets have desired to see these days which you see, and have not seen them, and to hear that which you hear, and have not heard. (Matthew 7:3 RE)

In Galatians, the apostle Paul wrote,

Even as Abraham believed God and it was accounted to him for righteousness, know therefore that they who are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham. And the scripture[s], foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In you shall all nations be blessed. So then they who are of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham.

(Galatians 1:7 RE)

Abraham is the father of the righteous and the prototype of the saved man in his generation because he was able to claw back out of a state of apostasy into a state of faithfulness, communing with God and renewing an order that had fallen into disuse everywhere except for a tiny enclave headed by someone who had been an antediluvian and who had the right (because the right continued right up into the flood) to be translated into Heaven, but he stayed behind to fulfill a mission. But having fulfilled the mission (that is, handing it off to Abraham), Melchizedek then likewise ascended and, with him, his city.

I'm a lawyer, and I've tried a number of cases. And there's a case I tried in Washington, D.C. against members of the (or opposing counsel from) the U.S. Justice Department. And they—not just the Justice Department but opposing lawyers, generally—when they're trying to prove a point, they always look for the “least likely witness to be able to handle the cross-examination,” because what they're interested in is an answer that they can use, and if the answer is in error, it's all the more good because they're seeking a certain outcome. And so, they generally press people who are not in charge of something to give them observations that they can use. And there was a moment when there was a witness on the stand who was working with my client (he was a vice president in their company), and the Justice Department attorney was asking him about something that had gone on during the phase of the job when it was being bid and trying to get him to ~~say some~~ make some observations about the “early on.” And the witness said, “I don't know.” And he was pressed and pressed and harassed. He was an old Marine who had fought on Iwo Jima. And after he had been pressed a number of times, he responded by saying, in effect (it's a pretty close paraphrase, really), “When I landed on the beach, I had five yards that were mine. Those five yards were mine to the center of the island. I didn't give a damn about what was going on ten yards away; I owned five yards. And I fought to the middle of the island. You're asking me shit about stuff that's 50 yards down the beach, and I wasn't there.”

Well, the judge was actually, at the time, he was the Chief Judge of the United States Claims Court. But I'm telling you, no one, including the Chief Judge of the U.S. Claims Court, was going to take umbrage at a Iwo Jima veteran using colorful language under oath in the U.S. Claims Court. The fellow's name was Jim Vallett. He's been dead a number of years now. But you always knew where you stood with Jim Vallett.

A lot of times messengers that are sent by the Lord are just like a marine landing on Iwo Jima given five yards and told, “Take it to the center of the island!” And they just can't deal with stuff outside of their purview without losing fact of the assignment that they've been given. And so, you read about them and you see what their ministries are like, and you wonder at them. Elijah did some remarkable things. And yet, as Christ observed, there were many widows who lost children. There was only one that Elijah restored the son for.

We tend to want to see signs and wonders and miracles without ever appreciating the fact that it is a wicked and an adulterous generation that seeks after a sign. I mean, these signs follow them that believe. But broadcasting them in order to attract attention is not the way in which signs are supposed to be used. I've witnessed miracles; there are people in this room that have, likewise, with me. But that does not mean that any of us should talk about it. The signs follow. And if you have a sign that is given unto you, that's for your own edification and use. Because if we broadcast those things, do you know who we attract?

[Answer from audience member]

Yeah—they're shallow. And they grow up in a day, and then the heat comes and burns them up because they have no depth.

But what do you think? A man had two sons. And he came to the first, and said, Son, go work today in my vineyard. [And] he answered and said, I will not. But afterward he repented and went. And he came to the second and said likewise. And he answered and said, I will serve, and went not. Which of those two did the will of [the] father? They [said] unto him, The first. Jesus said unto them, Truly I say unto you that the publicans and the harlots shall go into the kingdom of God before you; for John came unto you in the way of righteousness and bore record of me and you believed him not, but the publicans and the harlots believed him. And you, afterward, when you had seen me, repented not, that you might believe him; for he that believed not John concerning me cannot believe me, except he first repent. And except you repent, the preaching of John shall condemn you in the day of judgment. (Matthew 10:11 RE)

You know, it's just like that continuously. The words that John spoke need to be separated from the demeanor that John presented and the physical attributes of the man. It always should be limited to an evaluation of whether or not it leads to repentance, belief in God, and righteousness; whether or not it convicts you in your heart that there's something amiss with you—because all of us have things that are amiss within us. And that (and repenting of that) is where we come in contact with the Almighty. It's in the struggle to leave behind the weight of those things that Christ explains, "Take upon me [you] my yoke, because the burden is easy, and the work is light." Laying down your sins may seem like an impossible achievement and difficult to be routed out, but on the other side of repentance, what you find is the load has been lightened, and your life is better, and things are seen more clearly, and you can distinguish between truth and error in an increasingly obvious way—because as light increases, darkness becomes discernible. The "light that shone in the darkness and the darkness comprehended it not" is the Son of God. And so, accept the light, receive the light, let it cleanse what's amiss within you, and see if climbing on that upward journey doesn't improve the distance that you can see and the vistas that you behold because light illuminates and comprehension increases.

Oh, I'm gonna go ahead and say (on this initial part) that I'm gonna conclude.

I told them before we began that I would be willing to answer some questions—but not from people that I recognize that I've seen before [laughter] (because you're gonna ask questions about things that are off this topic or esoteric or less meaningful for the real people that we wanted to do this for this evening). So, did you gather some questions?

Todd Cella (Question 1): Yeah, we had one come in earlier, just regarding the hierarchy of the faith/the group?

DS: Yeah, if I had a board I would draw you the hierarchy. There is a... There's an absolute hierarchy...

[Amberli gets up to get a whiteboard] Oh, we don't need one. I can do this.

There's an absolute hierarchy. And you... I'll try and make it simple so you can commit it to memory. There is God the Father and Jesus Christ [at the top of the hierarchy]. Then there's everyone else [on the next rung down]. And then I'm below them, doing my best to try and elevate others—and accountable for how poor a job I'm doing. But that's the hierarchy.

Yeah, is that it? So we're done with questions?

TC: You're done with questions? Are you done?

DS: No, do not have any more questions?

TC (Question 2): There is a question regarding righteousness, if you could discuss: Is it possible... For example, Jonah was righteous but disobedient to a personal commandment he received from the Lord, and we all have personal commandments we're receiving from the Lord, and is it possible you can be numbered amongst the people of Christ while disobeying whether it's a commandment to forgive a sibling or keep a journal?

DS: Keep a journal... [chuckling]. Yeah, I'm fairly certain there will be enormous numbers of people who are kept out of the kingdom of Heaven for the want of a journal. [laughter]

You know, you can give tithe of mint and anise but leave out the weightier matters of law. And look: We've got nine kids, and sibling tensions come and go, rise and fall, and are inevitable. We have two granddaughters that are old enough now to occupy space and do things. And if the younger of the two infringes upon a toy that the older of the two feels possessive about, she'll go knock her down and take it away and go her way happily. And of course, they're beneath the age of accountability. And so, I mean, yeah—Jesus suffered for that too. And they seem to be aggressive about pouring it on our poor Lord.

Look, there's an inevitability in our own shortcomings—all of us, continuously. And there were, actually, four talks... There were two get-togethers called "Understanding Your Soul," where both my wife and I spoke about, you know, what comprises you. You are captured, and you are inside a body of dust that will be unoccupied at death, but it's being occupied by you right now. This body—this physical body—has its own agenda. It wants to eat; it wants to sleep; it wants to reproduce—because the body senses its own inevitable decline and death. There are natural appetites that attach to this. And then there's a spirit inside of you that seeks to do good and would like to be holy. But we get preoccupied with the desires, appetites, and passions of the flesh.

Well, what that means is that inside you, there is a lot of “junk thought” that goes on. But that's what the body is doing. You're never going to overcome those fits of anger, those lapses. What you need to do is to recognize that that's not you and that you are eternal, you're better than that, and that you're here experiencing this temporarily, but that eventually, if you live long enough, all those passions are gonna fade, all those physical abilities are going to wear down. And it doesn't matter if you're an Olympic athlete, eventually...

(Boy, I just have to... I have a sense of humor that gets me in trouble more often than not.)

What I was gonna say: You could be a decathlon winner on a Wheaties box, but that doesn't mean you're not gonna wind up wearing heels and a dress later [laughter].

Yeah, look: Edit that out, whoever's...

TC: Does anyone else have any questions? If not, we will...

Amberli Peterson (Question 3): This is... Just to go to the heart of this, so really, at the end of the day, what you're saying is righteousness can be defined in the most simple terms as hearing the voice of the Shepherd, the voice of the Son, hearing that voice, heeding it, and repenting.

DS: Yeah, no matter where that voice comes from. The Lord can choose any number of ways to get His message across. And even if the messenger appears not to be ideal... I can almost guarantee you, however, that the only ones who are going to occupy the chief seats (once the chief seats become enviable) are going to be the publicans and the sinners. Because if the chief seats don't confer upon you wealth and power and status and recognition, if instead what the chief seats give to you is sacrifice and difficulty and derision and insults, then the chief seats are only gonna have gravitating to them the people who are in it for themselves.

I remember when the LDS Church was insulted and mocked and ridiculed (and it really wasn't that long ago). And the LDS Church has become increasingly more socially-acceptable/recognized as a good institution; they've become more popular! But the increase in their popularity has corresponded with a decrease in the spiritual power and the authenticity of their teachings in almost a one-for-one comparison.

If you go back to the moment when I listened to the LDS missionaries, my initial contact with a Mormon missionary outreach—he was in the military with me, at the time—came as a result of a night-school visiting professor attacking—gratuitously—the Mormon Church in Salt Lake City. It just came right out of the blue. It sounded weird. I mean, I had lived in Idaho, so I knew what the Mormon Church in Salt Lake City was, but to me, the attack just seemed like, “Where did that come from?” And Steve Claproth raised his hand and took on Cal Colby (the professor) and defended the church and stood up for it. And I made the mistake of telling Steve afterwards that I thought he was effective, and he got the better of the professor, and “Good on ya!” It didn't mean I was interested in his Mormon heresy, but he mistook that because it was such slim pickings in New Hampshire that I became the golden contact. So the pamphleteers and the flannel board presentations ensued.

Yeah? Yeah?

Justin Griffin (Question 4): So how many people would you say in the world today would be considered righteous? If that's impossible to answer, how many people would you say you know personally that you would consider righteous?

DS: Fortunately, I don't really have to assume the responsibility of determining the one from the other. And I really can't say. But I believe that there are those who are true and faithful to the traditions that they're raised in that are good, and that (as the Book of Mormon puts it) God has given to all nations, of their own tongue, such truth as He, in His wisdom—actually, it's not the masculine pronoun; that's missing; it's “in wisdom”—that is appropriate for the respective groups.

I have been reflecting on the Buddhist tradition, where one of the very first Buddhist principles is that “suffering is inevitable,” and that fighting or resisting suffering leads only to misery, and that the best way to escape the misery of suffering is simply to accept it as inevitable and to live accordingly. It's like the dog that my son had who got cancer and had to have a leg amputated. And after the amputation, you could not tell the difference between the attitude of his dog on three legs versus the attitude of his dog before cancer required the removal of her leg. She accepted it, and it was of no consequence. She moved on and lived life with such joy as she was able to live with in that circumstance.

Contrariwise, unlike the founder of Buddhism, the founder of Christianity was a miracle worker who healed and who relieved the suffering and cured the blindness and took care of people. And in that legacy, Christians are never satisfied with suffering. They plead; they beg; they implore; they do not accept. They want the miracle worker to work a miracle. But not every leper was healed by the Lord. And there were whole communities that He visited in which He could do no miracle because none of them believed. There were still blind people in Judea after the crucifixion of the Lord. There were still lepers within eyesight of the boundary of the city. Not everyone got healed. But everyone who believed and who repented was saved.

And so, I don't know what turmoil has gone on in the lives of people who hear a message of salvation and who seek to repent. And I don't know what internal struggles they have to face—because all of us have individual challenges and difficulties. We might be amazed at what some people have overcome as a consequence of their faith in Christ, but we may look upon their outward appearance and their lives and say, “That’s still a sinful man,” because we don’t behold the struggle. But the Lord does. And He knows who He numbers as His sheep. And I can tell you that if you hear His voice when it originates from Him, that you are getting close to the kingdom of God.

In a very real sense, the salvation of mankind is not going to reach the same kind of fullness as we had on the earth during those first ten generations until after the Restoration itself has been completed. And for some of what has to take place, the only way to accomplish it is outside of the view of the world, inside of a sacred precinct that has been consecrated to and accepted by the Lord, where He can come and visit and restore again that which was lost. That was attempted and failed in the 1841-1844 timeframe. And we’re still awaiting a command to build a house for the Lord in this generation. But I believe the command is going to come. And if it does, then we’ll act accordingly. The Lord is the only one in charge, and none of us are. So...

Yeah?

Question 5: Yeah, so I understand the purpose of someone like Joseph Smith, the servant of the Bridegroom, who had a very specific calling to help restore the gospel and invite the Savior back in. But the rest of us, it seems like, perhaps we don’t need to go around looking for someone to tell us what to do or trying to hear the voice of the Lord. Maybe we should just go directly to the Lord. Should we have/would it be better to have a personal relationship with the Lord than try to find someone to speak for the Lord?

DS: It would be better. It always would be better. The problem that you have, though, is that Jesus told Mary one thing, and Jesus told Martha another thing, and Jesus told Brianna another thing, and Jesus told Brooke another thing, and Jesus told... And so it’s almost always the pattern that the Lord will focus attention—in bringing about His work—into some trusted and proven and reliable hands in order to accomplish what He has in mind.

The road to finishing up the work of the Restoration is going to require a remarkable number of things to be accomplished: from constructing a house to fabricating implements to laying out (in ceremonial form) authorized covenant-making, in which the redemption of mankind and the revelation of all things from before the world was until the end of His work in this cycle of creation have to be put together in an ordered fashion.

For such things, no committee can be assembled. For such things, no voting is even appropriate. For accomplishing the things that God commands, it requires something more than just a tuned ear. It requires people willing to endure all of the false accusations and nonsense and all of the unwanted and foolish praise and all of the suggestions of ambition that aren’t there and all of the misunderstanding and cloud of nonsense that attends every step of the way! It requires something that rarely appears on this earth—and when it does, it comes encumbered with so much that is undesirable that only a fool would stand up and say, “I, I! Me, me!” For the life of me, even after the angel had purged the lips of Isaiah, I don’t understand why Isaiah said, “Here I am, Lord. Send me,” unless, of course, he was just as naive as I once was when I thought I could take on anything. I've learned better since then. I don't know if I'd say the same thing or give the same answer today. But that's of no consequence.

I think it would be better if everyone were to go to God and to be a prophet. But God appeared to Saul and renamed him Paul on the road to Damascus. And the Lord commissioned Peter as the chief apostle. And the two of them butted heads. And Paul talked about how he "withstood Peter to his face" in one of his letters. (I mean, the audience to whom Paul was writing probably thought that was a real plus!) But again, they went their separate ways, and the Pauline church and the Petrine church were markedly different because of different emphasis that they put upon their view of the Lord.

But if you're trying to reel it back in and bring it back into a singularity, look: In that first beginning, Adam presided until Adam died. And he was the presiding patriarch—and Eve, too, the presiding matriarch—until they were taken. And it went down through that lineage. And so, yeah, it would be better. It hasn't happened. I don't expect that it will happen. I expect everyone can pray to God and get answers. And I expect everyone to be able to hear the voice of God. And I expect everyone who repents of their sins and who comes unto the Lord will know that He is with them and that He will not leave you comfortless. I expect everyone has access to the Lord.

But in terms of accomplishing the things that need to be done, if it's not accomplished in an orderly fashion—the same kind of pattern that has always been followed by the Lord, dispensation after dispensation—then I don't think that we're ever gonna arrive where we need to arrive.

Yeah?

AP (Question 6): One more question. Just, again, pulling all this together with... What advice would you give to all here as we see things around us in this world of the stranger's voice (you talked about the Shepherd's voice and then the stranger's voice)? What are ways, as you've seen things out there, are ways to decipher these strangers' voices? They sound so good; they sound so popular—however you want to say that. How do you... What's a good way to really discern?

DS: I think that people who are trying to make themselves the center of attention—not because they have something substantive to say but because they're eager to get out there and to accomplish something on their own errand... I mean, I got invited here; I got asked to talk, and I'm happy to respond to the invitation. I've spoken at conferences, but I've never organized a conference. I gave a series of ten talks in which I rented the places; after I'd given a few, there were others who rented them as a courtesy to me, but no one paid me to go there. No one... We spend a lot of money to renting venues and going out and giving talks.

People who sacrifice are a little different than people who are trying to earn a living or earn their keep. King Benjamin gave a talk, and then afterwards, he returned to his labors because one of the points he made in his talk was that he didn't suffer the people to labor on his behalf to support him. I think there are a lot of people who are trying to profit off of ministry. And I would wonder about that.

Let me clarify one thing that kind of irritates me, though. If anyone has ever written a book and gotten a book into print, I can tell you that writing a book is about 30% of the effort. After a book is written, the process that's involved in order to get the book into print is about 70% of the effort. And make no mistake about it: It is work! The first books that I wrote, I had a list of demands:

- I wouldn't do any public signings.
- I didn't want them advertised.
- I would not appear anywhere to promote them.

And they were willing to do that. I had to pay for the editing; I had to pay for the cover art; I had to pay for everything that went into getting it into print. And so, to get a book into print, I went into debt—well, I spent my own money; I didn't borrow money to do it—thousands and thousands of dollars in order to get books into print. And it took years to recoup the money that was spent getting the book into print. But by the time I'd recouped enough money to pay for the book that got into print, I'd already gotten another book out and another book out and another book out. And so, it's really...

And by the way, the audience for Mormon books (doctrinal)... The universe market for that is tiny. And if you're an excommunicated writer, the universe gets even smaller. And if you've got other people out there who are denouncing you on the Internet (because they are high and holy and "spiritual," and they got their own view of how things ought to be), the market becomes sliver-thin. But charging to publish a book, I don't care who you are, if you write a book and you get it into print, you're entitled to recoup something for your effort. I think that's one criteria.

Another would be: How much attention is drawn to the Lord and what the Lord is up to and to fulfilling and doing the work that was always on His mind to be accomplished in the final generation, and how much of it is just interesting, plowing the same field with nothing new to be added? If there's nothing new to be added, it's just insight based upon another man's work. And it's not... As Joseph said, he was "always bringing some new thing to the attention of the saints."

One of the markers would be: Does light and truth emanate? And does it emanate in a fashion in which something is self-evident as soon as you hear it, demonstrably true the instant that you get ahold of it but had never yet entered into the heart of man beforehand?

You know, the purpose of the ten talks was to say, "Look at what the Restoration was originally designed to include." And there's things in the ten talks that you could read a hundred times, and you would still be surprised at what's there. And that was the Lord's doing, not mine. And I didn't feel comfortable in that process, and I learned of my excommunication on the drive to Boise to give the first talk. And I paid a price.

When I became a member of the LDS Church, I lost all my childhood friends who, in a polarized, southern Idaho community, Mormons weren't well thought of, and the friends I had retained from back then thought it was crazy. When I got excommunicated, my universe of friends was essentially the LDS community in which I was then serving.

Do they pay a price for what they believe? Normally, people are unwilling to sacrifice things that matter to them, particularly things that matter greatly to them. And yet the Lord requires someone to sacrifice and be willing to sacrifice all things if they're really going to be on His errand.

Even now, today, I hate when my children go on the Internet and search my name. I hate the things that are out there. And I don't respond to them. And I don't defend myself. But my children know who I am. The problem is that my children pay a price because their friends search their father's name.

Anyway, there are a lot of poignant stories I could tell you about that sort of thing. But generally, one of the hallmarks of representing the Lord genuinely is the need for sacrifice.

Okay, the time is far spent, and Todd needs to go shave! [laughter] So we're gonna go ahead and wrap...

Audience Member: Thank you for coming tonight.

DS: Yeah, we're gonna go ahead and wrap it up. And I think Jeremy Hoop's interpretation of Wilford Woodruff in "The Great Apostasy" (showing now on lds.org) is a worthwhile view; touched my heart to see that. I texted him after I watched that video today, and I said, "Did you really go get baptized in ice water?" He said, "Yes, I did, but I was wearing a wetsuit." So his level of sacrifice was diminished considerably by the... [laughter].

Anyway, let me end by bearing testimony to you that God is actually up to something right now, and the Restoration is actually continuing, and it will continue until it has been consummated in the restoration of all things that God anticipated doing from the very beginning and that Adam himself prophesied would take place before the end.

In the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

2023.05.21 Context of the Answer to Prayer for Covenant

*The Answer to Prayer for Covenant as an Assignment from the Lord:
Love One Another as I Have Loved You, Spring General Conference*

Layton, Utah

May 21, 2023

Denver C. Snuffer, Jr.

I want to thank the conference organizers for all the work that they have done. It was an unusual format this time, and it worked well, I thought. I wasn't quite sure what to expect when we got here, but I think the way that they have planned it and executed it has worked remarkably well. And I appreciate all of the sacrifices that got made in order to bring this conference to pass. And I'm grateful to accept the invitation to give a talk.

As Alan Vanleer said this morning (and by the way, I had no idea what any of the speakers were gonna say in advance), the Answer to the Prayer for the Covenant has a context, and it should be understood within that context. When the context is disregarded, the Answer can't be fully understood. So this talk today is about the context of the Answer to the Prayer for Covenant.

There's a passage that is in the Teachings and Commandments section 36, ~~verse 5~~ paragraph 5, in which there's an allusion made after an admonition to pray that says, You shall ask whatever you will in the name of Jesus, and it shall be done. But know this, it shall be given you what you shall ask (emphasis added).¹ Now that was in a specific context, to a specific person, at a specific time. And what preceded the statement to that individual was, "This will work as long as you're purified and cleansed from all sin."

Well, we don't do that. We don't purify ourselves; we don't cleanse ourselves—that is a gift that gets bestowed upon us. But if the Lord chooses to accomplish something and He wants to give someone "what you shall ask in a prayer," then the Lord is under the necessity then of purifying and cleansing the person from all sin in order to have this to work. It worked once in Scripture that we read about in Third Nephi chapter 9, paragraph 4, when the apostles were kneeling—well, the disciples; they weren't called apostles in the Book of Mormon—when the disciples were kneeling and praying while in Christ's presence: And they did not multiply many words, for it was given unto them what they should pray.

So they're giving a prayer, but the prayer is really a recitation of what it was that the Lord wanted to be included within the prayer. That ought not surprise anyone that the Lord is capable of accomplishing that because, as the Lord told us in the Sermon on the Mount, your Father knows what things you have need of before you ask Him (Matthew 3:28). So if He would like you to address Him and ~~to tell you something to~~ you to tell Him something in prayer, and He would like it to be an altogether appropriate petition to be given, then He'll give you what you shall ask.

“To place events into a context” challenges historians and puts us all in the position of having histories that disagree, that contradict, and offer differing viewpoints of exactly the same events. I've read, researched, studied, and contemplated the history of the Restoration. It's taken me over two million words to explain some of that history. The revealed Prayer for Covenant contains only 2,759 words. That's less than one and a half percent of the volume of words I've written in order to try to understand the events of the Restoration. In those few words, the Lord tells us the history of the Restoration clearly, succinctly, and truthfully. The Prayer is His.

Truth is a knowledge of things as they are and as they were and as they are to come. The Prayer for the Covenant is our history, as explained and set down by the Lord through revelation, and it is that prayer that gives context and definition to the answer. In fact, it's called the Answer to the Prayer for Covenant because the Prayer for Covenant preceded it and is essential as part of it. T&C section 156 is needed to understand T&C section 157. Part of this was read this morning, but I'm gonna read it and probably interrupt a time or two with some comments. This is T&C 156:

Heavenly Father, [it's] I whom you named David, asking you in the name of Jesus Christ for your mercy and grace to be with those of us who seek to become your people. We hope to repent and return to your path, and no longer be condemned and rejected as a people because of those who went before. Take pity on us all and have mercy for us, as we acknowledge and accept the condemnation and rejection of the latter-day [saint] gentiles, and petition that we may overcome it. (¶1, emphasis added)

See, that's the first thing He wanted. He wants an acknowledgment—and not an acknowledgment that resists accepting it. He wants us to acknowledge the failure and to accept it as a given fact.

We are mindful that in [September]...

~~The petition says~~ The prayer says, “in 1832.” I'm adding that month; it was in September of 1832.

...the gentile saints were condemned for vanity and unbelief because they treated lightly the things they had received, and they were warned by you that they would remain under condemnation until they repent and remember the new covenant, even the Book of Mormon and the former commandments, not only to say, but to do...

To say requires that we have a correct statement. It requires us to have corrected Scriptures before we can do what God asks.

You commanded the gentiles that they bring forth fruit meet for their Father's kingdom, and if they failed to do so, there remained a scourge and judgment to be poured out upon those who claimed to be the children of Zion. They failed to bring forth the required fruit, and were judged and scourged, and then violently driven out of Jackson County, Missouri. (¶2, emphasis added)

That happened within one year of the September 1832 events. They were told, “You have to do this.” They didn't do that. And within one year, in the fall of 1833, they agreed, because of the demands of the citizens who are going to expel them, that they agreed to leave, one-half by January of 1834 and one-half by April of 1834.

You explained there were jarrings, and contentions, and envyings, and strifes, and lustful and covetous desires by them; therefore, by these things they polluted their inheritances. But they did not repent, and in their pride they threatened to wage a war of extermination against the Missouri citizens...

I don't know how many of you know this, but the extermination decree by Lilburn Boggs (as the governor of Missouri) was mirroring what the Latter-day Saints had done previously by threatening to wage a war of extermination. Lilburn Boggs was reactive; he wasn't the aggressor—as the Lord makes clear in this statement.

...in their pride they threatened to wage a war of extermination against the Missouri citizens, heedless of your warnings. But it was you who used the Missouri citizens as your hand of judgment to scourge the condemned saints in your attempt to persuade them to repent and no longer treat lightly your word. They still saw no Divine purpose behind their distress, and railed against their Missouri persecutors. Despite their suffering, they were not sufficiently humbled to repent. Instead, they breathed out threats and expressed hope[s] to gain vengeance against the same Missouri mobs to whom you had given power to afflict the gentile saints to inspire them to repent. Because of the hardness of their hearts, the gentile saints were again mobbed and slain, and in 1838 altogether driven out of the State of Missouri, with Joseph Smith, Hyrum Smith, and other leaders, cast into prison and condemned to die. But you were merciful, and did not suffer Joseph, Hyrum, or any of those imprisoned with them, to be killed. In your mercy, the surviving saints and the imprisoned leaders were [allowed] to obtain refuge in Illinois, whose people welcomed the saints, and a season of peace followed. (¶3, emphasis added)

This is the first hinge point in the prayer. Something now is going to change, and something else will follow because a new offer is extended by the Lord (in January of 1841) to the Saints after they'd been driven out because of their follies and because of their inability to repent earlier when they were warned.

*In 1841 you mercifully extended another opportunity to the gentile saints to repent and return, and you approved Joseph's offering and acknowledgements of the past failures of the saints when he petitioned you on their behalf. You found the prayers of Joseph and the gentiles were acceptable before you, and you granted to the saints another chance for you to recover them as your people. As you stated to the former gentiles, There is not a place found on earth that you may come to and restore again that which was lost unto us, or which you had taken away, even the fullness of the Priesthood...

It had been earlier offered on condition; the condition was not met. Therefore, it was taken away. They didn't “have it” and lose it. They had it offered to them, and they lost the offer. So now God is renewing again the offer at this point in the recitation of the history.

... You offered and intended for a house to be built unto your name in which you deigned to reveal to your people things which have been kept hidden from before the foundation of the world, things which pertain to the dispensation of the fullness of times. You gave to them sufficient time to build a house unto your name, warning them to complete the work or their baptisms for the dead would be unacceptable.

In those days, you warned the people you will not perform the oath which you make, neither fulfill the promises which they expect at your hands, or in other words, you would remove your covenant if they failed to do what you commanded. And you foretold what you would do unto the people if they neglected to do the work assigned them. You warned, For instead of blessings, we, by our own works, would bring cursings, wrath, indignation, and judgments upon our own heads, by our follies, and by all our abominations, which we practice before you. You foretold that at the end of this appointment our baptisms for our dead shall not be acceptable unto you; and if the gentiles did not do the things you commanded, at the end of the appointment we would be rejected as a church, with our dead, said the Lord our God...

So now He has set it up so that we understand what comes next. Because what He's going to describe next will be the response to the offer that was extended the second time to give to them the fullness.

... But the secret works of darkness multiplied, and the gentile follies did not end, and they practiced secret abominations in violation of your commandments and in defiance of your warnings.

The wickedness of the gentile saints dismayed the people of Illinois who had welcomed them, and provoked the anger of their indignant neighbors, who then implemented your judgments against the rebellious saints...

Nauvoo was a place where there was fraud, forgery, theft, counterfeiting, adultery, violence, and dishonesty. If you study the history, you'll reach that conclusion.

... The former gentile saints were driven into the wilderness, and relocated into a desolate land, where they suffered hunger, cold, and sickness. In that isolation the gentile leaders were emboldened to openly practice abominations and wrongly teach the people to call them sacraments, as they reigned with blood and horror over the people. Secret murders, open defiance, and the slaughter of over 200 men, women, and children fixed the anger and opposition of the entire United States, who were moved by your will to curtail the barbarism of the gentile saints. (¶4-6, emphasis added)

That slaughter of over 200 men, women, and children was the Mountain Meadows incident that took place.

Even today the gentile saints justify lying to others as part of their religion, believing you will vindicate them in their dishonesty. They seek deep to hide their counsel from others, and now deny your judgments against their ancestors, claiming you have never rejected them. They have, as you foretold, spoken both good and evil of your prophet Joseph. They ascribe many of their wicked practices to Joseph, who correctly told their ancestors that they never knew him — for indeed, the gentile saints have grown distant from you because of their willful rebellion, pride, foolishness, and blindness...

Now we reach the second hinge point.

...We acknowledge that we must distinguish ourselves from them, admit the errors of the past, and in the depths of humility, seek to be reclaimed as yours. (¶7, emphasis added)

Then what follows is an explanation to us of how we fit into the Restoration.

But I want to take just a moment to read you some words that we've been going through, extracted from the prayer. As of 1832's warning through 1838 (when they were altogether driven out of Missouri), these are the things which the Lord found offensive by the Saints:

- vanity,
- unbelief,
- treating lightly
- ~~repenting:~~ and not saying and doing,
- failing to bring forth fruit,
- jarrings,
- contentions,
- envyings,
- strifes,
- lustful desires,
- covetousness,
- pride,
- threats,
- wanting vengeance, and
- hard hearts.

This is a bad list of stuff that justified judgments. However, after the second offer, this is the list of the words that get used to describe what the Saints did after they were given an opportunity to repent and return:

- secret works of darkness,
- follies,
- secret abominations,
- violating the commandments,
- wickedness,
- emboldened,

- openly practiced abominations,
- wrongly taught,
- secret murders,
- reigned with blood and horror,
- slaughter over 200 men, women, and children,
- barbarism,
- justifying lying,
- denying the judgments of God,
- speaking evil of Joseph,
- willful rebellion,
- foolishness, and
- blindness.

The first list in response to the first offering is pretty bad. The second list in response to the renewed offer is so much worse. If it was a downhill ski slope, they augered in somewhere beneath the turf itself after the Lord in His mercy extended the offer.

So, now we get to an explanation of how we fit in.

The neglect and rebellion of the saints during Joseph's day and thereafter included how they have treated the scriptures, carelessly inserting numerous errors and transcription problems into the Book of Mormon and other commandments and revelations. The original Book of Mormon translation manuscript was placed in the cornerstone of the Nauvoo House where water and mold destroyed over 70% of the text. This was a similitude to the restoration provided by you through Joseph. Just as the original manuscript was allowed to decay, with only approximately 28% surviving, so likewise the Restoration has also decayed.

Using that remnant of the original translation, we have confirmed there were numerous transcription errors made when Oliver Cowdery copied it for the printer. We know that E. B. Grandin's Print Shop also made errors, and the punctuation was supplied by John Gilbert, which changed the meaning of the text. We know there has been over a century of debate caused by the errors in understanding the text, solely due to the way in which the text has been punctuated. [We've] labored to make corrections and to recover a truer meaning, but are required to use our best conjecture to sort out the many textual dilemmas we now face. [We've] inquired of you and prayerfully sought guidance on even small issues out of respect for your words. Joseph Smith revised the printed copy in 1837, and again in 1840, to try to eliminate errors and make the text more correct. Most importantly, we know that you have, by revelation, recently supplied corrections to some of the writings in the Book of Mormon quoting you, for which we are grateful...

...which I would point out is language that gets identified in the Preface to the Book of Mormon, and the corrections that were made weren't translation errors, apparently. They were quotes of the Lord, in which the Lord said, "I want to make what I said a bit more clear.” And so there were a handful of revisions made—by the Lord, to the text—which quotes Him.

...We have labored over the text of the Book of Mormon to try to remove as many of the mistakes in the text as we can discover, but know that our efforts fall short of perfecting the text.

The other revelations given through Joseph Smith have also not been maintained and transmitted to us in their purity. Many originals have been lost, and some of what we have from Joseph are copies of copies, and many were later recorded by others using their recollections of your revelations to him. [We've] used brackets and re-punctuated the texts as [we've] worked with them, all in an attempt to show respect for your holy texts. We ask that you accept this work and the punctuation and allow us to remove the brackets.

[We've] also determined to update some words that were in use and understood by earlier people, but whose meaning has been lost or so changed as to render the language foreign to modern usage. We ask for your approval to update the wording so as to clarify the language for modern readers. Mindful of how mistakes can be made, [we've] attempted to gather only those revelations which are authentic, attested to have come directly from Joseph in a reliable transmission, and which likewise involve general principles applicable to us rather than a personal revelation to an individual. We are mindful of the criticism of David Whitmer...

And I want to pause there. David Whitmer, when he was an old man, published a small booklet called An Address to All Believers in Christ. He made the charge against the church, and the church members, and Joseph, in particular, for having led the church into error by accepting Joseph's revelations as Scripture. And there are those who, having read An Address to All Believers in Christ by David Whitmer, have accepted the general idea that Joseph Smith's mission should have been confined to the Book of Mormon—or the other charge that David Whitmer made: that Joseph was a fallen prophet. And there are those who argue over that still today. The Lord is clarifying in this prayer that Whitmer was wrong.

...We are mindful of the criticism of David Whitmer, who thought the recording and use of Joseph's revelations was never wise and, therefore, we ask to be corrected in anything we have gathered and ask to be instructed by you to discard what ought to be discarded, and inspired to keep only those things which should be kept...

That begins our offer to the Lord, which is what He wants to be made. We ask to be corrected in anything we've gathered, ask to be instructed by you to discard what ought to be discarded, and inspired to keep only those things which should be kept.

...We were not responsible for neglecting your warnings, for treating lightly the Book of Mormon and former commandments, nor for failing to do as you asked, but have inherited that legacy and acknowledge that we also suffer under your condemnation as our inheritance. (§8-11, emphasis added)

And then, this issue comes up, which is section 132 of the Doctrine and Covenants (the revelation on plural marriage) that comes up in this prayer.

We also have been left with a copy of a copy of a revelation recorded July 12, 1843 that is not in the handwriting of a scribe of Joseph's, and which we believe to have been altered from its original form before it was publicly disclosed. That revelation has been the source of a great deal of mischief, sorrow, ungodly conduct, violence, and adulterous lusts among those who accept the published version of that revelation among the various Mormon factions. We first attempted to edit it to make it more consistent with your other commandments and revelations, but have ultimately concluded to remove it altogether because we cannot fix it. We ask that if there are any commandments, principles, or precepts involving the marriage covenant you would be willing to reveal to us to become part of our record, we would receive it with gratitude and rejoicing. We desire as a people to repent and remove the condemnation, and to overcome your rejection, and to be true and faithful to your commandments. All those involved have labored to avoid and eliminate the interpolations and uninspired emendations of others, however well they may have meant. If it is not from you or of you, we do not want to acknowledge it as scripture, and therefore we have labored to present this to you in the hope we have shown respect for your word and not the works of men. We acknowledge that you have inspired and guided this work by your spirit.

We acknowledge we are imperfect and, despite your inspiration and assistance, we know there are faults and weaknesses with us, and therefore we ask for your mercy to cover our weakness. We have attempted to be unified in this work, but have sometimes disputed with one another, and therefore ask to be forgiven for our own contentions as we were laboring beside one another. I confess my own failure in securing a replacement for the former section 20. You required a unified statement of principles for us to adopt, and I asked others to provide such a document. I have understood that you required that to be developed by others and not myself, and therefore I have refrained from any involvement. Despite three attempts by representatives of twenty-three fellowships, there remain disputes, and no agreed statement of principles has been composed and accepted by the people as you directed. Forgive those who have worked unsuccessfully. I ask that you look at the earnest desires of those involved and forgive this failure. I would ask that we not be required to provide a statement of principles, but the people be left to govern themselves according to their varying circumstances, needs, and desires. We are mindful of the duties expected by you for any people who would claim to be yours, and ask that our weaknesses be forgiven and our own follies and errors be corrected and not condemned. We as a people present the result[s] of our labor to you as our best attempt to preserve and recover the scriptures provided to us in the restoration through Joseph Smith at the beginning of the dispensation of the fullness of times.

As you began to roll forth a restoration through Joseph and others, we ask you to now continue that work and to allow your revelations, work, covenant, and blessings to roll forth with us, and things kept hidden be uncovered, and a fullness be given to us as a people. It is written that those who will not harden their hearts will receive a greater portion of your word, until they know the mysteries of God in full. It is also written that those who will harden their hearts will receive a lesser portion of your word, until they know nothing concerning the mysteries of God...

You can see that dynamic playing out on the losing end of light and truth within all of the churches, from The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints down to the apostate groups scattered everywhere. It gets diluted; the ignorance increases; the darkness grows. There's hardly a difference between evangelical television shows and general conference from the LDS Church anymore, except that there's probably more biblical truth, by far, among the evangelical group than you find in general conference—with the possible exception of Joel Osteen, who's rallying on the “gospel of success” is such rubbish that... Welcomed rubbish! He lives in a $10 million home supported by his fan club (who want to know that if they follow that, they “too will be blessed” [imitating Joel Osteen]. “You can be blessed, too!”).

...We seek to leave behind a hard heart, and to be open to receiving a greater portion of your word, and to know of your mysteries, and obtain your grace for us as a people, that we may become yours.

*Though only a remnant of the original Book of Mormon manuscript has survived, and though only a remnant of the original faith you established through Joseph [Smith] has likewise survived, we ask...

And at this point, the Lord takes over and defines what we should be asking. He gives it to us. This is our request: We ask...

...to be reconnected as a people to you by covenant, to make us yours, connected to a living vine, restored as a people, and numbered with Israel. We seek as a people to honor you and to keep your commandments so that a living body of your disciples may again exist on the earth. We desire that we may rise up through your grace and mercy so that you will perform your oath and vindicate your promises to the fathers concerning a faithful latter-day body of gentiles to be numbered with the remnant of Jacob, that your kingdom may come and your will be done on earth as it is in Heaven.

O Lord, remove our blindness, forgive our sins and weaknesses, give to us a new heart that we may become children of the Most High God. We acknowledge our unworthiness. We are descended from rebellious and wayward ancestors and know that without your mercy we will remain in an awful state, unprepared for the return of our Lord in glory. The scriptures foretell of a latter-day recovery of your people, and of natural fruit returning to your vineyard. We seek to be part of that so [that] you may value us as yours and preserve us against the coming season of harvest.

We have added only things to the scriptures as we have understood to also have come from you and would be pleasing to you. We ask that you accept these books as yours so that people of faith may then...

I want to pause right there and tell you that up until this moment, it was unclear and unresolved whether or not the Scriptures would be, in effect, a “supplementary commentary,” that we would all continue to buy Scriptures from Deseret Book and paying to get them—and use the Scripture Project as kind of a supplementary commentary that we could use alongside it. At this point, however, the Lord makes clear: Get rid of everything, and keep what He's going to approve.

...so that [the] people of faith may then rely upon this work as your word to this generation, as a standard for governing ourselves, as a law, and as a covenant, to establish a rule for our faith, and as the expression of our religion, so [that] we may have correct faith and be enabled to worship you in truth. If this body of writings are not acceptable, we ask that you guide us further so [that] we may correct, remove, or add whatever you would require for the writings to become acceptable for a covenant and law, a rule of faith, [and] as a correct expression of the religion that honors you, so [that] we may be in possession of correct faith and be enabled to worship you in truth.

We ask this in the name of Jesus Christ, our Savior and Redeemer, in faith, believing that with you all things are possible. Amen. (¶12-18, emphasis added)

That was the prayer that the Lord wanted offered—and which was offered—to Him on behalf of the people, which produced the Answer to the Prayer for Covenant and then the Covenant itself.

In Third Nephi chapter 5, paragraph 2, after there'd been a whole lot of destruction, and the people were gathered around, showing one another all of the terrible events that had transpired to change the typography in the area of Bountiful where the temple had been built, they heard a voice as if it came out of Heaven...they understood not the voice which they heard.

So something from Heaven spoke, and they didn't hear. Later on: [And] again they heard the voice and they understood it not a second time. And then the third time they did hear the voice and did open their ears to hear it...they did understand the voice which they heard.

Well, God's voice spoke in September of 1832, and they understood it not. God's voice spoke again in January of 1841, and they understood it not. And God's voice spoke again in July of 2017 (which was presented in September of 2017). Will we hear? Will we open our ears? Will we understand? Because on the other side of the third invitation, when the people open their ears to hear, they receive things which are not lawful for man to utter because of the Lord's visit.

Now, there's a chapter in Matthew that was considered so singularly important to Latter-day Saints that they put it in as one of the books in the Pearl of Great Price. Because we had adopted the Joseph Smith Translation (which is where this text came from) as part of our book of Matthew (just as we adopted Joseph Smith's Translation of the book of Genesis, instead of the book of Moses in the Pearl of Great Price—we just have it in our Genesis texts), there's a chapter that has been singled out—but even the Latter-day Saint scripture committee [who] tossed away the Lectures on Faith thought this was important, so maybe it really is.

(Hi, Bev.)

Jesus leaves the temple after He'd said a bunch of stuff that was somewhat hard for locals to understand—and even the disciples who'd been tagging around with Him for lo those three years previous had a hard time understanding—and they said,

[Well, tell us] concerning the [building] of the temple, as you have said, They shall be thrown down and left unto you desolate. ...Jesus said...Do you not see... these things? ...do you not understand...?

And then He sat on the Mount of Olives, and He gave an explanation, and it shows up in the book of Matthew. Specifically, they pose the question,

What is the sign of your coming? And of the end of the world, or the destruction of the wicked, which is the end of the world? (Matthew 11:2)

Now, His answer begins with things that these people locally—that were then talking to Him—would experience. But after He tells them about the stuff they will encounter, then He jumps forward to a much later generation that will be around when the Lord returns. It's that latter stuff that's kind of relevant. But the former stuff is interesting, too, because He draws some analogy between the two. But this is gonna happen during the lifetime of those disciples:

Take heed, that no man deceive you, for many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ, and shall deceive many.

Apparently, if you've got the Lord setting an example and fulfilling things that are contained within the Scriptures, then anyone can pick up the Scriptures and say, “Oh, that needs fulfilling,” and imitatively say, “Look, I fit that pattern too! Me too! Me too! Me too!” And so He's saying there's gonna be a whole lot of the “me too's.” As soon as someone does it, as soon as someone lays out the course, as soon as someone provides the example from which you can reach the conclusion that Scripture and prophecy can be fulfilled by the efforts or actions or teachings of someone, then I can imitate that too. And therefore, there will always be those who are imitative.

...I am Christ, and shall deceive many. Then shall they deliver you up to be afflicted...

...and so on. And He adds a little later,

...many false prophets shall arise and shall deceive many. And because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold. But he that remains steadfast and is not overcome, the same shall be saved. (Ibid. ¶3)

Then He warns them about the desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet, concerning the destruction of Jerusalem. And He tells them to flee to the mountains and tells them that there will be distress that falls upon Israel in that day that will be greater than any distress that Israel will experience later—which is almost hard to imagine because we all know from our vantage point about the Holocaust and what was done to the Jews in Europe, behind Hitler's rule. But if you read the accounts of what happened, there were literally mothers killing their children, roasting the bodies of their children, and eating them because of starvation. They despaired for the life of their children because of the circumstances. So rather than wait for their child to die, they killed them. And then rather than bury or show respect for the body, because of the hunger, they ate their dead infants. I mean, it's hard to imagine the distress that they felt. But the Lord said it'll be greater at that point than it ever will be at any other point in history. And in fact, that is true. But that's not the end of the suffering of the Jews, as history will tell us.

Now, He jumps way ahead because they've asked Him two things. “When's the Temple of Jerusalem going to be destroyed?” He gives them that, and then He jumps way ahead because they've also asked, “What's the sign of your coming at the end of the world? Or in other words, when are the wicked gonna be destroyed?” And He jumps way ahead:

...after the tribulation of those days which shall come upon Jerusalem, if any man shall say...Look, here is Christ, or there — believe him not; for in those days there shall also arise false christs...

“In those days” = contemporaneous with us.

...there shall also arise false christs and false prophets...

Dude, that “false Christ” thing—there's some guy who keeps mailing me books about the... Nah, never mind.

...and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders...

Yeah, that fits there. Yeah.

...insomuch that if possible, they shall deceive the very elect, who are the elect according to the covenant. Behold, I speak these things unto you for the elect's sake. (Ibid. ¶6)

There has to be, at some point, an “elect according to the covenant,” in order for the subject that He is discussing to become relevant. And He's saying, almost as a matter of fact, “There will be a covenant body in the last days,” and there are gonna be people who are trying to deceive them left and right. They're gonna show signs and wonders, they're gonna be out...

Now I show into a parable...

And this is where the Lord allows the information that He is conveying to drift off into the requirement that you have some interpretive ability to understand prophecy so that, through the gift of the Holy Ghost, the words of prophecy become clear unto you.

...[I'll] show...you a parable. Behold, [where] the body is...

Keep that thought in mind.

...there will the eagles be gathered together. So likewise shall my elect be gathered from the four quarters of the earth. And they shall hear of wars and rumors of wars — behold, I speak unto you for my elect's sake — for nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom. There shall be famines, and pestilences, and earthquakes in diverse places. And again, because iniquity shall abound, the love of men shall wax cold. But he that shall not be overcome, the same shall be saved.

So, there are a body of people that are called the elect; they have a covenant. The elect people get gathered; there will be a body that gets gathered. (He'll clarify that there's more than that later.) But He says that's gonna happen, and the people who are there are gonna hear about nation rising against nation, kingdom against kingdom. They're going to hear about famines. They're gonna hear about pestilences. They're gonna hear about earthquakes in diverse places. They're gonna see the iniquity abounding. They're gonna see the love of men wax cold. But the people that are there—who are not overcome—they'll be saved.

And then this remarkable statement (and this is the Joseph Smith Translation or clarification or inspired restatement):

And the gospel of the Kingdom will be preached, in the whole world, to a witness over all people; and then will the end come, or the destruction of the wicked.

...a singular individual who will witness about what is called the “gospel of the Kingdom.” It's going to come to a witness, and that witness will be everyone's warning—even if they ignore or reject it—because it is to a witness “over all people.” Being over all people doesn't require you to have any authority or position or rank or bully-pulpit. It just requires that the message be God's message, relevant to all the people...

...and then will the end come, or the destruction of the wicked. And again shall the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, be fulfilled.

And immediately after the tribulation of those days, the sun[I'll] be darkened ... moon...and...Powers of Heaven...be shaken.

And He says about these events,

This generation in which these things shall be shown forth shall not pass away until all I have told you shall be fulfilled. (Ibid. ¶7-8, emphasis added)

And then the Son of Man's sign appears in the heavens, and all the tribes of the earth are going to mourn, and the Son of Man is going to appear in the clouds of Heaven...

...with power and great glory. And whoever treasures up my words shall not be deceived, for the Son of Man shall come, ...he shall send his angels before him with the...sound of a [great] trumpet...

And so now, this is after the appearing of the Lord, and they that [the angels who've now come with Him]...

...and they shall gather together the remainder of his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other. (Ibid. ¶9, emphasis added)

So, He's now told us two things about the covenant group that will exist (called the "elect" in the last days). There is one "gathered together in a body," where the angels will be gathered, from the four quarters of the earth—and they will be in one place. And then there are a number of other people who are also elect that are scattered far and wide, in an ungathered state. And after His appearing, the angels "shall gather together the remainder of his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to [an]other." So we tend to think that there's one and only one [gathering], and the Lord is talking about, "No, that's not..." It's probably not even possible for that to happen, but it's not going to happen. And then He says,

Now [let me tell you] a parable of the fig tree.

This is a new one.

When its branches are yet tender and it begins to put forth leaves, you know that summer is near at hand. So likewise, my elect, when they shall see all these things, they shall know that he is near, even at the doors. (Ibid. ¶10)

So He's saying, "If you're gonna see any of this stuff begin to take place, then you need to recognize/you need to realize that something's afoot." And it's going to culminate in the destruction of the wicked and the final gathering together—after His return—of all the elect.

But as it was in the days of Noah, so it shall be also at the coming of the Son of Man, for it shall be with them as it was in the days which were before the flood. For until the day that Noah entered into the ark, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, and knew not until the flood came and took them all away; so [also shall] the coming of the Son of Man be. (Ibid. ¶11)

I see some of that kind of behavior going on right now. So He then describes how gathering will take place: not everyone is going to be gathered, even if they're "elect."

...two shall be in the field, the one shall be taken...the other left; two shall be grinding at the mill, ...one [shall be] taken...the other left.

...know this: if the master of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to have been broken up, but would have been ready. Therefore, you [also be] ready, for in such an hour as you think not, the Son of Man comes.

Who then is a faithful and [a] wise servant, whom his lord has made ruler over his [house], to give them food in due season? Blessed is that servant whom his lord (when he comes) shall find so doing. And truly I say unto you, he shall make him [a] ruler over all his goods. But if that evil servant shall say in his heart, My lord delays his coming, and shall begin to smite his fellow servants, and to eat and drink with the drunk, the lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looks not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of, and shall cut him asunder, and shall appoint him his portion with the hypocrites. (Ibid. ¶12-14)

So, you know, He's using graphic language here to describe things about people in the last days who pretend or think or even have the conviction that they are a servant, but they begin to get abusive and to smite the fellow servants. Well, I would take that word "smite," and I would cross reference it into the letter that Joseph wrote about the restrictions that ought to be employed by anyone who claims to have the priesthood; that is, you don't get to cover your sins, to gratify your pride, to exercise your vain ambition, or to have control or dominion or compulsion in any degree of unrighteousness. So when you begin to smite your fellow servants, it involves the very kind of behavior that got recently defined as what it means to sustain someone when you raise your arm to the square.

And then He tells the story of the ten virgins. And the virgins—as I heard Steve VanLeer mentioning—all of them knew there was a wedding, all of them knew what was coming, all of them had been invited, all of them were preparing for the event; it's just that five of them were still foolish.

And then He tells the story of a man traveling into a far country; [he] called his servants, and gave them five and two and one talent. And then some of them increased the amount that they were able to produce from the talents they were given, ~~and some of them buried them~~ and one of them buried them in the ground. And he took from those that didn't produce, and he gave to those that did.

*When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then he shall sit upon the throne of his glory—the sheep on His right hand, and the goats on His left. And He's going to say that when He separated the sheep from the goat, some of the goats are gonna complain and say, "HEY! Uhh, we don't belong here!" But more interestingly, some of the sheep are gonna say, "I'm not sure... Lord, I'm not sure I'm really a sheep belonging on your right hand." And the Lord's gonna explain to them, I was hungry, ...you gave me food. I was thirsty, ...you gave me drink. I was a stranger, ...you took me in; naked, and you clothed me. I was sick, and you visited me. I was in prison, and you came [to] me. And the righteous is gonna say, *When did we see you hungry, and [feed] you? Or thirsty, and gave you drink? When did we see you a stranger, and took you in? Or naked, and clothed you? And He says, Inasmuch as you have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, you have done it unto me. And then the others—the goats—weigh in and say, “Wait a minute! We didn't abuse you in that fashion!” And He said, Inasmuch as you did it not to one of the least of these my brethren, you did it not unto me. (Ibid. ¶21-25, emphasis added)

So we've got ourselves an interesting opportunity that has been presented to us because the Lord has, in our dispensation, done pretty much—over a period of years and generations, because when you reject the covenant and you kill the one through whom it was being offered, then you have to wait four and five generations before it can be renewed—but it's the same pattern as the one that was had at Bountiful: The voice speaks, they don't hear it (1832-38); the voice speaks, they don't hear it (1841 through the end of that generation); the voice speaks a third time, and they open their ears, and they heard it.

It's really incumbent upon us to decide whether or not we're interested, willing, and capable of doing what has been asked of us—because the Prayer outlines the kind of conduct that fails; it defines for us what they were up to that provoked His judgment; it tells us what not to do...and then they got worse. When the offer was made in 1841...

Clearly, if you don't humble yourself and accept what the Lord has offered and you rebel against Him, and in your pride, you look up, curse God, and die (as the Scriptures say) —which is exactly what they did. I mean, cursing the people through whom the Lord administered punishment to humble you is the same thing as cursing and rejecting the Lord! It's like the Catholic nun that gets the ruler out and bangs on your knuckles, “Do you understand me now, Jake and Elroy Blues?” It's the same thing. And when you say, “There's nothing wrong with what I have done, and I can lie, and I can cheat; I can commit adultery and engage in all of the kinds of misbehavior” (even worse than what had provoked your judgments in the first place), well, then the outcome turns out pretty much like it has. And you see, right now, the restoration petering out everywhere, except among us. The loss of light and truth, of understanding, and of comprehension is falling day by day, just like was foretold at the time the covenant was offered in Boise about the eclipse that had occurred recently before that conference. An eclipse that crossed from ~~border~~ to sea to sea, border to border, and there's another one coming. It's almost as if the Lord is doing everything He can to call attention to the fact that He really is up to something. This really is His work. And signs in the heavens above and on the earth beneath are being given, and the question is, Will any heed at all be given to that?

In the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

2023.05.21 Q&A with Denver

*The Answer to Prayer for Covenant as an Assignment from the Lord:
Love One Another as I Have Loved You, Spring General Conference
Layton, Utah
May 21, 2023*

Denver Snuffer: Now, I said to whoever it was who called me... I think it was you, Taylor. Yeah. I said that I have two grandbabies—a four- and a two-year-old's (grandbabies born in the same month, within, I think, three days of one another)—whose birthday is being celebrated down in Sandy. And I'm heading there to eat birthday cake and forget about this. And I said that I would have a few minutes... They wanted to open it up for questions—and I've heard that there is a microphone... And there's Reed, Mr. Microphone himself, (which kind of reminds me of a story that I'll tell at some point).

They're trying to record this stuff—and so you can put the mic there, and if anyone's got a question, you can feel free to come up, ask your question into the mic. A question is a sentence that ends with a question mark.

My wife taught a class yesterday, and she said she was interrupting people and saying, “That's not a question. What's your question?” So getting her counsel before I came up here, I decided I'd define question in advance: It's a short statement, and it ends with a question mark—and normally, you raise your voice at the end of the question to make it clear you're done and now something's on the table, deal with it.

Now, you can ask absolutely any question you want to ask. And I might answer some of them. So does anyone have a question? Oh, look, there we are.

Question 1: All right. So I'm new to all this...

DS: Oh, good. Yeah.

Q1: ...just so to preface. I want to know: What exactly does God expect of us—here, as a covenant people—to actually accomplish in our lives?

DS: Most of what the Lord would like us to do at the moment is internal to ourselves. There's a kind of analogy/a description that's given when Ezra returns and they're rebuilding the temple, of how they had the scroll/the Scriptures in one hand and a trowel in the other. The people that returned to rebuild the temple in the Second Temple era were only a remnant of the people that were taken, a remnant of the descendants of the people that had been taken captive into Babylon. So you have a large body of believers who got exiled from the holy land, taken captive into Babylon. The overwhelming majority of those people remained behind in Babylon, and only a remnant returned back—because returning back from Babylon meant you were leaving a kind of secure economy, a kind of stable society, a place where things were stable and good. You... It took a lot of faith for someone to leave there and go to a city that had been destroyed, in order to rebuild and re-civilize. So the environmental circumstances were such that they'd already made up their mind that they were going to follow the Lord and accepted the reality that following the Lord meant a sojourn into difficulty and hardship. They were willing to do that; that was what they knew would come by doing that.

In our day, we're being asked, for the moment, to stay put but to adopt a new set of values, rules, scriptural understanding, a body of teachings that really have been dissipated and lost. And we're doing that in the face of unrelenting criticism. ~~Many of it~~ Much of the criticism that gets leveled against the Restoration gets leveled against Joseph Smith specifically and gets done against a body of lies and falsehoods. The library of material that has been produced in order to suggest that Joseph Smith was a liar and an adulterer and someone who loved and made a lie—which, by the way, in and of itself tells you that he's damned to hell, based upon the “Three Degrees of Glory” revelation. Those who love and make a lie are those that are going to be cast down/thrust down to hell, and in the Book of Mormon text, it says the liar shall be thrust down to hell. And the body of information that people spread now, even within the “Answers to Gospel Questions” by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, states that Joseph Smith was unequivocally a liar because there were “some truths that are just so special and sacred” that one can't divulge that they're out there bed-hopping because that would not be understood by the “moral Gentiles” who accepted the ten commandments that included, among them, Thou shalt not commit adultery! It's just irony upon irony.

What is expected of you at this moment, is to recognize the truth, accept the truth, and change from within you. Then the even greater change is to get along with other people. I'd like you to meet Rob Adolpho; he's sitting about...

You're good? Okay! He's solved the riddle! You're there.

Any other questions? (I hope you're getting up to leave and not to ask a question.)

You wrote it down?

Question 2: I did! So you mentioned that we need to acknowledge our failure. What does He mean by “acknowledge”?

DS: Well, there's a... I think it's a psalm, but it could be a proverb. I wrote it down in the front cover of my quad, but I don't use my quad anymore, so it's home on a shelf. There's a statement that says, “I've inherited the heritage of the righteous.” Okay? And that was a psalm that was given at a time when, well, like... It's like Ruth and Naomi, where someone comes in and accepts the covenant, and then they're welcomed within the family of Israel. And by doing so, they become really an inheritor of everything that Abraham and Isaac and Jacob and Joseph and Judah... Well, Joseph more than Judah. Ah, Judah—and we're supposed to get rid of the envy and the jealousy between Joseph and Judah. So strike that last part.

We inherited a mess. So when we start out...

There's an expression—it's a baseball expression—that someone was “born on third base and thinks they hit a triple.” Well, we were born outside of the ball field and don't even have the opportunity to enter the dugout—because the way in which the Lord has treated the Restoration, based upon the response of the people to the Lord in offering the Restoration, is, “You're gonna get kicked out of Missouri. You're gonna get kicked out of Independence (where you think you belong) and driven into another county, you're gonna found a county...” They literally created new counties in order to, you know, put the city of Far West together and start their own local government. And then because they still couldn't get along with people, they wind up with the militia of the state of Missouri driving them out to Illinois. And Illinois was so sympathetic because the one thing that the church has always been really good at is propaganda. I mean, when they arrived in Illinois, the propaganda that had come out of the mouth of the Latter-day Saints made everyone there, you know, dry an eye and say, “How can we help?” but it didn't take long for them to, you know, gain the reputation of being—back then it was called, “making bogus”; today, it's counterfeit money making. Money all along the Mississippi River was plagued with counterfeit money, and a significant part of that appears to have been produced by the printing press that was in Nauvoo, Illinois.

Mark Twain was born in 1835 in Hannibal, Missouri, and he would have been like nine years old when Joseph Smith was killed in 1844. And, you know, despite all of what Mark Twain would have heard, he actually came out in Roughing It and visited Salt Lake and gave a pretty fair description of the Mormons. Funny! I mean, Mark Twain was! But it gives a pretty fair description of us. We've inherited that.

So when we start out, we are painted with the same ugly yellow paint, and we're leaving handprints and fingerprints all over everything, covered in unworthiness and offensive stuff. We can't even sit on the Lord's furniture without wrecking it. That's where we start out from. So what we have to do is largely what the Lord instructed us to do in the Prayer for the Covenant—that gets answered with the Answer to the Prayer for Covenant and then the Covenant itself—and that involves a real sober assessment of exactly where we stand in God's eyes at the beginning of this and the acceptance of grace. And if He bestows grace upon us... It's like the apostle Paul writing to the Romans: “What? Shall we continue to sin so that grace can abound? Do we benefit ourselves by having even more grace because we don't repent, and we continue sinning, and then God's grace can be, you know, even more rapidly and widespread applied?”

We're not supposed to be doing that. I mean, he says—after posing that question—he says, “God forbid!” He's saying, “Don't impose upon God's patience by getting forgiven of your messes and then turning around and making another mess!” Part of what the saints did was not... It wasn't just a defect internal. Envyings and strifes and all of the conflict that went on, that's not just a Latter-day Saint treating a Latter-day Saint that way. That's not just people in this room dealing with people in this room in an inappropriate manner. I've never heard of anyone financially cheating anyone else that's among the body of believers; that was going on back in Missouri and in Illinois and in early Utah—and it goes on right now, except the perpetrator is the Corporation of the President, and victims are everyone that was willing to donate money to 'em.

But it was a problem that existed between the body of believers and the “outsiders” who they treated with the kind of... If you could put it over on them, then, you know, “Good on us! Our side wins,” you know? We’re not supposed to be doing that. We ought to approach the people with whom we are dealing with the same kind of humility and respect that we would hope they would show to us or for us. We ought to be really good neighbors. The last thing we want is to have Independence, Missouri repeat itself or Far West repeat itself or Nauvoo repeat itself, where neighbors are... The neighbors felt themselves defined as “outsiders.” It’s just... You know, “You’re a Gentile.” You know, “We’re a saint!” I mean, the word “saint” has a kind of hallowed meaning because of Catholicism. So when you say, “We’re saints,” you’re... It’s offensive. I mean, if I’m... “You should be building magnetic statuary to me, and putting it on the dashboard of your car.”

I don’t care if it rains or freezes
Long as I got my plastic Jesus
Sitting on the dashboard of my car.

Who did that song? Okay, anyway, the...

Yeah, you were at the microphone. Save us.

Question 3: You read in Matthew 11 verses paragraph 11 that “the people of Noah were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, and knew not until the flood came and took them away.” Does that mean that we need to be careful about eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage? And if so, how do we do that?

DS: Well, there’s two ways to look at that. One way is exactly like the question you posed. The other is to say: While you’re eating and while you’re drinking and while you’re giving in marriage, be aware that the end is just around the corner—which will make you eat a little more carefully and share your food with others, drink a little less and be sober-minded, and only marry—in righteousness—someone for whom you have shared values and respect. And of the two readings, I would say I favor the latter.

Yeah?

Question 4: In 2019, you made a statement that you felt like we were getting... There’s a chance that we were getting close...

[replying to the microphone being repositioned] Oh, thanks.

There’s a chance we were getting close to gaining the spirit of Elijah. And I was curious as to where you think... It’s been almost four years. How much closer do you think we are?

DS: Umm... Closer still. Okay, look: There... That... Joseph Smith makes a passing reference to three different kinds of spirit. There’s a spirit of Elias, there’s a spirit of Elijah, and there’s a spirit of Messiah. Now, there are those who say that Joseph was an ignorant farm boy (as he confessed that he was) and that he didn’t understand that Elias was simply the Greek form of the name Elijah—and so Joseph didn’t know what he was talking about. I rather favor the other view, which is that Joseph found the term useful to illustrate a point and that he wasn't giving you a language course. He was trying to inform you about the manner in which restoration of material rolls forth.

- The spirit of Elias, as he defined it, was a forerunner that would deliver a message that warns you of things to come.
- The spirit of Elijah is where you begin to have a restoration that includes fulsome enough material to seal people up unto salvation against the day of the harvest.
- And the spirit of Messiah is when the Lord Himself comes and returns.

And he commented about how David had failed to get the greater spirit. So the question needs to be answered and the question needs to be understood in the context of the talk and the vocabulary that Joseph was employing at the time. And the answer I would give is that everything that the Lord has intended to accomplish, He has set about achieving the steps necessary to move everything forward. And that if the Lord were to command that a temple be built, we have everything that would be needed in order to fulfill, at our end, what Heaven expects to take place here, from Heaven's end. And that, should we get the command, we won't have anything at our end that impedes getting that done.

Yeah, you've got a question, I can tell.

Question 5: I'm gonna give a quote and then try to formulate the question. It's ummm...

DS: K, that doesn't sound like my wife's definition of a question. But go ahead, you can make an attempt. Hey, you can throw a shoe...

Q5: I'm trying to "honor her circle."

DS: Okay.

Q5: So, I think it's in Isaiah: "Wo unto those who are big with child or give suck in those days." It almost suggests that, at some point, it's not a good idea to have kids. But I don't know if that's just a false conclusion of mine, or I mean, I feel like... I would like to ask you to... If you would be willing to kind of expound on that?

DS: Yeah. Okay, the first thing you need to understand is that you're a boy, and you can't get pregnant.

The statement that was made by the Lord quoting from the earlier text was made in the context of the distress that would befall Jerusalem in the generation that He was talking to at that time, which included the very Jews who rejected Him. It's really a big deal. You can reject a message and a messenger the Lord sends, and He'll send another in another generation. If you kill the prophets, then it's three and four generations. And if you kill the son of God, it's more than a millennium before work will begin again, okay? He was talking to a generation who would not only kill Him, but they would also kill Paul, and they would kill Peter, and they would kill Stephen. (Paul would hold the cloak of some of those throwing the stones at Stephen, which just goes to show you how willing the Lord was to forgive and is willing to forgive, because Paul looked back on his sins with just dismay).

But He was talking to a generation, He was saying that... And it literally unfolded exactly as He foretold. The people in Jerusalem, and pregnant women in Jerusalem, or nursing mothers and babies in Jerusalem, it was an awful, awful circumstance. He didn't say that about this day. It was apt, and it fit then. But in particular, where the body is and the eagles are gathered, they don't... They will hear about famines; they will hear about wars; they will hear about this distress that goes on. But it doesn't sound like that gets right into the community in which the eagles have been gathered.

But then after all of the distress and after all of the wretchedness that happens globally in His return in glory, the angels still gather out “elect” that remain. And that remainder has been a remainder that’s spread literally everywhere. And so, if you read the words of the Covenant, there's a promise of protection, and that promise extends from Heaven and the Earth, who's gonna watch out for righteousness that appears upon her face. The Earth itself... If you read the Enoch prophecy in Genesis or, if you're still holding on to your Pearl of Great Price, the Moses/Enoch text in Moses in the Pearl of Great Price is reporting the lamentation from the Earth itself. She is speaking—she is cognizant of wickedness, and she is cognizant of righteousness that appears upon her. And let me tell you, the Earth has extraordinary destructive capability. But if she targets it, a landslide can wipe out a community, and there can still be someone standing there unscathed; a tornado can come through and wreck an entire neighborhood and leave one home largely untouched. Hand grenades can be thrown into a crowd of soldiers and detonate when it hits, and some die, and some are grievously injured, and some are trying to figure out, “How did I survive that?”

My father arrived on Omaha Beach on the morning of June 6—D-Day. And when he was dying in a hospital in his 80s, many years later, the thought that puzzled him was, Why did so many of the friends that he had, so many of the people that he had served with, why did they die? And why was he spared? Because he was uninjured on D-Day. On the morning of June 7, his company was gone. He was a combat engineer when he landed on the beach. He was an infantryman on the morning of the next day because they didn't need a combat engineer; they needed an infantryman. And he walked from there to Paris and from Paris to Berlin. And except for frostbite during the Battle of the Bulge, apparently the Lord intended to spare him. And if the Lord can spare a combat engineer landing on Omaha Beach on D-Day, the Lord can spare anyone—anywhere, in any circumstances—that He intends to keep in His fold.

“I have graven you on the palms of my hands.” He's saying the mark on His hand is a reminder to Him of how intimately acquainted with “those He intends to preserve” He is. So I wouldn't worry about... You know, Thomas Wolfe didn't coin the phrase, but he used the phrase to good effect in Breakfast of Champions [Bonfire of the Vanities]. When you're in an inner city—any big city—and the pigeons take off, what the pigeons do when they take off is they begin to flap their wings, and they crap—and the term is a “shitstorm.” And he used that to good effect in Breakfast of Champions [Bonfire of the Vanities]. And in the coming shitstorm, don't worry; you'll have an umbrella...assuming you're penitent and your heart's right and you meet the conditions of the Covenant.

Yeah, you're clearly getting ready to ask a question, I can tell.

Question 6: Thank you. You talked about the indelible gift of the Holy Ghost, which is awesome, but we seem to not have access to that at this point. So, many of us are still wondering about the kind of lesser gift of the Holy Ghost, which we have access to. In our LDS upbringing, it's very confusing. It's a... They really just kinda muddle it up. Many questions on that, I mean, is it a one-time event? It's the entrance into the straight and narrow path, but does this baptism of fire and the Holy Ghost happen many times, one time...? Just so many questions on that. And if you could give any clarification on that lower... If that's something you would like to speak on more. I mean, I'm still curious.

DS: They do a fairly reasonable job of talking about that, among the Latter-day Saints. Henry Eyring has talked about how, you know, you can grieve the spirit, and it withdraws from you, and then you have to be penitent in order to fetch it back. The admonition in the ordinance given in the LDS Church is to receive an admonishment to receive the Holy Ghost. And I... It's not as if the Latter-day Saints have any kind of a franchise that allows them to either be guaranteed of the presence of the Spirit OR of having some exclusivity that prevents other people from doing so. There are some brilliant, enlightened, meaningful material that gets produced by Buddhists who are reflective. There was a time when some of the greatest theological minds, some of the most well-informed people that understood things by the power of the Spirit were Muslim.

There was an effort—a translation of ancient text effort—made in Brigham Young University, and a deep theological thinker (a fellow by a Muslim scholar) that lived around—I think it was around 1100 AD—wrote some things that were remarkably, just remarkably praiseworthy and deep and contemplative. The problem is that Islam has lapsed into another Dark Age. But there was a time when it was contact by the Crusaders with the Enlightened Muslims who had preserved Plato, Aristotle, Socrates, that brought back material from the Crusades, that provided the stimulus for the Renaissance. We think of the Renaissance as some kind of a re-awakening in Europe. And, in fact, all that was is the Islamic traditions (that had been valued) getting spread into Europe and reawakening/reigniting that fire of knowledge and truth and love.

(And I'm getting the sign; I'm gonna get a sheep hook around my neck here in just a second.)

The Holy Ghost gets redefined in... It's like chapter 6, verse 61 (or [6]2 or [6]3) of the book of Moses in the Pearl of Great Price; you'd have to go into the book of Genesis (in which it's now paragraphs) in order to locate it. But it's redefined as the truth of all things, the keys of the kingdom, the fullness, and the comforter; it's a string of words. That's what we seek to have access to. You lived in Heaven before you came to Earth. And that is true of everyone everywhere, no matter where they hail from. They all came from Heaven. And they have a pre-existence that embedded within them knowledge of truths that you have to bring back to the surface here. The way in which you detect the truth of some things is by deep study and reflection and finding it here, and then recognizing it as being true—because something within your core is able to do that. There are some...

I heard a talk that was given by... Actually, I think it was Rob and Q both talking together about some native traditions that were remarkable in their application of truths and knowledge and symbols that convey eternal truths. There was a time and... God, who's that great anthropologist...? Campbell! Joseph Campbell wrote a book that said that there was a time when there were navigators. (And these guys are not necessarily living only in Polynesia. We're talking about people who had sailed, you know, as part of the Portuguese fleet, as part of the Spanish fleet, as part of the English fleet.) There were times when sailors could see Venus in the daytime. We don't see Venus in the daytime! We've lost it. (Well, if you've got a program that gives you the stars that will tell you on your iPhone, you can see it—but that's not Venus; that's your graphic on your iPhone.) There were times when people could see things and perceive things that we have become too coarse because they're irrelevant to us to behold anymore. But within every one of you, there are powers and capacities, gifts and abilities that lie dormant that only need to be awakened within you. And you can talk about how miraculous something is or how enlightened you've become. Largely all you're doing is waking up something that was resonant there before. It was there. It is there. It longs to be reignited. And it can be reignited by careful attention to Native traditions, the gospel of Christ, the teachings of the Buddha.

Everywhere you find truth in this world, it is an echo of something that began with Father Adam and Mother Eve. They had possession of a body of information that has been disseminated throughout the world. And every culture that has some great truth that they prize ultimately reckons from that same original source of truth. We just have the obligation of discerning between the one and the other and holding fast to the things that are true indeed and leaving to the side the things that are corruptions or inappropriate emendations. One of the challenges that the body of Scripture that we've been given has been supplied to us in order to help us overcome.

So, last question, and then I will go see some grandbabies.

Question 7: So, the Scriptures say that the natural man is an enemy to God. My question is: Is that a result of the fall, or was that true at the time of creation as well?

DS: Okay. Yeah, the statement found in the Book of Mormon about how the natural man is an enemy of God and has been and, you know, will be—we are, in our present condition, unlike God, okay? We get tired, and He does not. We get hungry, and She does not. We feel pain and can be manipulated through the application of outside, deliberately-inflicted pain, and They do not, okay? Your vulnerability and weakness and susceptibility to hunger makes you something that is not merely “other” than God, it puts within you something that is or would be detestable as a god. It is “unlike,” and therefore it is a way in to compromise you. God cannot be compromised. He and She and They are above that—can't be manipulated, can't be compromised, can't be made vulnerable to weaknesses. We are filled with weaknesses. We...

There was a prayer that got read by Taylor, and I knelt down, and I was reminded (when I knelt down) that I bumped my left knee on furniture a couple of days ago, and there it was: It kind of hurt. And I endured as much as I could kneeling, and then I sat down, hoping all you people had your eyes closed, so you wouldn't see that I was given up on that kneeling thing. But I did that 'cuz my knee hurt. Well, it's another manifestation of how easy it is to get me to do something just by inflicting a little bit of pain.

Go on a hike and put a pebble on each heel in your shoe, and see how long you hike. It's... You'll hike as long as you can remain on your tiptoes—and then you'll either sit down and cry, or you'll take the rock out of your shoe 'cuz it's kind of stupid to do that.

We are an enemy to God because we can be easily compromised. We're an enemy to God because we have vulnerabilities, susceptibilities, weaknesses, and frailties that get used more or less consciously. We are vulnerable (in addition to all that) to lies; we are vulnerable to emotional manipulation. You take the language of virtue and you apply it to corruption, and you get people to say evil things and do evil things because they are paraded as if tolerance and kindness should openly embrace things that are repugnant to and in direct opposition to the will of God. And it doesn't matter that the language of virtue gets used in order to manipulate that, we're susceptible to that. God is not. You can't fool Him. You can't fool Them. You can fool us. A false Christ never got the angel Gabriel to say, "Ooh, wait a minute, I want to hear this guy out! He might have something good to say. I think he might be the real thing." Gabriel wasn't gonna do that because he exists in a plane that is shed from this. And as long as we occupy bodies of dust, these bodies are weak, and they're vulnerable. And therefore, that—all of that—makes us liable to error, failure, and sin, and that is an enemy to God's plan to exalt you, to raise you, to make you a holy being. Because in our current state, we are not that, and therefore, that weakness/that vulnerability is what makes us an enemy to God.

I've got little baby Harper and little baby Nora waiting for me with birthday cake in hand, I'm sure. Thank you, all.

2023.07.14 Truth at All Costs - Interview with Michelle Stone

Denver C. Snuffer, Jr.
Recorded July 14, 2023

Michelle Stone: There you are... Can you hear me?

Denver Snuffer: I can hear you. Can you hear me?

MS: Perfect, yep, there it is. We're just barely getting set up—the last-minute stuff with the kids, always.

DS: Hah.

MS: Okay, let me get this started.

Well, thank you again for agreeing to talk to me!

DS: Yeah, yeah!

MS: I appreciate it. Okay, anything you want to start with? Should we just go ahead and get going? Is there anything you want/topics you want me to avoid or make sure to cover?

DS: Well, if you ask something that I don't want to talk about, I'll just not talk about it. Umm...

MS: Perfect.

DS: I don't really like doing these kinds of things. So, you know, I'm not enthused, but I'm willing to participate. So...

MS: Well, thank you!

DS: ...we'll do that. Okay.

MS: We'll hope for the best! Well, I'm gonna go ahead and start recording, if that's all right.

DS: Yeah, that's fine.

MS: And then...

DS: Yep.

MS: Okay. I had a super late night last night. So hopefully, I can remember all the words I need to... I'm a bit sleep deprived. Hopefully, it will all go well. So, okay.

(Oh, let's see what's going on with this. One sec. Gotta get the microphone going as well.)

DS: Do you need me to talk to check volume level?

MS: Umm, I think it sounds good. I'm gonna put you on a separate recording. So it should... I'm sadly low-tech. So it'll just be the best it's gonna be. Okay, we'll go ahead and get started, if that's all right.

DS: That's fine.

MS: Okay.

Welcome to this conversation that I am having with Denver Snuffer. Denver, I really, really want to thank you for coming. I know this is not your favorite thing to do. This is not your cup of tea. But I also wanted to explain... Well, I've kind of explained to my audience a little bit about why I wanted to talk to you. There are so many things I would love to talk to you about. For those who don't know Denver's story, I'm sure we're going to go into that. And for anyone who feels nervous having Denver here, I just want to repeat that I have talked to many different people who are not members of our faith who have different journeys and different paths. And I think that we can all rely on the fact that the Lord has given us the gift of discernment, so we can listen to what people say and discern truth and error without fear and without needing to just reject people. That's part of why I wanted to have Denver come. It's 'cuz I feel like his voice has been silenced, and other people have been talking on his behalf in ways that don't feel very fair to me.

So Denver, with all of that being said... I guess I should say Denver was/has been a member of the church, I believe, for 40 years. He was baptized, and 40 years later, to the day (if I'm getting the story right) was excommunicated in 2015 for, I believe, a book tour, right? Like a series of lectures you were giving?

DS: Yeah. I was baptized on September 10th of 1973, and I was excommunicated on September 10th of 2013...

MS: Oh, of 2013. Okay.

DS: ...and it was exactly 40 years to the day.

MS: That is amazing. So, yeah, this is a complicated conversation, 'cuz I really want my faithful LDS listeners to feel comfortable and welcome and not be afraid, so I'm hoping that people can just listen. But I want to tell a little bit about my...

So I've shared before that I was struggling in my church membership 'cuz I felt like the church was not living up to what I expected it to be if it was the true church of God. And I was reading the Book of Mormon and just getting these powerful, strong messages from it: mainly, that it was TO us and ABOUT us, that we ARE the Gentiles, we are the ones being called to repentance. And also, what I started to see was this pattern of people coming into the presence of God, basically telling us how to do that. It seemed like an instruction manual with part-by-part, and it starts with Nephi telling us everything he possibly can until the Lord tells him, "You can't say anymore," and ends with Moroni basically summing it all up and saying, "If you have..." you know, and right before Moroni, we have Ether, that's one of the most profound stories, the brother of Jared telling us, "Wait, this is how you come into the presence of God." And then again, Moroni setting it up. And I felt so... Yeah, I just felt like how... What is going on here? How can I dare believe that this is what the Book of Mormon is about—because someone would have TOLD me! How can I think I know more than everybody else or that I know something different than anybody else? I really, like, it really was actually quite a bit of turmoil. And that was when I was led, really, by the Lord to this book that I believe is... I don't know if this is the first book you wrote, but it's the one that I found pretty early on.

DS: It is...

MS: And it sure...

DS: ...the first.

MS: Is this the first one you wrote?

DS: Yeah.

MS: So this is The Second Comforter (so they can get it in the screen), ~~Communing with the Lord through the~~ Conversing with the Lord through the Veil, and it—for me—served as this beautiful second witness. It gave me permission to believe what the Lord was teaching me without feeling like I was all alone and crazy, you know? So I want to thank you for that. That really was a gift to me. And I want to say also, for those worried about Denver, he wrote this book as a fully active, participating member of the church, I believe serving on the High Council, if I'm not mistaken. And...

DS: Yeah...

MS: ...and this book didn't do anything to get you into trouble. This book is not...

DS: Oh, no; heavens, no.

MS: ...unsafe for continued members.

DS: No. And in fact, the manuscript for that book was submitted to Deseret Book, and they took seven months to evaluate it before deciding that they thought the content was too sacred for them to feel comfortable putting out there. But when they finally decided not to publish it, they encouraged me to find another publisher to put it out there, and ultimately, yeah, it got into print. But I didn't want it advertised; I didn't want it... I didn't want to do book signings. I didn't want it to become something that a lot of attention was drawn to.

Because I refused to advertise or publicize or do book signings or promote it in any way, I had to bear the cost to get it into print. I had to pay the cost out of pocket for the cover art. I had to pay to get the professional editor. I had to... It took a lot of money to get it into print, but I was hoping it would be a very quiet book—that people for whom it was appropriate would find it, and everyone else would just go their way and pay no notice.

But the printer—the month before it went into print—the printer was acquired by the world's largest bookseller, Amazon; it's a subsidiary of Amazon that printed the book. And when a title comes out on Amazon and anyone does a word search like... The title of the book is The Second Comforter, Conversing with the Lord through the Veil. If someone picks up and does a search for "the second comforter," Amazon has worldwide, global reach. And so the, uh... It got more attention than I wanted it to.

It's a very personal book. But it's personal to the reader. It's taking the reader on an individual, internal journey in themselves. But there are vignettes about me. The vignettes illustrate how to get something wrong. And then the chapter that follows the vignette explains how to get it right. And so it's personal in the sense, for me, that I'm talking about a lot of personal failures. And it's personal to the reader because it's pushing the reader internal to themselves in a search. And your mention of the Book of Mormon... I mean, there are three chapters devoted to Nephi's struggle and search, because his experience illustrates a great deal about the process. And so Nephi figures prominently for three chapters early in the book.

MS: Tell people what those three chapters are, so they can go and look at 'em...

DS: Oh, I don't have the book with me. And I don't have the index. But if you look in the table of contents, it talks about Nephi's journey and how Nephi came along. I mean, initially, the first thing that Nephi did was to struggle and have a confrontation meditatively and prayerfully with God, struggling to try to believe what his father had said. And it begins with something as simple as that, and then it culminates in what happens with Nephi. And the Book of Mormon, I think, intends to invite everyone—every reader—to go on that same journey.

MS: Exactly. Yes. And I just was rereading... We were speaking to some friends the other night that were talking about it in Moroni 9. One thing that I really also appreciate about your book—appreciated at that time, especially—was that it seeks to almost, I don't want to say "normalize" but "give people permission" to have spiritual experiences, to have manifestations and visitations, and the things that we have made... They seem crazy. Like, I know that at one point, you know, I had people decide I was schizophrenic if I would share experiences. That literally happened, you know? And it's very difficult for people to be able to understand that not only do we have the opportunity but almost the obligation to believe that these kinds of experiences, the ministry of angels for, you know, a start are not only possible but are part of what is expected of people of faith. And Moroni 7 makes it so clear (I hope people will read that/reread it) that if angels are/have ceased to minister to/if we aren't experiencing these kinds of things, it's not because the heavens are silent; it is due to our lack of faith. And that's what I think is part of the essential message that all of us are trying to spread is, like, this shouldn't be so suspect; it shouldn't be so strange and scary and odd to have communion with the divine. That is the very purpose of the gospel; like, that's the message I was getting from the Book of Mormon is: What the gospel is, is the power to overcome death and hell (which means separation from God—right?) and physical and spiritual death. And so instead of saying, "So, I can live with God again, someday," which we mean, just live a good life on the safe path, and then when you die, you'll be in the presence... It's so minimized and dumbed down—when what we actually have is the process to come back into the presence of God, overcome spiritual death, and then (eventually, the next step) be translated, overcome physical death (which is the city of Enoch), which is everything we claim to believe in, right? And there's a literal-ness to all of this that it's maybe too great and marvelous, too terrifying for us to be willing to accept and embrace and pursue.

DS: I think that's... Yeah, I think that the institutional encouragement is for Latter-day Saints to outsource spirituality to a hierarchy and trust them to then feed you whatever it is that you need to have fed in order to obtain salvation. And the Book of Mormon is going in an opposite direction, in which we all become individually accountable before God and independently authorized by God to pursue the path of faith in order to reach the point where we, "having been true in all things, are prepared to converse with the Lord through the veil and receive further light and knowledge" (which is still a preserved part of the LDS temple ceremony, despite all of the other changes that have been made). You know, you're introduced as "having been true and faithful in all things" and desiring now for "further light and knowledge by conversing with the Lord through the veil," and that's a ceremony—but it's a ceremony that's pointing to a divine invitation and a religious expectation. And the Book of Mormon is ratifying that in account after account, experience after experience—and I mean, why are those accounts given to us if they're not meant to be accepted, trusted, and acted upon? And you're right: In chapter seven of Moroni, If these things have ceased, then has faith ceased also (Moroni 7:38 LE). It's kind of an indictment of the institutional position of outsourcing spirituality and trusting other people to tell you what it is that's important.

I think we become easily submissive to religious authority and that the temptation always is if you are given a little authority, that you begin to want control. It's chaotic when everyone is given the opportunity to believe and trust and act for themselves. And yet, you do not want (and the Scriptures do not encourage you) to seek order at the price of unrighteous dominion, control, compulsion, and abrogating the agency of man. Joseph's "teach them correct principles, and let them govern themselves," actually did result in a mess in Nauvoo, in a mess in Far West, in a mess at Independence, in a mess at Kirtland. I mean, gathering after gathering, group after group, "teaching correct principles and allowing them to govern themselves" always resulted in unruliness and the fringes of the folks who were gathered being up to a lot of mischief and engaging in a lot of expectations. But I don't think that is a poor reflection upon either the Lord's plan to give us all agency or Joseph Smith's calling to start a rough stone rolling down the hill, to fulfill what Daniel foresaw. What it means is that, individually, we're just not accepting the responsibility devolving upon ourselves to be peaceable with our fellowman, to be obedient, to be true and faithful, to be something more than the kind of wayward, chaotic, self-indulgent, ambitious, self-promoting people that vied for power and influence in Kirtland and then in Independence and in Far West and in Nauvoo. And Joseph never lived to see a group of people who would rise to the occasion that he had hoped—in teaching them correct principles, that in governing themselves they became like the people of Enoch.

I don't think that Joseph was deficient as a teacher. I just think Enoch had a better audience. I mean, Christ is clearly the best teacher of them all, and Christ's audience didn't become Zion. And of all those who heard Him throughout His mortal ministry, at the end, the account that we're given in Paul's writing is about 500 people were there to see Him ascend on the Mount of Olives. So at the end, after the thousands—perhaps tens of thousands—who had heard the Lord minister, the greatest teacher (greater, more intelligent than they all) only managed to make about 500 people really adopt and accept the lesson. It wasn't for want of a good teacher that the people at the time of the Lord's ministry we didn't realize Zion, and so I don't think you can indict Jesus or Joseph Smith. I also don't think you can laud Enoch. I think you have to take the realization that the people themselves have a say—they all have a say...

MS: Okay!

DS: ...they all have the opportunity to rise up or to not. And so it's not... You can't point to the failure by saying the Lord didn't send someone adequate to the task, because I think Joseph was more than adequate to the task. It's just that...

MS: As was Jesus, right?

DS: Yeah. It's just that people had... They had more interest in worldliness and the weaknesses of the flesh and the aspirations and ambitions of mortal men, and the consequence was: No Zion. And even now, while I think the Lord is fully prepared to permit a group of people to rise up, the problem remains the same. "Lo here" in hierarchy, "lo there" in a-faction-that-practices-fundamentalism. There are chaotic voices, but none of them penetrate to the heart of the people living today to allow them, with deep reflection and with humility, to live according to... I mean, it's... If you've got your Doctrine and Covenants, it's D&C section 93, verse 1. I mean, right there is the formula; that's what's required: It [should] come to pass that every soul who forsake[s] his sins and come[s] unto me, ...and [hearkens to] my voice, and keepeth my commandments, shall see my face and know that I am. I mean, that long—well, long?—relatively short list of things is something...

The battleground is internal to the person. It's not how you get along with other people; it's how you slay the dragon within. Then having slain the dragon within, you can live at peace with your fellowman because the turmoil, the turbulence, the disruption, the fear, the anxiety, the ambition, the hope, the aspiration... All of those things go away if you can slay the dragon within and be right with God. And we have far too many people in Joseph's day and today who don't get that first verse of section 93 right. And we're looking for—and we actually want to be—oh, hey, "Lo here! I'm good! I'm great!" Yeah...

MS: Okay, there are so many things I want to respond to that you just said because... Oh, they're like... Let me start here: I think that it is an individual responsibility. And part of the reason that it's messy... Like, I live in the Doctrine and Covenants, and I won't remember the section right now, but where it says, "If you build a house unto my name, all of the pure in heart can come and will see God" (see D&C 97:15-16). And then right over on the next column, it says, this is Zion—THE PURE IN HEART (vs.21), right? True Zion is made up of a people who walk and talk with God, which is why... So when those people come together... And it is an individual responsibility. I even... Well, I see God's hand in this entire thing. God needed the pattern set with the city of Enoch to show the rest of mankind. Enoch had hundreds of years. They... You... Their lives were much longer. God established that pattern, if we see that as a literal story, right? And since then, it's been... Like, I see the Restoration and the—I guess, if we want to call it the "failure" of the Restoration, the failure to establish Zion, the "being disparate" and following under what I consider the covenant curses (because that's what seems to have happened, you know, to the states in Utah)—I see this all in God's hand, because everything God does is good. And God is the author. And so all of us, even the leaders of the church are—Brigham Young and the continuing leaders—are playing their role because there has to be this... There's this necessary traction or friction that you have to grow through, right? I don't... Like, I think that all of us want to find this perfect place, find this perfect thing where we'll all just be in the presence of God, without recognizing that that's not how it works. There has to be the opposition in all things, even—I've said before—even in Eden, even in paradise, there was a snake to set this all going, there was a poisoned tree, you know, like, there's not going to be this perfect place to escape to. And so I think that even our leaders... Like, the process is internal, and we come to God however we will, in whatever organization we're in; that doesn't matter very much. The question is, Are we following the promptings we are having? The church structure cannot in any way keep us from God any more than it can bring us into the presence of God, as can no other structure or no other leader—or just like you were saying, even Jesus and Joseph Smith couldn't bring the people into the presence of God. All they can do is, like the Book of Mormon strives to do: give the example, give the instructions, try to encourage, and try to promote faith, because that's... Does that make sense?

And so I think that, like, the faith is multifaceted. We have to have faith, first of all, that this is a possibility. But maybe the harder step is that it's a possibility for each of us. I know so many people who are like, "Well, I don't think God expects that of me. That's..." Right? That it's... And then the possibility that God can lead us through that process and that whatever effort we make in that direction is good; it's not like a "you've succeeded" or "you've failed." It's that: Are you striving on this path, in whatever setting the Lord wants you to be in while you are striving on this path? That's how I see it.

So I don't see any church leaders as being obstacles to this journey. In some ways, they serve us as helpers because everybody, you know, like, everybody in our life is a helper for us on this journey if...

So anyway, and then I do think that Joseph, what he established and where that all went, God knows the end from the beginning. God knew that the whole time. It wasn't a mistake in the plan or a failure. It's this incredible opportunity that I feel that we now have to pick up the mantle, to begin finding what is still there. It is still there, absolutely, in the Book of Mormon, and it is even still there, like you said, in the temple and in the gospel and in the church, we see...

Well, I guess I should talk... Your second book that is... The other one that I have of yours (these are the only two books I have of yours), Passing the Heavenly Gift, which I think this was the troubling one, right? This was the trouble book?

DS: Yeah, that... Yeah.

MS: And so this, but this does, I remember, it does talk about the embers still being there; you can still blow carefully on the embers and reignite the flame.

DS: Right.

MS: It is still present in the gospel that we have. And so, anyway, so that's why I wanted to, like, clarify... I don't think... I think that people get scared, thinking, "If I go on this path, then it threatens everything I know. It threatens my family, my membership in the church, and..."

DS: Yeah.

MS: While... Okay, a couple of things, and then ~~I'll~~ I'll let you talk again; I'm talking too much. But a couple of things, because you were talking about the messiness of this path. And it is messy, because striving to become pure in heart... And I think that there are so many false spirits and so many opportunities to be tempted from one side to the other like... I think there is—maybe it's an inevitable part of this path—this sort of grandiosity, this feeling of, "I'm really important. I'm really special." And we, as mortals, want to put people on pedestals. That's part of what the problem is. It's not just that our leaders are claiming that they're on pedestals. It's that we want to put them on—we want people on pedestals—and as soon as people get disillusioned with the church, then they want to find someone else to put on the pedestal, whether it's you or someone else that is vocal about their experiences with the divine, right? So we want to put people on pedestals, and then a consequence of that is we want to be put on a pedestal...

DS: Hah.

MS: ...as soon as we start... Right? I think... To me, that's part of the problem, right there. It's just our desire. Like I think every time we want to be around someone that we think is important, it's because it makes us more important, and if we can recognize, "Oh, I'm trying to fill that person in for God; it's God that I really want to be in connection with, not that person, not..." and "I don't want people to glorify and put me on a pedestal." We all... If I'm feeling the desire to have people put me on a pedestal that also is my lack of connection with God.

DS: Hmm.

MS: I think connection with God fills all of those holes. And I think all of those holes are what make this such a crazy, messy, complicated process for every individual. And so, luckily, kind of when you're a little further down the road, you can see, "Oh, I think they're at/in that place on the process that I relate to," you know—not that everyone's journey is the same, but when you see someone being a little bit, maybe, self-glorifying or when you see someone wanting to glorify somebody else (you or somebody else), you can kind of recognize that and just pray, "Lord, okay, help them make it through that journey on their own."

Anyway, does that resonate with you? Do you find some truth in that?

DS: Yeah. I think there's very little I would quarrel with. The purpose of a Zion is to have a community that, in effect, a community that finally lives the Sermon on the Mount—because the Sermon on the Mount was simply a blueprint for how a society would get along. And it really is Jesus explaining to people, in a sermon, how He lived, how Christ dealt with the law of Moses as an internal challenge that He was trying to face.

Zion is a community, and there's no such thing as an individual Zion. I mean, if you're gonna have a Zion, you have to have a community. The impediment to the community is the failure of the individual to internalize what the Lord has invited us and commanded us and asked us to do. And part of what interferes is that very notion about, "Hey, there's something special about you because the Lord took note of you."

I can tell you that there's absolutely nothing special about me. And in fact, as I look around at Latter-day Saints generally, as I was being baptized in September 10th of 1973, I was convicted and convinced that Joseph Smith was a prophet, the Book of Mormon was true, and that I needed to be baptized. I was convinced of that. But I looked at the Latter-day Saints ('cuz they invited me into family's homes), and I did not think that I was as good a person as the people in whose homes I was being taught. Some of these were very young married people with children, who were, you know, in their early 20s; they were still very youthful themselves, and yet they were living chaste, moral lives with families: they didn't smoke; they didn't drink; they did all of the Mormon things. And I did not believe myself to be capable of living as good a life as the lives I was seeing on display. But I had this conviction that I needed to be baptized because I had gotten an answer to prayer—and that if I failed to respond to that, that I would be losing that connection (because this connection was important to me, and I wanted to preserve it). So I went and I got baptized but didn't believe I was as good a person as the people I was joining. And realistically, as I look back on my life, I don't think I'm as good a person as the Latter-day Saint model would suggest.

I do think that forgiveness from God is absolutely important in order for someone to be reconciled to God, but the fact that God forgives you doesn't change that you were never good enough in the first place but for Christ's forgiveness. Therefore, of what do you have to boast? Is there something about you that makes you better than someone that did not need forgiveness for these errors? And my view is that, No, there isn't. And it's preposterous to think that, in a spiritual journey, that your stumbles and your falls and your bruised knees and your bloodied elbows are something that you can overlook when you think about yourself. The Lord may forgive you, but you're still that weak individual that needed to be lifted, that needed to be forgiven, that needed to be buoyed up by the Savior. And the idea that now, "Oh! You get to be a great model, and you get attention!" is foolish. I try to do what the Lord asks, in the way that He asks for it to be done, using what I'm told to do, at the time I'm told to do it, and nothing more. And I believe that anyone that then inserts themselves into the process cannot be trusted by God! And part of what gets favor with God is trustworthiness: the desire to give heed and diligence to Him and to His agenda and to lose yourself and your ambition and your desire. And there are a lot of people who, once having a spiritual experience of any kind, wants to go out and shout about it and call attention to themselves and go stand on a street corner. I mean, I did not want to—throughout, I did not want to call attention to myself. And even now, I don't like doing interviews because it does seem like you're trying to get noticed and get airtime with someone. And I don't like that!

MS: Put the focus on you.

DS: Yeah.

MS: I think the focus on you is always a... I struggle with that with my podcasts. Like, I feel like this is what I'm supposed to be doing. This is...you know. But it is a challenge to not want the focus to be on me. Of course, it's nice when people say nice things to me. I appreciate it, you know. But at the same time, I don't want to drink that—right?—because...

DS: Yeah. I don't think the Lord can trust someone who has that within their heart, within their ambition. And I think that “being trusted by God” is a rare thing. It does not happen much in Scripture. It does not happen much in life. But if you ever obtain something like that, the last thing you want to do is betray it. And so...

MS: Absolutely.

DS: ...~~I worry about~~ I don't worry about the Lord trusting me, because I know what I'm about. However, I worry that people misinterpret, misread, and project onto someone else ideas that don't belong there. And if they project that onto someone—but they're trying now to follow a path towards God, and they think that that becomes part of that path towards God—then they're led astray by that. And so you have to be careful about the misimpressions that people take into themselves and then hope that they can get over on God, employing the misimpression that they've obtained from their misread of someone's motives. And I think that happened to Joseph all the time.

I think, as I read carefully the Joseph Smith Papers and look at, you know, what was going on in the contemporaneous material, there's a lot of people who are throwing onto Joseph their views of what they think he's about. And then they go about what is in their own hearts, believing that if they imitate the projection that they put upon Joseph in their own lives, that that will then let them get over with God. And I worry that just as the Lord was misunderstood, and Joseph was misunderstood, and undoubtedly, you know, Peter and Paul and others were misunderstood, that anyone who says, “I have come to know God,” will be misinterpreted and that there will be projections put upon them as a consequence of which they are misled—which is one of the reasons why I think the telestial world includes within the “list of those who are damned” those that say, “I, I am of Cephas, and I am of Peter, and I am of Paul, and I am of Esais,” because what they're doing is they're taking someone who was merely employed temporarily to deliver a message, and they're reading into that individual and projecting onto them what they believe to be a useful pattern to mirror their own lives when that is not the case. The one... These are true messengers that are listed in those that inherit the telestial world. The problem is that they project onto that messenger instead of saying that the messenger was following only the Lord and that...

MS: Can you back up and say that again? I lost the audio for just a second. Can you...? Say the problem is that they worship messengers...

DS: Yeah. The problem is that they project onto the messengers a pattern that they interpret as being the way to follow the Lord. And so they've substituted someone between the Lord and themselves. The messenger ought to be listened to...

MS: Absolutely.

DS: ...They ought to be heeded. But the purpose is to take that in order to try and draw closer to the Lord and only to the Lord—because the only one that ever got it right was the Lord! All of these other people are serving as delivery boys. But the cook in the kitchen and the food is coming from somewhere else. I mean, your DoorDash guy is not the... There's a whole infrastructure behind him.

MS: He's not the gardener that grew the food. Right!

DS: Yeah.

MS: I think this is exactly what it means with “cursed is he that putteth his trust in the arm of flesh” (see 2 Nephi 28:31 LE). Because I do... I really... That has been my pattern is, for a time I feel so inspired to learn from this person, you know...

DS: Yeah, sure.

MS: ...and I drink up what they're teaching. And then they say something or something happens, and I'm like, “Oh, that doesn't resonate with me. They're off on that.” That doesn't mean I reject them as a teacher, but I... The spirit is the teacher. What is the truth is the teacher, right?

DS: Yeah. Yeah.

MS: And I'll learn from this other person, and I'll learn from this other... And so, I take the messages from all of these people with messages to deliver, but keep the eye on... Don't... It's so tempting to want to be in someone's good graces or in someone's good favor, 'cuz it makes you feel more important, right? And that's, I think, exactly what you're talking about. And then, when we start having experiences with God, all of a sudden, we can start trusting in our own flesh, in our own self-speaking: “I can lead these people.” And that is really... That's a real temptation. To want to be put on a pedestal is as much of a...more of a temptation than wanting to put someone on a pedestal, right? And all of those things are part of this messiness that we have to avoid. Just true messages, letting the Holy Spirit be the guide, not any individual person.

DS: Yeah, yeah. And that is... We have to be wary. And wariness isn't confined to the motives or intentions or desires of the heart of another person. Wariness needs to be addressed internally to myself. We never escape the weaknesses of the flesh; so long as you're occupying a body of dust, that body is weak and vulnerable to the appetites of the flesh, the weaknesses of the flesh, the desires of the flesh. We get hungry; we get thirsty; we feel ourselves all the time in need of something else. And our egos are just as big a problem to be wary about as anything else. I don't think we ever escape the weaknesses of mortality, and we fool ourselves if we think that we do. But the purpose, I think, that we best serve if we have something to offer is in teaching others and helping to lift them so that they draw closer to the divine, closer to light and truth. And in that sense, if you are able to raise someone else and have them accept more light and truth into their life, that's all you can do to please the Lord and to satisfy your obligation to your fellow man. After that, you don't get to control them! You don't get to collect...

MS: Right.

DS: ...tithes from them. You don't get to, you know, pay yourself a dividend, and you don't get to, you know, stand up and ask for adulation. You really... If you succeed...

MS: You don't get to become the authoritarian, institutional leader.

DS: Yeah.

MS: The Lord's messengers are rarely, if ever, ~~the institution~~ the authoritarian, institutional leader.

DS: The letter from Liberty Jail that Joseph Smith wrote, No power or influence can or ought to be maintained by virtue of the priesthood (D&C 121:41 LE) is an indictment of church leadership. And all of what follows in talking about the only correct way is by "love unfeigned, gentleness, meekness, pure knowledge," all of that is about the church leadership. It has nothing to do with the government. And it has nothing to do with individual rank-and-file members sitting in the pew. It's about people who claim to have power and authority by reason of the priesthood. If Jesus Christ is the head of the priesthood, if He is the one from whom all priesthood authority is derived through generations, if He's the head, He did not come to BE served but to serve.

MS: Yes.

DS: And so...

MS: And I do have to push back on you just a tiny bit...

DS: Yes?

MS: ...for saying it's an indictment of church leadership. Because I would say... Like, there are so many leaders who truly are servant leaders in the church, and I don't want to paint...

DS: Yeah.

MS: ...with a broad brush there. Like, that is... I think each of us has the opportunity to be a servant or to be an authoritarian. Even as a parent, when I look at myself with my kids, and I'm like, "Go to bed; stop bothering me," 'cuz I want my time alone. And I... right? Am I being authoritarian, or am I serving? That's a question for each of us to ask at all times, in everything that we're doing. And so, we can't... Again, we can't put that off on somebody else when it's something... It's in all of our hearts all of the time. I think whatever authority we have—I'm bigger than you; I'm in charge of you, I...right?—we always can get into unrighteous dominion or into servant leadership. So anyway... So I don't want to... Like, I think that's a question for all of us all the time. Because how we interact in the stewardship we have shows us how we will interact if we had a bigger stewardship, if we were the president of the church, our own little authoritarianism that would come out with... But in a way, the worst thing that happened to Brigham Young is that he accumulated so much power. If he hadn't had so much power, he couldn't have done so much mischief and caused so much damage, right?

DS: Yeah.

MS: And so that's the question for each of us in our... I think that applies to all of us all the time is, What do we do with the authority we're given?

DS: Yeah.

MS: And one example I use, like, my stake president is, you know... At a very, very difficult time, the way he used his calling was he brought the stake presidency over to clean my kitchen three weeks in a row when I was going through unthinkable things—because he was using his calling to demonstrate the service that can and should be done in our communities. And that... You know, so I really think there is a power to... It is possible to be in any position and abuse authority or not abuse authority. So anyway, continue, I didn't mean to cut you off.

DS: No, no, no! I think I don't have any quarrel with that. You know, I have met some... Some of the greatest people I know have been local Latter-day Saint leadership. The stake president who called me to the High Council, President Lorin Pugh, deserves special mention because I think he was a a godly man and a righteous man.

We had a stake patriarch. He was actually the stake patriarch before Lorin Pugh; he was released, and he became the stake patriarch. And the high priest group leader wouldn't call him to be a home teacher—because he didn't want the stake patriarch to be burdened with home-teaching or to have to deal with any family's problems or issues. And President Christensen went to the High Priest group leader, and he said, "I WANT to home-teach. I don't feel like I'm doing my duty if I don't home-teach." So the high priest group leader called me in and said, "Okay, I'm gonna let the patriarch home-teach a family, but I want to make sure it's the right family. And so I'm calling you and your family to be the home-teaching family that I'm sending the patriarch to because I don't want him to have to bear any burdens or be troubled by anything." And so, we were called to be the home-teaching family to whom the stake patriarch was assigned as his single home-teaching family.

MS: That's great!

DS: And he was a wonderful home teacher! He was the patriarch that came to know my children sufficiently well that when it came time to get patriarchal blessings, we took our kids over to Brother Christensen for patriarchal blessings 'cuz I thought he certainly would know and understand them. We still have a straggler who was too young, and so she hasn't yet gotten a patriarchal blessing—so maybe I'll just give her one; we've talked to her about it.

MS: Wow.

DS: Anyway, there have been some wonderful men that...

MS: Yeah.

DS: ...that I've encountered who have been in local church leadership, and you're right! There are some great... There are no categoricals; there are good people everywhere.

MS: Right.

DS: Yeah.

MS: So, okay, so I have a couple of different areas I really want to get into. The reason I asked you to come on the podcast, specifically—it's not the only thing I want to talk to you about, but...is... One of the things... So, I talked about how you have different people that you learn from and listen to, and I told you what a service your book (your initial book)...that I was just miraculously led to. I was online, and there was a little link down at the bottom to some other page that just like shot... I had no idea what it was. Clicked on it. It took me to some conversation where there was another link that kind of glowed; I clicked on that. And it took me to some discussion where someone mentioned your book.

DS: [chuckling]

MS: That was my process of finding your book, which I had no idea what it was; I just knew that it was... The screen was glowing extra bright, and I was like, "I have to buy that book!" And I did. So, I do think it worked that the Lord led people to it who needed it. That was my experience, you know. So...

DS: Oh, hey, while you're talking about that: The Second Comforter, Nephi's Isaiah, Eighteen Verses, Beloved Enos are all written by me as a member in good-standing, a High Councilman, active Latter-day Saint, and they all are LDS orthodox. I've had a number of people say, "Why don't you go back and rewrite the books now that you are on the other side?" And my position has always been: Every one of those were written to reflect what was then LDS orthodox teachings, and I don't... Well, they are an artifact at this point.

MS: Right.

DS: Every one of them is a reflection of what the doctrine, what the teachings, what the principles, what the understanding was of Latter-day Saint Mormonism at the time those books were put into print. And so if something has changed between then and now (and some things have changed), I want to preserve what it was like at the time that I was a member in good-standing, holding a temple recommend, attending the temple with some regularity, serving on the High Council, and having taught either Gospel Doctrine or Elders Quorum or High Priest Group priesthood for three decades. I understood the orthodox teachings of the church. Now, those books are, in context, an exposition of Mormonism as it was when I was a member—active and in good-standing—and I won't edit them to change them at this point. And you will see a lot of encouragement to orthodoxy in all of those books; even Passing the Heavenly Gift encourages faith in the Restoration and fidelity to the church—although it takes some of the varnish off the historical narrative of the church, it doesn't say you should run and hide from LDS orthodoxy; it's just saying that the narrative is not accurate, it ought to be improved, and suggests ways in which it might well be improved. But it was that and the lectures that followed...

One thing that excommunication did (in the lectures that followed) was freed me up from what I perceived to be an obligation to pull punches. I really...

MS: ...to be careful, to be gentle. Okay.

DS: Yeah, I really did.

MS: I feel that.

DS: Even in Passing the Heavenly Gift, I am not hitting anything very hard. In fact, a...

MS: Okay, I felt... I will say, as a member, I felt... I loved the terms that you introduce in the first one. Like, the term “institutional pride” was one that, really, I was like, oh, my goodness, that is what the Book of Mormon is talking about, our institutional pride of “we are the chosen people; we have the fullness of the gospel; we're the ones; everyone needs to be like us,” right?

DS: Yeah.

MS: But you do hit pretty hard. Like, if people, you know... Like, I have a little bit of a softer tone, but I was able to tolerate it; I thought that it was very useful. I just always... I kind of argue back at you a little bit, 'cuz I have a slightly different “come from” or way of approach. But I still think that you were... But my understanding—and I need to clarify a few things—but my understanding is you still were trying to preserve faith and trying to...

DS: Yes.

MS: ...preserve [indecipherable] membership in the church—your own and of those who would be your readers. I think that was your goal, even at that time.

DS: Right. It was, it was—and let me illustrate with one little incident. I had a (or I HAVE a) law partner who left—he had been on a High Council—he had left the church, and he had actually become Catholic. And he's a lay Catholic minister. (He can't be a fully ordained priest in Catholicism because he's married, and he has a family.) But he had left the church. I took a copy of Passing the Heavenly Gift, and I gave it to my law partner to read, and he read it. His reaction was, “Well, this is an apologetic book, AND I have to tell you, if I had read this book before I had left the church, this may have kept me in the church. So, you know, it's too late now; I'm not going back. But it's really an apologetic book.” That's in the view of someone who I think is a more objective reader than someone who is a Latter-day Saint and who doesn't want to acknowledge that there may be some unresolved issues, some fudging on history, some shading of accounts...

MS: We're plagued by defensiveness.

DS: Yes. Yeah.

MS: I think the defensiveness is one of the greatest things...

DS: Yeah.

MS: Like, anytime I feel defensive, it's really... I really take that as a signal of going, “Okay, God, I know this is not from you.” Defensiveness is about pride and fear and shame and things that are the adversary's tools, not the Lord's. And so it's our defensiveness that makes us object to these things. And I think that's one of the main things we need to get rid of. And so, yeah—so that's my experience of those books. I will say, and I don't... This is just, you know... (Someone just called me honest to a fault; it's true.) But I read your first book—very much inspired by the Lord; greatly appreciated it. I didn't feel inspired to read any of your other books. I shared your book with my sister, and she went and bought all of your books, and lent one to me, and I started reading it. And while I appreciated it, I wanted to read the Scriptures—do you know what I mean?—like, I didn't get very far into it, ‘cuz I just felt like, “I'm reading his interpretation of Scriptures, but I want to read the Script...” I get my own interpretation of Scripture. So it wasn't anything against it; it was just the Lord saying, “Hey, you got what you needed. Now go back to me,” right? That was my journey.

DS: Yeah.

MS: And so I never became sort of a follower or, you know (which I don't think you even like the term “follower,” from my understanding, you know). So I don't think you'll object to my journey that I... That was the book I needed from you. And then my journey has been in the Scriptures.

But I do know... One of the things I wanted to talk to you about (because I don't know where you talk about this or if I misunderstood), but at some point—and I had, I don't know, I'm trying to... The memories are fuzzy [on] the timeline. But I know at some point, I heard you say something about polygamy, which led me to believe that, at that time, you believed polygamy was of God, right? Because we all... ‘Cuz I believed polygamy was of God; I'm not... You know, like we all grow and learn. And so that's kind of what I wanted to talk to you about because I know there was a time where, based on all of the information all of us had, we believed polygamy was of God. And I think maybe what it was... I have sort of now developed a sort of a maybe unhealthy, maybe not knee-jerk reaction to hearing men talk about women's identity or destiny or purpose that... Do you know...?

DS: Yeah...

MS: Like, that's... I don't mean to come up with that. It just is how it is for me at this point, and it has been for many years. And so maybe you were talking about men and women or something, and that's where I kind of was like, "Okay, I'm tuned out for a little while 'cuz I can't have any more men get the answers that are mine and my sisters to get and to present." Does that...?

DS: Yeah.

MS: That's my... I'm sorry. I'm a little bit of a feisty ~~low-cap~~ I mean, small-cased "feminist," you know?

DS: Yeah.

MS: And so, I just kind of instinctively feel that way. So... But what I wanted to talk to you about, because I've gone on this journey of strongly believing polygamy was of God and that it would be Zion and that it would be, you know, very much the Bruce R. McConkie perspective, that it would be the celestial kingdom, and it was... It would be a privilege when we were able to live that. I was incredibly naive, went through the journey of learning, first of all, that polygamy was never of God, then, yeah... I was naive about polygamy. I only saw the glowing, you know, top level—not all of the underbelly. And then went through the process of learning that polygamy was not of God and then, more recently, have come to this conclusion that has become... You know how you finally accept truth and then the Lord confirms it and confirms it and confirms it?

So, now in the position of not believing that Joseph was the author or any sort of participant in anything to do with polygamy, but that he didn't define it. And I believe you've gone on a similar journey. And I kind of wanted to hear your, like, how you got from point A to point B to point C, what your journey was, and what convinced you, because I think it's a valuable... People like to write me off. I'm, you know, I'm dealing with a lot of people saying I'm too emotional, and I'm too... They, like... It's pretty unpleasant. You're a lawyer, hard-nosed guy, pretty logical. Let's hear it from you, Denver: Why should people consider that polygamy is not of God, and that Joseph wasn't a polygamist?

DS: Well, if... Let me start by just talking about the way in which I had understood it at the beginning because, as a Latter-day Saint, you accept what the Latter-day Saint tradition tells you. So I began with the proposition that it was of God and true, and section 132 is in the Scriptures that...

MS: Right.

DS: ...I got, and I respected. And if it's in the Scriptures, then it just...

MS: It's canonized! Yeah!

DS: ...as a matter of fact, it's part of the religion! And so I accepted it.

There was a time when it got called into question. And so, while I accepted it, I then became a little more sensitive to the historical source material that it was predicated upon. And it actually became an issue for investigation that I investigated for more than a quarter century. I didn't... I accepted it as true; I began to investigate it; it took a long time before I began to question it; then when I began to question it, it didn't arise to the level of doubting it until I read enough source material ~~that may~~ that troubled me. So I went back to section 132, and I wrestled with the content of section 132 because it is an internally inconsistent document.

MS: Absolutely.

DS: It doesn't hold a constant theme. And one of the things that I was trying to reconcile is how can this unsteady voice in a single revelation make contradictory statements? I began by accepting the notion that Joseph Smith had received the revelation early on. I found were Brigham Young—in that five volume set of Brigham Young's discourses—there is a place in there where he says that the revelation was originally received in 1828, while they were translating the Book of Mormon. He says that Joseph and Oliver became exposed to that. I became acquainted with little known history about Oliver Cowdery (one of the first four missionaries going out), and one of the ideas that they entertained on that mission was that they could grab Indian squaws (they refer to them as that; I'm not being disparaging—this is their view) and get them pregnant; breed with the Indian squaws and produce half-breeds. (There was an entire section of land on the other side of the Mississippi River in the Iowa side, opposite Nauvoo, that was called the half-breed section, in which children that American soldiers had fathered with Indian women were considered, you know, the appropriate landowners in the half-breed section.) Well, the first four missionaries that went out were engaged in the thought of taking extra wives and impregnating them.

MS: Now can you clarify that: Are you saying they actually did that? Or that's the report that came later?

DS: No, that was what was part of what motivated Oliver Cowdery in the first trip out west to engage in the missionary work. They got into Kirtland, and one of the missionaries converted—or started the conversion process for—Sidney Rigdon. Rigdon then went up to where Joseph was in New York. Missionaries continued on and wound up in Independence. But that's... All of that is a separate issue. It was Brigham Young that put it as early as 1828. And so, one of the questions about section 132 is:

- Was it a singular revelation?
- Was it multiple revelations?
- If it was multiple revelations, is there any way to divide it up into the time...?

And I looked at it, and I thought, “Well, they're so different in the way that this subject gets treated. It's so different that this HAS to be separate revelations,” and I parsed it into four and maybe five different revelations, while still accepting the notion that it was true. And it took some time after that before enough information accumulated that I changed my mind. And that was not a, you know, hasty thing.

I changed my mind, and I concluded that section 132 was not at all reliable. Its provenance was very dubious. And it's attribution to Joseph is very suspect.

In Michael Quinn's exposition and in Brian Hales' exposition, they acknowledge that there is only ONE document contemporaneous with Joseph Smith that clearly ties him to the practice—and that one document is section 132. And so if section 132 is suspect because its provenance is insufficient that it shouldn't be trusted, then we have nothing to tie Joseph to the practice, other than the enormous library of material that was generated years/decades after the death of Joseph Smith, in which they attribute—back into the “Nauvoo era”—things TO Joseph which made sense after the 1852 public announcement and the public advocacy that went on and the indoctrination and the propaganda that went on. It makes sense that they would feel comfortable providing these narratives years/decades after the death of Joseph Smith.

So, one of the challenges...

MS: Right.

DS: ...that I thought needed to be undertaken—which I undertook—was to look at everything that existed on June 27, 1844 and before then as evidence that linked Joseph to the practice, and what you find...

MS: So you wanted to limit the search to the contemporaneous evidence...

DS: Only!

MS: ...because I'm just watching everyone... 'Cuz what we have... They claim that 132 is contemporaneous. It's not! It appeared magically after Brigham's death in 1852, which is not contemporaneous with Joseph or when it was received.

DS: Right.

MS: And then the very first testimonies we have start in 1869 and then continue on throughout the rest of that century, right? So from what I'm hearing, you were saying, “Okay, we have all of these later documents. Is there anything that can tie them to Joseph's life? Is there anything contemporaneous I can find to validate or verify any of these later claims?” Is this what I'm...?

DS: Yeah, I...

MS: Okay. ...which is what a good lawyer would do (or a good critical thinker). Yes.

DS: I wanted anything that I could find that would tie Joseph directly that existed June 27, 1844 or before then. And so in looking at that, I concluded that the overwhelming body of information was Joseph Smith denouncing/opposing/holding church courts to discipline anything and everything which suggested spiritual wivery, polygamy, multiple wives. He was absolutely opposed to the practice publicly and in any of the private meetings that were held in church disciplinary proceedings. And even the stuff that purported to tie him to it... That McClellan letter about Emma Smith catching Joseph in the barn in the very act—with exclamation points—which was written after the fact and based upon an interview that McClellan had with Emma Smith decades after the event (and she denied Joseph had done that) appears to be not about sex or intercourse or even marriage; it appears to be something about a ceremony being conducted, in which they were in the barn. And that's it. And what was that ceremony? Because Joseph was in the process of employing a sealing power in order to link people together in order to provide for the eternality of marriage—and the only way that you could make the eternal marriage work in a family in the next life was to link them through Joseph to the eternities. And Joseph was doing something which... You don't find it in any of the documents (because I've looked carefully) until October of 1843, when Joseph (for the first time) mentions the word “adoption.” And so whatever was going on was designed to preserve a family into eternity, and it included a concept which Joseph finally employed the vocabulary word adoption to describe. But one of the problems with saying “sealing=marriage” and “marriage=sex” when it comes to this whole subject matter is that Joseph Smith never fathered a child with anyone other than Emma Smith. Fanny Alger is supposedly someone with whom he had sexual relations, and there was some kind of sealing. Well, she went on to get married to another man, and I forget, it's either eight or nine children. She was fertile, and she bore eight or nine children. She's at the...

MS: She also never claimed to be Joseph's wife.

DS: Correct.

MS: She never claimed there was anything between them; she refuted... And I will push back a little bit against you again...

DS: Yeah.

MS: ...if you don't mind. You know, like, I think that... I think you're bringing quite a bit of speculation to the Fanny Alger situation, because we don't even know if there was any sort of a ceremony happening at all. We'd, like... What we do know is that Oliver said that he had misunderstood; Emma did not hold Joseph accountable/was not angry. We know that the wording in that... Like, it—again—is a very convoluted, like... Something happened in the barn that was somewhat misunderstood and that all works out. As soon as Joseph...

DS: Yeah, they...

MS: ...was able to talk to people—people that he was not manipulating or exerting power over—he just was finally able to explain, and they were like, “Okay, I've got it.” So, the reason I get a little uncomfortable, like... And Joseph did talk about adoption, but nobody has any idea what that meant or what it was, other than we can listen to his own words saying it had nothing to... There was no...

DS: Right.

MS: ...allowance for any kind of sealing to anyone as a wife.

DS: Right.

MS: And so, for me, I guess, the reason I get a little bit feisty about it is because, for me... Emma is my connection to this, you know? Like, I am perfectly happy to defend Joseph, but it's really Emma—studying her—that convinced me...

DS: Right.

MS: ...that this did not happen—because to believe this about Joseph, you have to believe this about Emma. And for me, if Joseph did anything that felt like a betrayal to Emma, then that was a betrayal of their marriage, even if it was some sort of a sealing that Emma didn't understand. And so, for me, if he was doing some sort of ceremony in the barn with Fanny that upset Emma, that's not okay. Do you know what I mean? Like, I'm not good with that.

DS: Yeah, well...

MS: And so, still, there's so little that we know.

DS: Well, let me be clear, because apparently you're misunderstanding. The only source material that we have for recounting the incident with Fanny Alger is the very late McClellan letter...

MS: Yeah.

DS: ...which, again, it's decades later, and it's filled with exclamation points, and it's intended to be scandalous. But at the time, I think McClellan felt comfortable in writing it in that fashion because word had leaked out decades earlier about what was going on in Utah.

You also have the Far West High Council disciplinary court involving Oliver Cowdery, in which, purportedly, Oliver Cowdery said something about Joseph and Fanny Alger; however, the court disciplined Oliver, and he testified that there was never anything untoward that Joseph Smith had done, and that he was unaware of anything that Joseph had done that would violate any of the commandments.

And then we have Emma's statements that are contrary to the idea that there was something untoward that took place.

But the final piece is: The son of the man who claimed that he performed the ceremony in the barn... We don't have an account of his father; we have his [the son's] account, and his account is also late! And therefore, I question whether the son's hearsay comments about what the father did are reliable.

So the whole Fanny Alger thing... IF something happened—and I don't think there's enough to clarify if or what—I am fully satisfied that if the answer to if is, “Yes,” that the answer to the what question is, “The sealing, if it was something that took place, had nothing to do with marriage or intercourse.”

As I was saying before you interjected that last part, she was at the height of her fertility at the time...

MS: Yeah.

DS: ...that this encounter purportedly took place. Joseph Smith fathered, I think, eight pregnancies through Emma (some of whom, you know, died and others miscarried). But he was...

MS: Well, I want... Just to clarify that as well.

DS: Yeah.

MS: 'Cuz now... I want to interject again. Well, you finish your sentence, then I'll interject. I apologize.

DS: She was at the peak of her fertility, he was at the peak of his fertility, they were young, they were youthful, and yet, if something happened, it produced nothing! I don't think that you can say that Joseph had 37 (or however many they now aggregate to) women other than Emma, and there was no progeny produced, when most of those women DID bear children and yet Joseph, who—according to 132, its purpose is to “raise up seed unto the Lord,” which is a euphemism for, you know, getting them pregnant and having your cattle produce offspring, which is what Brigham Young did. I mean, you look at the pregnancies, and Joseph was not engaged in whatever it was that Brigham Young began teaching in the absence of Joseph Smith. And the number of plural wife pregnancies mushrooms as soon as Joseph is killed.

MS: Right.

DS: And before then, it's just... It's kept on the down-low. One of the things that I think you have to take into account (if you're examining this whole narrative about the credibility of section 132 and its authenticity) is the lack of any offspring other than through Emma and the presence of this 50+ offspring from Brigham Young that begins after Joseph's death; it... The narrative doesn't match the conduct on the ground! And when you've got—June 27, 1844 and before then—Joseph denouncing it, Joseph convening church disciplinary councils to discipline those who are caught in this process and asking those, “Where did you learn about this?” and then bringing in the people from whom they learned it and holding a church court for them. These aren't public; these are private matters, and Joseph is doing this in private. In public, he's giving lecture and discourse and sermon denouncing this stuff; he's running denunciations in the Times and Seasons; he has Emma (and he assisted) publishing a declaration from the Relief Society of Nauvoo and trying to get the sisters in Nauvoo to cut off these wayward men seducing them by saying, “Oh, Joseph teaches this nonsense in private.”

I went to dinner with D. Michael Quinn, and he had a great opening line for starting a conversation: After we settled in for dinner, he said, “I think your position on polygamy is bullshit.” And I said, “Okay, so let's just think about it for a moment: If you take June 27, 1844 as the cutoff date and you look at what information we have available to us from June 27, 1844 and before—if that's the library you look at, and you ignore everything after then—tell me what proof you have that Joseph was involved.”

And he reflected for a minute, and he said, “Well, yeah, the Far West High Council doesn't quite get there, does it?”

And I said, “No, it doesn't!”

And, you know, he mentioned two or three other things and then said, “Okay, I understand your position,” you know, it wasn't that...

MS: Okay...

DS: ...he agreed with me. It was like, Okay, if that's going to be where you focus, then you're not just full of bullshit; I mean...

MS: Yes.

DS: ...there's something there for that. But he and Brian Hales and others who are proponents of the narrative, immediately turn to, “Yes, BUT you have to believe that hundreds of people were lying in the years afterwards, and you can dismiss one or two or three, but you can't dismiss hundreds of people being liars!” And that's the problem with this whole subject area. Because a person who wants to support the narrative that polygamy is legit can list off a hundred sources in rapid fire and say, “There! I've now proven my case.” In order, then, to respond to that position, you literally have to go through every single one of the examples...

MS: Right...

DS: ...one by one by one to show:

- It couldn't be true,
- They weren't in a position to know anything,
- They contradicted themselves elsewhere,
- They borrowed words from an affidavit that was put in front of them by Joseph F. Smith (who pre-wrote the affidavit),
- They were locked into a system in which polygamy was the law, and it was being enforced, and
- These are vulnerable women who are signing the affidavits, and by not conforming to the narrative, they could be put out on the street. And so there's pressure put upon them.

There are so many problems...

MS: And not only put out on the street... Not only put out on the street in this life, lose their entire exaltation!

DS: Yeah.

MS: These are the men telling them they have control over their eternal destiny.

DS: Yeah.

MS: And so, lying for the Lord became part of your way to qualify; it was very much a... Obedience... I mean, the preaching of obedience at this time is hard for us to imagine, and the connection between “Follow counsel or go to Hell”...

DS: Yeah.

MS: ...was profound. Your life will be made healthier, or your eternal life will be hell...

DS: Yeah. And...

MS: ...literally. The fear is something we can't relate to.

DS: One of the things that I tried to explain or bring to people's attention in Passing the Heavenly Gift was what was really going on during the Mormon Reformation. I mean, things are going very, very bad in Utah, and Brigham Young blamed the saints, not himself; he blamed the saints for that failure. The Home Missionary Program asked a series of questions that were designed to determine whether you had sinned in a way that justified the shedding of your blood, because blood atonement was being preached. And so the intimidation that was going on during that time period was... I mean, it was life-threatening! If you wanted to be a righteous saint, you had to conform to the system, and the system included plural marriage. So the gathering of hundreds of affidavits in an atmosphere that is oppressive and threatening is not something to say, “Oh, we've proven our case with”—because every one of those has flaws in their credibility, in their reliability, or even whether they were present at the time they claim they were present. I mean, Orson Pratt is rather famous for talking about things that he witnessed when he was in a complete different location, and it was impossible for him to be able to testify to something. I mean, it... Yes...

MS: Right...

DS: ...the conclusion I reached is, yes! Hundreds of people can be lying!

MS: Well, and I want to also say it doesn't require even hundreds of people to be lying. Because even, like, there are just a few of the women who claim to be... There are a few of the women who have to be lying and a few others. And I guess my question is, How many do we have to show our lying absolutely?? Like, we have turned out so many lies! Even the church has many of these people that claim to be wives of Hyrum and Joseph that the church doesn't accept!

DS: Yes!

MS: That means the church is acknowledging they were lying, right?

DS: Yeah.

MS: And I guess my question would be, Hey, do you think that the FLDS—before they became this, you know, before that fell apart—do you think they could get hundreds of affidavits saying that Warren Jeffs was not a pedophile and was not a rapist and was not abusing control? Do you think that...? Like, that's this kind of system we have to get our minds... Anyone who doesn't think that that absolutely would and could happen is up in the night. And when we recognize that that is what Mormonism was at that time, it should not surprise us at all that we have all of these affid... Everyone was lining up to do affid... I mean, they were being pressured so much. Everyone of these affidavits you see was in response to being asked for it, to being pressured to give it in some way or other.

DS: Yeah...

MS: We've gone through so many... And more and more all the time saying, "That's not true. That's not true. That's not true." There is no... Like even Helen Mar Kimball, who's one of the best known, all of her reasons that she gives, all... Like, none of it is recognizable to anything we would recognize as eternal doctrine. There's nothing about it in Joseph Smith's writings anywhere or the revelations. And so it's bizarre that we say, "No, these things are all true! And God told them that was the truth!" Well, where did that truth go then...

DS: Yeah.

MS: ...right?

DS: Yeah.

MS: If we needed these dynastic sealings, why don't we still need them? Like, why could it... I mean, there are so many, many problems. So, I guess that's what frustrates me is this idea of...

And it's not hundreds. It's not hundreds. We have affidavits of people that were [age] three at the time. They wouldn't know, right?

DS: Yeah. Yeah.

MS: We can prove all of these things. So if we can prove so many of them automatically false, and then we have a few that are hard to deal with... Like, we're calling the women liars. And my example for that is Elizabeth Smart. You can't look at a trauma-bonded woman and call her a liar.

DS: Yeah...

MS: You look at the situation that she is victimized by, and go, "Are we wise to listen to the words of her oppressor, even if they're coming through her mouth? Is that serving that woman well?"

DS: I think that this subject is also extremely problematic for the LDS Church and its narrative—because the official position of the LDS Church in the essays that they have written on this subject and published on lds.org makes...

MS: ...are written into their history Saints, now; it's been written into that narrative form, uh-huh.

DS: It makes Joseph Smith:

- a liar;
- under the law at the time, an adulterer;
- someone who disobeyed the marital law at the time that governed conduct, and therefore, a criminal;
- it makes him a pedophile because of the ages involved;
- and given the narrative that they've adopted about how he solicited them, it makes him a predator.

Therefore...

MS: Um-hmm, and also a hypocrite because he was disciplining other people...

DS: Yes!

MS: ...for doing what we claim/what they claim he was doing.

DS: Therefore, the people who are bitter, angry, anti-Mormon, former Mormons who are vociferously denouncing and fighting against the the Restoration itself are not irrational or ill-motivated.

MS: Right.

DS: They are simply accepting the way that the LDS Church claims that Joseph Smith lived. And they're saying, "This is abhorrent!" If you accept the church's view of Joseph Smith, I understand why you would throw the Restoration itself out, Joseph, the Book of Mormon, everything. I understand why you would do that. The reason why I hold on to Joseph Smith, to the Book of Mormon, to the Restoration, and to God's promises that He intends to have a shoot come out from the dead stump and still live and survive is because I believe Joseph Smith did NOT engage in hypocrisy, pedophilia, predatory, hypocritical, adulterous relations. I believe that Joseph Smith was honest in his public denunciations. And I believe that God would never deal with a man subject to so many flaws, weaknesses, so much treachery, so much betrayal.

My read in the Joseph Smith Papers is not that Joseph Smith merely loved Emma, but he admired, respected, and deferred to Emma!

MS: RELIED on her, yes! He NEEDED her. And...

DS: She was better educated than him; he respected that. She was older than him; he held her in esteem—she was an elect lady. I think if Emma contradicted Joseph in a discussion, that Joseph would not only listen to her, he would give heed to and probably surrender his opinion to hers if it was better informed—and very often that WAS the case. And I think you read the letters between Joseph and Emma in the Joseph Smith Papers... I don't get any sense that this is a two-faced, hypocritical, dishonest, treacherous husband betraying a woman that he had little enough regard for that he would consign her to destruction.

One other thought that I forgot to include earlier. I mean, section 132, was written by someone who was not very well acquainted with the Scriptures, wherein you justify by servants Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in having multiple wives. Isaac didn't have multiple wives! It...yeah.

MS: Right. The very first problem reveals what a farce it is. In fact, the very first verse reveals what a farce it is. And then it goes on from there to innumerable other... My podcast is called "132 Problems." Exactly! There is, like... And we can see... Well, I have Brigham Young and others were... Brigham Young was not familiar with the Scriptures. Joseph Smith very, very much was.

DS: Yeah.

MS: And there's consistency in his teachings. He believed them; he tried to carry them out.

DS: Yeah, yeah, there's... Yeah. And so I've come, ultimately, to the conclusion that section 132 is a—wherever it originated from—it's not a product of Joseph Smith's. There may be some internal teachings that reflect what Joseph was teaching about the eternal nature of the marriage covenant. There may be some morsels of truth that migrated into the 132 that originated from Joseph, but 132 did not. I don't think it is authentically something that we can rely upon. And I don't think the practice of polygamy is something that originates with Joseph.

Now, I'm willing to look for additional proof. But the meticulous search that I have made to this point, leads me to the conclusion that the more carefully you examine the credibility of the authority...

You know, Jeremy Hoop is trying to put together a website and a product that gets everything out there and allows people to make an examination for himself. I gave him a copy of a jury instruction that gets used in court about the credibility of witnesses: You can find one witness to be credible and find ten witnesses that oppose the one not to be credible, and it's not the number of witnesses that carries the day; it's the underlying believability and credibility. The church certainly has numerosity on their side. They have... The LDS Church has been effective propagandists. And when they take on a subject, they generate libraries of material to support their position. But that doesn't mean that the library is trustworthy. You can have a single voice crying in the wilderness, like John the Baptist, who, as Joseph put it, The kingdom of God was with John and not with the Jews at the time. But John was a lone voice crying in the wilderness. He certainly didn't have numerosity. But he did have the kingdom of God with him.

MS: I... Okay. And I think it is useful to look at the modern-day examples. I was trying to remember the woman's name—I won't remember it—but the one woman they finally got to testify against Warren Jeffs to hold him accountable, right?

DS: Oh, yeah.

MS: They have... Like, it was so hard. Oh, and I know there's a book, The Witness Wore Red, and it's her younger sister ~~that Joseph~~ that Warren married off/forced to be married as underage. And to get that ONE woman who was courageous enough and crazy enough to testify against her entire community, and the entire community lined up, called her liars, called her... Right? It isn't the number; it's the veracity of the testimony. I just want to emphasize that in this modern case, in our day. That as soon as that one woman was willing to go to trial, it was a slam dunk! It's so obvious what Warren did! And then, they went in and did the raid and found the tape recordings and found the, you know, then they found much more evidence, but...which I believe is what's happening, to a great extent, now as we're getting more access. And that's one thing I say often: The more gain access, the more we gain scientific valid verification through things like DNA testing, the more information we have available to us, the more innocent Joseph is; the stronger the case is in his favor. And that is a really good way to determine where truth is, right? So to just go by, "I believe these women!" Okay, well, then you need to believe all the polygamist women who still don't believe that Warren Jeffs was doing anything wrong. You need to do that to be consistent. And people don't do that!

DS: They don't. By the way, I went down to the Colorado City community area, and spoke directly to the polygamists a while ago on the subject of plural marriage. I don't know of any outreach that's being made by Latter-day Saints, but I don't think you just sit back and criticize people for believing something—because there is a library of material that justifies their conclusion. I went down there to address them, you know, face-to-face to discuss candidly with them and to try and disabuse them of things that they need to be confronted with and taught about...

MS: Yes.

DS: ...and some effort made to reclaim them. And, you know, I'm not interested in just sitting back and throwing rocks. If there's a way to help people to overcome something, I'm happy to go and attempt to do that—don't know what...

MS: I love that! I feel like that's one of the tragedies happening now is the LDS's...

DS: Yeah.

MS: The church's insistence on keeping 132 and keeping this doctrine continues the abuse; we are complicit in the ongoing polygamist suffering that's happening.

DS: Yeah.

MS: And even the anti-Mormons and ex-Mormons insistence on saying it was Joseph also continues this abuse. If people could look at this evidence honestly, we could actually help men, women, and children suffering under this deplorable satanic system, this abomination today. We can really make an... Us coming to truth and sharing that can help people today! It's not just a historical question.

DS: You know, earlier I mentioned Doctrine and Covenants 93, verse 1. I believe Joseph to have been an honest man and an authentic messenger called by God. I do not think you can be a morally corrupt man and have that kind of assignment given to you by God. And I think that first verse of D&C 93 defines the character of Joseph Smith: ...who...cometh unto me, and calleth on my name, and obeyeth my voice, and keepeth my commandments, shall see my face and know that I am is not just a recitation of, you know, a laundry list of interesting facts. I think it is a description of the kind of character that is required in order for someone, as Joseph did, to come into the presence of God. And to impute to him hypocrisy and predatory behavior and dishonesty is to completely confuse the kind of character that God will deal with in asking for a message to be delivered.

MS: Absolutely.

DS: I think Joseph was naive in that he trusted a lot of people that he should not have trusted. I think he was imputing to others the kind of character and heart that he had within himself. And so he assumed...

MS: We all project. He projected his goodness onto other people. I've done the same thing and gotten myself in trouble. We assume people are the same as us. Right? And so...

DS: And Joseph did that. And he trusted a lot of untrustworthy people. And THAT, I think, is his biggest mistake, but I don't believe that to be a sin!

MS: Absolutely.

DS: To trust someone when they're untrustworthy doesn't reflect poorly on your character; it reflects generosity and big-heartedness on your part, requiring that they prove themselves to be untrustworthy before you assign to them untrustworthiness. And Joseph made that mistake.

MS: But if we're going to be hard on Joseph, then we need to also be hard on Jesus...

DS: Yeah.

MS: ...who called Judas. Right? It's... We can see the Lord's hand in it, or we can blame the individual, which is ridiculous. Yeah.

DS: Yeah, it's true.

Well, this is a workday. And I have work to do! So, is there anything else that you wanted...?

MS: Can I ask a couple more questions?

DS: Yeah, yeah. Let's hit your list of whatever you want that's important, and let's wrap it up. Okay.

MS: Okay, this is great. Well, I do want to know, and this is a question for you. So, as we talked about, you did want to stay in the church, and you did want to assist people in staying in the church dealing with this messiness. So my question is for people who are in the church who are coming onto this path, ummm... I guess it's a two part question. First of all, do you see anything that you... Do you ever deal with regret or self-reproach? I struggle with those things a lot. Do you ever feel like, "Maybe if I had done this a little differently...?" Or do you feel like it was inevitable? And what would you tell people who are dealing with that fear today of "How can I embark on this path without threatening my life as I know it? Or do I need to get rid of that fear and maybe threaten my life as I know it?"

DS: Umm, I think everyone has to sort that out for themselves. However, I do think that preserving marital harmony is important. I... From time to time... Look, the LDS Church has a great Primary program. I have some granddaughters who are benefited by going to the church on Sabbath days to get through the Primary program. It's an occasion for them to actually put a dress on, to sit and be reverent, to engage in the kind of personal self-discipline that you only get if you go to church before you go to school. And when my granddaughters go to church, they go to the ward I once belonged to because that was where my daughter... (And actually, my daughter and son-in-law lived in our basement; that's where they went to church after they were first married.) And I go with them. And we go to a local LDS ward, and when the Sacrament meeting ends, I escort my younger of the two granddaughters; she knows exactly where the nursery is, and she runs down the hallway because she's eager to get there—now that they're through with the sacrament thing—to get into the nursery. And she and I go down the hallway, and I get her safely into the nursery. And my daughter—because, you know, her children are in Primary and in the nursery, and she's got to stay around—my daughter will stay and attend Relief Society, and my wife will stay and attend Relief Society with her. And I'll just go home. And I'm welcomed; in fact, I keep getting invited to stay for Priesthood, but...

When they excommunicated me, they did not tell me that I couldn't participate (normally, they give you instructions that say you can't speak up). And so for some period of time, we attended church after the excommunication, and I did speak up in—back then it was Gospel Doctrine still—and in Priesthood. And there was one fellow in particular that that made uncomfortable. Ultimately, I concluded that it's better off if I don't make him uncomfortable. So I go to Relief or I go to Sacrament, but I wouldn't attend the other meetings. I don't think that I benefit anyone by going in and answering questions 'cuz my questions at this point would be honest.

I don't see a thing wrong with someone continuing to enjoy LDS membership. I think you can believe in the gospel of Christ, the Restoration, Joseph Smith, and attend a Methodist Church. I mean, his mind had become somewhat partial to the Methodists for pretty good reason (if you read about Methodism and some of their earliest advocates). I think you can belong to whatever church you want to belong to because churches, generally, are fellowshiping forums. How you relate to God and being baptized—because used to be Latter-day Saints were rebaptized with some regularity, and I believe, today, being rebaptized if you're going to accept the Book of Mormon as a covenant (because the LDS Church has not done that) and if you're going to repent and try to accept Joseph as an authentic prophet-leader and the version of Joseph that throws out 132—I think you can be rebaptized, but after that, I think you can go sit in an LDS Church, and if you find fellowship and comfort there, I think that's fine!

I know there are a lot of people who are independently fellowshiping now. They don't contribute tithes to an organization. They gather tithes in little fellowships, and then once the tithes are gathered, they look at the needs of the people in that little fellowship so that money doesn't aggregate and go to some institutional purpose. Tithing goes to help with the transportation, the food, the rent, the housing, the medical bills of the local people and isn't spent elsewhere. People do that, and I think THAT is fine.

But how you deal with your reconciliation with what you're hearing in the LDS Church is an individual matter—and I wouldn't encourage anyone to go storming off and becoming an enemy to Mormonism. Even now, I don't pick a fight with the LDS Church. I don't go around denouncing them or challenging them. I try to state clearly and plainly my understanding, and if it contradicts a narrative that the LDS Church is advancing, I try to explain why I view it differently than does the institution—but that's not picking a fight! That's an attempt to give clarity to why I understand what I understand.

But I'm not interested and I do not hope for the ultimate failure of the LDS Church. I think Utah and the Mormon corridor from Canada to Mexico is enormously benefited by what the LDS Church offers. I think that the communities all throughout the Mormon corridor have better citizens, they have better people, they have better neighbors who are Latter-day Saints. And so I don't want the LDS Church to lose its members. I want them to try and hold onto them and continue to make good citizens of them. But that doesn't mean that I think that they bear the imprimatur of truth and that everything they say is “God speaking on high.” I think that's kind of a silly notion.

But I do think that Joseph was authentic, the Book of Mormon is reliable, God was up to something then, and I believe that God intends to conclude that, vindicating everything that had been foretold to happen. It's just that I don't think it's gonna happen, at this point, institutionally. I do think it's gonna involve the individuals who rise up and who become pure in heart before God, so that they can become pure, neighborly with one another, so that there can be a city of peace. I don't think you can impose that hierarchically. I think the only hierarchy is you getting right with God, which will in turn make you right with your fellow man.

But I don't think anyone should run away from the church. And I do think that the church has—in particular, for youth—a marvelous program. I think foreign missions and learning another language... It helps people prepare for life. It gives them a leg up on other...every other religious community! The programs of the LDS Church make people better off.

The most articulate people in my high school were the Mormon kids; you could almost pick them out...

MS: Wow...

DS: ...because they were composed; they were used to public speaking; they had gone through the Primary program, the Young Men and the Young Women's program; they had spoken in a Sacrament meeting. And so when they get up to present a paper in class, they were FAR more polished than the contemporaries. People that go on a foreign mission and come back with a second language that they've learned, they're all benefited.

One of the guys I baptized fell away from the church, asked for his membership to be withdrawn, has become an anti-Mormon. Talking to him, he said the best thing that ever happened to him was when he joined the LDS Church; it set his life on a new direction that benefited him from that moment, and he doesn't regret one moment of having been a member of the church. I worry that a lot of people display horrible ingratitude for everything the church has done (to personally help develop them into a much better, more polished individual) when they discovered that there are problems with the church. Be grateful for what you got—even if you part ways, and you say, “Ah, it's just nonsense!” Still, you were benefited. Every one of them were benefited, and they ought to acknowledge it.

And I'm grateful for what the LDS Church gave me. And I'm still—although kicked out; I didn't leave, I got kicked out—still believing in Joseph, the Book of Mormon, and in the Restoration.

MS: Okay, I love that. It sounds like we're kind of on the same page. My desire is that people—as many as possible who feel it's their path—can be in the church but not of the church (is the way I describe it). I think that even aside from the kind of utilitarian benefits of the church...

DS: Yeah.

MS: ...there also is the training to listen to the Spirit, the training to pray, to believe in God, to... Like, all of the seeds of the path that we believe in and that we walk are taught and nurtured in this church, and there is a way to—for many people, I hope—a way to try to be elevated while in the church and, as a process, be part of elevating the church. That's my hope, but...

DS: Yeah.

MS: Denver, I really appreciate you taking the time to talk to me. I didn't give you much time to kind of share some of your experiences or share a testimony. Is there something—some encouragement or guidance or testimony—you want to share, just as we're wrapping up?

DS: I think Joseph Smith understated who he was and what exposure he had gotten to things beyond the veil. And I think that when you underestimate Joseph Smith, you make a grave mistake. You would be better off paying careful heed to everything that we got from him, and realizing that he could—and would—have offered a great deal more if the people had been prepared to receive it. And the problem that existed in 1820-1844 (while we had him here) is not a problem that reflects on Joseph Smith as having failed. It's a reflection on the people who lived contemporaneous with him, who underestimated and who went off with exaggerated self-importance simply because they got close to the man. It's about penetrating our own veil of darkness—because our flesh IS the veil, and the weaknesses of the flesh are what alienate us from God.

There's a great deal of truth out there to be found anywhere and everywhere. And some of the most profound teachings (that echo and mirror what Christ was teaching and what Joseph was trying to get across to us) can be found in all of the world's great religions. They all have some truth, or they wouldn't have any adherents. You can find truth in Judaism. They translated in the—I think it's the CPART project down at BYU—some of the Islamic texts, and there's a teacher, al-Tha'labi, whose teachings resonate with light and truth that were preserved in Islam at a time when Christianity was so oppressive from the Catholic dominance that everyone was darkened in their mind. And God was still preserving truths there. Taoism and Buddhism and Hinduism...

I have a fellow who went to India to learn from the Maharaja in India in the 60s who, upon the death of the Maharaja, came back here and rediscovered in the Doctrine and Covenants truths that he had learned in Hinduism—and was excited about the possibility that Mormonism was really every bit as transcendental as what he had been studying over there; began to teach Transcendental Meditation here in Utah, and he read The Second Comforter and looked me up, and said, “How did you find this? How did you find this without a trip to India? How did you find this without going first through Hinduism?” He said, “I didn't... I couldn't see it. I couldn't realize it was there until I had taken this other path.”

Joseph Smith restored to us [a] phenomenal wealth of information; he could have given us more—we just weren't ready at the time to accept it. So if God starts up things again, we really have to be careful about the heed and the diligence, because we have—in the past—wasted opportunities, and without individually reconciling ourselves to God's work, we can forfeit opportunities again, which is generally what mankind does. I mean, we only had Zion in Enoch's time, and then Melchizedek (who was Shem—that used to be a teaching; people doubt it now, but nevertheless) reckoned from before the flood, and he had the covenant. He had the promise that he could be translated, and he lived through the flood, and he was here until Abraham—after generations of apostasy—got fully endowed in the Holy Order, and then Melchizedek acted on the covenant, which was really derivative from before the flood and belonged to Enoch. Melchizedek realized it too, and there was a second city that got taken up (that's a big story and beyond the scope of this). But twice now (Enoch and then—derivative from Enoch—Melchizedek) two cities have gone up. The next time—the prophecies tell us—the city isn't going up, but there is a city returning, and there needs to be people here to welcome them so that we can fall on one another, and we can kiss each other's necks (which is the way that it's put in the Scriptures: we will fall upon one another and kiss each other's necks in the welcoming return of Jesus and his ten thousands—Enoch with his ten thousands with Jesus—as He returns in glory). All of those prophecies are going to be vindicated; it's gonna happen! But the question isn't “Will it happen?” The question is, I mean, are we gonna have ten thousands falling on two dozen, or are we gonna have ten thousands falling on ten thousands? And it's just... Numerosity has never been a big deal. Jesus managed to get 500. Joseph got about 18. (That is another discussion.) And the question is, what, if anything, can we do? And...

MS: Yes.

DS: ...expectations need to be modest.

MS: So what can people do to try to be among that the residue, the small portion? What would you tell people?

DS: Take very seriously the Book of Mormon. It is the keystone of our religion, and a man can get closer to God by heeding its precepts more so than any other volume. And that's still true today. Just take the Book of Mormon seriously. And if you have a real problem understanding or parsing the Book of Mormon in a way that elevates your view, that was the purpose of The Second Comforter, Nephi's Isaiah, and Eighteen Verses. Every one of those... Well, and Beloved Enos. Every one of those books is simply parsing the Book of Mormon, trying to get people to look at it. The Book of Mormon is a shallow book [when] read by a shallow person. The Book of Mormon is a profoundly deep, deeply meaningful book if you bring enough with you to the party. Those books are intended to help someone bring more with them to the party—because the Book of Mormon is very serious stuff. And it doesn't have much good to say about us. It doesn't have much good to say about our churches. It doesn't have much good to say about our superficial religion these days. So...

MS: But it does offer us a tremendous amount of hope for those who will allow the scales of darkness to begin to fall from their eyes. 'Cuz we can't just read it as we've always read it, through the lenses that are provided to us, through only the Scripture Mastery verses or the lessons. We have...

DS: Yeah.

MS: We have to read it as a vehicle to come to know God and with God's mentorship as we... Like, we should always approach it asking God to help transform us through its pages.

DS: That Scripture Mastery comment reminds me—it made me laugh at the time—there was a talk in general conference; it was quoting from the Book of Mormon something about Christ, and the quote in the Book of Mormon was from Sherem, the first Antichrist. And I looked it up to make sure, because when I heard it, I thought, “Well, that's the wrong source.” And sure enough, there it was, in general conference: an Antichrist being quoted with favor! But that's probably...

MS: That's why we need to know on our own, so we can discern.

DS: Yes!

MS: That's why we can't take these people as our guides. We need to take the spirit and the book as our guide, because often ~~the same~~ general conference is filled with false doctrines and false attributions to Scripture and false interpretations. So... I shouldn't say it's "filled." It has plenty of it, though. So...

DS: Yeah.

MS: ...you've got to ask individually. Ask: you and God, right? Every individual person.

DS: That's where it belongs.

All right. Well, thank you.

MS: Thank you so much. I appreciate it. I hope to talk to you again sometime.

DS: Take care.

MS: All right.

DS: All right. Goodbye.

2023.07.29 A Fountain of Filthy Water

Sunstone Symposium
Sandy, Utah
Denver C. Snuffer, Jr.

DENVER: I am pleased to return to Sunstone and to see it again exists in the form we took for granted before Covid-19. I feel more welcomed here among you intellectuals, doubters, apostates, and seekers than I do now among the active Latter-day Saints. Like many of you, I see gaps, contradictions and falsehoods in the claims made by the LDS church. But I also see many gaps, contradictions and falsehoods in the critics of the LDS church. I'm a believer in Mormonism as Joseph Smith defined it: "One of the grand fundamental principles of Mormonism is to receive truth, let it come from whence it may." When it comes to Mormonism, renegade apostates are often that because they have discovered some new, unpleasant truth about the LDS church. These disappointed former saints are not evil and do not deserve being branded as 'apostate'—but are in reality practicing a more correct form of Mormonism by accepting more truth.

The theme discussed by this year's Symposium presenters is "(Main)Streaming Mormonism"—an effort by the LDS church to accomplish that objective is certainly underway. But if you define "Mormonism" as Joseph Smith did; that is: "One of the grand fundamental principles of Mormonism is to receive truth, let it come from whence it may." Well, then all of you who welcome the truth are Mormons. Even if that search has alienated you from the LDS church, or (in my case) alienated the LDS church from you. If you seek for truth then you are companions with Joseph Smith and "Mormons" as he defined it. [More on that later.]

As for the LDS church, the hope to mainstream their organization has resulted in two things happening simultaneously: First, the original form of Mormonism is being abandoned. Second, political, social, economic and moral trends of modernity are replacing it. Considering many of the titles chosen by presenters at this Symposium, it should be apparent to us all that the present-day LDS church is both threadbare and foolishly attempting to put patches of new cloth on an old garment. The 'traditional' believer's voices no longer dominate LDS meetings, conferences and lessons.

But this is getting ahead of the matter. I should start with another part of this story that requires me to clarify some matters about which many of you will hold very contrary views. I am not going to defend my position on foundational matters. I've already done that in some 38 volumes currently in print. This is an hour-long talk, so here is a list of things I believe, but won't be defending here:

-First, that Joseph Smith was in contact with God and used by Them to accomplish a Divine work.

-Second, that Joseph Smith was a devoted monogamist, faithful to his only wife, Emma. Emma had the stronger personality and better formal education of the two.

-Third, that Joseph Smith opposed plural wivory, did what he could to discover it and eradicate it from Nauvoo, and believed that these secret adulterous crimes would lead to the destruction of the church.

-Forth, that it is wise, noble and virtuous to follow Joseph Smith's example and counsel, and foolish to hold him in derision and attribute wickedness (including adulterous plural wivory) to him. Ultimately, those who believe and trust lies regarding him will have reason to mourn.

-Fifth, while Joseph Smith was at the head Mormonism was optimistic, utopian, revolutionary and innovative. It was intent on reshaping the world into a better, more egalitarian place.

-Finally, Joseph Smith was not understood by the majority of those living in Nauvoo during his lifetime. Once Brigham Young ascended to control over the LDS faithful, he implemented a different (although arguably still utopian) form of Mormonism than what Joseph Smith and God intended to accomplish with the restoration.

Joseph was constantly adding to the breadth, depth and width of a religion he understood to have been both ancient and lost. He claimed to be a restorer, not an inventor. When the text of Genesis says that man was formed "in the image of God, male and female..." it only hinted at the truth Joseph would add about mankind: "You have to learn how to be Gods yourselves, and be kings and priests to God, the same as all Gods have done before you, namely by going from one small degree to another, and from a small capacity to a great one: from grace to grace from exaltation to exaltation until you attain to the resurrection of the dead." Joseph taught we have not only God's "image" but also Their potential. Joseph held a much more elevated view of mankind than did Christianity of the 1800s.

I prefer the optimistic, self-confident, revolutionary Mormonism of Joseph Smith over the devolving form it has since assumed. The deformities have multiplied and it now is lurching forward toward an unrecognizably abominable form.

LDS Mormonism has not seen such radical changes as Russell Nelson's since Brigham Young's reign. At one point Brigham Young's agenda brought Utah's Mormonism into a violent, downward spiral that the US Army was sent to dethrone him as governor. President Young hoped to employ Native Americans as the "battle axe of the Lord," but that came to nothing. A few years later the Blackhawk War from 1865 to 1872 proved that 'battle axe' was the Lord's, and He wielded it against the Mormons rather than the gentiles. Brigham Young did not take the hint when removed as Governor, and he ignored the slap when the Natives made war against the Mormons. Likewise, Nelson is ignoring the tremendous outflow of disaffected LDS now underway. Instead of radically adopting bad ideas, the LDS church should just be truthful.

Truth need not destroy faith in God, in Joseph Smith, or in Mormonism. Once the varnish is removed, keep digging and remove the veneer also. What you will find is that the LDS church has warped even Joseph Smith as part of their false narrative. There is sturdy lumber lying beneath the marketing veneer of corporate LDS-ism.

There is a vast library supporting institutional LDS historical claims. The LDS church has always been prolific-propagandists, whose effort to claim historical support for themselves has been enthusiastic and overeager. It was, after all, the saints who threatened to “exterminate” the Missourians first, but church apologists have preserved that memory only in the form of a cruel order by Missouri Governor Lilburn Boggs. He was only a reactionary.

There were LDS apostles who strayed into bigamy and ‘spiritual wifeism’ in England years before it became something they attributed to Joseph Smith. The LDS reliance on William Clayton’s Journal is misplaced.

The Church History Library withholds many original resource materials, including contemporary journals, diaries and letters from the public. Interesting materials are becoming increasingly available that provide a valuable peek inside censored, authentic LDS history.

Woodruff’s Official Declaration 1 was a lie, and the “Manifesto” was only to mislead the ‘gentiles’ long enough to get statehood for Utah. The document remains part of the LDS scripture canon as if it were an authentic renunciation of plural marriage.

There is another library, not quite so prolific, written by LDS naysayers. They, too, have been enthusiastic if not overeager. After reading both libraries, I’ve reached the conclusion that both overstate their cases and wind up distorting who and what Joseph Smith was. As a result, I do not fit into the LDS church and they properly excommunicated me. As they define “apostasy” I did that. I apostasied [apostatized]. They have every right to define the terms for continuing membership in their religious club, and I violated their terms. However, I do not hold a virulent view of Joseph Smith, the Book of Mormon, or whether God was up to something beginning in the early 1820s. I believe that something resulted in an inspired renewal of God’s commitment to help mankind. For that reason many of you also have strong disagreement with me.

I doubt anything I have to say will be welcome on either side of the ‘pro vs. con’ LDS divide. But at least my voice is heard and even welcomed here. Sunstone is still a valuable meeting ground for Mormons of every stripe.

As LDS Mormonism undergoes another metamorphosis, one question I think should be asked is, ‘what is the role of religion’ any religion, in any society, at any time in history— what role does it serve? To me the answer is to preserve proven or traditional values, to stabilize society against rapid and often disruptive change. Religion impedes new ideas from diverting society into a potentially unwise detour from traditions that have provided stability. Correspondingly, the greatest criticism of religion is that it interferes with adopting fashionable, new ideas. It is inevitable that when “old flattop” comes “grooving up slowly” with “hair down to his knees” he challenges the status quo, and provokes a chorus of churchgoing criticism.

“Changes” require you to “turn and face the strange,” often leading to an uncertain, unpredictable outcome. The voices urging change offend the religions, all religions, because they oppose social stasis. A good lyricist has put the matter both clearly and persuasively:

*Come mothers and fathers throughout the land
And don't criticize what you can't understand
Your sons and your daughters are beyond your command
Your old road is rapidly aging
Please get out of the new one if you can't lend your hand
For the times, they are a-changin'*

Because LDS Mormonism is teetering on this brink, the Sunstone Symposium this year is timely. It comes when most of you are cheering on this current metamorphosis of LDS Mormonism. LDS leaders have made more changes since Russell M. Nelson ascended to the top at any other time, excepting only Brigham Young. Nelson embraces change, even advising his followers to “eat their vitamins” so they can keep up with his aggressive agenda. His wife, Wendy Nelson, said his elevation would now “unleash” the changes he always aspired to adopt.

All the recent LDS policy changes tell us where the leadership’s heart lies: The church longs to be far more “woke” and popular, urging its adherents to prize a “living prophet” and neglect the dead ones. Dead ones said things unsuitable (or at least very uncomfortable) in the Brave New World where LDS Mormonism awakens. And so we have Elder Haynie of the first quorum of the seventy, telling the LDS faithful in General Conference, “unlike vintage comic books and classic cars, prophetic teachings do not become more valuable with age.” Elder Haynie added, “we should not seek to use the words of past prophets to dismiss the teachings of the living prophets.” That turns things onto its head but will be necessary because LDS “living prophets” contradict and ignore past prophets and even scripture.

Even the vocabulary of “living prophets” was an innovation during the presidency of David O. McKay. Before then, the LDS leader was called “President” and not “Prophet.” Opinion polling showed that LDS members responded more readily when the word “Prophet” was used, and therefore it got adopted in February 1955 by the LDS Deseret News and has continued in use ever since. Query whether now an ‘LDS Prophet’ could implement female ordination by fiat—or if past teachings would prohibit such a change? It probably comes down to when Baby Boomer tithe payers will poll in favor of making the change.

The Community of Christ has ordained women since 1984, and today five of their twelve apostles are women. The LDS organization appears, from the symptoms of recent behavior, to look with envy on that achievement. The overtures are there: Russell Ballard’s May 1, 2015 talk at BYU (The Essential Role of Women) mentioning how women have been allowed to weigh in on church councils, from wards to the highest levels of church administration. Then rewriting the temple endowment to put Eve into direct rather, than indirect, contact with Elohim. The LDS patriarchy glacier clearly wants to melt and run rapidly downhill, freed from the icy prison of its past. Homosexuality is no longer grounds for excommunication. Some homosexuals serve in local leadership positions.

In a gesture that was likely intended to keep more traditional Baby Boomer believers to 'hold fast', Dallin H. Oaks spoke to the LDS youth in May 2023. His talk was reported by Peggy Fletcher Stack on May 21, 2023. She reported his talk included this advice:

"Marriage is central to the purpose of mortal life and what follows," said Oaks. "We are children of a loving Heavenly Father who created us with the capacity to follow his commandment to multiply and replenish the earth."

The power of creation is "one of the most precious gifts we have in mortal life," he said, but "central to that gift is the law of chastity, the commandment that our powers of procreation be expressed only within marriage between a man and a woman."

Delaying childbearing, he said, "means fewer children born to grow up with the blessings of the gospel."

There's more than a little common sense to that advice. Catholicism has lasted for two millennia in part because, although its clergy is celibate, its members are traditionally quite fecund. Catholic teachings oppose abortion and birth control, and emphasize having large families. The result is that over the generations, Catholic membership numbers exceed 1 billion.

The one thing that almost all varieties of homosexuality fail to produce is children. Homosexuality does not result in pregnancy and/or children. Transsexuals do not reproduce. It will take only one generation of such sexual non-productivity to "leave them neither root nor branch." Those Biblical words are genealogical terms, and in context mean without descendants or posterity. It is not a matter of 'go woke, go broke' but instead a matter of 'empty wombs leaves only tombs.' Any church, including the LDS, which wants to survive the next century, will need a birth-rate well above the mortality rate.

The theme that worldly popularity is antithetical to godliness appears early in the Book of Mormon. Lehi saw but failed to notice, and Nephi both noticed and described the meaning of filthy water:

And the angel spake unto me, saying, Behold the fountain of filthy water which thy father saw, yea, even the river of which he spake; and the depths thereof are the depths of hell. And the mists of darkness are the temptations of the Devil which blindeth the eyes and hardeneth the hearts of the children of men and leadeth them away into broad roads, that they perish and are lost. And the large and spacious building which thy father saw is vain imaginations and the pride of the children of men. And a great and a terrible gulf divideth them, yea, even the sword of the justice of the Eternal God and Messiah who is the Lamb of God. (1 Ne. 3:17.)

Broad roads and large, spacious buildings are symbols of worldly success, acceptance, popularity and vanity. Pretty much what we get in the values advocated by mass media, entertainment, current fashion and now well represented in opinion polling among those aged 18-35.

In contrast, as Joseph Smith taught, there is a narrow pathway that runs contrariwise and is to be preferred:

[I]f one man cannot understand these things but by the spirit of God, ten thousand men cannot. It is alike out of the reach of the wisdom of the learned, the tongue of the eloquent, the power of the mighty. And we shall at last have to come to this conclusion, whatever we may think of revelation, that without it we can neither know nor understand anything of God, or the Devil; and however unwilling the world may be to acknowledge this principle, it is evident from the multifarious creeds and notions concerning this matter that they understand nothing of this principle, and it is equally as plain that without a divine communication they must remain in ignorance. The world always mistook false prophets for true ones, and those that were sent of God they considered to be false prophets, and hence they killed, stoned, punished, and imprisoned the true prophets, and they had to hide themselves in deserts, and dens, and caves of the earth, and though the most honorable men of the earth, they banished them from their society as vagabonds, while they cherished, honored, and supported knaves, vagabonds, hypocrites, impostors, and the basest of men. (T&C 147:6, italics in original.)

Joseph Smith was killed by the conspiracy of adulterous insiders, jealous politicians, and mobs motivated by lies. They did not understand him or know what he stood for. The LDS church today has essentially adopted those same slanderous lies as their version of his biography. And many of you think him to have been a pedophile and a liar. I disagree. In 1829 God predicted there would be these opposing views:

The ends of the earth shall inquire after your name, and fools shall have you in derision, and hell shall rage against you, while the pure in heart, and the wise, and the noble, and the virtuous shall seek counsel, and authority, and blessings constantly from under your hand. And your people shall never be turned against you by the testimony of traitors, and although their influence shall cast you into trouble, and into bars and walls, you shall be had in honor. (D&C 122:1-3; T&C 139:7.)

I hold Joseph in high regard, believing he was a much greater spiritual presence than what he claimed publicly—meaning he understated his visionary calling and mission. He was a friend of heaven, and that alone vouches for his character. I think I understand what heaven requires of a prophet. The caricature believed to be Joseph Smith by the LDS church and many of those attending this Symposium is not a fair representation of what is required to have the heavens opened. God does not entrust salvation of the souls of men to the self-indulgent and sexually promiscuous.

Mormonism today seems to agree with one of the anti-Christ characters of the Book of Mormon. It was Nehor whose message was:

“...preaching to them that which he termed to be the word of God, bearing down against the church, declaring unto the people that every priest and teacher ought to become popular and they ought not to labor with their own hands, but that they ought to be supported by the people. And he also testified unto the people that all mankind should be saved at the last day, and that they need not fear nor tremble, but that they might lift up their heads and rejoice, for the Lord had created all men and had also redeemed all men; and in the end, all men should have eternal life.” (Alma 1:1.)

The religion of Nehor is not only practiced by the LDS church, but also by many of that church’s opponents. The many podcasts, websites and ministries that are anti-LDS hope to be popular and supported financially by their audience. In a sense they are part of broadening mainstream Mormonism by the practice of anti-Mormonism. They contribute by advocating either the futility of salvation in the afterlife, or that salvation is generally available without any need to accept or acknowledge Joseph Smith’s contribution to God’s work of saving us. “Mormonism” has therefore become an inadvertent broad tent, being practiced even by everyone attending this Symposium.

Sincere Nehorists are preaching, teaching and crying “Lo here! And Lo there!” inside these turbulent LDS competitors’ competition for consideration.

Any attempt to be part of a mainstream of thought is denounced in the Book of Mormon. If there is a “truth” to be valued, then whether it is popular or not the Book of Mormon prefers we follow that truth without regard to the opinion of others:

For the time speedily shall come that all churches which are built up to get gain, and all those who are built up to get power over the flesh, and those who are built up to become popular in the eyes of the world, and those who seek the lusts of the flesh and the things of the world and to do all manner of iniquity — yea, in fine, all those who belong to the kingdom of the Devil — are they who need fear, and tremble, and quake. They are those who must be brought low in the dust, they are those who must be consumed as stubble; and this is according to the words of the prophet. (1 Ne. 7:5.)

Following truth in a lifelong quest to discover more light and truth rewards the seeker. Popularity invariably pulls away from enlightenment and toward decadence. “The truth is not always beautiful, nor beautiful words the truth.”

Then there is this:

Behold, the gold, and the silver, and the silks, and the scarlets, and the fine twined linen, and the precious clothing, and the harlots are the desires of this great and abominable church. And also for the praise of the world do they destroy the saints of God and bring them down into captivity. (1 Ne. 3:19.)

There is a lot of money in religion. The charitable impulse produces a great deal. Gold, silver, silk and harlots are often where tithes and offerings wind up among successful religious organizations. That is why today we have been taught by the Lord to not gather tithes, but to distribute them locally and immediately within fellowships to those with needs. Those needs include food, clothing, housing, transportation, education and medical needs. This precludes the need for any Ensign Peak Advisors.

What about those “harlots” that creep in at the end of that list? How far does that word extend? Are drag-queens contemplated as part of the harlotry? Transvestites? Is the effort to popularize sexual dysphoria through such institutionalized events as “Pride Month” included as “harlotry?” Can we accept and welcome such conduct while adding “sin no more” tolerance, or something else? If there were to be homosexuals in the final, actual City called by the Lord ‘Zion,’ would they ignite in flames when the Lord appears in His glory? What thoughts expand as we contemplate the “harlots” that are the desires of this great and abominable church? Can we ever discuss the matter without fear and loathing? Or are we doomed to damning one another because we are too immature and foolish to talk honestly and candidly with one another?

Frequently sexual dysphoria has an underlying traumatic cause. Many personality disorders are likewise the result of unresolved trauma. Certainly the Bible and Book of Mormon have many triggering words. Religion can also be the source of well-intentioned abuse. And good intentions alone cannot repair the scars inflicted.

The anti-Mormons are often as abusive in their approach as the LDS church they oppose. Benjamin Franklin said: “Half a truth is often a great lie.” When the search extends only far enough to discover a justified criticism, the search ought not end. Whatever your conclusion is about Mormonism, you are probably wrong. Even the claim you are thinking for yourself is vain, as Kathryn Schulz explained in her landmark book, Being Wrong: Adventures in the Margin of Error.

Thinking for oneself is, beyond a doubt, a laudable goal. But there are three problems with the idea that it is a good way to ward off error. The first is that the glorification of independent thought can easily become a refuge for holders of utterly oddball beliefs. You can dismiss any quantity of informed and intelligent adversaries if you chose to regard them as victims of a collective, crowd-driven madness, while casting yourself as the lone voice of truth. The second problem is (as we have seen), our own direct observations and experiences are not necessarily more trustworthy than secondhand knowledge. ...

The last and most significant problem with the idea that we should always think for ourselves is that, bluntly put, we can't. Every one of us is profoundly dependent on other people's minds—so profoundly that if we took seriously the charge to think for ourselves, we would have to relinquish our faith in the vast majority of the things we think we know. In his Confessions, Augustine wrote that,

I began to realize that I believed countless things which I had never seen or which had taken place when I was not there to see—so many events in the history of the world, so many facts about places and towns which I had never seen, and so much that I believed on the word of friends or doctors or various other people. Unless we took these things on trust, we should accomplish absolutely nothing in this life.

This explanation of the problem of proof, knowledge, and thinking for yourself reminds me of the Second Lecture on Faith. But that is beyond the scope of this talk.

Today the Lord has provided a way to practice Mormonism without the risk of being subjugated to an insecure, insular hierarchy. Hierarchies eventually succumb to the temptation to make the institution itself “God.” Today we are asked to fellowship independently, joining together in our homes without brick and mortar facilities. It is one small precaution against priestcrafts, which always replace priesthood in hierarchical religions. They are described in the Book of Mormon:

He commandeth that there shall be no priestcrafts; for behold, priestcrafts are that men preach and set themselves up for a light unto the world, that they may get gain and praise of the world, but they seek not the welfare of Zion. Behold, the Lord hath forbidden this thing; (2 Ne. 11:17.)

It may be forbidden by God, but priestcraft is the inexorable result of a stratified body of believers where power and influence are concentrated in an office. The LDS church was doomed to apostasy as soon as Joseph and Hyrum were killed because offices of “President” and “Patriarch” could be occupied by anyone. There was no need to wait for God to choose a suitable occupant. A vote by common consent was considered enough to put a person in the office. Over time the ill-defined concept of “keys” took center stage. Now, even common consent is irrelevant because the “keys” (whatever you conceive them to be) are held by the leader. Therefore the hierarchy feels comfortable teaching that there is no God today, for the Lord and the Redeemer hath done his work, and he hath given his power unto men. If you want salvation, hearken ye unto my precept. The bloated, distended, swollen, but altogether ill-defined idol of “keys” has replaced the unknowable God described in the Athanasian Creed.

Mormonism is no longer interested in gathering together believers to establish a city of peace. Instead it is gathering together funds for a ‘rainy day’ and for the payroll needs of far-flung interests of the institution.

And behold, instead of gathering you, except ye will repent, behold, he shall scatter you forth that ye shall become meat for dogs and wild beasts. Oh how could you have forgotten your God in the very day that he has delivered you? But behold, it is to get gain, to be praised of men, yea, and that ye might get gold and silver. And ye have set your hearts upon the riches and the vain things of this world, for the which ye do murder, and plunder, and steal, and bear false witness against your neighbor, and do all manner of iniquity; and for this cause, woe shall come unto you except ye shall repent. (Hel. 3:4.)

It becomes apparent that the Book of Mormon unequivocally denounces the LDS church and her daughters. Despite what those who attend Sunstone or post on the exMormon Reddit forum, to listen to Mormon Stories or Radio Free Mormon, watch Shawn McCraney think of themselves, they are all daughters of the LDS church every bit as much as the FLDS and Apostolic United Brethren. Mormonism controls their content. It makes little difference they are pro or con, they are still part of today's Mormonism. They are all comfortably situated in a 'broad mainstream' into which the LDS church's gradualism has been, and is, proceeding.

Joseph Smith hoped to welcome all into a friendly brotherhood of mixed faiths peacefully co-existing. "Have the Presbyterians any truth? Yes. Have the Baptists, Methodists, &c., any truth? Yes. They all have a little truth mixed with error. We should gather all the good and true principles in the world and treasure them up, or we shall not come out true 'Mormons.'" It was truth, not sectarianism that mattered to him: "One of the grand fundamental principles of Mormonism is to receive truth, let it come from whence it may." In that same spirit, would Joseph Smith been willing to likewise acknowledge, "Has John Dehlin any truth?" and answer, "Yes." And would Joseph ask, "have RFM, exMormon Reddit, or Shawn McCraney any truth?" and admit likewise, "Yes."

Brigham Young twisted big-idea, broadminded Mormonism. He instituted an integrated patriarchal and polygamous society that employed threats, intimidation and murder to reign with blood and horror in his Telestial Kingdom. I spoke about that in a previous Sunstone Symposium and will not address that again here. Young's leadership viewed outsiders or non-Mormons with disdain as though they threatened his kingship. His fiery rhetoric helped inspire the Mountain Meadows Massacre. While employed as LDS Church Historian, Richard Turley acknowledged, "tough talk about blood atonement and dissenters must have helped create a climate of violence in the territory, especially among those who chose to take license from it." That would be the apologist's view, but more candor would admit that Stake President Isaac C. Haight and other LDS leadership organized and executed the slaughter at Mountain Meadows, even holding a prayer circle prior to the killing.

Wilford Woodruff wanted to keep the polygamous practices in place but tried to hide it from public view to get statehood. Congress, the President and the US Supreme Court would not be placated, and when the Edmunds-Tucker Act passed in 1887 both the church and its Perpetual Emigrating Fund were dis-incorporated. Woodruff yielded and by September 24, 1890, President Woodruff knew the U.S. Supreme Court had found the federal campaign against Mormonism to be constitutional. The church's property was forfeited, trustees had acquired title, and criminal prosecution for bigamy was lawful. In the face of that pressure, the "Manifesto" was issued pretending the practice of plural marriage was over. It was a lie. The Manifesto was written by church lawyers in response to the Utah Commission's finding that plural marriages were continuing in Utah even after the U.S. Supreme Court decision. Woodruff's Manifesto denies the report. Later in 1890, when the abandonment of polygamy made statehood at last possible, Mormonism reached a point of "abandonment of its violent culture and the beginning of its selective memory of a turbulent past.” Polygamy continued, but went underground.

From 1903 to 1907 the US Senate debated whether to seat Reed Smoot as a member of the Senate. This was before Senators were popularly elected, and he had been appointed by the LDS church-dominated legislature. During the Reed Smoot Senate Confirmation Hearings, LDS President Joseph F. Smith testified under oath that the practice of polygamy had ended. Apparently, shortly after that testimony, he took the step to officially end it and submit to US rule. That change of direction was not merely submission to the government, but Mormons changed culturally as well. The ambition to create an independent kingdom turned to dust, and uber-Americanism became the new order of things. Baseball, apple pie, Boy Scouts, pledges of allegiance, and hopeful conformity into the American ideal was progressively how Mormonism projected itself into the Twentieth-century. It worked.

Gordon B. Hinckley helped accelerate this assimilation using public relations tools. Opinion polling and focus group testing informed LDS programs, messages and even temple changes. Social science tools became the new form of ‘revelation’ as the institution adopted social studies and marketing tools in the quest for popular acceptance.

The unsteady course that the LDS church has followed over their history resulted in a compromised, untenable message now that alienates everyone on one issue or another. The message is as frayed and discordant as this:

- Homosexuality is evil and God destroyed Sodom because of its wickedness
- BUT, children are innocent before God
- HOWEVER, children raised by homosexual parents cannot be baptized because of the malevolent influence of the parents until after they leave home at 18
- EXCEPT, we’ve changed our mind now that we think about the unaccountability of children for the sins of their parents
- AND, now that we think about it, everyone has sexual fantasies, so if your queer and only fantasize then you’re not unlike the typical Elders Quorum President who fantasizes about women he can add to his harem in the afterlife because of D&C 132
- SO, we’re tolerant and accepting of everyone, and love queers, but don’t approve of their behavior; ‘cuz God destroyed Sodom after all...

OR, as discordant as:

- We teach that Joseph Smith lied about multiple wives
- We lied when we said publicly that we abandoned the practice
- SO, we are just like Joseph Smith when we lie about multiple wives
- AND, we’ve added it to our scriptures (even though it was a lie) -BUT, we really now do want to stop that excess wivery thing so Joseph F. will mail out a letter (and it’s not scripture),
- AND SO, now ‘all we have to do is take these lies and make them true’

-THEREFORE, D&C 132 authorizing plural wives, and OD1 ending it will both remain LDS scriptures...

-BECAUSE we are just like Joseph Smith when we lie about stuff; and that is how 'modern prophets' always act...

I'm trying to understand their position and I think that represents a fair retelling of it. Maybe not, but I've tried to pay attention and I'm not deliberately mischaracterizing their message(s). It is an on-again/off-again attempt to be traditional and untraditional, not too hot, but not too cold, firm, but yielding when needed. If the LDS church is ashamed of its history, it would be better for the institution and its members for the leaders to confess and drain the infection than to deny and lie. I'm not suggesting that as an attack or as an enemy. I'm sincerely trying to be helpful. I hate to witness the LDS church failure now underway. If it is to be reversed, it can only come through institutional confession and acknowledging errors—or what the scriptures term “repentance.”

Wouldn't we all be better off if there was one, consistent, unchangeable message that was reliably stated across the centuries. You can disagree with it, argue against it, reject or accept it but it should be knowable and unchangeable if religion is serving its purpose.

If there was a broad mainstream of popular opinion in the 1920s, supported by popular opinion, journalism and entertainment, (and there was) did the LDS church fit in then? How about the broad mainstream in the 1950s? How well did the LDS church adapt to the cultural changes of the 1960s? What about the morass of today's broad mainstream? Can today's mainstream even be defined? Can the same church attract membership from the ranks of Democrats and Republicans, New Green Deal advocates, Black Lives Matter, NRA members, Bill Maher, and Tucker Carlson fans? Probably not. If the organization is trying to be all things to all people.

Probably so, if the message is a timeless statement of moral values that advises people and lets them govern themselves. A religion needs to stand for something solid, reliable and knowable.

Churches must understand that drifting along with the stream, choices need to be made. It is impossible to float along rudderless without getting grounded on one bank or the other.

As the Book of Mormon reminds us, popularity may be profitable, but it can be morally hollow:

O ye wicked, and perverse, and stiffnecked people, why have you built up churches unto yourselves to get gain? Why have ye transfigured the holy word of God that ye might bring damnation upon your souls? Behold, look ye unto the revelations of God, for behold, the time cometh at that day when all these things must be fulfilled. Behold, the Lord hath shewn unto me great and marvelous things concerning that which must shortly come at that day when these things shall come forth among you. Behold, I speak unto you as if ye were present, and yet ye are not. But behold, Jesus Christ hath shewn you unto me, and I know your doing, and I know that ye do walk in the pride of your hearts. And there are none, save a few only, who do not lift themselves up in the pride of their hearts, unto the wearing of very fine apparel, unto envying, and strifes, and malice, and persecutions, and all manner of iniquity. And your churches, yea, even every one, have become polluted because of the pride of your hearts. For behold, ye do love money, and your substance, and your fine apparel, and the adorning of your churches, more than ye love the poor and the needy, the sick and the afflicted. O ye pollutions, ye hypocrites, ye teachers who sell yourselves for that which will canker, why have ye polluted the holy church of God? Why are ye ashamed to take upon you the name of Christ? Why do ye not think that greater is the value of an endless happiness than that misery which never dies? Because of the praise of the world? Why do ye adorn yourselves with that which hath no life, and yet suffer the hungry, and the needy, and the naked, and the sick, and the afflicted to pass by you and notice them not? Yea, why do ye build up your secret abominations to get gain? And cause that widows should mourn before the Lord, and also orphans to mourn before the Lord, and also the blood of their fathers and their husbands to cry unto the Lord from the ground for vengeance upon your heads? Behold, the sword of vengeance hangeth over you, and the time soon cometh that he avengeth the blood of the saints upon you, for he will not suffer their cries any longer. (Mormon 4:5.)

The mainstream now more closely resembles the fountain of filthy waters described in Nephi's vision than a pure and healthy stream. The voice of gladness Joseph wrote about in 1842 has lost its vigor, and is not likely to be heard again from the conference center pulpit. Thankfully, Mormonism does not belong to a single franchise.

If Mormonism welcomes all truth from whatever source provides it, then instead of debating fashion, politics and social causes, why not teach the brotherhood of man, man's eternal nature, doing good unto others? All this by focusing on the crucified and risen Lord.

Thank you.

2023.07.29 Sunstone Symposium Q&A

Sandy, Utah
with Denver C. Snuffer, Jr.

Steven Pynakker: So, thank you. We'll now open the floor for questions. Please come up to the audience mic to ask your questions...

Denver Snuffer: And I get to decide if I answer.

SP: ...and if we don't have time for your questions, please enter it into the Whova app where your presenter can answer it after the session. Also, it's been requested that the questions remain on topic and that they BE questions.

Question #1: Thank you for your comments. My question comes by way of seeking clarity on a point that I've heard you make a handful of times about hierarchies, and where this talk talks about the hierarchies—the hierarchical institution of the LDS Church—and asserting an idea that there are to be no hierarchies in seeking truth (or something along that line; I'm not trying to put words in your mouth but just trying to make sure I understand what it is that you're trying to say). Because I really appreciated the concepts that Jordan Peterson is... (And I only reference it because, you know, if people aren't familiar with it.) But that hierarchy... Hierarchies are something that are present in everything in nature, in the way that our brains are constructed, in the very way that we look out on the world—that we don't see every detail; we see the hierarchical positions of things that come to us. So is the assertion that you're trying to make that we're trying to eradicate, within practicing Mormonism, complete eradication of hierarchies, or more along the lines of eradicating hierarchies of power, meaning hierarchies of office?

DS: Well, obviously hierarchies of office and power positions are invariably what ambitious people gravitate to. And when they acquire possession of office, then moral authority is no longer what gets respected. It's “office” that gets respected. And therefore, perhaps with good meaning, the lines get a little blurred and they exceed the bounds of propriety. But over time, that becomes a window into abuse.

Are there people who wield more influence within society? As far as I know, Jordan Peterson has not been elected to any office, has not done anything to gain authority or control over anyone, but he wields influence because what he says attracts the notice of and persuades people that he's presenting something that's laudable, persuasive, worthwhile, and ought to be respected. Opinion leaders do not have to have AUTHORITY in order to exert influence. I think if the...

“Office” was fine as long as the person occupying it was a morally straight, trustworthy individual. But as soon as you remove the morally straight, upright individual from the office and you leave the office open for someone else to occupy it, you are now leading yourself into a trajectory that's going to be destructive, as all institutions eventually show us.

We have a great federal government program that anticipated warring factions of ambitious men having divided authority that fight among each other, in the hopes, then, that the public would be left free. And what we see going on in Washington right now is working—kind of—except they didn't anticipate the administrative state, which (at some point) we're gonna have to get rid of.

SP: Okay, here's a question from the Whova app from a member in the audience:

Question #2: You seem to admit that scholars and historians of all stripes disagree with your positions and consider your scholarship to be wishful thinking, illusion, or fiction. Is there any historical evidence or other scholars' works that you would find convincing or that might lead you to reconsider your polygamy-denial position?

DS: Well, yeah; absolutely. If good proof can be generated... I was musing over the LDS Church Historian's volume 15 of The Joseph Smith [Papers]: Documents, retelling a transcript of a talk that Joseph Smith had given (in Nauvoo in June of 1844) for which we have three accounts. The documents gave us two of the three accounts, but it excluded—as unreliable—a third account that appears to have been a re-creation by George Smith in 1856, some years after Joseph's martyrdom in 1844. Most of the proof that the LDS historians rely upon in order to create the polygamy narrative are after the death of Joseph Smith and not before.

I respect a lot of the work that LDS historians have done, and I appreciate D. Michael Quinn. He and I disagreed about stuff, and we talked about our disagreements. And the point I made with Michael Quinn was if you take June 27, 1844 (the day that Joseph was killed) and you look at what existed before that date, what evidence do you have to support that Joseph Smith was the originator of polygamy? And what evidence do you have to support the proposition that Joseph Smith opposed polygamy? The record on that date when he died is overwhelmingly—it's not even close—overwhelmingly that Joseph Smith opposed the practice. But you remove him from the place, and you allow people access to the records, and you let them edit the historical journals... (There's more rolling out on that, and I don't want to get high-centered on this one question.) But I'm open to persuasion if you can find me proof. All of the proof that I find is so incredibly suspect that, quite frankly, in a courtroom, an objection could keep it out of evidence!

SP: Okay, another question from the Whova app:

Question #3: Do you agree the church is proud to rebuild the foundation of the Salt Lake Temple yet unwilling to repair cracks in the foundation of their ideology?

DS: Yes. That's well put. Yeah, they're messing with the foundation that... Unfortunately, all of that appears to me to be an ego-driven bunch of rebuilding that doesn't help the original edifice. In fact, they've stripped the interiors. Down in Temple Square, looking at the building under construction a while back and you could see through the windows all the way up to the sky. I mean, they've gutted the original pioneer-era plaster and lath crown moldings and beautiful artisanship; it's gone. It's gonna be replaced by, you know, modern wallboard crown moldings that are manufactured at a plant somewhere, and it's just...it's gone. The artisanship isn't there; they've gutted it. I thought the Lord was going to do something to destroy the Salt Lake Temple, and in my view, Russell Nelson decided to destroy it on his own. He's succeeded. They're gonna turn it into a movie house.

You're up!

SP: You've got three minutes left. Three minutes left.

Question #4: Okay. You've made the case a number of times that the LDS Church has become this huge corporation, and the segment that is the church itself, the faith portion of it, is relatively...it's just another business. What's their end...? I mean, they've amassed hundreds of billions of dollars at this point. Why do they try to even continue to perpetuate the illusion? What interest do they have in maintaining that little segment when they have this vast wealth from all their commercial businesses?

DS: The religion is the goose that laid the golden egg, and it continues to provide ongoing tax-free-tied revenue that is... It's just an ongoing revenue stream. And you wouldn't kill your revenue stream that is tax-free. It's the goose. And you know, they need it, in part, for some credibility as well. You don't throw away stuff like that if you don't have to.

Yeah?

Question #5: Two questions: One's a really softball question; the other one's a little harder. I was talking to Jeff Foley; he said you had been interested in potentially going to Independence area and doing...

DS: He's ASKED me to do that...

Question #5 (continued): "Potentially." I'm not saying you've committed or anything like that. But in light of this convers[ation]... And that organization's idea was to bring all the cousins of Mormonism together and have a unifying voice. But given your talk today, you wouldn't possibly try and do that talk there to create a unifying voice, I don't think. So, what would you say in that regard? And then my follow-up is the harder question, possibly (maybe not), but do you, then, deny the exaltation of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, who also lived plural marriage?

DS: The marriage of Abraham to Hagar was an accommodation Abraham made for his wife; he did not seek that out. And as it turned out, it not only proved to be incapable of being sustained, but it also proved to be a curse that has endured down to today in the ongoing conflict, generation after generation, of the descendants of Ishmael and the descendants of Isaac.

Isaac had one wife! He was not a polygamist.

And Jacob... When I used to teach Gospel Doctrine for all those years and we got to the account of Jacob and his marriage and the father misleading him on his drunken wedding night, I'd mention that it was a scene often repeated in Las Vegas today: [Behold,] in the morning...it was Leah (Genesis 9:25 RE)! It's one of the few places where they ought to have thrown in an exclamation point because he was surprised. He was surprised! He didn't... He never gave up on the first wife he wanted, though. And she proved to be barren.

And no...I think there's something in our Scripture—and by “our,” I mean Scripture that has been developed since 2017—that says that each of them, with a singular wife, are exalted. But you'd have to look at the... There's a replacement for D&C section 132 that describes marriage.

And no, I wouldn't come in... I wouldn't go bitch-slap people that are trying to unify. I would remind them of the core, of the most important things—the Christ and Him crucified. That's where we come together. And that matters more than, you know, all of the other financial problems.

SP: Okay, our time is up. Thank you all for attending this session and for supporting Sunstone.

2023.10.14 Unity in Humanity Interfaith Celebration

Online Conference

October 14, 2023

Denver C. Snuffer, Jr.

One of the comments that Brian Bowler just made about prayer circle: That's a practice that members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints participate in in the temples that they build. And at one point, when you get through the process of the temple and the ceremony is wrapping up, there's a symbol that gets discussed, and it's a symbol that represents (according to the lecture given) "all truth can be circumscribed into one great whole"—whole w-h-o-l-e, not h-o-l-e, although given where society is right now, all the truths may as well go into a hole. But the truth that can be circumscribed into one great connection is really represented, I think, well by the comments that were made in the earlier presenters. The truths that you discover at the highest level of the teachings of Hinduism and at the highest level of Buddhism and at the highest levels of the Christian experience all merge into a kind of singular, harmonious whole that agrees with one another across the religions. The problem is that our... Marquita [Oliver] was talking about how she doesn't like organized religion. The problem with organizing religion into entities—no matter what form that entity takes—is that it very often, then, has jealousy for itself and defensiveness against anything that would be viewed as a rival. The religion that I believe in was founded by a prophet who claimed God had visited with him and enlightened him. And one of the proclamations that he made in defining what it was he believed was that all truth belonged to that religion, no matter where it came from.

The traditional form that Mormonism is regarded to have assumed is in a corporate entity called The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, but that institution has renounced the name "Mormon," and they no longer claim that they ARE Mormon. In fact, the leader of that church says that whenever the term "Mormon" gets used, that's a victory for the devil. And I am a Mormon. The founder—the Prophet-founder—defined Mormonism as "more good," and the religion consists of all truth, no matter where it can be found. And I think that's a welcoming proposition where, if you can find truth out there, then that's what we believe. That's what I believe. That's what my religion consists of: whatever truth can be found.

The theme of this conference is "Sacred Beliefs and Holy Writings," and those, in my view, are two separate things. Not all sacred beliefs are contained in holy writings, nor does holy writings contain fully the sacred beliefs. Texts that I regard as holy writing demonstrate the dichotomy between these two things. This is from a passage in a book called Alma:

It is given unto many to know the mysteries of God; nevertheless, they are laid under a strict command that they shall not impart — only according to the portion of his word which he doth grant unto the children of men, according to the heed and diligence which they give unto him. And therefore, he that will harden his heart, the same receiveth the lesser portion of the word. And he that will not harden his heart, to him is given the greater portion of the word, until it is given unto him to know the mysteries of God...in full. And they that will harden their hearts, to them is given the lesser portion of the word until they know nothing concerning his mysteries; and then they are taken captive by the Devil and led by his will down to destruction. Now this is what is meant by the chains of hell. (Alma 9:3 RE)

Another way of stating that is: If you ignore light and truth, you get less light and truth, and eventually you fall into darkness; and that darkness, that misery, that hopelessness IS hell. It happens here, and it happens now; it is hell.

That same concept—that you have more understanding or you have less understanding, but that there are limits to what you are able to share in mortality—shows up in the New Testament writings of St. Paul. Paul wrote a letter to the Corinthians about a person (we all think he's referring to himself, but he's not identifying himself as the person) who was caught up to the third Heaven... (whether in the body or out of the body, I cannot tell; God knows), that he was caught up into paradise and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter. Of such an one will I glory (2 Corinthians 1:41 RE).

The idea that there is something that God can reveal but that man cannot talk about is embedded throughout the Scriptures. Joseph Smith (the founder of Mormonism) and Sidney Rigdon were shown a vision of what will go on in eternity, and they end that description of what they saw with this:

But great and marvelous are the works of the Lord, and the mysteries of his kingdom which he shewed unto us, which surpasseth all understanding, in glory, and in might, and in dominion, which he commanded us we should not write while we were yet in the spirit, and are not lawful for men to utter, neither is man capable to make them known, for they are only to be seen and understood by the power of the holy ghost, which God bestows on those who love him and purify themselves before him, to whom he grants th[is] privilege of seeing and knowing for themselves, that through the power and manifestation of the spirit, while in the flesh, they may be able to bear his presence in the world of glory. (T&C 69:29)

See, there are some things about the highest form of religious experience which are intended to be shared between you and God alone. Religion can have sacred beliefs, and religion can have holy writings. But the holy writings often tell you about the sacred experiences that those that pursued the path received, going along the way, in which they encountered God. Religion is intended to bring us to encounter God, whether that is in the least dramatic form of feeling yourself closer to Him or more dramatic forms in which sudden bursts of clarity and understanding come, overwhelming the mind; or a voice speaking to you that comes out of nowhere that informs you of some great answer to a dilemma that you've been looking for; or an angelic visitor who comes from another dimension that steps into this dimension to speak to you and to make themselves known and visible to you; or the experience of being caught up (as Paul writes about) into Heaven and seeing and hearing unspeakable things. Everywhere along that continuum, there is a connection that happens between the individual and God, and that's what religion and sacred writings are intended to cause to happen. Institutions that interfere with that process by claiming that they are a substitute for the experience of a living, breathing, presence of God in your daily experience are really substituting themselves, like an idol, to become a false image, a false messiah, a deceiver, if you will.

Enlightenment should be experiential (in that you go through it), and it should be shared universally. Nephite disciples recorded in the Book of Mormon: And many of them saw and heard unspeakable things which are not lawful to be written (3 Nephi 12:3 RE). God wants to tell them to you. He doesn't want someone else to; He wants to tell them to you. Three of the Nephite disciples reported about their experience:

And behold, the Heavens were opened, and they were caught up into Heaven and saw and heard unspeakable things. And it was forbidden them that they should utter, neither was it given unto them power that they could utter, the things which they saw and heard. And whether they were in the body or out of the body, they could not tell; for it did [not] seem unto them like a transfiguration of them, that they were changed from this body of flesh into an immortal state, that they could behold the things of God. (3 Nephi 13:4 RE)

Your sacred beliefs, based upon holy writings, point you to something that is ineffable and intended to be personal and intended to be shared between you and God alone.

Nephi saw a vision at the beginning of the Book of Mormon, in which he saw the unfolding of history down through the end. But he was instructed by the angel who was his accompanier on the journey, But the things which thou shalt see hereafter thou shalt not write (1 Nephi 3:30 RE). We should all have experiences that lead us to a familiarity and an intimacy that we share between ourselves and God alone.

And I do want to comment on the eclipse. As we heard about the eclipse that it—like a snake—it gets a bad reputation. Oddly enough, the snake is not originally a symbol of the deceiver or the adversary. Originally, it was a symbol of God. In order to mislead—in the myth of Adam and Eve—in order to mislead them, the adversary assumed the form of the snake (which was a symbol of renewal of life, shedding the skin, rising from the grave, eternal life), co-opted that, and turned it into the source of temptation and, ultimately, transgression against God and expulsion from the Garden of Eden. But it wasn't always so.

I do think that we're in the midst of a series of eclipses that hold some communicative value from on high. The one that happened in 2017 and the one that happens in 2024 (next year) are total eclipses. I think the total eclipse brings together a symbol of both the Father and the Mother: In the image of [God, created he them], male and female, created he them (Genesis 3:14 RE) is a statement at the very beginning of the account of God's dealing with this world in the book of Genesis found in the Bible. The image of God, therefore, is both the man and the woman. The sun is many times larger than the moon, but the moon is many times closer than the sun, and from the surface of the Earth, the two occupy the same space in the vision field that we have from the surface of the Earth looking up. Well, when the sun and the moon in an eclipse are at totality (a total eclipse), then you see neither the sun nor the moon; you can see the one and the other joining together, but at the moment of the eclipse, they're both blotted out.

Today's eclipse was an annular eclipse, which is unlike a total in that this one is called a "ring of fire," because the ring of fire leaves you still with the ring of the glory of the sun exposed, but the presence of the moon there. I think today's eclipse, unlike the one in 2017 and 2024, represents an agreement between both the Divine Father and the Divine Mother—the image of God—striking an agreement. And I think you have to view the first eclipse ~~and the~~ (in 2017) and the second (in 2024) as conveying a message and today's eclipse signifying that the two of them are in agreement about that message. (And I think that I'll speak more about that when we get to a conference in April of 2024.)

For today, I do think that we have heard from people a consistent message that there is truth, it does matter, that you can take the Hindu teachings and look at the message of Christ and you can find that what Christ is talking about and what the highest level of values in Hinduism represent can be found there. The idea of "awakening" in Buddhism and the "illusion of separation" and the "presence of God in us all" is one of the themes in the talk given by King Benjamin in the Book of Mormon, where he talks about how God is within every one of us, that God is sustaining us from moment to moment by lending us breath so that we can live and move and have our being, and that we are all connected because we're here borrowing power from God to be here, and that same God who sustains us all, therefore, we have in common. Our separation is an illusion. And there is a constant recycling of existence that we read about in the prophecies of Joseph Smith, about how this process continues worlds without end (T&C 69:28) and how we go from exaltation to exultation until we attain, ultimately, to a point where we secure the resurrection from the dead and we're no longer needing to go through endless cycles of existence. I agree with what Marquita had said that we are not as different as we are the same. The problem is we tend not to notice our similarities; we tend instead to only reject by noticing our differences.

And one thing I noted before the schedule was put out was that we intended to end at 12:45, and I think it's discourteous to go on and require people more time than they've allotted for this. So I intend to wrap up now. I don't think there's any questions for me, and I'll turn it back over to you, Jill.

Jill Van Haren: ...Denver, there is a question that came up in the question thread. Would you like to take a look at that, or do you want me to read it to you?

Denver: "Many of the panelists explain explicitly, to a degree, what their particular spiritual practices/prayers/mantras look like. Could you share some light into how you pray?"

Well, this is what I would say. It's different now than it was at the beginning. At the beginning, prayer seemed the same sort of thing that one would see in a Christian church or in a Mormon church or in a Catholic thing. I didn't use rote prayers. I used the kind of formal language of prayer. And very often it had the same elements that you would think of in a normal prayer setting: You address God, [and] you articulate what it is you're looking for. That has changed over time. And while I still will, on occasion, engage in something that is akin to that, very often I reflect upon the things of God all the time; that's where my mind goes, continually. It's not that I am constantly in a "state of prayer," but I will be aware of the presence and involvement of God in things that are going on and will take time to reflect upon and to meditate upon things that involve God and truth [and] creation.

Yesterday, my wife and I were on a hike, and I was reflecting again, out loud, about how—in both the revelations of Joseph Smith and in the book of Revelation itself—there will come a point at which time is no more; there will be a point at the end of this creation when time ceases to exist in the way in which we encounter time; and at that point, there is time no more. And so if we continue our existence on into that state and there's timelessness there, then we're already there; I mean, we will move into that condition, but since that condition is, in itself, timeless, that timeless existence already exists, even though I'm here in time.

There's a notion in the Egyptian religion about the ka and the ba, the ka being you in an eternal sense, and the ba being you here in mortality, and you both exist in both places at one time and that there's no difference between the two, and the objective is to try to get in touch with your eternal self. And there are echoes of that within the Scriptures that I regard as sacred writings or holy writings. And reflecting on that and trying to push that theoretical concept back further is a kind of meditative enterprise that is, in my view, a form of prayer, a form of reflection, and I engage in a lot of that a lot of the time. And there's not a clear distinction between the prayer life, on the one hand, and the daily existence, on the other hand.

There's a passage in the book of Alma about how you ought to pray, and he starts at a distant spot (in your fields and over your crops), and he talks about prayer, and he mentions place after place where prayer should take place, and then it ends with the proximity getting closer and closer until, finally, you're alone in your closet at home, and you're praying. And that "alone in your closet at home," I don't view as merely physical; I view it also as when you're alone in your thoughts when you can—by meditative practice—exclude everything there is here and to take into account your relationship to God, you can go to your closet in secret prayer. And I think—now—prayer is more of a constant phenomenon and not an event to be scheduled and to be set apart. I can pray even while I'm in a meeting like this or when I'm talking, as I am now. So, it's changed over time.

2023.11.14 Live True to Your Faith

United Kingdom Conference

Leeds, England

Denver C. Snuffer, Jr.

Knowing that I was coming over here, I found some quotes from Englishmen to use. Assuming that a proper education...

[Audio cuts out from 0:15 to 0:35. Denver quoted Winston Churchill as follows: “Men occasionally stumble over the truth, but most of them pick themselves up and hurry off as if nothing ever happened.”]

...That's one of the problems with religion, generally, and the truth, almost invariably.

George Bernard Shaw said, “Beware of false knowledge; [it's] more dangerous than ignorance.” Ignorance leaves you, you know, still unaware; false knowledge makes you certain. And that's where unbelief comes from.

And then this other one, which I like most of all, from George Bernard Shaw, “All great truths begin as blasphemies,” which is where often we find ourselves. I had a Catholic friend—I still have him; I shouldn't talk of him in the past tense—I had a Catholic friend who heard I had been excommunicated from the LDS Church for writing a book, and he called me excited about that, saying, “You know that when you write a book and get excommunicated from a religion, over time that makes you a saint!” He said, “Someday, you're going...” Well, as a Catholic would think, “Someday you're going to be canonized!” I thought, “Oh, settle down. You're my friend because you coach baseball, and that's what we talk about, not religion.”

He's an honest man, however. I went to the Rose Festival at the Catholic Church with him. He owned a motorcycle. I owned a Harley Davidson. We went on a poker ride (and this was a Catholic Church affair). On a poker ride, you ride from bar to bar to bar, and then you stop at the bar, and you get a card. And after you have made five stops, you have five cards. And depending upon the hand, someone would have the winning hand with the best group of cards. Now, when we got to the fourth stop, which was a bar in a little town called Lehi, Utah (full of cowboys and about 98% Mormon), the bartender was talking about how the Catholics were welcome; they ought to come back. They have a big affair every week on Wednesday evenings where the local Relief Society ladies come in for dinner at this Lehi, Utah bar. And so if the Relief Society could go on Wednesday evenings, I felt proper as (then) a Latter-day Saint attending the same thing. But it was going on too long, and I had to leave. So I gave my four cards to my Catholic friend, and I had to go home; we had some family thing going on. He kept my four cards. He went to the fifth bar, he collected two cards, and then he went back to the Catholic Church in Draper, Utah, submitted two hands of cards, and in my absence, my Catholic friend said I had the winning hand. I won a $700 leather coat as a result of winning the Catholic poker run. I wonder how many Mormon friends, Presbyterian friends, or others entrusted with the winning hand and in my absence would have surrendered a $700 leather coat because it was me that was the winner and not him. He's a trusted friend, as a consequence. I know him to be honest.

I've been listening to everything that got said here today, and I was struck in particular by Amberli's statement about this singular individual: that murder went on among the Nephites, but it wasn't coupled with "secret" until Gadianton, and then the account that she gives of how things progressed from there until the utter destruction of the people because of the prevalence of secret murder among the Nephites. And I'm persuaded by her book; I think she makes a very sad but telling point.

When I was a law student at Brigham Young University, it was a very young law school, comparatively; I would be in the fifth graduating class. But every year, because the president of the university and the dean of the law school and several of the other members of the faculty had been clerks at the United States Supreme Court, every year during the moot court competition, we would have one or more members of the United States Supreme Court come to the law school to sit during the moot court competition by the students, and then they would meet with us afterwards. And I met a number of the Supreme Court justices, including Chief Justice Warren Burger, while I was a law student. (And I was a member of the ad hoc committee with Chief Justice Warren Burger that founded the American Inns of Court, modeled after the British Inns of Court. And so someday, I hope in London to visit the Inns of Court there.) But one of the justices who visited while he was there was Justice Harry Blackmun.

Justice Harry Blackmun wrote the majority opinion in Roe vs. Wade, which in 1973 made abortion legal in the United States. No one voted on it; no one had a say on it; it went through the courts. And Justice Blackmun wrote an opinion which said that, through the third trimester, abortion was a constitutional protected right not found in the language of the Constitution but found in (and this is the language) found in the penumbra to the right to privacy. "Penumbra" is a word that describes that gray zone between light and dark; it's not fully lit, but you're still somewhat out of the darkness. And in that vague, poorly illuminated (if you can call it that) area between the right to privacy (that we think is brightly lit in the Constitution) and some things that may possibly be implied, there was this right to privacy that guaranteed a woman the ability to have an abortion.

There's a scathing dissent written by Justice Rehnquist (who also would come to our law school while I was a law student), and Justice Rehnquist said, "There's absolutely no precedent for finding this to belong to the right to privacy. It didn't exist at the time the Constitution was written; it was illegal and considered immoral—in fact, criminal—in every one of the original 13 states that adopted the Constitution, and it is, by and large, illegal throughout the nation at this time."

And so you have a "penumbra" in the majority opinion, and you have an outright declaration that what Justice Blackmun had written is a load of crap! However, there is a majority opinion and a dissenting opinion written by Rehnquist—there were other opinions that joined in for other reasons—but Blackmun's was the majority opinion. And it was like they were speaking opposite one another in different directions with different reasoning, without ever coming together to meet one another's arguments.

So when Justice Blackmun opened up the meeting for questions in the moot courtroom, and I was raising my hand to ask a question, and Dean Lee knew that was problematic, Dean Lee was relieved to see Blackmun was calling on people throughout. I was on the far left (I guess I would have been on Justice Rehnquist's far right, which is probably a little more symbolically suitable). And after trying to be called on for some time, Justice Blackmun said, "Oh, I'll take one more question. I haven't called on anyone from over there." And he called on me, and Dean Lee looked like, "Gah. I could have gone all day without having this!"

So I stood up, and I said, "Justice Blackmun, we have a dissenting opinion in Roe vs. Wade." Okay. I just spoke the tragic words "Roe vs. Wade." He'd been on campus for like two weeks, and no one had invoked Roe vs. Wade, and now there it is in all its messiness, sitting right on the table.

"In the dissenting opinion written by Justice Rehnquist in Roe vs. Wade, you in the majority seem to be like two ships passing in the night. Would you please respond to Justice Rehnquist's dissenting opinion and explain why he got it wrong?"

[Impersonating Elvis]: Thank you very much. Elvis has left the building.

And I sat down, and there was this long, awkward pause while ~~Justice Rehnquist~~ Justice Blackmun paced back and forth up behind the bar at the front of the moot courtroom, rubbing his hair back. And after a long silence, he did not answer my question, but essentially said... Well, he first told the story about how when he came to the Supreme Court, the Sergeant at Arms came into his newly assigned chambers and dropped a large book on the table with a loud thump and said, "Sign it." And he looked at the book, and it was the Bible. And it had the signatures of venerable prior justices: Oliver Wendell Holmes, Taft, there were a number of names that he listed, and he's kind of being a tourist looking at the signatures in the Bible, when the Sergeant at Arms [clearing his throat loudly] clears his throat like, "Get on with it." And he signed his name, and the Sergeant at Arms closed the Bible and left.

He said he was a religious man. He said he was a man of faith. And he said that religiously there was no way that he could justify abortion. But he said constitutionally he did not see any way to prevent it. And therefore, what he wrote in the majority opinion, he felt had to be done—all of which got sent down the river by a decision of the Supreme Court just in the last few years, in which they overruled Roe vs. Wade, and they sent the decision back to the states for the states to grapple with, and not as something that gets imposed from the top without the public being able to vote on the matter.

This is from the Book of Mormon: Now it is not common that the voice of the people desireth anything contrary to that which is right, but it is common for the lesser part of the people to desire that which is not right (Mosiah 13:6 RE).

In 1973, the people did not have a vote; they were not given the opportunity to decide that. A single man, acting in the role of Gadianton, imposed upon an entire nation of over 200 million people the judicially imposed, from-the-top-down edict that abortion in the United States is a right. Can't be prevented. But that right got restored to the people, and the United States was given the opportunity to make a decision at the state level about whether they would or they would not permit abortion to continue on. And so for the last couple of years in the United States, state legislatures have been grappling with it. Politicians have been running campaigns in which they came out supporting or opposing abortion, and state legislators have been elected as a consequence of the position that they hold. And just (I think) last week, Ohio voters were given the opportunity to decide whether they would amend the constitution of the state of Ohio to allow abortion to take place as a constitutional right in the state of Ohio. And the people of Ohio voted to amend the constitution of the state and to make abortion a right that they have in the state. Well, see, the role of decision-making was never given to the voice of the people in 1973. But it has been given now.

For as their laws and their governments were established by the voice of the people, and they who chose evil were more numerous than they who chose good, therefore they were ripening for destruction. For the laws had become corrupted, yea, and this was not all; they were a stiffnecked people, insomuch that they could not be governed by the law nor justice, save it were to their destruction. (Helaman 2:15 RE)

There are a handful of states that have made abortion either illegal altogether or limit it to circumstances that we find compelling, like saving the life of the mother or rape or something similar. But on both coasts of the United States, the decision has been made that abortion is permitted. So we find, now, the voice of the people having been persuaded. If you had had an election in 1972, in which this issue was put in the lap of the people and they were permitted to vote, there's no question what the outcome would have been. It had to be imposed by edict. The edict was issued by Harry Blackmun. In a very real sense, he has occupied the role of Gadianton because now, after 30 years of it being a right and arguments having been mustered to support it, people can't conceive of it being anything other than a right. And therefore, the voice of the people now has been persuaded by Gadianton that it is altogether right and fitting that we should engage in the process of murdering the unborn. It's one of the sobering lessons in the Book of Mormon. But the Book of Mormon does not leave us without hope.

The destruction that took place is analogous to the destruction which will take place, and the destruction was targeted. God knew who to spare, and God knew how to spare them. However random, however surprising the circumstances may have been in which the destruction took place, God knows who His people are. And God has a line He won't cross: He will let the wicked destroy the wicked; He will even let the wicked destroy the righteous, to a point, in order to justify His judgments against the wicked; but what He will not do is destroy the righteous. He can't do that; it would violate one of the laws that He has adopted for this entire creation. God will not destroy the righteous. Therefore, if you accept the Book of Mormon, believe its principles, follow its precepts, and accept it as it has been offered in 2017 to us as a covenant, God will not allow the elements to be used, the destructions that have been decreed, or the fires that will consume the wicked as stubble to affect you if you remain true and faithful to what He asks of us. And what He asks of us is largely that our hearts be inclined, that we do our best. You don't have to be error-free. He's a forgiving, loving God. Try to do what He asks, give it your best effort, and realize that God will not only refuse to destroy you in the coming judgments, but He will protect those that are His sheep.

I also want to make clear, because this question came up in a conversation I had about a week ago. I want to make clear, there's no reason to be in a panic about the coming judgments. First of all, not everyone who has not heard of the Book of Mormon or accepted rebaptism is going to be destroyed. That's not gonna happen. There will be many, many good people from all over the world with backgrounds that are as divergent as Hinduism and Islam and even atheism who live harmlessly, with goodwill towards their fellow man, who do not present a threat to anyone, who have regard for their fellow man. They won't be destroyed; they'll be preserved. The reason why the prophecy into the Millennium talks about people, that the heathens and "it being well with them," and there being an effort to reach out to them during the Millennium is because many of them are going to be preserved in the coming destruction, and there will be a lot of opportunity for people in very far-spread places to say, "Hey! Come, let us go up to the mountain of the Lord's house where we can learn of His ways." And why do they have to learn of His ways at the mountain of the Lord's house? It's because where they reside, they don't have it. They have to go and learn it "that we may walk in His paths." See, once they learn, then they want to return and they want to live their lives accordingly. There's a great effort that will be made among people—good people—who will be preserved in the coming destructions. So if you've got someone in your family who's a good person, and this good person thinks you're heretical, if they're a good person, you don't have to wrestle them down into the River Thames and dunk them under the water in a panic because, otherwise, they're gonna ignite like a match head when the Lord appears in His glory. That's not how this is going to work. Calm down!

Look, the best way for people to be interested in what you have to offer, assuming you have something to offer, is to calmly go about living your life confident in the message of the Lord, trusting in the Book of Mormon, and living true to the faith that you hold. That arouses curiosity. And when someone asks to know about something, they're a whole lot more interested in hearing what you have to say than they are when you come in hands-on-hip and finger-wagging, saying, "You're gonna be damned. But I'm not! And I'm not because I got something you don't got! You, you need what I got!" You're not gonna persuade anyone with that kind of nonsense. If they're good people, rejoice with them. Love them. Be kindly towards them. Be patient with them—a long and patient example. When they see...

I mean, why does the Lord in the Sermon on the Mount say, "Blessed are you when men will speak all manner against you falsely for my name's sake" (see Matthew 3:14 RE)? It's because hearts have been broken by hypocrites so often that no one trusts a genuinely religious person to be authentically what they claim to be. I can't remember the name of that preacher from Oklahoma... I want to say Swaggart, but I don't think that's it. There was a preacher from Oklahoma who had a university. [Audience comments.] No, no, it wasn't Bakker. And I don't think it was Oral Roberts, although Oral Roberts had... This guy made, like, Newsweek magazine; it's been a while. [Audience comment.] Umm, it could have been. Anyway, this guy... I think... I want to say it started with an H, but that doesn't matter; name doesn't matter. This guy wound up sleeping with the coeds at his university and getting caught. And when he got caught, this is... This really tells you where his heart was—he's a Christian minister, but where his heart was—he said he “couldn't help himself; it was in his genes and chromosomes. It was biology. He just couldn't help himself.” And there's an article about it, and he's giving his confession and saying, Oh, he was compelled to do so! And my reaction to the article was, “Yeah, if he'd kept his jeans on, his chromosomes wouldn't have been spread about the campus!”

We're accustomed to that kind of crap from the religious community! I had a friend who went to present a paper to a group of Christians in Atlanta. And he presented his paper to an auditorium full of Christians, and one of them came up to him and said, “You talk and write like you believe this stuff!” And he said, “Yeah, I... Don't you?” And the reaction was [disdain sound]. Nonsense. So he asked that there be a show of hands in the auditorium of those who did not believe the account of the New Testament to be accurate, trustworthy, and reliable—these are ministers! 80% of the people raised their hands who were professional ministers! They didn't believe it. He flipped the question and said, “Well, do any of you believe it to be true?” And about 10% did. So the other missing 10% just didn't know. And they're ministers!

The reason why people say evil concerning you for His name's sake is because if you really do believe and follow what He teaches, everyone is gonna be skeptical because there are so many hypocrites, so many people who sin and disbelieve in private but make a public pretense of believing in it. But if you endure that gracefully, if you really do demonstrate faith in Christ, those people who speak evil concerning you will eventually have it touch them, and they will realize they finally found an authentic follower of the Lord. And when they realize that, that arouses curiosity. You don't have to bludgeon anyone into believing. You don't have to go ask the golden questions: “What do you know about the Mormons? Would you like to know more?” You don't have to do any of that. They'll ask you. They'll come to you. You may have to put up with a lot of nonsense first.

I can't tell you how much garbage there is about me on the Internet. I don't defend myself; I don't respond to the nonsense. I just let it go. But I don't know how many people who have come and spent any time with me have walked away shocked at the remarkable difference between this rather welcoming chap who seemed to have a bit of common sense about him versus the lunatic that's out there trying to recruit a cult so that he can fair sumptuously while shacking up with a polygamous commune. I do not believe that Joseph Smith originated or practiced polygamy. I believe it is morally wrong. I have taught that; I've been clear on that. I've published things about that. And yet on the Internet, that nonsense still percolates about.

So you're gonna get lied about. You're gonna get misinterpreted. You're gonna get misunderstood. That's just what Christ said would happen to you in the Sermon on the Mount. So don't let it surprise you or frustrate you or anger you. Blessed are you. Take it in stride! How do you think Christ remained so congenial throughout His ministry? If you had the nonsense said to your face that He had said to His face, you would have probably been far less kindly than Jesus was. He walked the path; He set the example. We're just asked to follow it. He's already set the pattern before us, and He's given us counsel in the Sermon on the Mount on how to do it.

So, I'm out of time. We're past when we said we would stop. There's still time to hang around in here, and I don't know if we need to straighten things up or if there's more treats in the back to be consumed. But I want to wrap up by saying, look, the Book of Mormon is exactly what it purports to be. And Joseph Smith was not only what he said he was, he rather understated the case. Joseph's proclamations about himself were modest. He was more than he said he was. But he didn't think people could hear everything that needed to be said. And although he began the process of the restoration, it was not finished! It's not going to be finished by a group of people atop a multibillion-dollar church that has the financial and political and social clout to decide to undertake a trillion-dollar enterprise developing a city in Florida on 133,000 acres.

They're not gonna do it. It's gonna be the few who are the humble followers of Christ who take Him seriously that will finish up the work. That is currently afoot. That is currently advancing, step-by-step, forward to a conclusion. And the promise is that in the generation when it starts, it will all be concluded. There's still time. "Generation" is a vague timing. We may number them as "Z" and "Baby Boomers" and "X" and "Millennials." The Lord doesn't do it that way. So however long a generation is, that's how long it will take to wrap things up. I think we've got perhaps decades. Just live your religion. Just set the example. Arouse the curiosity of others who have seen hypocrisy year in/year out, and live true to your faith. Don't be a hypocrite, and God will use you to a good end.

Of that, I testify, in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

Denver C. Snuffer, Jr.

Denver Snuffer: Did anyone bring a set of Scriptures with them? A set of the three-volume, new printed Scriptures? You did? Do you mind if...

Unknown: [indecipherable comment]

DS: No, if I let people pass them around. Is that okay?

Unknown: You have permission.

DS: This is one volume. Do you have the other two?

Unknown: No, I just choose between three.

DS: So you packed and you flew from the States, did you? Umm, this is hard-bound.

Unknown: Buffalo.

DS: Did they give you the option of getting them hard-bound?

Unknown: Yeah.

DS: They did?

Unknown: Got in early.

DS: Yeah, why would anyone do that? They're flexible when you soft bind them, but they're still in leather.

I wanted anyone who has not seen what these look like to have a chance to look at them. I'm gonna mention them... Let's just pass them around. That way, it'll wind up—if it goes this way and then this way—it'll wind up back with its owner. I want to mention the Scriptures at the end. What time are we supposed to end here?

Unknown: Five o'clock.

DS: Five o'clock. So I'll be right on the money.

When the Scriptures were being put together, one of the last things that needed to be done was to take the book of John and do something with it that made it a little more reliable, a little more accurate. And that assignment ultimately devolved upon me. But the material was not put in the New Testament; it was instead added as a section in the Teachings and Commandments volume, as section 171 and under the name of Testimony of St. John. I'm gonna be quoting from an incident that happened in that text.

As I was working on it, I got to the—very early on—I got to the wedding feast in ~~Canaan~~ [Cana]. And there were so many options using the many definitional choices that you could have with the Greek for the words that were being used, that I gave up, and I quit the assignment, prayerfully, and let the Lord know that, you know, it would never be done in time for adding it to the Scriptures because the choices were too plentiful. And that night, I got help on the wedding feast at ~~Ganaaan~~ [Cana].

John purposefully selected that and put it into his account very early on, in order to tell about an incident that would illustrate the entirety of the gospel of Jesus Christ and Christ Himself. And so the purpose of this event (which actually took place) would put a parable into the mouth of the master of the feast that illustrates what it is we find when we come unto Christ. So I'm gonna read from that testimony:

When the host of the wedding tasted the ceremonial water...

Now, it's called "water" at this point because these pots were six water pots made of stone that were used for ceremonial purification in religious observances. And so far as anyone knew, they were simply six pots filled with water, the water being used in cleansing ceremonies.

When the host of the wedding tasted the ceremonial water, it had been converted into wine. But he did not know the source that converted the water, unlike the servants who recognized the Source.

In the account, this is an attempt in our language to replicate some of the subtlety that John had at his command, writing in his language. The word source,

- in the first use, he did not know the source that converted the water... is small s;
- unlike the servants who recognized the Source, capital S.

We can use capitals and small letters in our language in order to convey or communicate a point. Throughout the record, Christ is not recognized as who He is, except on rare occasion, and therefore, all the pronouns referring to Him are small letter. But when someone figures out and they're recognizing Him in His true role, then in our language, we can depict the recognition with capitalization. So "source" gets used twice in this sentence: once small/uncapitalized and once capitalized, because the servants were the ones who knew who the Source was.

The host of the feast called for the bridegroom, and praised him using a proverb, saying, Careful men introduce their plans using the best wine, and later, when ... followers are drunk, then their worst — but you have brought [to] us better wine than at the start.

This was a sign confirming his role as the Messiah...

You see, the Messiah is not like men who bring people aboard with some delightful tale, but when they get them within their grasp, then they abuse and misuse it. The Savior, when you come to Him, find out it only gets better. And this is a parable about how the Savior would conduct Himself—and does conduct Himself—with people who come to and accept Him as who He is.

...It was a demonstration of authority over both the elements and ordinances of salvation. Those who recognized this as a sign of his authority were awed as they considered it was him present among them. (TSJ 1:16-17)

But clearly, it was only a small group. And in fact, it was the group that was the most servile; it was the servants who recognized who the Master was. Others were oblivious.

Christ would be confronted by Nicodemus in the account that we have in the Testimony of St. John, and Christ explained to Nicodemus:

I tell you, if you want to ascend to the Heavenly Council, you must first acknowledge and give heed to the messengers sent by them. (TSJ 2:3)

See, Nicodemus had greeted Him by acknowledging Him, that He was a master and that He'd been sent by the Heavenly Council—and he wanted to know something about how to get back into that condition. And Christ is saying, “Well, if you want to ascend to the Heavenly Council, you must first acknowledge and give heed to the messengers sent by them.” So Nicodemus needed to change his priority. Instead of being attentive to the Sanhedrin, an authority that had not been sent; they'd simply inherited office by tradition that had been preserved under the arrangement that Moses had originally established, but they were hollow at this point. They may have authority that people recognized societally/institutionally within the group, but they didn't have authority from the Heavenly Council. And therefore, what Jesus was saying was rather revolutionary. It was rather turning things upside down. It's like that quote I read the other night: "All great truths begin as blasphemies," as George Bernard Shaw.

Well, at this point, what Christ is saying is really in the form of blasphemy because he's undermining those that are in a position of authority. Christ goes on to explain to Nicodemus:

Everything about my assignment, which I am now performing, was foretold by the prophets sent earlier to teach Israel, for they all testified of me. They told you I would come, and I am now here doing what was prophesied, but you refuse to see it happening...

That's always a dilemma, you know. It's happening right in plain sight. Easily ignored.

Enough is underway that rejecting it means you prefer darkness to light. Humble yourself and admit the prophets foretold the very things now underway; repent and be baptized and the Spirit of Truth will open your eyes. If you want greater light, you will obey this instruction. If you refuse, then you never meant it when you greeted me as an enlightened heavenly guide. (Ibid. ¶ 4, emphasis added)

That's always the test, you see. “I believe in Heaven. I believe in prophets. I believe in Scripture. I believe in the Lord. And I believe all that He said throughout!” And yet, were the Lord here, you'd find reason to criticize! You'd find Him too congenial, too irreverent, or too somber. I mean, He says, at one point: “Look, I sent you people that played for you to dance, and you wouldn't dance. And I sent you others to cause you to mourn, and you wouldn't mourn. You're never happy. You can't be pleased. The only way to please you is to say, well, you are all of it." But the truth is, none of us are all of it. We're all not quite what the Lord was and is.

Jesus responded to the doubts of the Jewish religious leaders:

My doctrine does not come from me, but from God who sent me. Anyone who walks in God's path will understand his doctrine, because that path increases light and knowledge. I testify of that path. Follow it and you will know whether I am sent by God or I am not sent by God. Teachers who preach from their own understanding only gratify their pride... (TSJ 6:5)

Okay, so we need to pause at that point because this is a really interesting moment in our Scriptures that we've been given. He's saying, If a man is out teaching you and what he is teaching you, it hails from his understanding, then what he's doing is being done to gratify his pride. So hold that idea of gratifying your pride, and I want to jump to a letter that was written by Joseph Smith in the Liberty Jail after he'd been confined for nearly six months and at a point when he did not know if he would ever get out of there. He wrote (after saying "many people are called but few are chosen"):

Why are they not chosen? Because their hearts are set so much upon the things of this world, and aspire to the honors of men, that they do not learn this one lesson — that the rights of the Priesthood are inseparably connected with the Powers of Heaven and that the Powers of Heaven cannot be controlled nor handled, only upon the principles of righteousness. That they may be conferred upon us, [it's] true, but when we undertake to cover our sins or to gratify our pride, ...the Heavens withdraw themselves, the Spirit of the Lord is grieved, and when it is withdrawn, Amen to the priesthood or the authority of that man. (T&C 139:5)

So if we undertake to gratify our pride, God ends any commission of authority given to that person. And Christ in the Testimony of St. John is quoted as teaching that "when you teach based upon your own ego, that's only being done by a teacher who seeks to gratify his pride." That ought to put us on notice about how careful we ought to be when we teach.

...but a teacher of truth teaches only what God tells him, and that teacher provides a light worth heeding. (TSJ 6:5)

So if you can find a teacher who is telling you that what they are teaching hails from a higher source, then you may have found something worth heeding.

Well, so far, as we have made a few milestones moving along in our present day, we began with the proposition that we were under condemnation, and we had been under condemnation since about the second year of the Restoration through the Prophet Joseph Smith, where the Lord says, "You're under condemnation, even all of you, because you've taken lightly the former commandments and the Book of Mormon, not only to say but to do, and this condemnation rests upon all" (see T&C 82:20). So all of us got condemned in the revelation in 1832 (as I recall), and that never got reversed. Now, I was an active Latter-day Saint when I heard people from the podium (including a president of the Church, Ezra Taft Benson) teach that that condemnation remains upon us.

So, we accepted the proposition that we were under condemnation, and so, trying to figure out a way out of the condemnation, one of the things that multiple people were inspired to do was to go back and to take a look at the Scriptures that had been treated lightly. Two different groups of people, independent of one another (actually, at the first, there were three, but two of the three combined into one, so there were two by the time it came to me), two groups of people worked on trying to get the Scriptures right. And I heard rumors that this was underway, but I wasn't involved.

And then one of the groups came to my attention and gave to me their work-up of the Scriptures. Within a few days after that, the second group contacted me and said, "We've worked up the Scriptures, and we'd like to turn them over to you." And I said to both of them (after finding out that they had worked independent) that "You really need to get together." So two completed projects! They all met at my office in the conference room to look at what one another had done, and they found out that they had encountered many of the same problems, but they'd reached different solutions. And my suggestion was, "I don't want two different solutions. You guys get it right."

So the project that had been worked on for some time—years—now was starting over again. And as it turns out, there was, at the same time, more material rolling out into the public view that had been withheld. And so the project started all over again. And it was worked on diligently. I think that effort, with more people using better resources, took about another 18 months to culminate in a finished project, which at a conference held in St. George, Utah was printed up and distributed in multiple copies, large print, for everyone to take a look at so that everyone could give their input if there's something that someone else knew that we didn't know about. And sure enough, as it turns out, there was a fellow who had spent years looking at the Joseph Smith Translation who told us that the Old and New Testament versions we had worked up were incredibly flawed, that the version that we'd been working with had been adopted by the RLDS Church (when they were the Reorganized Church) and that that version included many changes that a committee made that Joseph never did, and it omitted dozens—perhaps hundreds—of changes that Joseph had made that they didn't feel significant enough to include in the text.

So now the Bible and the New Testament have to be reworked, and the project starts all over again, and we find out that some of the material that we thought was included in the revelations of Joseph Smith were, in fact, alterations that had occurred after Joseph had released them. And so the Doctrine and Covenants began all over again.

The Scriptures that are now available have recovered, as close as possible, the version of the Book of Mormon as Joseph Smith intended it. The version that the LDS Church printed was taken from a copy that got typeset in England. When the original Book of Mormon was typeset, on average, the printer's copy made one-and-a-half errors per page when it was copied from the translation copy. So Oliver Cowdrey, making the printer's copy, introduced errors. The printer's copy then was taken to E.B. Grandin's workshop, and John Gilbert typeset the Book of Mormon in the first edition—but John Gilbert was working with a text that had no punctuation. So when Gilbert is supplying the punctuation, he supplies the punctuation in the way that he understood the text ought to be punctuated. Among other things, the punctuation of John Gilbert (which remains as part of the LDS version of the Book of Mormon)—because of commas, semi-colons, periods (and the absence thereof)—has Trinitarian descriptions of God.

If you erase the punctuation and you let me re-punctuate it, I will make the words of the Book of Mormon consistent with Joseph Smith's Lectures on Faith. It's easily done. But there have been Ph.D. dissertations written on the Trinitarian view of Joseph Smith early in his career as a Prophet when he was writing the Book of Mormon, in contrast to his later theological teachings that differed—so Joseph Smith changed his theology. Well, let me change the punctuation, and I'll make it consistent. It's not that hard to do. And it has, in fact, much of the punctuation to the text of the Book of Mormon has been eliminated. Wherever possible, we have made it as simple as possible to give the greatest flexibility in understanding it.

So we have recovered, as close as possible, the version of the Book of Mormon as Joseph Smith intended it, we have eliminated things that never belonged in the Doctrine and Covenants, and we have added many of the missing revelations of Joseph Smith that he intended be received as revelations. And there was one talk that Joseph Smith gave in Nauvoo that he wrote up; he intended that as a sermon. It is in... The entirety of that talk is in the—we call it Teachings and Commandments to distinguish it from Doctrine and Covenants—but it's in that volume that's being passed about.

When they worked up the 1835 Doctrine and Covenants, Joseph Smith had sent Oliver Cowdrey to independence, where a printing press was bought and they were going to publish the revelations. So in Independence, Missouri, Oliver Cowdrey put together the revelations, and he called it the Book of Commandments. The Book of Commandments never made it into print because the press was destroyed. And when Oliver was attempting to translate the Book of Mormon, he was told about his failure and encouraged by saying, “You get to write other things later for people, not by way of commandment, but you'll be able to write other revelations later.” When he was putting together the revelations for the Book of Commandments in 1833 in Independence, Oliver took editorial license because he could write on behalf of the Lord—and things in the Book of Commandments blew up; more got put in. When the press was destroyed and copies were smuggled out by the women back to Kirtland (where they had a press and where they were working on a new edition of the Scriptures), the Book of Commandments version of the revelations got incorporated as the “covenants.” And the “doctrine” was something that Joseph Smith worked on from the School of the Prophets: Lectures on Faith.

Joseph Smith paid attention for months to the content of Lectures on Faith, making sure that he got those right. But a committee took care of the revelations. So Joseph vouched for Lectures on Faith, but he left it to the committee to finish up the revelations.

And so the doctrine, which is the Lectures on Faith, was Joseph assuring us that he would stand by every word that appeared in that, and the covenants were left to a committee. We have cleaned up the revelations, we have restored the Lectures on Faith, and we have published that as Teachings and Commandments.

We have published the most correct and complete version of the Joseph Smith Translation of the Bible. The Joseph Smith Translation of the Bible (if you have Doctrine and Covenants) is mentioned in the Doctrine and Covenants and promised 15 times—that was a necessity for the saints to avoid falling under condemnation; they needed the Joseph Smith Translation. We've recovered it. It was promised 15 times. We've cleaned it up from what the RLDS did to mangle it. We finished up some of the things that Joseph added that have never been included, and that is The Old Covenants and half of The New Covenants.

We have obtained and implemented a new covenant from the Lord that was given in 2017.

We are currently advancing a translation of the Book of Mormon into Old Testament Hebrew that was mentioned earlier. We are also advancing work on a modern English version of the Book of Mormon because, as it turns out, the vocabulary that got employed at the time of the publication of the Book of Mormon in 1830 has language that we share with those people, but we have an altogether different understanding of the meaning of the words that got employed. And so a modern English version that works through the Book of Mormon—in order to give what today, in our vocabulary, ought to be understood by the word choices—is also currently advancing. And we're hoping to get (I don't know, Steph always says, “Never promise a date”) sometime before 2030 to get those in print. We have—modest though our ability and our capacity may be—we have, nevertheless, taken seriously and remembered the covenant people of the Jews and Native Americans, and we have begun a labor on both of those fronts. It's still modest; we assume it will ultimately pay some dividends.

We've begun gathering funds to build a house of God—a Temple—to be built in the tops of the mountains.

We've published the New Testament and Book of Mormon in a single bound volume, as Joseph Smith intended to do and promised would be done. He wanted the Book of Mormon and the New Testament to occupy a single volume. So The Old Covenants volume is the Old Testament. The New Covenants volume is the Book of Mormon and the New Testament. And the Teachings and Commandments are Lectures on Faith and modern revelations.

We've created a searchable, free, online Scriptures site: scriptures.info. Can you imagine that that website was available for the taking? If you go to scriptures.info, all of the Scriptures are available. They're available free, they're online, and they're searchable. You can do word searches. If you want to know how many times the word “iniquity” appears in the Book of Mormon (because Amberli has aroused your curiosity), you can go to scriptures.info, feed in “iniquity,” limit the search to the Book of Mormon, and see how many times there are. It's searchable. Now, there have been some updates recently to our phones—the plague of modern man—a new program. And so I think that unless you have an older phone, the search engine on handhelds is currently being updated for the new generation of whatever they're doing to charge you more money for your phone, and will be available soon. But if you search it from a PC, it's perfectly established.

We have also established voluntary fellowships in which tithes are collected and then distributed to members of the fellowship to those needing assistance within the fellowship. Tithing doesn't go anywhere except among the people who pay in the tithing. It gets used among those who have a need among the fellowship for food, clothing, housing, transportation, medical care, dental care, and education. If anyone within a fellowship has a need, that need gets addressed. Now, there have been fellowships with rather affluent members with practically no needs, and as a consequence of that, they aggregated a lot of money. And so they decided to reach outside their fellowship. This was them deciding this, voluntarily among themselves. No one's telling anyone what to do with tithe money. It's all voluntary, and it's all a matter of consensus. But there was someone who had a profound disability who needed a van that would help transport disabled people and could be operated by someone that was disabled in a wheelchair. The fellowship had enough money; they bought that van for the purpose of helping someone that they knew locally. It's up to the fellowship to decide such things. But that's underway.

Volunteers have organized general and local conferences, including this one. I don't know who paid for this, but someone did. We believe that the religion requires sacrifice of ourselves. The people who have come over here to participate in this are not being compensated; it is a financial burden to come and to participate. If your religion does not require that you make a sacrifice—and for the most part, people assume that it's enough to be a home teacher or a home minister or serve as a Sunday school teacher. Tell them it's gonna involve your pocketbook, and all of a sudden, “Well, that's not sacrifice. That's wrong! I'm doing... I'm giving up my time and my talent and everything other than money that the Lord has blessed me with or with which He may bless me to the building up of the Kingdom of God and the establishment of some theoretical future Zion that will never get here until after we develop 133,000 acres of real estate in Florida. But it's coming!”

A website has been created to archive the record of the Restoration, including our conferences, our Scriptures, and everything going on currently. And that's referred to as restorationarchives.com. Any talk that's ever been given—I assume including the ones that are given here—will ultimately both be available as an audio recording and as a transcription because we have an obsessive-compulsive transcriber; I'll spare naming her. But she does wonderful work, and she'll get around to transcribing these things. (I hope part of that's automated.)

And we have a website for events that get announced called remnantevents.com.

And those things are what have been and are currently available or are being prepared for as a consequence of what we're up to. Small—I've never thought numbers mattered.

I'm absolutely persuaded numbers don't matter, now. Based upon the letter that Paul wrote to the Corinthians, the Lord's ultimate success in Judea involved 500 who assembled together at the time of His ascension into Heaven. Those I assume to be the correct number of the real believers who had been invited to come along for that occasion. Literally, that means the greatest group of believers that the Lord ever spoke to was the group that He talked to in Bountiful, when people had come up 11 months after the destruction, at a festival time, and they're standing about showing one another "the marvelous changes that took place since the last time we were at Temple Square. Look, the horn is gone!" Except now the spires are gone; the interior is gone. Sitting over here, you may not know the "marvelous changes" that have gone on.

All of the original handicraft of the workmen... I don't know if this is lath and plaster. But it could be because of where we are and how old buildings are here. But all of the interior work of the Salt Lake Temple was made of lath and plaster, painstakingly done by pioneer workmen. It's gone. They gutted the entire interior. Standing on Temple Square and looking through the windows, you can see the sky from the ground up. It's... The entire thing's been gutted. It will be a movie theater version of the temple endowment instead of the live version that was there before. The orientation of the rooms required that you circumambulate a circle, going from room to room and up the stairs; you were required to change directions (a symbol of repentance) when you climb and then change and continue climbing, and then ultimately complete your rotation once you get to the celestial room through the veil, entering from the terrestrial room. And then at the highest level, there were sealing rooms that were made off of the celestial room; an annex was made on the north wall off of the celestial room with a corridor that had sealing rooms on it. That entire north-wall annex is gone. I noticed that one of the problems the temple was having was that when they cut through, in order to add that, the blocks at the corner of the cut had begun to separate, so you could see the crack that was made. They got rid of all that to sturdy up the structure again. But because of that (if the Deseret News can be trusted), they have now moved the sealing rooms—instead of being at the highest level and off of the celestial room—they've moved it downstairs into the basement, in the new way of doing it. So you'll get in... And by the way, in order to gut it, they had to remove the solemn assembly room at the top. I don't know what they're going to do to replace or if they're going to do it. It's so rare that they use the three pulpits at one end and the three pulpits at the other end. And they have a theater over in the Conference Center, so that's where the General Authorities can come hold their solemn assemblies. So I don't know what they're going to do with that. But one of the premonitions that I had had some time ago was that the Salt Lake Temple would be destroyed. But I thought, rather like the trumpet being shaken out of the hand, that it would be the doing of the Lord, the trembling of the Earth. But as it turns out, it's been altogether destroyed voluntarily by the proprietors. They've gutted it, and now it's not gonna contain... I assume that they'll try and put moldings back in. But they'll be wood and painted; they'll be, you know, pre-manufactured stuff (at least I hope it's wood and not plastic).

Okay, so it's five o'clock. And I understand this was the moment at which we were supposed to end, but I'm happy to—if anyone's got a quick question—I'm happy to answer anything on any subject, including why there are so many New York Yankee hats over here! Don't you guys know the Yankees are the evil empire? Get a Red Sox hat, for goodness sake.

Yeah, what?

Question: I was just interested in asking whether you could expound upon a comment that you made in Leeds that kind of made me struggle a little bit to think that, umm, when you said that we may have decades.

DS: It took 500 years for the Roman Empire to fall apart, you know. [Indecipherable audience comment.] It took 500 years for the Roman Empire to finally fall apart. The world is held together—tattered though it may be—the world is held together by American hegemony. If you take the American, really, Navy out of the picture (I guess the Air Force's ability to transport part of that, as well), but right now, you know:

- Turkey and Greece would be at it.
- Right now the Armenians still have a battle to settle.
- Right now Iran and Iraq continue to have animosities.
- You don't have as peaceful a coexistence between Pakistan and India because of the disputed border in that region.
- And what would China do with Tibet if some of the others came to Tibet's aid? Where's that going to go?
- Korea has historic grudges.
- Japan has historic grudges with China.

Everywhere you look, there are potential conflicts that are kept at bay because there's a respected world order. So how long does it take? Well, once you remove the capacity to enforce that, you still have a period during which that animosity turns to violence. It's not abrupt; it's gradual and generally requires provocation. And the prophecy is that the turbulence, the calamity, the stuff that is to come is going to make a full end of all nations (T&C 85:3). Well, that's quite a sweeping statement. To make a full end of all nations is not something to be achieved in a blink of an eye.

If you start today and you remove the American presence and their military hegemony from the scene, it's still gonna take a while to work things up. I mean, go up to the castle and look at all the swords. How long did it take to fabricate those? You don't get ready for that, you know, overnight, and you're going to have to undertake the preparations for war. These people aren't gonna go out throwing rocks at one another. It takes a while. But the wicked are going to destroy the wicked. That's the prophecy. The wicked are gonna destroy the wicked, but it's tedious work. I mean, there are a lot of wicked, but there are a lot of wicked to kill. And everyone's got something to do when it comes to that kind of an undertaking.

So, yeah, don't think of it in terms of an abrupt moment. There will come an abrupt moment, but that's at the end, “by and by,” when the Lord in His glory does the wrap-up with, you know, things burning as stubble under the feet of the righteous. That will come. But that's not where it starts. That's where—after the wicked have had a season of hard labor destroying one another—it all turns about, and the Lord takes care of what's left.

Well, thank you. We've got someone (a monitor) now at the door telling us to get out of here. So, [singing] “Get that thing back where it came from...”

2023.12.16 Understanding Prophecy Q&A

Sandy, Utah

Denver Snuffer: Comments? You were saying something.

Aaron Kibbie: Is it on? Do you wanna record...? Okay, cool. Yeah, I'll just go top-down from the top of the talk down on my questions. So first thing we mention is foolishness and ignorance, but we don't qualify "What is foolishness and ignorance?" That might be purposeful to leave it vague, but it's still there.

Next thing is that we talk about Nicodemus and his inability to recognize prophecy. Later on, it's talked about how the Sanhedrin (the Pharisees and the Sadducees) are unable to recognize prophecy because they have this expectation that created a trap for them where they were unable to recognize the fulfillment of prophecy outside of the bounds of their understood parameters (or whatever). So...

DS: Yeah, they viewed themselves as being more sinful than they really were.

AK: Right. And a little bit later on, you say that God admonishes us to be open to not solidify our expectations, so we CAN recognize prophecy, but nowhere in the talk do we say, exactly, "HOW do we stay open to recognize the fulfillment of prophecy?" So that's a... Kind of like a... It's like a, "You gotta do this," with, you know: How?

Next is we're talking about the vineyard, and we have the use of wild in a positive way and in a negative way, which is itself juxtaposed. Because in the first instance, when we're finding the bad branches—right?—and we're chopping out the bad, and then we're grafting in wild branches with the intent of making the tree strong, with a hope that they will become good to overshadow the bad. But then later on in this allegory, we're now cutting out the wild branches. So to me, it's like, okay, what constitutes badness? And you kind of give some examples of what badness is there...

DS: K, well, let's pause on that because that's a good point. You're actually referring to events that occur earlier in the prophecy of Israel's history. Because Israel had acquired a state of religious staleness that they were the only people who would kill their God—and they killed it—at which point, they reach out to the wild (which is when it's positive) in order to bring in Gentiles who would be willing to start where the Lord had ended, which is with the ministry of Jesus Christ because they were converted to it. So Christianity thrived for a season, and the wild, it took off, getting nourishment from those roots. All of that is historically behind us. The prophecy point in which I pick it up in this talk is LATE: It's now when everyone... There is no good. It's the statement that Christ makes to Joseph in the First Vision about "There's a form of godliness, but they deny the power thereof."

And so we're starting at a point in which the wild has reverted back to being absent of salvation. You can't go anywhere and find good fruit. And so now, given the state of the world (which is really what we want to look at), the last time the vineyard gets worked in, the last time that we have an opportunity to lay up fruit, the last time that He's going to send and labor alongside some servants, that's relevant now to us (assuming we're gonna be able to produce some natural fruit again). And so that's why I start there. And in that sense, at that moment, the wild is negative. But once you graft it back in... Apparently, that season of Christian apostasy is beneficial to reconnecting up with the roots. And I think, in many ways...

There are those that say that the Book of Mormon was really a product of the early 1830s, answering all of the problems with the then-existing forms of Christianity. And I don't think I would argue with that, because it's pretty clear that in making the abridgment and in the final letters between Mormon and his son, Moroni, he's literally addressing the ills that they foresaw we would confront in our religious traditions today, and gives us answers for them.

AK: Yeah, all I was saying was that there's no clear delineation between when wild being grafted in is okay and when we're now treating wild as something that needs to be pruned. So the use of the word wild doesn't have... It has a continuous vocabulary, but it... There needs to be some point of delineation to where [indecipherable reading of scripture verses]. So that needs to be clarified in my opinion. But...

There's also the choosing of grafting because... I also wondered, does wild mean not... Because he was talking about, like, wild... It almost sounded like you were describing wild as being those who are not predisposed to the corrupt traditions of some society or religion. That's what it almost sounded like the good wild were. And then the wild that became the bad wild were those who were entrenched still in their traditions, but they lended strength to the top of the tree so that the roots didn't overpower the other branches. But as they grew—right?—or as the new branches grew and became strong, it now allowed for the pruning of those traditions. But I... That was complete inference. You didn't say anything specific to it so that... I could be totally off my rocker.

And then there was... Okay, that was that question. One thing you said was “good strong roots,” but there was nothing said that defined what “good strong roots” mean.

DS: Abraham and his original covenant.

AK: Okay, cool. So that's right there.

[Reading notes] And then... Already touched on that... Branches...

Oh, the other part is that it might be reasonable to... Well, branches don't have feelings; they don't have emotional attachments to other branches being trimmed, right? And I think that's part of the strength that those traditions kind of allow on top of the good roots but, at the same time, need to be disposed with. But at the same time, you... It's hard to say, “Hey, we're gonna prune you.”

DS: Yeah.

AK: Right? And... Because that sounds very much like excommunication—right?—particularly if the branch is still alive.

DS: Yeah. Fortunately, it's ~~the vineyard~~ the Lord of the vineyard that's deciding what He prunes away.

AK: Right. And I'm not saying one way or another, but a lot of times in that particular parable, I always find a sticking point with WHEN you prune—right?—because hasty, overzealous people are like, “We need to prune you!” Right?

DS: [laughter] Yeah...

AK: It might be reasonable to say that the branches don't have their hands on the shears; that's the job of the servants and the Lord. If you're thinking that you need to be the one who's grabbing ahold of that, then you're falling into the camp of those who have...

DS: Yeah...

AK: ...have decided to be—as you described just slightly later on—being hasty and impatient. And I really am sorry that I'm saying all of this like logorrhea; I'm just vomiting out of the mouth. But anyway...

Whitney Horning: A thought that just came to mind was: How does that relate to “My hand is stretched out still”?

DS: Yeah...

Vern Horning: In regards to the pruning?

WH: Yeah.

VH: Well, I was just gonna say, sometimes the pruning happens, and the people don't even know it happened.

DS: Yeah.

VH: The branch doesn't know.

AK: I think, most of the time, our... I have noticed that our groups kinda self-prune.

VH: That's what I mean, yeah.

AK: I mean, people will gather and then what'll happen is that you'll find that a subset of the fellowship will just go over here. And others will tend to try to find more like-minded people who are sympathetic to whatever they're preaching or believing, and then that creates self-pruned groups.

VH: Well, I was thinking like the Jews, when they rejected John the Baptist and Jesus. They didn't know they were pruned away when it happened.

DS: That's a good point. But they were.

AK: And the seer... You said that... Okay, that one's out of context. I don't have a good one with that one. Sorry, I'm just... I tried to take notes as fast as I could, but...

Oh! I... This one always comes up: Prophecies are only meant to be understood after they are fulfilled. Okay. There's never any sort of nice understanding of "how long after." And so these people wondering if they're a part of that expectation trap up above or if they're not caught in...or if they've actually understood the prophecy correctly.

DS: How long do you think was a reasonable length of time following Joseph Smith bringing forth the Book of Mormon, how long should it reasonably take to at least consider the possibility that God was working through him to restore lost truth? I mean, can you do it perfunctorily without reading the book? Can... Are you justified in rejecting the book? Do you need to at least read the book and its claims? And if you read the book and its claims, then do you need to investigate Joseph? Or is it okay to say, "He hasn't been to college and received training for the ministry, and he's not ordained in one of the existing denominations that I recognize, and he's really just an ignorant farm boy who's making pretentions." Well, how long is it after the work began before you need to at least allow the possibility that Joseph Smith was someone who really did come in contact with God?

AK: Umm...that's undefinable.

Tina Kibbie: Individually.

AK: You said earlier... ([talking to himself] Was it early on or later on from there? It was later on)... "Search for God's will for themselves."

DS: Yeah!

AK: Right? So until you are willing to throw your will at the feet of God, I don't think any prophecy can be reasonably understood.

Stephanie Snuffer: The thing that keeps coming up for me is ('cuz we talked a little bit this morning), like, so what comes up for me is "by their fruits," right? So what is a reasonable amount of time between the coming forth of the Book of Mormon—whether you read it or not, whether you lived in, you know, around him or not—eventually, as an individual and someone who has just a natural desire to give their will to God, eventually they will notice, eventually they will see it. Who cares when it is? Who... What does it matter if it's within Joseph's lifetime, whether it's within, you know, whether it's 2023, and you're just finding the Book of Mormon for the first time? I mean, it is absolutely... It is undefinable. And it's going to happen just for the humble, the honest in heart, and those who—no matter where they are, what they're doing, ~~how they're liv...~~ you know, where they're living—they're just the ones who are willing to turn their lives over to God, whatever that looks like for them. And then, in 2023, someone says, "Oh, my gosh. This is the fulfillment of a prophecy," a prophecy that was fulfilled in the 1800s, right?

DS: Yeah, but it's just now coming to your attention.

SS: Yes. So what does it matter?

DS: Yeah.

SS: What does it matter?

AK: It doesn't really matter as much as [whispering] everybody asks that's stupid question.

SS: Right. Exactly!

AK: Right. And...

VH: Or we're living in a time when prophecy is being fulfilled, like you were saying, or events in the Scriptures that seem like they're about to unfold, is it worth speculating/discussing/talking about those? Or is it just... Or do you wait for the gospel doctrine class in the millennium to connect all the dots?

AK: I think it's exactly what Stephanie was said. But that needs to be taught. It's like, you need for yourself to really take and ponder these things, and see how it fits for you in your current form of development. Maybe bookmark it and say, "I'll come back to that later because it doesn't make any sense to me right now." But there's enough people who you care about who have said this is important. So don't rush yourself. Don't be hasty. Don't be impatient. Just mark it as something that you might need to come back to later. I think far too often we try to teach religion like math: First, you learn addition, then you learn subtraction, and ad nauseam, all the way up until, you know, differential calculus. But religion really is what you're ready for at the moment. And sometimes, like, you'll see kids just get stuff that you're like, "What the...?" And I've been struggling with that for years and now my seven-year-old says, "But Daddy, it's..." and you go, "Oh. Oh! Oh my gosh!" Right? And now you feel like, you know, out of the mouth of babes! What...? That's awesome. But so it's like, don't be discouraged that your "how long after" is not really close.

SS: Or different than someone else's.

AK: Yes. Exactly. Because I think that's what divides us a lot and gives us a lot of evil in our groups and stuff is because we don't allow for the individual growth pattern of other people in our fellowships. It's like, "Oh, if you don't believe that then you can't be here," right? And that is...

TK: That's the "stay in your lane."

AK: That's contrary to, I think... Well, I mean, it's contrary to what I think God wants for us because I think He wants for us not to be... He ~~wants to be~~ want us to be as inclusive as possible. And if pruning is necessary, that's His job—right?—or let the other people prune themselves, but try to be good, regardless. Anyway, I'm just being stupid.

Janson Fish: I've got a question. Can I fit one in?

AK: Please.

JF: “Remnant of Jacob.” “House of Israel.” The same person. Why does the Lord distinguish those groups? I get one is a covenantal name; the other is his birth/given name. But why does He use them interchangeably, it seems, throughout Scriptures? Is it a marker of sorts to, like, identify specific groups? Or is he just using...

DS: Well, Jacob was his given name, but Israel was his new name. In the allegory, the grafting (as he was mentioning a moment ago), you've got wild, and you've got regrafting, and Jacob... He is the God of Abraham and the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob, because He covenanted with Abraham, and He covenanted again with us, He can covenant again with Jacob, and He gave to Jacob the new name/the covenant name of Israel. Well, in the allegory, using both names is a way of suggesting to the mind... I mean, when Christ says, “Isaiah truly prophesied concerning all things, therefore, he had to prophesy about the Gentiles,” the Gentiles' status (when they're wild), they're still Jacob; they're not Israel. They're still Jacob. But you're trying to reclaim it and turn that into some kind of covenantal, familial, back... I mean, we want it to be the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, the God of Jacob, and the God of Janson, and the God of Aaron, and the God of Taylor. We want it to be the God of all of us. Maybe even the God of Vern. That's a stretch there. I mentioned all the men in the room, except for Vern, so I had to mention him, which now means we're really sexist. But if you go back to the beginning, the name Adam meant both Adam and Eve. So the God of Aaron is really “Aaron and Tina.” And the God of Taylor is really “Taylor and Kelsey,” and so on. And Janson, I assume his wife too.

JF: I have a wife, Yvette.

Taylor Ward: I've got a question. At the beginning, as well as throughout, we learned that understanding prophecy is: You can't fully understand it until it happens. And although you can search it out, they're unsearchable. But one of the things I learned that you can do is “incline your ear.” So I was wondering—I like practical—some practical ways to incline our ear amidst all the stuff all of us have going on every day, practical ways to incline our ear so we can understand the way we need to.

DS: You know, this... The incident involving Nicodemus going to Christ is... It's like... Make Nicodemus every man. I mean, what was it...? He's a member of the Sanhedrin. He has all the traditions, he has all the learning, he has all the reasons—just like we all do—to live our lives content and in a rut and to leave all of the “nonsense going on” on the side. WHY did Nicodemus go and flatter Christ and then ask Him questions? And Christ didn't accept the flattery. He went right after Nicodemus.

SS: I think the “incline”... I don't know if I'm answering your question specifically, but the “incline your ear” is... The only thing that's keeping us from knowing (whatever that's gonna look like for everybody) is the fact that we think we already know. It's the fact that we think we already know! I mean, it's “being wrong”: Assume you are definitively wrong about everything you know! Because...

DS: Or at least “incomplete.”

SS: Yeah, because you actually are, right? If you know anything about your brain, you know that your brain... It's a masterful... (I can't even think of the word.) It fools you all the time; your brain is lying to you 99% of the time. And so, you know, I mean, somewhere between “believe you're wrong all the time” and know at least, you know, at least “believe ~~what you know~~ what you think you know is incomplete,” that's how you incline your ear. You just let it all go. Nicodemus comes and questions Christ and flatters Him because he thinks he KNOWS—because he is a member of the Sanhedrin. So he knows! And what he realizes is that he doesn't... What he realizes that he knows is like, “I now know that I didn't know anything. Like, I totally missed it.”

VH: So is that the danger of trying to figure out prophecy before it happens, because you get these preconceived ideas that, when it does happen, you'll be blind to the reality?

DS: Why were the Sanhedrin leading the chants, “Crucify Him! Crucify Him!”? I mean, they... Not only was the Chief Cornerstone rejected, they were bitter and angry and upset, and they wanted Him killed! I mean, how do you...? How does your religion—which is telling you about the coming of the Messiah—how does your religion turn you into that? I mean, I give Nicodemus a whole lot of credit for coming and actually having a conversation with Christ. Can you imagine what the Sanhedrin—behind closed doors, you know, outside of earshot of Christ—what they talked about and what silly things they repeated that they'd heard about, and the nonsense that...? It's like the people who already made their mind up about Joseph Smith. And they can't tolerate the idea that he was a man of virtue and faithful to Emma and that he was surrounded by vipers that lied about him! We'd rather take his—lie or THE lies and project them onto him. I can't imagine what Jesus' reputation inside the Sanhedrin was, other than: He had a devil; He was a devil; He worked with the power of the devil; and He was absolutely opposed to everything good and virtuous and right—so much so that the sorcerer Jesus, the devil worshiper, really did need to be killed for the good of society! We need to protect our people from Him! I mean, how many people entertain really, really stupid, profoundly, strongly-held convictions about Joseph Smith? I mean, I'm amused at the nonsense that gets put on the Internet about me!

SS: Describing the Sanhedrin, what you're describing is the almost insurmountable task of believing “you don't know.”

TK: Well, it's becoming like a child, right?

SS: Yeah. Yeah.

TK: So that's the whole purpose.

SS: Yeah. How can you be a member of the Sanhedrin and stand to the side and say, “Why do you guys think you know that? What makes you think you know that?”

DS: In The Second Comforter, the chapter about becoming as a little child, I wrote that little children don't “know,” but they KNOW that they don't know, and therefore, they're relentlessly curious. We don't have any curiosity about stuff outside of our prejudices because we might have to surrender them!

WH: Well, and I think that brings up, I think, one of the, you know... We talk about paradoxes all the time in this world—right?—and that things are a double-edged sword. So we have this: We need to be curious; we need to assume we don't know. But then how do we, then, avoid being deceived? Because as soon as we become curious and willing to be like a child, we open ourselves up to the deceivers and deception. And so then there's this line that we need to navigate that God fulfills His prophecies, but He uses men to bring it about. So that's one of my questions.

DS: And there are 10,000 people willing to volunteer to claim every sort of...

SS: Well, and I think that stays... It, to me, that stays in the area of curiosity, right? Because the minute you close, the minute you hear something that scares you... So fear is HUGE. “Fear” is as big as “thinking you know it already.” Those are the two things that are going to damn us all, right? So as soon as you... And it's by their fruits, “by their fruits, you shall know them.” Well, you may have to go pretty far down a path to realize that this fruit is stinky, right? But we're so afraid of any kind of mistake that we have to stay on the path, we have to stay on the path. I mean, I believe all the Scriptures, I believe there is one way, I believe the path is narrow, but I don't believe we're supposed to stay... I believe we're supposed to explore. That's how you find the narrow path is by exploring something different. And the reason we don't and the reason this is a big issue is because we think we know already, and we're afraid.

JF: Is that, umm... You quoted Joseph's “search into and contemplate the darkest abyss.” What does that mean? Is it that? Is it...?

DS: Look, it's almost impossible to understand anything absent contrasts.

SS: Opposition in all things.

DS: You have to have contrast. If you don't have contrast, you don't know what you're looking at [begins drawing on whiteboard].

If you begin to put contrast onto something, what was once flat and meaningless becomes spherical. And when you begin to put the contrast there, even if it's not apparent, this tells you there is a light source, and it's out of your view and over here. And so now I know/I comprehend this is spherical, it's not just round; there's a shadow, and there's a source of light, even if I can't see it. And so from what the contrast gives me is the certitude of knowing that there's something out there. A lot of times God is giving us a whole lot of information that we sense, not because the light source is within our field of vision, but because it is impossible for this condition to exist in the absence of the light source.

I went to my father's funeral, and his casket—it's open casket—was sitting there in the room, and as soon as I entered the room, I could point to the exact spot. My father was there but not in the shell. He was there, palpable and with the same radiant presence of his person, his personality, his demeanor, everything; disembodied, and not in the box. And that tells me that death doesn't take us away. That tells me that we survive the separation of the spirit from the body. I mean, you lose someone, and they come visit you. Now, they may not visit you by walking in the door and physically opening and closing material structures, and they may visit you only outside of your range of view, but if they communicate something to you that clearly originates from who they were, then you don't have to have the light sitting in front of you; you can tell by all of the other circumstances that it's there. The “searching into the darkness” means we really have to recognize that there is an opposition. The kind of evil that we see on display in this world implies that there is an opposite and a goodness. The teachings of Jesus Christ...

If we took the Sermon on the Mount and we adopted that as our thing, think of all the messes that we've got everywhere in the world right now, think of all the illnesses that we see on display in society, think of all the interpersonal problems that we've had among ourselves, the Sermon on the Mount is a remedy for all of it. Well, the fact that someone in one generation influences multiple accounts of His life, from very different personalities and different vantage points [who] tell us about the existence of this “teacher” who did these things, one generation, and there's this outpouring of historical accounts and, then, teaching accounts that pour out in one generation, and you get now—you know, two millennia later—a book in which His teachings are preserved, and you read them, and you realize that that would cure so much of the world's vanity, evil, conflict; it would cure so much. That tells you that “what we see” vs. “that light,” that Christ was a real historical figure who taught such lofty ideals that you really have no reason to reject His claim to being the son of God. And the witnesses that say He came back from the grave and then reported the statements made by recent witnesses of His resurrection (like Joseph Smith), we don't have any reason to say that light... I mean, I... The presence of evil tells me there is good. The presence of darkness tells me there's light.

SS: So if... Oh, sorry, Aaron, go ahead.

AK: I was gonna say there's no... The analogy of hunger and satiation keeps coming to mind. Food always tastes better when you're hungry, right? And the longer you've been without food, the more willing you are to accept food that's closer and closer to spoiling. And...

DS: That's a GREAT point.

AK: And this analogy keeps on cropping up into my head when I'm thinking about some of the comments you made at the end, which was... And in accordance with Nicodemus' station. He's “full.” He's “okay.” He's at a point in his life where he's accomplished enough and accomplished a lot, and he doesn't need to prove anything to anyone. But he does recognize greatness. And so he's willing to have conversations that may be in contrast to the mainstream. He's confident enough/he's satiated enough where he's “okay,” and he's willing to talk to Christ about things in a way that's blase vs. having real intent. Those who come to Christ who are hungry—who have an appetite to relieve pain and stress in their lives—are willing to accept prophecy sooner, right? And they're willing to get on to something that they feel is affordable (emotionally and physically) for the gains that they are going to feel emotionally, spiritually, and hopefully metaphysically in the life hereafter that will drive them forward, will help them become more than what they are because they are not satisfied. They are not satiated. But then there are those who are satiated, but they know they're missing something, and this is where you have the demonic fruit that is presented by God—and Denver [Joseph] classified it very well as being the flowery, fanciful words that are given by false prophets or false teachers who want you to eat from their hands so that they can pad their pocket with the other, with your resources. And that... It was mentioned over and over again in your talk, and I don't know if it was because of inspiration or because it's the quotations, scriptures, or whatever, but it was mentioned again and again about priestcrafts; I think it was like at least three times. But that is the fanciful and flowery thing that sets an expectation. Those men are setting an expectation to bar you from receiving true prophecy.

DS: And to direct you into their camp and give them power and influence over you.

AK: Yes, so they are flatterers; they are with the intent of building up a kingdom. And they will sell you with the exact same words that are used in the Scriptures: “WE can build Zion. WE can do this baptism that will bring us closer to God. WE TRULY understand the Scriptures. We TRULY understand what is going on. Therefore, these are the things that we're going to get on the outside. And if you participate with me, we can accomplish this great work.” And that's where you get cults, right? Where there's a figure who has successfully used flowery and fanciful words, along with flattery, to sell an expectation that is backed 90% by truth, in a lot of ways. And they do go after the hungry, and they do satiate them. And when they are satisfied, they are firmly in the camp of those who would kill Christ.

SS: So what if you combat that by always having this part of you that says, “But what if it's wrong? But what if I'm wrong? But what if he's wrong? What if there's more?”

AK: The first thing that you can recognize when you are inside of a space where expectation has taken over you is 1: When someone brings up something new that is actually rational, you have an emotional response to it, usually fear or disgust or hatred, right? Because now your social base is being threatened. Your... Everything that you have done to teach your children is now being called into question. And you now have to come to grips with the idea that you are a bad father or a bad mother or you've been a bad friend because you have taught someone falsehood that's going to damn them to hell—right?—and the reason why that goes through your head is because that is the expectation that has been given to you by those wild or wicked or vain, glory-seeking people. They have said that if you don't follow these teachings, you're gonna go to hell. Therefore, if you're following some other teaching, isn't that going to be the same thing? But that's a false teaching in and of itself, teaching you that God is going to hate you for some reason, when in truth, Christ is the master teacher. Everything that we're going through here is a lesson, and either we get it here or we don't; we're gonna get it at some point. But hastiness and impatience, thinking that you have to have everything done now? That's the kind of thing that creates negative emotion, that's anxiety, right? And worry and fear of failure, right? Fear again, right? Those are the things that will lead to bad decision-making. It's no longer a successful cycle. It's now a cycle of emotional reaction to truth, which means that you kind of... You're definitely in a place where you're missing out on something reasonable.

SS: Yeah. Well, and I think, I mean, I think we have the blessing of, like... It's articulated, if we know there's opposition in all things, that's just a word, that's just a statement. There is opposition in all things. It's not a... It's not meant to make you afraid. It's meant to tell you what's gonna happen.

AK: You could say it another way just like Denver did. There's contrast.

SS: Yeah, it is a statement of truth. And in that statement of truth, there is technically nothing to be afraid of, just an awareness that I am going to—if I'm going to pursue this—I am going to experience that. If I'm gonna pursue this, I'm going to experience that.

DS: Contrast grows.

SS: Yeah, it wasn't meant to scare us off. It wasn't meant to say, “Be timid. Be hesitant.”

DS: We've been here a couple of hours. I'm concerned that the recording is going on too long for people to be tolerant. But there's some people who haven't said anything (Kelsey) or have said very little (Tina, Whitney). Actually, you too, Janson. Does anyone want to say anything?

JF: I have another question: “First shall be last, last shall be first.” Can you... Is there more to that? That keeps popping up through Scripture.

DS: Well, the Jews retained their identity with Israel longer than anyone, and therefore, they are the first in terms of recollection. The Gentiles got lost to that; they became the last because they have completely forfeited any awareness of their identity. But when the end comes, He's going to start by reclaiming Israel and using the cast-off branches that have become wild and redrafting them back into the roots. And then after the Gentiles have been brought back—both by covenant awareness, teaching, acceptance of truth—into the point where they can produce any good fruit, then secondly, the last of the ones who had been first will at last (the Jews and others who've retained the separate identity) are gonna be grafted back in at the end so that the cycle that started with the Jews and went on to the Gentiles is gonna start with the Gentiles and go back ultimately to the Jews.

JF: So the Jews, is it “I self-identify as a Jew; that makes me a Jew”? Or is it a...? Is there a specific bloodline or group of people that...? Like, who's the Jew?

DS: Well...

JF: What does that look like today in today's world? There's a whole lot of stuff going on in Israel...

DS: The easiest answer is that clearly those that self-identify as Jews would be where you would start with it. But there's a whole lot more to that. Yeah, but the easy answer is the obvious one. Is there more to that identity? Well, yeah. But that's a big subject. But it's a worthy question to keep in mind. Yeah.

But Whitney and Kelsey and Tina, what's up? [crosstalk]

Kelsey Ward: I'm a very simple-minded person.

SS: That's lovely. We need a lot more of THAT! Loftiness is...

WH: The thought that's been coming to me in this discussion is charity. So charity for each other when we get things wrong, when we think we've understood prophecy, or we think we're the one who just fulfilled the prophecy. And so charity for that, and then charity for ourselves as we're trying to figure it out. I think about... I personally don't think that Joseph Smith, when he started translating the Book of Mormon, truly understood what he was fulfilling. I think he was just obeying God. God asked him to do something, and he was being obedient to that. And so I think there's a lesson to be learned there.

DS: Yes.

WH: But then also just the thought that when we're bumping into each other, and we're trying to figure all of this out, and we're trying to be obedient to the Lord in the way we think we're supposed to do something, and we're getting it right, or we're getting it wrong, just to have charity for each other.

DS: Yeah. Yeah.

TK: There's one thing that came to mind when listening to the ~~tree~~ of the olive garden allegory was that I watched a documentary not too long ago about how trees in the forest talk to each other, and how there's like a mother tree, right? And then they send out signals and fungus (like through the fungus they can talk to each other), and when someone is struggling, that mother tree, it like tells all the other ones to support. And that kind of goes along. That just came to mind when I'm thinking of that, you know, listening to the allegory again. That's, I think, part of being equal is being equal in helping one another when someone is down, you know, that... So, it goes along the lines of charity.

DS: Yeah.

TK: It's kind of cool to think about.

SS: I'm just quickly gonna interject because I think that's a perfect example of... You know that; you were probably... Maybe Aaron knows that too. But you're the only one at this table that knows that. You're the only one at the table who watched that documentary— okay?—which is a powerful, powerful explanation of really how God works and how His creation works. We can't be expected to know that. But as soon as you say something like that, what comes to me is like, “Oh, my gosh, look at what I don't know.”

TK: Yeah.

SS: “Oh, my gosh, look at what I don't know!”

TK: [Indecipherable] lack at being that support.

SS: And if I don't know that, and I don't understand that metaphor, and I don't understand how God created the world so that I could have that symbol in my life, then I really can't know much of anything—you know?—and I will spend my life never knowing enough. And so staying in that space of “Wow.”

DS: The guy who might be really interesting to have walk through that allegory is Keith Henderson because he goes and gets cuttings from California and from La Gaille and from all over, and then he grows grapes, makes wine.

TK: There's all sorts of cool things [indecipherable].

DS: Thanks all of you for coming.

2024.04.07 The Holy Order, Part 2

April 7, 2024

Fulbright Auditorium, Hobart & William Smith Colleges
Geneva, New York

This is... It's gone back and forth, and right now the "forth" is that it's gonna go out over the Internet because this particular venue has an adequate connection to the Internet. And it was supposed to start at 10 [o'clock], and it's 10, and I like to be prompt.

I appreciate the invitation to come. For those that are unfamiliar with how we conduct conferences, volunteers decide that they would like to host a conference, and then they organize it, they arrange for the venue, they take care of all of the responsibilities associated with making a conference work, and they do it largely "volunteering" and out of pocket. Now, meals are very often the subject of requests that you pay for your own meal. But anytime someone agrees to do a conference, what they're agreeing to do is to SACRIFICE, which is an essential component of having faith. You cannot have faith if your religion doesn't require that you make sacrifices. Therefore, if you're looking to be compensated to participate in anything that we do, you're sadly mistaken, because we would like to encourage you to have faith. Those who attend the conference, by and large, are here as I am, paying your own way, buying your own plane ticket, renting your own car, paying for your own hotel, and making a sacrifice. I mean, the invitation to come and speak is not an invitation to "not sacrifice."

Religion mandates that we sacrifice for it in order to give us the capacity to have faith. When you have a multi-billion dollar organization supporting and compensating you, it's a matter of a truism, as Joseph described in the Lectures on Faith, it becomes impossible if you're rewarded in order to have faith. And so I'm grateful for the faith of those that have organized and sacrificed to make this conference take place.

If you did not see and haven't had access to what was presented last evening, it's worth the time and the trouble of looking at. One of the things that happened was a report on the translation of the Book of Mormon into Hebrew—not just "Hebrew," but "Old Testament Hebrew," and not just "Old Testament Hebrew," but the canon as it existed at 600 BC and earlier; and so the later prophets, who wrote after the moment that they departed from Jerusalem at 600 BC may have used slightly different vocabulary, added some words that didn't appear in the earlier canon, or used grammar adjustments that don't appear in the earlier canon. What is being done in the Hebrew translation is literally pre-600 BC Jewish Scripture, just as it would have been composed by the authors, although they used a different vocabulary.

(Brian [McNulty]! How you doin'? We have a Scotsman here! [Brian responds,] "I'm doin' okay." [Denver responds in a Scottish accent,] "Yer doin' okay." Well...)

Salvation comes through Jesus Christ. He was assigned the role of Redeemer before the foundation of the world, and in all likelihood was the only one that could have fulfilled that role. Resurrection is only available through Jesus Christ. Forgiveness of sins is only possible because of the atonement of Jesus Christ. This talk is about how, from time to time, Christ sends authority and order into the world, for His purposes. How He chooses to establish order does not change His essential, central, and singular role as our Savior.

Seven years ago, after a solar eclipse that traversed the United States, I gave a talk titled “The Holy Order.” Now another solar eclipse will traverse the United States in two days after this talk. This is titled “The Holy Order, Part 2.” Actually, the change in schedule: it’s tomorrow. Tomorrow there’ll be another eclipse.

The previous talk is both a paper that can be downloaded from my website and one of the essays in the book Eight Essays. The two talks (or papers) belong together.

Footnote 9 to that earlier talk explains a concern when we receive more Gospel light (I’m reading that footnote):

Although I am going to discuss this topic in only a limited way, each time I convey more of what God is now doing it gives God’s opponents more information they can use to deceive others. I hesitate to equip the pretenders, the well-intentioned but deceived, and the foolish with more ammunition to make a better pretense. Even those who hold good intentions are often tempted to run into errors because they possess only a tiny fraction of the truth. We should all only disclose what God approves...when He directs, and how He directs.

I should add that one of the problems that I have seen (and this isn’t in the paper, this is an aside, which I probably shouldn’t do ‘cuz it’s just gonna make this thing longer), but one of the things that I have noticed is that big religious ideas overwhelm weak minds. And sometimes people, in their enthusiasm, display a lot of foolishness simply because the big religious ideas are beyond their capacity to handle.

I’ve noticed when something new is added, there are those who start discussing it as if it were their own insight—even when they have never said one word about it until after they first learn of it from me. The same caution as set out in footnote 9 in the earlier talk applies equally here.

I am not going to repeat anything from the earlier talk but will assume you understand what was taught there, and this will follow up on that discussion.

The earlier Holy Order talk explained the term “fullness of the priesthood.” It was used by Joseph Smith at different times with different meanings, but we can do better than that. This talk is going to clarify that term.

The fullness of the Priesthood, including the rites of the Holy Order, is not something that has ever been or can be publicly explained in complete detail. The fullness of the Priesthood is different from the fullness of the Gospel. The Book of Mormon contains the “fullness of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.”

The fullness of the Gospel was intended openly for everyone. In contrast, the “fullness of the Priesthood” (which is the Holy Order after the Order of the Son of God) is not something that was restored to the church Joseph Smith organized, nor is it publicly available, nor is it intended FOR everyone. It may SERVE everyone, but it will never be held by everyone. The fullness of the Gospel of Jesus Christ produces faith in the Savior and will save you if accepted and obeyed. The Book of Mormon reports that some of what Jesus Christ taught cannot be written, neither can they be uttered by man (3 Nephi 9:5; see also 3 Nephi 8:4). Joseph Smith could not write all that God revealed to him. Much of those unspeakable things belong to the fullness of the Priesthood but will not be publicly available before the Lord's return.

Adam and Eve were the original priestly patriarch and matriarch to whom God gave the right of dominion over every living thing that moves upon the earth (Genesis 2:8-9). That appointment by God giving them dominion was (and is) part of the Holy Order. They held it jointly, as companions. Joseph Smith explained,

[The Holy Order] was first given to Adam; he obtained the [first presiding position on the Earth], and held the keys of it from generation to generation. He obtained it in the Creation, before the world was formed, as in Genesis 1:26, 27, 28. He had dominion given him over every living creature. He is Michael the Archangel, spoken of in the Scriptures. Then to Noah, who is Gabriel; he stands next in authority to Adam in the [Holy Order]; he was called of God to this office, and was the Father of all living in this day, and to him was given the dominion. These men held keys first on earth, and then in heaven. The [Holy Order] is an everlasting principle, and existed with God from eternity, and will to eternity, without beginning of days or end of years. The keys have to be brought from heaven, whenever the Gospel is sent. When they are revealed from Heaven, it is by Adam's authority. (Teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith, hereafter referred to as TPJS, p. 157; see also JSP Documents Vol. 6, pp. 542-543)

This (from Joseph) ties together parenthood, priesthood, dominion, and Holy Order. All of these elements were necessary for Adam and Eve to be at the head of the Holy Order and are necessary for it to exist today. In "Our Divine Parents" (a talk and paper you can also read on the website), the nature of eternal unity between the man and the woman and the dual nature of God were explained.

The Holy Order is not synonymous with having your calling and election made sure. You can have your calling and election made sure without having the Holy Order.

The Holy Order is not synonymous with being redeemed from the fall and returning to God's presence. That also can happen without having the Holy Order.

Nor is the Holy Order synonymous with having the fullness of revelations from before the creation of the world through the end of this cycle of creation. That, also, can be given to a person while they still lack the Holy Order.

An individual does not need to possess the Holy Order to be able to enter into a covenant. Covenants have been offered mankind by God through the Holy Order. Once offered, covenants are still honored even if the Holy Order is no longer present. The condition for a covenant to remain in effect requires only that the covenant never change. If officiators make changes, the covenant is broken and is no longer in effect.

Further, it is not required for you to be initiated into the Holy Order to become a member of the eternal Family of God. All those who will be exalted will be members. Only a tiny fraction of the Family will experience that in mortality.

Finally, any position in the Holy Order may change after this life. Christ reminded the mother of Jacob (or James) and John that positions in the afterlife will be assigned by His Father. The Holy Order must return before the Second Coming to re-establish God's "house of order." But organizing and ordering for the afterlife will not happen until some time after the Lord's return. Restoring and organizing God's Family is necessary because of the disorder caused by the fall of Adam. That disorder has been compounded by additional repeated apostasies from the periodic restorations of the Holy Order.

Despite what the Holy Order is not, it is important to understand. Most of our scriptures are the writings of members of the Holy Order. The Order must return. This talk is to confirm God is vindicating His promises, whether the world takes any notice or not.

The Holy Order function requires both a father and mother and is the reason Joseph Smith wrote,

...there are many teachers but perhaps not many Fathers. There are times coming when God will signify many things which are expedient for the well being of the saints but the times have not yet come but will come as fast as there can be found place and receptions for them. (JSP Documents Vol. 6, February 1838-August 1839, pp. 396-397)

That time did not come during Joseph's life, and therefore, the return of the Holy Order did not happen in his day. Because of the failure in Joseph's day, the Family or House of God still needs to be set in order. As is always the case, there will need to be a temple prepared for the Holy Order to function. It was first given to Adam and Eve in sacred space, and therefore, sacred space like the Garden of Eden is required for its function.

Abraham received the records going back to Adam and were passed down through generations to him. Despite having the records and testimony of the first fathers from which he learned about the Holy Order, Abraham did not hold it merely because he learned of it. It inspired him to seek for the blessings of the [Father] and the right whereunto [he] should be ordained to administer the same (Abraham 1:1).

Adam [Abraham] spoke with God face to face (Abraham 5:3) when he was not yet a member of the Holy Order. God also revealed to Abraham a vision of the creation of this world and its destiny while still not a member of the Holy Order.

Joseph Smith told us exactly when Abraham received his priestly appointment, the one that is without father or mother, beginning or end of days, but is endless and eternal. He also clarified who bestowed it. Despite all Abraham had received before, the Holy Order was not conferred upon him until he met and was initiated by Melchizedek. Abraham explained the process: it came down from the Fathers, from the beginning of time, yea, even from the beginning (or before the foundations of the earth) to the present time, even the right of the firstborn (or the first man — who is Adam — or first Father) through the Fathers unto me (Abraham 1:1). Melchizedek was a king and a priest and stood as God to give laws to the people, administering endless lives to the sons and daughters of Adam (see Glossary: Melchizedek) and from him, Abraham received the required initiation into the Holy Order.

In the talk “Religion of the Fathers,” I explained that the Book of Abraham covered events in Abraham’s life before he entered into Egypt. It was years after he left Egypt before Abraham met with Melchizedek and was initiated into the Holy Order. Abraham honored the Order and received it because he was not aspiring to supplant Melchizedek, the man who presided. Instead, he respected and honored the rights that belong to the Fathers. Had he wanted to supplant Melchizedek, he would not have qualified for the ordinance:

I sought for the blessings of the Fathers and the right whereunto I should be ordained to administer the same. Having been myself a follower of righteousness, desiring also to be one who possessed great knowledge, and to be a greater follower of righteousness, and to possess a greater knowledge, and to be a Father of many nations, a prince of peace, and desiring to receive instructions and to keep the commandments of God, I became a rightful heir, a high priest, holding the right belonging to the Fathers. It was conferred upon me from the Fathers: it came down from the Fathers, from the beginning of time, yea, even from the beginning (or before the foundations of the earth) to the present time, even the right of the firstborn (or the first man — who is Adam — or first Father) through the Fathers unto me. I sought for my appointment unto the Priesthood according to the appointment of God unto the Fathers concerning the seed. (Abraham 1:1, emphasis added)

That could never have happened for Abraham if he did not obtain it in the right way, with the right intent, and from the one who could confer it upon him. Periodic fighting over who had the right was always evidence of aspiring, untrustworthy men seeking their own vainglory. Abraham was faithful and un aspiring, but also seeking and willing.

The Lord trusted Abraham because he (Abraham) respected the man chosen by the Lord to stand at the head before him. By respecting Melchizedek, Abraham also respected all of the fathers, from Adam through Melchizedek, chosen by God as His representatives on Earth. Because Abraham was to become part of that Family, the Lord could say to him:

And you shall be a blessing unto your seed after you, that in their hands they shall bear this ministry and Priesthood unto all nations. And I will bless them through your name; for as many as receive this gospel shall be called after your name and shall be accounted your seed, and shall rise up and bless you, as unto their Father. And I will bless them that bless you and curse them that curse you. And in you (that is, in your Priesthood) and in your seed, (that is, [in] your Priesthood) — for I give unto you a promise that this right shall continue in you and in your seed after you (that is to say, the literal seed or...seed of the body) —

shall all the families of the earth be blessed, even with the blessings of the gospel, which are the blessings of salvation, even of...[eternal life]. (Abraham 3:1)

For the purpose of this talk, it is important to understand certain terms. The term “this gospel” does not just include the fullness of the Gospel of Jesus Christ but also the fullness of the Priesthood. Those who become part of the Holy Order necessarily recognize Abraham as a Father to them, and they in turn become his “seed” or descendants. Abraham was adopted as son to Melchizedek, which made Melchizedek father to Abraham. Subsequently, all those who were added to the line holding the fullness of the Priesthood became adopted descendants to Abraham. That is why it is written they shall rise up and bless you, as unto their Father (supra).

Melchizedek was “Father” to the righteous at the time Abraham was seeking for the blessings of the Fathers. Because Abraham honored the position occupied by Melchizedek, Heaven took notice. As stated before, Abraham was faithful and unassuming, but also seeking and willing. If he hoped to displace, or compete, or stand independent of Melchizedek, he would not have been qualified, nor even considered by Heaven.

If Lehi had not respected Jeremiah as the Lord’s messenger, the heavens would not have opened for him. If Nephi had not respected his father Lehi as God’s messenger, Nephi would not have had the heavens open for him. An aspiring spirit is toxic, and while aspiring men may gain some measure of spiritual understanding, they forfeit any blessing they might have been gained by accepting and honoring the Holy Order.

Abraham received the promise from the Lord that: I will bless them that bless you and curse them that curse you (supra). Abraham qualified for this blessing because Abraham honored the position occupied by Melchizedek. Abraham was not like Nephi’s older brothers, who assumed because they were older that they were entitled to rule and not be ruled. As Nephi described his brothers:

...they did seek to take away my life. Yea, they did murmur against me, saying, Our younger brother thinks to rule over us, and we have had much trial because of him; wherefore, now let us slay him, that we may not be afflicted more because of his words. For behold, we will not have him to be our ruler, for it belongs [to] us, who are the elder brethren, to rule over this people. (2 Nephi 4:1)

This refusal to respect God’s choice doomed them and their descendants to continual apostasy. That apostasy led to open warfare beginning with the first generation. Centuries later, Lamanite fighters were inspired by hatred because they believed your fathers did wrong their brethren, insomuch that they did rob them of their right to the government when it rightfully belonged [to] them (Alma 25:4). This hatred was grounded in religious resentment. Father Abraham was nothing like Laman. Instead, he willingly accepted and honored the Holy Order. Consider for a moment how unlike Abraham his great-grandsons were (the children of Jacob). They destroyed their father’s garment and perhaps other artifacts handed down within the Holy Order.

The only qualified man in Abraham's day (who obtained it from Adam through the Fathers), was Melchizedek. Although Abraham had been rescued by an angel, conversed with the Lord, had the heavens opened to him, the Holy Order could only be obtained from Melchizedek, who was the heir and officiator of that Order.

In the Restoration Edition of Scriptures, Abraham entered Egypt in Genesis chapter 7, paragraph 4. He left Egypt in paragraph 6. It is not until chapter 7, paragraph 14 (many years later) when Abraham met with Melchizedek. It was then he [Melchizedek] blessed him [Abraham] and said, Blessed Abram, you are a man of the Most High God, possessor of Heaven and earth (Genesis 7:14).

You should read that footnote when you get this paper. Oh, I'll read it:

Melchizedek lifted up his voice and blessed Abram (Genesis 7:17). It's interesting to consider whether the description "possessor of Heaven and earth" were about "the Most High God" or about "Blessed Abram" in Melchizedek's salutation. It could easily be either (or both).

It may seem odd that this Order is so rare that it is withheld from righteous men who have stood in God's presence. Nevertheless, there are good reasons, established before the foundation of the world, setting conditions that strictly confine the Order.

The Holy Order inducts couples into the Family of God. You can only have one father and one mother standing at the head at a time. Abraham could not receive it from anyone other than the singular couple who stood at the head. God's House is a house of order, and there is never more than one parental couple at a time at the head. There is no more reason to aspire or envy that couple than there was for you to jealously want to replace your own father or mother. We should hope for it to return. Early Christians prayed for the Lord's quick return: "μαρὰν ἄθᾶ" mar'-an ath'-ah (Lord come quickly). We should also hope for His quick return. However, unlike others who follow the Lord without understanding the prophecies, promises, and covenants, we should also hope and pray for the return of the Holy Order that must be restored before His return.

Unlike Abraham, people of this fallen world have rebelled against God's governance. Despite mankind's rebellion, God has been willing to gather people like a hen gathering her chicks under her wings, but we've rejected those offers. The heavens have not withdrawn, they have been evicted. A false "god of this world" has reigned from the rivers to the ends of the earth. He demands mankind worship him. And unfortunately, mankind has too often accommodated that demand with idolatry. For that to change, at least a small group of people must accept and welcome God's governance. Abraham did not assert independence from, nor compete with, Melchizedek. Had he done otherwise he would not have qualified. He recognized the officiant, respected his position, and paid tithes to Melchizedek.

There's a footnote there: "Today tithes are gathered in fellowships and distributed there to those in need" (footnote 34). So you need to read the footnotes!

This gained favor from God for Abraham. Had Abraham been aspiring to compete with or held any reservations about honoring the officiator Melchizedek, Abraham would never have received the “blessings of the Fathers and the right to be ordained to officiate in that Order.”

Joseph Smith wrote a discourse the day after announcing plans to build the Nauvoo Temple. He explained, in relevant part:

It is the highest and holiest Priesthood and is after the Order of the Son of God, and all other [powers] priesthoods are only parts, ramifications, powers, and blessings belonging to the same, and are held, controlled, and directed by it. It is the channel through which the Almighty commenced revealing his glory at the beginning of the creation of this earth, and through which he has continued to reveal himself to the children of men to the present time, and through which he will make known his purposes to the end of time.

Commencing with Adam, who was the first man, who is spoken of in Daniel as being the Ancient of Days, or in other words, the first and oldest of all, the great grand progenitor, of whom it is said in another place, He is Michael [Denver mistakenly said “Melchizedek”], because he was the first and father of all, not only by progeny, but...was the first to hold the spiritual blessings, to whom was made known the plan of ordinances for the salvation of his posterity unto the end, and to whom Christ was first revealed, and through whom Christ has been revealed from Heaven and will continue to be revealed from henceforth. Adam holds the keys of the dispensation of the fullness of times; i.e., the dispensation of all the times have been and will be revealed through him, from the beginning to Christ, and from Christ to the end of all the dispensations that are to be revealed. (T&C 140:2-3)

It may sound odd that Joseph Smith said Melchizedek “stood as God to give laws to the people, administering endless lives to the sons and daughters of Adam” (JSP Documents Vol. 13 August-December 1843, p. 74). That is, however, the actual purpose of the Holy Order. Joseph Smith was not unique in teaching a man can act in the place of God for the benefit of God’s people. When Moses was called to restore Israel to God’s presence, Moses was given that same role:

And you shall speak unto him and put words in his mouth, and I will be with your mouth and with his mouth, and will teach you what you shall do. And he shall be your spokesman unto the people, and he shall be, even he shall be to you in stead of a mouth, and you [Moses] shall be to him in stead of God. (Exodus 2:7)

Joseph Smith’s comment on this scripture confirms the principle:

These scriptures are a [mix] of very strange doctrines to the Christian world, who are blindly led by the blind. I will refer to another scripture. “Now,” says God, when He visited Moses in the bush, (Moses was a stammering sort of a boy like me) God said, “Thou shalt be a God unto the children of Israel.” God said, “Thou shalt be a God unto Aaron, and he shall be thy spokesman.” I believe those Gods that God reveals as Gods to be the sons of God, and all can cry, “Abba, Father!” Sons of God who exalt themselves to be Gods, even from before the foundation of the world, and are the only Gods I have a reverence for.” (TPJS, pp. 374-375; see also JSP Documents, Vol 15, p. 274)

That’s a strange comment that Joseph Smith made. Well, hopefully by the end of this talk you’ll understand it a bit better.

In his first letter, John mentioned there are those who are God’s “sons” and very like God: now...we are the sons of God, and it does not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him... (1 John 1:13).

Jesus Christ defended teaching He was the Son of God by explaining that there had been other mortal men who substituted for God. He taught that He was serving on God the Father’s behalf and got accused of blasphemy because of it:

Jesus answered them, Is it not written in your law: I [say], you are gods? If he called them gods unto whom the word of God came, and the scripture cannot be broken, do you say of him whom the Father has sanctified and sent into the world, You blaspheme, because I [say] I am the Son of God? (John 6:30)

It is a hard matter to hear, and a harder one to teach. There is nothing about this subject that should be understood in a worldly sense. It involves a heavenly order of things and not something to be divided from God’s purpose to save all mankind and exalt those He can. Not everyone is suited to become part of God’s Family. The reality is that very few are.

Jesus taught from Isaiah and would certainly have been acquainted with the Isaiah passage that states, I am the Lord, and there is none else. ...there is no God...besides me — a just God and a Savior, [and] there is none besides me. Look unto me and be saved, all the ends of the earth, for I am God and there is none else (Isaiah 15:19). And yet Christ also recognized there are gods unto whom the word of God came (supra). Therefore, the idea of men who are called “gods” in scripture ought to be understood as an appointment to represent and a calling to teach, and never as making a man anything more than a fellow servant. In the Book of Revelation, an angel was sent to John and testified of his message that, These are the true sayings of God. John fell to the earth to worship the angel, and was rebuked for showing him honor: And I fell at his feet to worship him. And he said unto me, Do you not see...I am your fellow servant? And of your brethren who have the testimony of Jesus? Worship God, for the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy (Revelation 7:10). Bear in mind and understand that messengers can be acknowledged in scripture as “gods, even the sons of god”— while we are commanded at the same time to only worship the Father in Heaven and His Son.

Jesus Christ, the greatest of all, is the best example of this principle in action. He stood as God and was in fact the Son of God. Yet when Christ was asked about His kingship and kingdom, He explained:

My kingdom is not of this world. If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews. But now is my kingdom not from here. Pilate therefore said unto him, Are you a king then? Jesus answered, You say that I am a king; to this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world — that I should bear witness [of] the truth. Everyone that is of the truth hears my voice. (John 10:7)

This is an example of how the Holy Order should operate. He came to fulfill the role of servant. Jesus Christ set the pattern and demonstrated how God's House is correctly ruled:

But Jesus called [unto] them and said, You know that the princes of the gentiles exercise dominion over them, and [that] they that are great exercise authority upon them. But it shall not be so among you. But whoever will be great among you, let him be your minister. ...whoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant, even as the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life, a ransom for many. (Matthew 10:3)

The Lord's Holy Order is not designed to impose rule, control, or assert dominion over the unwilling. It is designed to teach correct principles and then let those who are taught govern themselves. The Holy Order empowers and frees. It assumes the individual will decide to give heed to what is taught. In contrast, ambitious men crave control over others. They enslave and subjugate. They oppose freedom and self-rule. The Holy Order relies on man's agency. The adversary wants to limit and destroy man's agency.

Christ explained His role, which is similar to the role entrusted to the Holy Order:

My doctrine does not come from me, but from God who sent me. Anyone who walks in God's path will understand his doctrine, because that path increases light and knowledge. I testify of that path. Follow it and you will know whether I am sent by God or [whether] I am not sent by God. Teachers who preach from their own understanding only gratify their pride, but a teacher of truth teaches only what God tells him, and that teacher provides a light worth heeding. (TSJ 6:5)

If God gave Christ the words to teach, then those who believed and followed those teachings were following Christ's Father. This is the same as when the angel asked Nephi if he believed the words of his father. Nephi said emphatically that he did. Upon hearing this, the angel proclaimed, Blessed art thou, Nephi, because thou believest in the Son of the Most High God (1 Nephi 3:6). Believing in the words of truth from a messenger is to believe in the Son of the Most High God! That is as true today as when the angel said this to Nephi.

Enoch is another example of a teacher from the Holy Order. He was sent by God to teach a message. When called by God, Enoch responded, Why is it that I have found favor in your sight, and am but a lad, and all the people hate me, for I am slow of speech; why am I your servant? (Genesis 4:2). He was no braggart. The task sobered him; he believed himself unequal to the task. But he taught, some people repented, and without any compulsion, those willing to be taught lived together in peace.

When he was commissioned by God to teach Israel, Moses reacted similarly to Enoch: And Moses said unto the Lord, O my Lord, I am not eloquent, neither before now nor since you have spoken unto your servant, but I am slow of speech and of a slow tongue (Exodus 2:7). Moses also described the difference between himself (all mankind) and God: Now for this once I know that man is nothing, which thing I never had supposed (Genesis 1:2).

Those who have been part of the Holy Order have been trustworthy to God because they know they are weak. When the Lord says He will make weak things become strong, I do not believe that means a man will become strong but instead means God will provide the strength to those who rely on Him.

If every angel from Adam...

[Denver coughs] Excuse me. They gave me water, but I think this has been opened. It's sorta like kissing the predecessor. That reminds me of a story. (Reed, you're just gonna have to edit this thing.)

So, one year... I need to segregate this.

One year we went to the bike/the motorcycle rally in Sturgis, and that year we went to some rural road that's north and south but not an interstate, 'cuz you always take the back roads. And we were stopped at a gas station, and the fellow I was with had brought his daughter. And his daughter and I were sitting on a bench outside the gas station where we'd stopped to get a drink and to refuel and sally forth to our decadence in Sturgis. It's like "Disneyland in Hell," according to one of my friend's wives. So we're at the gas station, and this rather friendly fellow from Colorado came up to talk to her and to me, and he was just a welder who welded by trade. He had... I think he had a Shovelhead; it was an older bike. And we had this pleasant exchange, but boy! He was non-hygienic! After he walked away, I said, "I think he had green teeth!" She said, "Yeahhh!"

Well, this bottle of water that she and I had been sharing, and after we'd shared it for awhile, the guy—Green Teeth—came back to get his water bottle he'd left on the bench that had been between the two of us, and I said to her, "Dude! That was like kissing Green Teeth...which is bad for you, but it's so much worse for me!"

(K, you've gotta get that out of there!)

If every angel from Adam down to the present time who ministered to Joseph Smith were to minister to you, and if Joseph and Hyrum were added to those who ministered to you, and if you knew more about the heavens than any man now living, you would still be nothing. We do not and cannot comprehend enough to understand God's works. The Lord explained to Moses, For my works are without end, and also my words, for they never cease. Wherefore, no man can behold all my works except he behold all my glory, and no man can behold all my glory and afterward remain in the flesh on the earth (Genesis 1:1). Even if a man knows more about Heaven than anyone alive at the time, he still remains incapable of knowing all that God has in store for mankind.

We are feeble, unprofitable servants. None of us have anything to brag about. Any boast about being great and having some wonderful assignment from God is arrogant and vainglorious. DO something for God, don't claim you are going to do so. Then, if you accomplish something, Let another man praise you, and not your own mouth; a stranger, and not your own lips (Proverbs 4:49).

The arrogance of men is astonishing. Nephi understood this vanity and described it:

Oh the vainness, and the frailties, and the foolishness of men! When they are learned they think they are wise, and they hearken not unto the counsel of God, for they set it aside, supposing they know of themselves. Wherefore, their wisdom is foolishness and it profiteth them not; and they shall perish. (2 Nephi 6:9)

The Holy Order is not for the benefit of the holder. No one who views himself or herself as worthy has ever been trusted with it. They (the man and the woman) must be meek like Moses, Now the man Moses was very meek, above all the men who were upon the face of the earth (Numbers 7:22). It is troubling, daunting, and perilous. There is no great reward in this life. Here, those who are members of the Holy Order will be doubted, criticized, envied, accused, feared, and cast out from those who they are asked to teach. Only a very few will be willing to give them heed, and many who do listen will still be poor disciples, wayward in their conduct, and misunderstanding what is taught. People rejected the Lord, and more have (and will) reject His messengers.

God's message given through a member of the Holy Order is not to be trifled with, either by the holder or by people who are taught. Everything is always voluntary, and teaching must still persuade. Pure knowledge and love unfeigned are the approved tools. Sometimes reproof with sharpness is necessary as well. Gratifying pride or vain ambition are forbidden.

The approved tools are necessarily what the world regards as "weak." It is intentionally designed by the Lord to be weak. It is the opposite of the "strong man" model. But if followed, the Holy Order can teach people to become strong in faith, hope, and charity. As it is written, If they humble themselves before me and have faith in me, then will I make weak things become strong unto them. Behold, I will shew unto the gentiles their weakness. And I will shew unto them that faith, hope, and charity bringeth unto me, the fountain of all righteousness (Ether 5:5).

Just like Jesus Christ, we believe in being subject to and obeying the law. We are not our own "sovereign" but are subject to obey rules and laws of the land. We render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's. There is something called the "sovereign citizen movement," which has no place in the teachings of Jesus Christ. Sovereign citizens claim the right to reject laws, claiming they have no application to them.

The “sovereign citizen movement” refers to a group of people who see themselves as answerable only to the laws as they interpret them, not as they are written. Members of the sovereign citizen movement include everyone from litigants and tax protesters, to those who promote financial schemes. They do not believe they are subject to the same governmental statutes that govern the rest of the country. (<https://legaldictionary.net/sovereign-citizen/>)

The worst examples of this are Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols whose Oklahoma bombing killed 168 people, 19 of whom were children. They injured another 680 people. The most tranquil examples are tax protestors who refuse to pay federal, state, and local taxes. We should reject all of the “sovereign citizen” ideas because they are contrary to the teaching and example of Jesus Christ. They are contrary to the restored faith.

While Christ declared His kingdom is not of this world (John 10:7), there are those who think they can found their own heavenly kingdom. The advocates display the worst form of hypocrisy because they cannot detect their own inconsistencies. I have a pamphlet that advocates a form of withdrawing from “Babylon” by denouncing U.S. Citizenship and claiming to be a citizen of the “Kingdom of Heaven.” The pamphlet advocating this is bound in a plastic spiral binding. This ignores the fact that the plastic is likely produced by hydrocarbons requiring an entire fossil fuel industry to provide the pamphlet’s binding.

It is printed with ink. The ink-making process requires raw materials of pigments, binders, solvents, and additives to produce, all of which require multiple industries to provide the ink for the “Kingdom of Heaven” pamphlet.

It is printed on paper that uses cellulose pulp from a lumber operation, transported by logging trucks to mills, where sodium hydroxide and sodium sulfide are used to break down the lignin of the wood for paper manufacture.

The transportation trucks move along roads paid for by federal and state tax collection. They are safe because of federal, state, and local law enforcement that keep the roads safe for commerce to take place.

All of the raw ingredients used to make the pamphlet were produced and supplied by Babylon. The author is oblivious to his obvious dependence upon what he calls “Babylon.”

While pretending to be separated from “Babylon,” their hypocrisy knows no limits. They are parasitic and require the ongoing support of the same society, government, and taxpayers they judge as morally inferior.

Part of the difficulty with those who believe this way is that they seem to be possessed with a false spirit that will not suffer common sense to be spoken in their presence. They advocate their withdrawal from society relentlessly and do not see and will not hear how things really are. It is as if the spirit possessing them will not tolerate the truth to be spoken.

Those who believe they can be more pure by living “off-grid” are fooling themselves. Some, for example, use solar panels instead of connecting to the electrical grid. Solar panels are built using rare earth minerals, mined using heavy equipment, burning fossil fuels, transported using public highways, and utterly dependent on the proper functioning of a complex society that clothes, powers, protects, and serves them. We should be grateful to society, humble about our own dependence, and accepting of our plight. We may not like “Babylon” (as the fool calls the functioning society that succors them), but as long as it exists, we are not and cannot be independent of it.

Unfortunately, I know people who have bought into these false ideas. Their lives have been burdened, and many of the responsibilities that they should take care of for themselves have been imposed on others. Some have lost family homes, one has been jailed, vehicles without licenses have been impounded, and countless difficulties have resulted from their lawlessness. They foolishly believe they are living a “more pure” and “godly” way of life, while the sad reality is that they are forsaking basic responsibilities they should discharge for themselves.

In the Sermon on the Mount, the Lord gave us this instruction to follow:

Truly, truly I say unto you, I give unto you to be the light of the world. A city that is set on a hill cannot be hidden. Behold, do men light a candle and put it under a bushel? [No, they put it] on a candlestick, and it gives light to all that are in the house. Therefore, let your light so shine before this world, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in Heaven. (Matthew 3:16; see also 3 Nephi 5:21)

How do you suppose rebellion and lawlessness to be “good works” that “glorify your Father who is in Heaven?” They will instead resent your imposition upon society. We may fool ourselves into believing we are independent of society, but we are not. All of us who obey, honor, and sustain the law are symbiotic with the government and society at large. Those who claim sovereign citizenship are parasitic. None of us are independent. We should acknowledge our plight and stop fooling ourselves.

There would have been no governments of man if the original Holy Order had been followed from the beginning. Because of rebellion against God’s plan, societies divided into governments that supplanted God’s order with kings, magistrates, governors, dictators, and ministers. For the present, governments are necessary for peaceful and ordered societies to function, and therefore deserve our obedience to their laws. But loyalty to God must remain. God’s “kingdom” is indeed not of this world. Man’s kingdoms will be supplanted by a returning Lord. Before then, we should respect and submit to the order of society and contribute to the peace and safety of our communities.

Society will only welcome us if we benefit others. Letting our light shine includes making our towns and neighborhoods better places by our service to others. People should want us. Because we are commanded to become the “salt of the earth” or the “leaven” that benefits the entire meal, we cannot abandon principles that make us valuable to society.

The First Amendment gives religious societies exemption from taxation. Not individual taxpayers, but the society itself is exempt from taxation. The Lord's House will be built when a command is given and will be exempt from property taxes. However, despite this Constitutional protection, a voluntary payment to support the surrounding community as an act of appreciation to neighbors is consistent with being "leaven" or "salt" or a "shining light." I would hope everyone would want to do this.

While we should not be in rebellion against our government, sadly the time will come when:

With famine, and plague, and earthquake, and the thunder of heaven, and the fierce and vivid lightning also, shall the inhabitants of the earth be made to feel the wrath, and indignation, and chastening hand of an Almighty God, until the consumption decreed ha[th] made a full end of all nations. (T&C 85:3)

That's not something to look forward to. It will be a time of great mourning and sorrow. Whatever we can do to delay that day and preserve our nation we should do.

Prophecies in the Book of Mormon and modern revelation will be vindicated. Societies will degenerate into violence. The Book of Mormon warns us of the coming destruction of all the gentile nations upon the Americas and all other lands.

But behold, in the last days, or...the days of the gentiles, yea, behold, all the nations of the gentiles, and also the Jews, both those who shall come upon this land and those who shall be upon other lands, yea, even upon all the lands of the earth, behold, they will be drunken with iniquity and all manner of abominations. And when that day shall come, they shall be visited of the Lord of Hosts with thunder, and with earthquake, and with... great noise, and with storm and tempest, and with the flame of devouring fire. And all the nations that fight against Zion and that distress her shall be as a dream of a night vision. (2 Nephi 11:15)

Now, I said I would take a break every hour for about ten minutes, and it's been an hour. And while that's not the best places or the happiest note to... We'll find out just how intimidated you are by how many people now visit the restroom! So, let's take ten minutes.

Although there are gentile nations that seem sturdy, enduring, and capable, to God they are no more substantial than a dream. They will pass away. The Lord's people do not need to fight against these governments, nor to cheer on their demise. Fleeing from the coming societal failure is first internal. Our fears, jealousies, shame, guilt separate us from God and each other. We owe honesty and candor to one another. We're living a lie when we fail to honestly speak to each other. I've observed how we deceitfully fail to speak directly to one another but instead tell our complaints to uninvolved others. That's not only wrong, it turns an opportunity to improve one another with honest feedback into gossiping behind our backs.

Gossiping about someone's misbehavior only makes society worse. On the other hand, honestly confronting each other and truthfully sharing our concerns can heal society. We either grow together peacefully, honestly, and candidly, or we will never have peace between each other. We are told to prepare to live in peace and with our fellow man. Fleeing Babylon is first emotional and internal and will become physical and external as the world's institutions fail.

There is nothing about becoming radical, aloof, or isolated that shows we have fled Babylon. Although we should have our eyes open to the wickedness all around us, we can still have compassion on the victims of terrible ideas, false beliefs, and destructive and corrupting social and governmental trends. The world is flooded with lies. Lies were used by Satan to wrap the world in chains at the time of Noah. The widespread lies today are much like the days of Noah. If you want to escape the destruction of Babylon, study and hold tight to truth.

Mormon recorded a specific plea God commanded him to write to us:

Turn, all ye gentiles, from your wicked ways, and repent of your evil doings — of your lyings and deceivings, ...of your whoredoms, and of your secret abominations, and your idolatries, and...your murders, and your priestcrafts, and your envyings, and your strifes, and from all your wickedness and abominations — and come unto me and be baptized in my name, that ye may receive a remission of your sins and be filled with the holy ghost, that ye may be numbered with my people who are of the house of Israel. (3 Nephi 14:1)

Our world is filled with lying, deceit, whoredoms, murder, priestcrafts, envy, and strife. While the exact number is not known, it's estimated that approximately 60 million American children have been murdered in the womb. When the U.S. Supreme Court decided in 1973 that abortion was a constitutional right, the nation had no say about it. When that decision was reversed in 2022, the issue was returned to each state to decide. As soon as states were given the choice, the people became accountable for the continued slaughter of innocent children. The United States has engaged in a half-century of genocidal slaughter of unborn children. Continuing it when given a choice to end it by the voice of the people makes Americans complicit in mass-murder. Consider this warning from the Book of Mormon: And if the time cometh that the voice of the people doth choose iniquity, then is the time that the judgments of God will come upon you. Yea, then is the time he will visit you with great destruction, even as he has hitherto visited this land (Mosiah 13:7). That warning is as applicable to us now as it was to the earlier people who inherited this land. France recently amended their constitution to call abortion a "right." It is now legal in at least 75 countries (where 40% of the world's women reside).

Political parties have learned that fear motivates people to follow politicians who promise safety and protection. Class envy, resentment of others, false allegations of racism, and sexual confusion are political tools. If that course continues uninterrupted, the outcome will be violence. Already, the rhetoric of violence is justified as "restorative justice" and "ending oppression."

Eventually the gentile nations will become unsustainable as they descend into violence and confusion. The only preparation for that inevitability is to reject the growing tidal wave of lies. We cannot live in peace with each other if we believe lies about one another.

And it shall come to pass among the wicked that every man that will not take [up] his sword against his neighbor must needs flee [to] Zion for safety, and there shall be gathered unto it out of every nation under heaven, and it shall be the only people that shall not be at war one with another. And it shall be said among the wicked, Let us not go up to battle against Zion, for the inhabitants of Zion are terrible, wherefore we cannot stand. And it shall come to pass that the righteous shall be gathered out from among all nations, and shall come to Zion singing with songs of everlasting joy. (T&C 31:15)

There will be a place of safety. But “peace” is not possible if your mind has been demented by confusion and deceit. The truth alone can make you free. Jesus Christ was confronted by false religious teachers and explained why they missed the mark. He explained:

Only if you continue to follow my teachings will you be my students indeed, because you will know the truth, and the truth will make you free. The leaders interrupted to claim, We’re Abraham’s descendants, and have never been slaves to any man. Why do you say we will become free? Jesus answered them, ...I say unto you, Whoever misses the mark is the slave of errors. And such a slave will not be allowed to be within Abraham’s house in the resurrection, but the Son will remain part of God’s Family forever.

If the Son sets you free from sin, you are free indeed. ...If you were really Abraham’s children, you would do the works of Abraham. ...I am a man that has only told you the truth that I have heard from the Most High God; Abraham would never do such a thing. You follow the example of your real father. ...If God were your Father, you would love me, for I am sent by and represent God. I am not speaking my own words or pursuing my own agenda, but the Father’s words and agenda. Why do you fail to comprehend my words? Your refusal to hearken and submit to my teachings makes you deaf indeed. Your father is the accuser, and you share the envy and rebellion of your father. He was a rebellious destroyer from the beginning, and fought against the truth, ...he [preferred] lies. [Because] he spreads a lie, he advances his agenda. He is the source of deceit in this fallen world. And because I am the Source of truth, you are unable to believe me. Which of you can truthfully show that I have missed the mark? And if I teach the truth, why do you refuse to believe me? Everyone who follows the Most High God hearkens to God’s words. Because you do not follow the Most High God, you cannot hear him. (TSJ 6:18-19)

The test for mankind is always the same. It’s no different now than when Adam, Enoch, Noah, or Abraham were here. It is no different now than when Christ was here. When the Lord commissions a member of the Holy Order to declare His message, some will hear and be numbered as His sheep. The rest will reject the warning and forfeit accordingly. It's always been necessary for mankind to face and choose the truth while being confronted with widespread and relentless lies.

If you can find a messenger with a godly message, then give heed. The Holy Order will return as part of the end time being like the days of Noah. I doubt you will hear anyone with real authority from the Lord speak about it as if it were a credential. When it comes to something that is most sacred, fools will damn themselves by falsely claiming that which they do not have:

Wherefore, let all men beware how they take my name in their lips, for behold, verily I say that many there be who are under this condemnation, who use the name of the Lord and use it in vain, having not authority. Wherefore, let the church repent of their sins and I the Lord will own them, otherwise they shall be cut off.

Remember that that which comes from above is sacred, and must be spoken with care and by constraint of the spirit, and in this there is no condemnation. (T&C 50:14-15)

Those who hold it are unlikely to boast of it. Those who boast of it are not likely to be trusted by God. True holders let the false claimants go in peace. Abraham did not challenge the false, feigning claim of Pharaoh.

Truth alone should be proof of the position. God will do work through whom He chooses and will provide whatever knowledge and authority is necessary to complete the work. Although His servant may be misunderstood, the Lord will see that he is like Moses and can be trusted with His work because he will pursue the Lord's will and not his own. He will hardly mention authority or keys. There will be no need or desire for a hierarchy to accomplish the work. Much like Enoch and Melchizedek, they will teach.

In a letter from Liberty Jail, Joseph explained how the highest order of Priesthood, or any portion of it, should be used:

[Men's] hearts are set so much upon the things of this world, and aspire to the honors of men, that they do not learn this one lesson — that the rights of the Priesthood are inseparably connected with the Powers of Heaven and ... Powers of Heaven cannot be controlled nor handled, only upon the principles of righteousness. That they may be conferred upon us, it[s] true, but when we undertake to cover our sins or to gratify our pride, our vain ambition, or to exercise control, or dominion, or compulsion, upon the souls of the children of men in any degree of unrighteousness, behold, the Heavens withdraw themselves, the spirit of the Lord is grieved, and when it is withdrawn, Amen to the priesthood or the authority of that man. Behold, ere he is aware, he is left [to] himself, to kick against the pricks, to persecute the saints, and to fight against God. We have learned by sad experience that it[s] the nature and disposition of almost all men, as soon as they get a little authority, as they suppose, they will immediately begin to exercise unrighteous dominion. Hence many are called, but few are chosen.

No power or influence can or ought to be maintained by virtue of the priesthood; only by persuasion, by long-suffering, by gentleness and meekness, and by love unfeigned, by kindness and pure knowledge, which shall greatly enlarge the soul; without hypocrisy and without guile; ...your bowels also [should be] full of charity toward all men, and to the household of faith; and virtue garnish your thoughts unceasingly. Then shall your confidence wax strong in the presence of God, and the doctrines of the Priesthood shall distill upon your soul as the dews from heaven. The holy ghost shall be your constant companion, and your scepter an unchanging scepter of righteousness and truth, and your dominion shall be an everlasting dominion, ...without compulsory means it shall flow unto you for ever and ever. (T&C 139:5-6)

God the Father, who upholds the worlds by His power, uses that power to bless and benefit all of us. Both the good and the evil benefit from the power of God the Father. Christ explained that we should treat one another kindly that you may be the children of your Father who is in Heaven; for he makes his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sends rain on the just and on the unjust. (Matthew 3:26)

Generations have wanted to hear the words that are being taught today and have not heard them. To hear them is to become accountable for receiving and then acting on what is taught.

King Benjamin put authority and “kingship” into perspective:

I have not commanded you to come up hither that [you] should fear me, or that [you] should think...I of myself am more than a mortal man. But I am like as yourselves, subject to all manner of infirmities in body and mind. Yet as I have been chosen by this people, and was consecrated by my father, and was suffered by the hand of the Lord that I should be a ruler and a king over this people, and have been kept and preserved by his matchless power to serve thee with all the might, mind, and strength which the Lord hath granted unto me...

He did not presume that his position made him anything more than another mortal man, subject to infirmities. But he could not deny that the Lord had made him a ruler over the people. Continuing:

...I say unto you that as I have been suffered to spend my days in your service, even up to this time, and have not sought gold, nor silver, nor any manner of riches of you, neither have I suffered that ye should be confined in dungeons, nor that ye should make slaves [of one] another, or...ye should murder, or plunder, or steal, or commit adultery, or even I have not suffered that ye should commit any manner of wickedness, and have taught you that ye should keep the commandments of the Lord in all things which he hath commanded you...

He was not motivated by wealth, but by service. He was a “ruler” and a teacher. And he taught his people to obey the commandments. Continuing:

...And even I myself have labored with mine own hands that I might serve you, and that ye should not be laden with taxes, and ...there should nothing come upon you which was grievous to be borne. ...I have not done these things that I might boast, neither do I tell [you] these things that thereby I might accuse you; but I tell you these things that ye may know that I can answer a clear conscience before God this day. Behold, I say unto you that because I[’ve] said...that I ha[ve] spent my days in your service, I do[n’t] desire to boast, for I have only been in the service of God. ...behold, I tell you these things that ye may learn wisdom, ...ye may learn that when [you] are in the service of your fellow beings, [you’re] only in the service of your God... (Mosiah 1:7-8)

This head of the Holy Order performs his obligation to God and his fellow believer by serving. He is not served. He labors with his own hands to support himself and his family. He does not receive compensation for serving God. Alma abandoned secular authority to serve in the Holy Order. Alma delivered up the judgment seat to Nephihah, and confined himself wholly to the High Priesthood of the Holy Order of God, to the testimony of the word, according to the spirit of revelation and prophecy (Alma 2:5). Teaching and persuading are best accomplished without exerting authority. Continuing:

...Behold, [you] have called me your king. And if I, whom ye call your king, do labor to serve you, then had not ye ought to labor to serve one another? And behold also, if I, whom ye call your king, who has spent his days in your service and yet has been in the service of God, doth merit any thanks from you, oh how had you ought to thank your Heavenly King! (Mosiah 1:8)

God chooses people to serve, and their role is to provide service. God approves those who desire to help others, bless lives, and lose their own ambition. Only a mere servant can be trusted with the Holy Order. This is why the Holy Order can act in the stead of God, and those who benefit from it are not trusting the arm of flesh. Quite the contrary, the words of a servant in the Holy Order are the words of the Lord Himself:

What I, the Lord, have spoken, I have spoken, and I excuse not myself. And though the heaven[s] and the earth pass away, my word shall not pass away, but shall all be fulfilled, whether by my own voice or by the voice of my servants it is the same. (T&C 54:7)

This principle of equivalency does not apply to pretenders. They certainly apply to the man and the woman of the Holy Order. They did apply to Joseph Smith in 1831. They would apply to Hyrum Smith in 1841 when he was given the assignment as Joseph’s older brother. When the Lord appoints such a servant to bless His people, then trust in that servant is not trust in the arm of flesh but trust in the arm of the Lord. It was not idolatry for Abraham to go to Melchizedek for authority and blessing, to pay him tithing, and to recognize and respect him as God’s king and priest. The name “Melchizedek” is a compound word that means “king” and “priest.”

That name-title was given to Shem, the son of Noah. Shem obtained it by descent from Adam through his father, Noah. As revelation explained:

Abraham received the Priesthood from Melchizedek, who received it through the lineage of his fathers, even till Noah, ...from Noah till Enoch, through the lineage of their fathers, and from Enoch to Abel who was slain by the conspiracy of his brother, who received the Priesthood by the commandment of God, by the hand of his father Adam, who was the first man, which Priesthood continues in the church of God in all generations, and is without beginning of days or end of years. (T&C 82:10)

The Holy Order was and is intended to establish a “house of order.” In 1836, the saints were invited to reestablish the Lord’s house of order. They hoped to accomplish that by their own initiative: The Lord wanted His House, Even a house of prayer, a house of fasting, a house of faith, a house of learning, a house of glory, a house of order, a House of God (T&C 123:3). They were offered the Holy Order or fullness of the Priesthood, but it was lost unto [them] (T&C 141:10) and taken away from that generation. This was not unexpected. The Lord knew they would fail and had previously promised there would come a time when His House would be set in order (T&C 83:4). This will happen when the Lord reestablishes the Holy Order. The Lord’s “House” is not merely a physical building but includes His Family/House as well.

Egypt’s first Pharaoh tried to perpetuate the Holy Order by imitating what had been in the first generation:

Pharaoh, being a righteous man, established his kingdom and judged his people wisely and justly all his days, seeking earnestly to imitate that order established by the fathers in the first generations, in the days of the first Patriarchal reign, even in the reign of Adam, and also Noah, his father, who blessed him with the blessings of the earth, and with the blessings of wisdom, but cursed him as pertaining to the Priesthood. (Abraham 2:3)

The name “Pharaoh” in Egyptian means “great house.” Pharaoh wanted to recreate the “House” meaning the “Family” of God. That is why he was trying “earnestly to imitate that order established by the fathers in the first generations, in the days of the first Patriarchal reign.” He wanted to be the head of God’s Family on Earth. However, men cannot establish the Holy Order. It can only be established by God or, as Joseph Smith explained, through Adam (the original father and holder of the right) under the direction of Jesus Christ.

Those who falsely claim to be apostles of the Lord are not to be trusted, and following them is putting trust in the arm of flesh. When Zion returns, it will be clear who the Lord’s servants are.

The Apostle Paul explained that you cannot have faith unless God sends a messenger to preach the truth:

How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? And how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear without a preacher? And how shall they preach, except they are sent? — as it is written: How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the gospel of peace, and bring glad tidings of good things! So then faith comes by hearing the word of God. (Romans 1:49)

Those who deliver a living message from the Living Lord are indispensable ministers whose work is needed so that the “residue of men” can have faith in God, but only God can save us. As it is written:

...neither have angels ceased to minister unto the children of men. For behold, they are subject unto him, to minister according to the word of his command, shewing themselves unto them of strong faith and a firm mind in every form of godliness. And the office of their ministry is to call men unto repentance, and to fulfill and to do the work of the covenants of the Father which he hath made unto the children of men, to prepare the way among the children of men by declaring the word of Christ unto the chosen vessels...that they may bear testimony of him; [that] by so doing, God prepareth the way that the residue of men may have faith in Christ, that the holy ghost may have place in their hearts, according to the power thereof; and after this manner bringeth to pass the Father the covenants which he hath made unto the children of men. And Christ hath said, If ye will have faith in me, ye shall have power to do whatsoever thing is expedient in me. And he hath said, Repent, all ye ends of the earth, and come unto me, and be baptized in my name, and have faith in me, that ye may be saved. (Moroni 7:6)

The Holy Order requires both a man and a woman in similitude of Adam and Eve. The couple holds dominion as a father and mother over the Family of God on Earth. That is different than acting as a priest and priestess. God’s House is a house of order. To set it right is something far more important than administering a church or performing priestly rites.

We know that Adam is the one with authority over the Holy Order. Adam holds the keys of the dispensation of the fullness of times; i.e., the dispensation of all...times [that] have been and will be revealed through him, from the beginning to Christ, ...from Christ to the end of...the dispensations that are to be revealed (T&C 140:3). However, the identity of “Adam” is not just the first man but includes his helpmeet. It is the first couple who are named “Adam,” and Eve stands as partner in this order. In the day that God created man, in the likeness of God made he him; in the image of his own body, male and female, created he them, and blessed them, and called their name Adam in the day [that] they were created and became living souls in the land... (Genesis 3:14).

The role of the woman is greater than most have imagined. We have enough in modern revelation to know of the mother’s importance and power. Consider these words from the Answer to the Prayer for Covenant:

I say [un]to you, Abraham and Sarah sit upon a Throne, for he could not be there if not for Sarah’s covenant with him; Isaac and Rebecca sit upon a Throne, and

Isaac likewise could not be there if not for Rebecca's covenant with him; and Jacob and Rachel sit upon a Throne, and Jacob could not be there if not for Rachel's covenant with him; and all these have ascended above Dominions and Principalities and Powers, to abide in my Kingdom. (T&C 157:42, emphasis added)

The covenant-making to secure a throne requires the direct participation of the woman. The Holy Order involves both the husband and wife. Refer back to "Our Divine Parents" regarding the Heavenly Mother and the other mothers involved in the Holy Order. The Heavenly Mother declared, By me kings reign and princes decree justice. By me princes rule and nobles, even all the judges of the earth (Proverbs 1:36). That talk went on to explain that it was Eve who identified the successor to Adam. That was her right, just as it is the Heavenly Mother's right over Her offspring. It was Rebecca's right to choose Jacob over Esau. We should therefore expect the woman/mother/wife/priestess to be involved directly with the covenant making, who positions her husband in the Holy Order. And we should anticipate that the senior-most mother would also likewise have a say in who succeeds her husband as heir-successor in the Holy Order.

It was the Holy Order that existed as the singular government organization for mankind at the first. There was no "church" or other institution. There was only a family, and it had at the head a father and mother set there by God. They were given dominion over all others. They were to be "husbandmen" to raise up righteous posterity who would walk in the pathway leading back to God.

With the exception of Abraham, all subsequent dispensations were organized different from the first. But the end will return to the beginning, and what was once will be again, for the prophecy must be fulfilled: Now this same Priesthood which was in the beginning shall be in the end of the world also (now this prophecy Adam spoke as he was moved upon by the holy ghost) (Genesis 3:14).

This Order has been offered in earlier dispensations but can be and has been repeatedly rejected. For example, the Holy Order was refused by the Israelites and, therefore, taken from them:

And the Lord said unto Moses, Hew two other [stones of tablet], like unto the first, and I will write upon them also the words of the law, according as they were written [on] the first on the tablets which you broke. But it shall not be according to the first, for I will take away the Priesthood out of their midst. Therefore, my Holy Order and the ordinances thereof shall not go before them, for my presence shall not go up in their midst lest I destroy them. But I will give unto them the law as at...first; but it shall be after the law of a carnal commandment, for I have sworn in my wrath that they shall not enter into my presence, into my rest, in the days of their pilgrimage. Therefore, do as I have commanded you, and be ready in the morning, and come up in the morning unto Mount Sinai, and present yourself there to me in the top of the mount. And no man shall come up with you, neither let any man be seen throughout all the mount... (Exodus 18:5, emphasis added)

Modern revelation explains this was a terribly significant loss for ancient Israel.

And this greater Priesthood administers the gospel and holds the key of the mysteries of the kingdom, even the key of the knowledge of God...

It is their responsibility to “know”—but not necessarily to teach. Some things are necessary for the greater priesthood holder to understand but to be kept in sacred silence.

Therefore, in the ordinances thereof, the power of godliness is manifest, and without the ordinances thereof, and the authority of the Priesthood, the power of godliness is not manifest unto man in the flesh, for without this no man can see the face of God, even the Father, and live...

Part of the instruction of the knowledge of God’s mysteries is given through “ordinances.” These are also kept from public display.

Now, this, Moses plainly taught to the children of Israel in the wilderness, and sought diligently to sanctify his people that they might behold the face of God, but they hardened their hearts and could not endure his presence. Therefore, the Lord, in his wrath (for his anger was kindled against them) swore that they should not enter into his rest — which rest is the fullness of his glory — while in the wilderness.

Therefore, he took Moses out of their midst, and the Holy Priesthood also. And the lesser priesthood continued, which priesthood holds the key of...ministering of angels, and the preparatory gospel, which gospel is the gospel of repentance, and of baptism, and the remission of sins, and the law of carnal commandments, which the Lord in his wrath caused to continue with the house of Aaron, among the children of Israel, until John, whom [the Lord] raised up, being filled with the holy ghost from his mother’s womb. (T&C 82:12-14)

Like Israel at the time of Moses, the Latter-day Saints at the time of Joseph and Hyrum also rejected the Holy Order. In January 1841, the LDS were commanded to build a house unto my name for the Most High [God] to dwell... For there is not place found on...earth that he may come and restore again that which was lost unto you, or which he has taken away, even the fullness of the Priesthood (T&C 141:10). Although Joseph Smith restored the fullness of the Gospel, he was unable to deliver the fullness of the Priesthood or Holy Order after the Order of the Son of God. The required temple was never completed, and the time and opportunity available to them passed. That rejection was foreshadowed in an 1831 revelation foretelling a future moment when the Lord will speak from Heaven declaring:

Hearken, O you nations of the earth, and hear the words of that God who made you: O you nations of the earth, how often would I have gathered you as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings, but you would not? How oft have I called upon you by the mouth of my servants, and by the ministering of angels, and by my own voice, and by the voice of [thundering], ...by the voice of lightnings, and by the voice of tempests, and ...the voice of earthquakes and great hailstorms, ...by the voice of famines and [pestilence] of every kind, and by the great sound of a trump, and by the voice of judgments, and by the voice of mercy all the day long, and by the voice of glory and honor and the riches of eternal life, and would have saved you with an everlasting salvation, but you would not? (T&C 29:8)

The question remains open as to whether we will allow the Holy Order to function among us. The Lord will permit it. He's willing to identify those He will permit to enter into His House (meaning His Family). The question is, who will welcome it? The conditions today are the same as at the time of Adam, Enoch, Melchizedek, and Abraham. Few there will be that will find it.

Predictably, as soon as some learn of the content of this talk, they will claim to be worthy, perhaps even in possession of the Holy Order. All such claimants are liars and deceivers. Whenever there is a couple appointed to the Holy Order, there are always competing voices, pretenders, opponents, and deluded others acting in direct opposition.

The Book of Mormon explains for us the direct connection between repentance and obedience in obtaining this Order. This was and is required not only for Melchizedek but also for the people who will welcome the return of the Order:

Now as I said concerning the Holy Order, or this High Priesthood, there were many who were ordained and became high priests of God. And it was on account of their exceeding faith and repentance, and their righteousness before God, they choosing to repent and work righteousness rather than to perish. Therefore, they were called after this Holy Order and were sanctified, and their garments were washed white through the blood of the Lamb. Now they, after being sanctified by the holy ghost, having their garments made white, being pure and spotless before God, could not look upon sin save it were with abhorrence. And there were many, an exceeding great many, who were made pure and entered into the rest of the Lord their God. And now, my brethren, I would that ye should humble yourselves before God and bring forth fruit meet for repentance, that ye may also enter into that rest. Yea, humble yourselves even as the people in the days of Melchizedek, who was also a high priest after this same Order which I have spoken, who also took upon him the High Priesthood for ever. And it was this same Melchizedek to whom Abraham paid tithes — yea, even our father Abraham paid tithes of one-tenth part of all he possessed. Now these ordinances were given after this manner, that thereby the people might look forward on the Son of God, it being a type of his Order, or...being his Order, and this that they might look forward to him for a remission of their sins, that they might enter into the rest of the Lord.

Now this Melchizedek was a king over the land of Salem, and his people had waxed strong in iniquity and abominations — yea, they had all gone astray; [and] they were full of all manner of wickedness. But Melchizedek, having exercised... faith and received the office of the High Priesthood according to the Holy Order of God, did preach repentance unto his people. And behold, they did repent. And Melchizedek did establish peace in the land in his days; therefore, he was called the Prince of Peace, for he was the King of Salem; and he did reign under his father. Now there were many before him, and also there were many afterwards, but none were greater. Therefore, of him they have more particularly made mention. Now I need not rehearse the matter; what I have said may suffice. Behold, the scriptures are before you; [and] if ye will wrest them, it shall be to your own destruction. (Alma 10:1-2)

When he was the servant, Melchizedek preached repentance. He didn't claim self-importance, establish an organization, or claim an office. He preached repentance.

In a sermon on August 27, 1843, Joseph Smith explained, "The Holy Order is the channel through which all knowledge, doctrine, the plan of salvation, and every important matter is revealed from Heaven" (JSP, Documents Vol. 7, p.435; TPJS, p.166-167; WJS, p.38). Because it is the mechanism God uses to reveal from Heaven what is necessary for the salvation of mankind, His messenger will preach repentance.

This world was organized to provide an opportunity for every soul sent here to be added upon (Abraham 6:2). But it was never expected that souls would develop equally. Because of apostasy, an overwhelming number of mankind have lived without any opportunity to receive and accept the Gospel. It will nevertheless be "tolerable" for them in the resurrection. But when the Gospel is taught to and rejected by people, the resurrection will not be "tolerable" for them. People who live and die without learning of God's law are also redeemed and unaccountable for what was never shown to them.

From among the few who have the Gospel preached to them, the "fullness of the Priesthood" has been available to teach very few indeed. How often God would have gathered people as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings? But mankind has continually returned to a state of apostasy, rejecting the gift that was (and now is) continually offered by a gracious God:

You who are quickened by a portion of the Celestial glory shall then receive of the same, even a fullness. And they who are quickened by a portion of the terrestrial glory shall then receive of the same, even a fullness. And also, they who are quickened by a portion of the telestial glory shall then receive of the same, even a fullness. And they who remain, shall also be quickened. Nevertheless, they shall return again to their own place, to enjoy that which they [were] willing to receive, because they were not willing to enjoy that which they might have received. For what does it profit a man if a gift is bestowed upon him, and he receive[s] not the gift? Behold, he rejoices not in that which is given unto him, neither rejoices in him who is the giver of the gift. (T&C 86:4)

If there is a need to fix blame for the limited opportunities mankind has had for being gathered by God and protected by Him, then the blame is upon our ancestors who rejected the Gospel. The blame is not on a willing God. Our unwillingness to let Him govern us through the Holy Order has resulted in this world descending into chaos and sin. The path back is through repenting and returning to God's path.

The Holy Order was established before the world and was conferred on Adam. It could have been a continuous guide to all of Adam's descendants, but men loved sin and surrendered to carnality because of their weakness. Even as Adam was preaching the truth, Satan came among them, saying, I am also a Son of God. And he commanded them, saying, Believe [it] not. And they believed not, and loved Satan more than God. And men began from that time forth to be carnal, sensual, and devilish (Genesis 3:5).

Although mankind rejected Adam's preaching, God never withdrew Adam's commission. He continues to hold that position and will do so until the end of this cycle of creation or the end of the world. All of the later forms of priesthood are inferior to the original.

The Holy Order requires a restoring of great knowledge that's hidden from the world. The fathers knew it would be restored in the last days and anxiously anticipated its return.

The Holy Order was conferred during the creation, when Adam and Eve were placed in the Garden and were given dominion over the creation. Then, after the fall, Adam's initiation into the Order continued in this documented event:

And it came to pass [that] when the Lord had spoken with Adam our father that Adam cried unto the Lord, and he was [carried] away by the spirit of the Lord, and was carried down into the water, and was laid under the water, and was brought forth out of the water. And thus he was baptized, and the spirit of God descended upon him. And thus he was born of the spirit and became quickened in the inner man. And he heard [the] voice out of Heaven saying, You are baptized with fire and with the holy ghost. This is the record of the Father and the Son, [and] from henceforth and for ever. And you are after the Order of him who was without beginning of days or end of years, from...eternity to all eternity. Behold, you are one in me, a son of God. And thus [all may] become my sons. Amen. (Genesis 4:10)

Adam would teach his descendants these principles as part of the initiations. Our Scriptures do not provide the details. However, we learn more about the Holy Order from the account involving Melchizedek in The Old Covenants, Genesis 7:17-23:

And Melchizedek lifted up his voice and blessed [him]...

Melchizedek ordained Abraham. However, details are missing. But the record tells us why Melchizedek was chosen to hold the Holy Order:

Now Melchizedek was a man of faith who wrought righteousness. And when a child, he feared God, and stopped the mouths of lions, and quenched the violence of fire. And thus, having been approved of God, he was ordained a high priest after the Order of the covenant which God made with Enoch, it being after the Order of the Son of God, which Order came not by man, nor the will of men, neither by father nor mother, neither...beginning of days nor end of years, but of God. And it was delivered unto men by the calling of his own voice, according to his own will, unto as many as believed [in] his name.

For God, having sworn unto Enoch and unto his seed with an oath by himself that everyone being ordained after this Order and calling should have power, by faith, to break mountains, ...divide the seas, ...dry up waters, to turn them out of their course, to put at defiance the armies of nations, to divide the earth, to break every band, to stand in the presence of God, to do all things according to his will, according to his command subdue principalities and powers; and this by the will of the Son of God which was from before the foundation of the world. And men having this faith, coming up unto this Order...were translated and taken up into Heaven.

...now Melchizedek was a priest of this Order, therefore he obtained peace in Salem and was called the Prince of Peace. And his people wrought righteousness, and obtained Heaven, and sought for the city of Enoch which God had before taken, separating it from the earth, having reserved it unto the latter days, or the end of the world, and has said and sworn with an oath that the heavens and the earth should [not] come together, and the sons of God should be tried so as by fire. And this Melchizedek, having thus established righteousness, was called the King of [Peace] by his people...

...he lifted up his voice and he blessed Abram, being the high priest and...keeper of the storehouse of God, him whom God had appointed to receive tithes for the poor. [Therefore], Abram paid unto him tithes of all that he had, of all the riches which he possessed, which God had given him, more than that which he [needed]. And it came to pass that God blessed Abram, and gave unto him riches, and honor, and lands for an everlasting possession, according to the covenant which he had made...according to the blessing with which Melchizedek had blessed him.

And it came to pass that after these things, the word of the Lord came [to] Abram in a vision, saying, Fear not, Abram. I will be your shield. I will be your [exceeding] great reward. And according to the [blessing] of my servant, [the "blessing of my servant" is referring to Melchizedek], I will give unto you. And Abram said, Lord God, what will you give me, seeing I go childless and Eliezer of Damascus was made the steward of my house? ...Abram said, Behold, to me you have given no seed and [no] one born in my house is my heir. ...behold, the word of the Lord came unto him again, saying, This shall not be your heir, but he...shall come forth out of your own body [and] shall be your heir. And he brought him forth abroad, and...said, Look now toward heaven...tally the stars, if you[re] able to number them. ...he said unto him, So shall your seed be. ... Abram said [to the] Lord...how will you give me this land for an everlasting inheritance? And the Lord said, Though you were dead, yet am I not able to give it to you? And if you shall die, yet you shall possess it. For the day comes that the Son of Man shall live. But how can he live if he be not dead? He must first be quickened.

...it came to pass that Abram looked forth...saw the days of the Son of Man, and was glad. And his soul found rest, and he believed in the Lord, and the Lord counted it to him for righteousness. (Genesis 7:18-23)

The Book of Mormon has 25 different places expounding on the Holy Order. The Book of Mormon has more information than any other book of Scripture about that subject. It is first mentioned in 2 Nephi chapter 5 in The New Covenants version.

The words of Jacob, the brother of Nephi, which he spake unto the people of Nephi: Behold, my beloved brethren, I, Jacob, having been called of God and ordained after the manner of his Holy Order, and having been consecrated by my brother Nephi, unto whom ye look as a king or a protector and on whom ye depend for safety, behold, ye know that I have spoken unto you exceeding many things. (2 Nephi 5:1)

For Jacob to have been “called of God and ordained,” it required someone to ordain him; he identifies Nephi as the source.

When and how did Nephi obtain the Holy Order of God? Before his family migrated across the Arabian peninsula, God spoke to him,

...the Lord spake unto me, saying, Blessed art thou, Nephi, because of thy faith, for thou hast sought me diligently with lowliness of heart. And inasmuch as ye... keep my commandments, ye shall prosper and...be led to a land of promise, yea, even a land which I have prepared for you, a land which is choice above all other lands. ...And inasmuch as thou shalt keep my commandments, thou shalt be made a ruler and a teacher over thy brethren. (1 Nephi 1:9)

Those words, “a ruler and a teacher” identify a role that belongs to the Holy Order. But this is a conditional promise of a future ordination. After that promise, by faith Nephi obtained the plates of Laban, studied the records of the fathers and the prophets, broke the bands from his hands and feet, beheld a vision of God’s condescension, witnessed things not lawful for him to teach, held the power of God in his hands, built a ship and led others across the oceans to a promised land, recorded God’s dealings in Scripture for his people, and summarized God’s blessings to him in these words:

I know in whom I have trusted. My God hath been my support, he hath led me through mine afflictions in the wilderness and he hath preserved me upon the waters of the great deep. He hath filled me with his love, even unto the consuming of my flesh. He hath confounded mine enemies, unto the causing of them to quake before me. Behold, he hath heard my cry by day, ...he hath given me knowledge by visions in the night time. And by day have I waxed bold in mighty prayer before him; yea, my voice have I sent up on high, and angels came down and ministered unto me. And upon the wings of his spirit hath my body been carried away up on [an] exceeding[ly] high [mountain]. And mine eyes have beheld great things — yea, even too great for man — therefore I was bidden that I should not write them.

...I have seen so great things, [and] the Lord, in his condescension unto the children of men, hath visited me in so much mercy... (2 Nephi 3:7-8)

These accomplishments are evidence of Nephi's ordination, however, he omits mention of the actual event for himself. He does record his brother, Jacob's, ordination to the Holy Order by him. This is also typical of someone having authority. The evidence is not in proclaiming status, but in providing service.

The Holy Order continued for generations with the descendants of Nephi. Alma the Younger claimed to have been called after the Holy Order, and what he taught about it is the best proof he was a member of the Order. Here is what he wrote about his calling:

And Alma went and began to declare the word of God unto the church which was established in the valley of Gideon, according to the revelation of the truth [and] the word which had been spoken by his fathers, and according to the spirit of prophecy which was in him — according to the testimony of Jesus Christ, the Son of God who should come to redeem his people from their sins — and the Holy Order by which he was called. And thus it is written. Amen. (Alma 4:2)

Alma the Younger gives the best scriptural exposition and the foremost description for why an individual is ordained to the Holy Order in this life:

And again, my brethren, I would cite your minds forward to the time when the Lord God gave these commandments unto his children. And I would that ye should remember that the Lord God ordained priests after his Holy Order, which was after the Order of his Son...

This clarifies that Alma is speaking of the original Holy Order that was after the Order of the Son of God. This is the priestly authority that many of the Nephite prophets held. This is why Joseph Smith called the record of the Nephites the most correct book and the keystone of our religion. The text was composed by people within the Holy Order who were adept in the required knowledge, experience, and wisdom to compose a correct ~~amoun~~ [account].

...to teach these things unto the people...

This is the primary role of the Holy Order. Enoch led a city to peace by teaching. By obeying Enoch's teachings, his city was translated into Heaven.

And those priests were ordained after the Order of his Son in a manner that thereby the people might know in what manner to look forward to his Son for redemption...

Now we're getting into some pretty deep water that I don't want to interrupt for lunch. It's a little ahead, and I'm gonna end there for lunch. And I've had a couple people ask me if I was willing to take questions. Here's the problem: You don't know what's gonna be said as we're going forward, so the answer to your question is very likely gonna be heard a little later in this same talk. So, ONLY in relation to anything that has been said up to this point and nothing further. Does anyone want to ask a question, or would you like more time to eat lunch?

Okay, we've got one hand up here. Someone's not all that hungry.

Yes?

QUESTION 1: Just a question of... Earlier you'd said that it's not (I don't know the exact word, but...) "permissible" with someone who the Lord said identified as holding the Holy Order, so it made my thoughts go to Paul and Peter. Did Paul make a mistake there? Or is that something different?

DS: No, in fact, the two of them are described...

[Audience interjection]

Oh, the question was, it's not appropriate for people within the order to compete with one another; what about Peter and Paul?

Okay, Peter was a very rigid man, and Paul was a very enthusiastic man, and in terms of personality types, they were probably two of the most incompatible people that you will ever meet. And yet, both of them were servants of God and called and asked and given assignments. Peter primarily labor,ed as Paul with disgust pointed out, among the Jews, so much so that he accommodated them in ways that Paul would not. But then later... Later, Paul gets Timothy circumcised, rather abruptly, in a non-hygienic way that would never be approved by a modern physician who would be considerably more hygienic in the process of accomplishing such a feat. And so, when it came right down to the rub, there were moments of conduct by Peter, on the one hand, accommodating the Jews, and Paul, on the other hand, accommodating the Jews, that you could put either of them in the exact same place and you would detect no difference between how they were proceeding and what they were doing. That being said, when they got together, Paul talks about how he "withstood Peter to his face." Well, good on you, Paul. Peter probably needed that. And Paul probably needed his comeuppance.

Look, the primary focus and the primary reason for calling Paul was to take a message into the gentile world. Peter was indeed the one who saw the blanket descend with the unclean animals on it and received the admonition to "take and eat" and then protested that that would ceremonially violate the law to which he was holding fidelity. But he got the vision! He was the one that it was instructed. It was Paul, however, who became the messenger to the Gentiles. And so, I mean, it's... So between the two of them they licked the platter clean. You didn't get the job done with one, and you didn't get the job done altogether with the other. You actually needed both of them in order to accomplish the work. Paul did NOT supplant Peter. And Peter did not supplant Paul. They were disagreeable with one another...which oughtta be another lesson about how godly people don't necessarily have personality traits that are fully and completely compatible. I mean, "Hail, fellow well-met," is not necessarily the greeting that...

In fact, Joseph Smith, in a revelation, gave words that are supposed to be spoken when a brother meets a brother at the entry to the temple, and they are to greet one another with a holy kiss. And the words of greeting are proscribed! It's not, "Oh, crap! He's here! 'Hey....'" It's specific words. "Art thou a brother?" or if it's more than one, "Art thou brethren?" And then you greet one another with a recitation and a holy kiss. It's kinda French. It'd make Aaron feel at home. Maybe he'll be the greeter!

Yes, okay!

QUESTION 2: Sorry, I just wanted... I wonder if you're gonna speak more about the woman's role or what it means to a woman or... [crosstalk]

DS: Maybe. Maybe. Maybe we will, and maybe we'll just have her [Stephanie] get up here and talk for a little while about something or another. She...yeah.

Look, this is all one singular, self-contained exposition about a subject, the most alarming portions of which will come after lunch. Now I know you guys had the sacrament and you drank wine, and it put people into a...one of those wine comas. I'm hoping that you don't come back in a food coma for this afternoon because there's something valuable about having the content sounded live in your own ears in the moment that it gets offered. And I can't... I don't think I can adequately express the importance of the content of this material. It will, I think, dawn on you at some point. I'm hoping not while we're still together, and that I can catch an eclipse.

But we're gonna go ahead and end early for lunch 'cuz it's gonna take awhile. There is a lunch that people have paid for, and that... You'll [Joe Jensen] take care of that? Okay.

K, so the primary responsibility—primary, probably the foremost responsibility—is to teach. But we have this in Alma's description:

...those priests were ordained after the Order of his Son in a manner that thereby the people might know in what manner to look forward to his Son for redemption...

So there's a connection between the manner in which the ordination is done and proving up the mission of Christ. They're intended to reflect the Son of God. It's the Son of God who's going to provide for the redemption. But only one generation was there and heard Him teach. Other generations needed examples that allowed them to believe in and anticipate the redemption through the Son of God. And that is also needed now.

The Son of God would only teach what the Father told Him to teach. I am Son Ahman, and that I have done nothing on my own; but as my Father has taught me, I repeat his words (TSJ 6:16) This is what the Son of God would do and what every one ordained after His Order would likewise do. That's the manner to look forward to Christ and to also look back and understand about Christ.

...this is the manner after which they were ordained: being called and prepared from the foundation of the world, according to the foreknowledge of God, on account of their exceeding faith and good works in the first place, being left to choose good or evil; therefore they, having chosen good, and exercising exceeding great faith, are called with a holy calling — yea, with that holy calling which was prepared with, and according to, a preparatory redemption for such...

Probably the most important single description of how the Holy Order operates.

All the qualifying individuals for the Holy Order—all of that qualifying—happened before this cycle of creation. When the “foundation” or beginning planning of the world was first underway, God in His Wisdom knew it would be necessary to send messengers who would reliably teach others. Those chosen had already proven to be loyal to God and shown great faith in God’s Son. However, even if they were prepared before the foundation of the world, they needed to be initiated into the Order in mortality. Abraham was chosen before the creation but still was not part of the Holy Order in mortality until initiated by Melchizedek.

...thus they hav[ing] been called to this holy calling on account of their faith, while others would reject the spirit of God on account of the hardness of their hearts and blindness of their minds (while, if it had not been for this, they might have had as great a privilege as their brethren — or in fine, in the first place they were on the same standing with their brethren — thus, this holy calling being prepared from the foundation of the world for such as would not harden their hearts...

That happened BEFORE; it happened before this creation. That was when the qualifying took place. That’s when Abraham qualified. Some showed unwavering devotion to God. They had proven reliable. Others would not qualify because they would risk failing and leading souls astray. They risked rejecting God’s spirit because of hardness of hearts—or in other words pride and lack of humility. They questioned and argued, doubted and challenged. They had an inconsistent record of conduct, sometimes hesitating when others remained steadfast and true.

The risk of blind guides falling in a ditch and leading others to fall in that same ditch was disqualifying. And yet we still see those who, without possessing the required calling and ordination, claim they should be leaders and teachers. Even the pre-qualified still need to be “called” here.

The Holy Order is not for the benefit of the servant. Its purpose is to allow others to “enter into his rest” or receive the redemption of the Son of God offered to all. The Holy Order is to “teach his commandments” in a reliable, authorized, and dependable way. It’s not to get acclaim, attract a following, or preside over anyone. The responsibility is to teach God’s commandments.

...which Order was from the foundation of the world, or in other words, being without beginning of days or end of years, being prepared from eternity to all eternity according to his foreknowledge of all things...

Because the qualification and ordination was first accomplished from the foundation of the world, it took place before the first day was set for this world. Therefore it is without any beginning of days. And because that authority will endure into the afterlife, it will not come to any end in this world where years are counted. Hence it is “from eternity to... eternity.”

Now they were ordained after this manner, being called with a holy calling, and ordained with a holy ordinance... (Alma 9:10)

An ordinance is required. Alma confirmed there is a required “holy ordinance” for someone who qualified before the foundation of the world. They need to receive that holy ordinance before they are part of the High Priesthood of the Holy Order. That’s why Abraham went to Melchizedek to obtain the ordinance.

The description of those who obtain the Holy Order was given in the Vision of the Three Degrees of Glory on February 16, 1832. They are identified as those,

...who overc[a]me by faith and are sealed by that Holy Spirit of Promise, which the Father sheddeth forth upon all those who are just and true.

They are they who are the church of the Firstborn.

They are they into whose hands the Father hath given all things [dominion].

They are they who are priests and kings, who, having received of his fullness and of his glory, are priests of the Most High [God] after the order of Melchizedek, which was after the order of Enoch, which was after the Order of the Only Begotten Son. Wherefore, as it is written, they are gods, even the sons of God. Wherefore, all things are theirs, whether life or death, or things present or things to come, all are theirs and they are Christ’s, and Christ is God’s. And they shall overcome all things. Wherefore, let no man glory in man, but rather let them glory in God who shall subdue all enemies under his feet. (T&C 69:10-13, emphasis added)

Here the scripture uses the present tense to call them “gods, even the sons of God”; not that they will be, but that they are presently in that position. And yet, consistent with all we have been told about worship of God only, this same description teaches, “let no man glory in man, but rather let them glory in God who shall subdue all enemies under his feet.” These are consistent statements. The appointment to the Holy Order does not make the recipients anything other than servants, teachers, and guides who can reliably report on their errand from the Lord. They deliver God’s words but are not to be worshipped.

While these words have been around since 1832 and generally regarded as promising status to the faithful in the afterlife, when understood in light of the Holy Order, they take on a different meaning. They describe specifically and exclusively that group.

Some comparatively few qualified for the Holy Order before this world's current cycle of creation. But remember, the course of the Lord is one eternal round (1 Nephi 3:5). Things repeat, and there are worlds without end (T&C 69:28).

This is not our "first estate," nor will it be our last. Creation is endless, and God has declared that His [words] are without end, ...for they never cease (Genesis 1:1). God explained to Moses:

For behold, there are many worlds which have passed away by the word of my power, and there are many [worlds] also which now stand, and numberless are they unto man; but all things are numbered unto me, for they are mine and I know them.

And it came to pass that Moses spoke unto the Lord, saying, Be merciful unto your servant, O God, and tell me concerning this earth and the inhabitants thereof, and also the heavens; and then your servant will be content. And the Lord God spoke unto Moses of the heavens, saying, These are many and they cannot be numbered unto man, but they are numbered unto me for they are mine. And as one earth shall pass away, and the heavens thereof, even so shall another come. And there is no end to my works, neither my words. (Ibid. 6-7)

We have a partial account of events before this cycle of creation. There were those who rebelled during this earlier existence or estate. Because it happened prior to this cycle of creation, it is referred to as the "first estate," but it might as well be called an "earlier estate" or a "prior estate." We read:

And they who keep their first estate shall be added upon, and they who keep not their first estate shall not have glory in the same kingdom with those who keep their first estate; ...they who keep their second estate shall have glory added upon their heads for ever and ever.

And the Lord said, Who shall I send? ...one answered like unto the Son of Man, Here am I, send me. And another answered and said, Here am I, send me. And the Lord said, I will send the first. And the second was angry and kept not his first estate, ...at that day many followed after him. (Abraham 6:2-3)

The second who did not keep his first estate was cast down and drew a third of the stars of Heaven with him as he fell to Earth. It's described as,

...an angel of God who was in authority in the presence of God, who rebelled against the Only Begotten...(whom the Father loved, [and] was in the bosom of the Father), was thrust down from the presence of God and the Son, and was called Perdition, for the Heavens wept over him. (T&C 69:6)

That earlier tragedy before this cycle of creation is not dissimilar to a description of events to happen later, at the end of this cycle:

And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be set loose out of his prison and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle, the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and encompassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city. (Revelation 8:6)

It is all one eternal round, worlds without end, opportunities to prove faithful without end. Accordingly, we can prove faithful in this present estate so that what comes in the next cycle will let it be said of us:

...being called and prepared from the foundation of the world, according to the foreknowledge of God, on account of their exceeding faith and good works in the first place, being left to choose good or evil; therefore they, having chosen good, and exercising exceeding...faith, are called with a holy calling... (Alma 9:10)

We tip the scales by our choices, and by so doing, we change all eternity. We change eternity by the choices we make here (T&C 159:13).

There is an eternal balance, with infinite results, hanging on our every choice. We stand in peril or stand in glory depending upon our every thought and deed (Ibid. 14).

Five minutes of mortality are more precious than all the prior eternities of pre-earth life. Only here can you demonstrate the faith from which creation itself was born (Ibid. 15).

Why not view this moment as another “first place” and choose to obey God, in faith, to have your good works follow you into your next estate?

Our noble acts and righteous deeds are celebrated in joy and song in the corridors of Heaven. As we choose God and His ways, the Hosanna Shout rings out in Heaven for such choices. We are the place where eternity’s conflicts are now being played out. We are the battleground between infinite good and infinite failure (Ibid. 17).

What you do with your thoughts, words, and deeds NOW matters. Whether you will repent and follow Christ determines an eternal course.

In contrast, those consigned to hell to suffer until the end follow a religion with only a form of godliness, while denying the redemptive power of following Christ’s servants. They are described in the revelation in these words:

These are they who are liars, and sorcerers, and adulterers, and whoremongers, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie. These are they who suffer the wrath of God on...earth. These are they who suffer the vengeance of Eternal fire. These are they who are cast down to hell and suffer the wrath of Almighty God, until the fullness of times, when Christ shall have subdued all enemies under his feet, and shall have perfected his work, when he shall deliver up the kingdom and present it unto the Father... (T&C 69:27)

They love lies because they’re comforting. Lies tell you there’s no need to repent. Lies promise you salvation without obedience. The scope of their lies is particularly alarming.

They claim to follow true but deceased prophets but never accept a living testimony of Jesus:

For these are they who are of Paul, and of Apollos, and of Cephas. These are they who say they are some of one and some of another: some of Christ, and some of John, and some of Moses, and some of Elias, and some of Esaias, and some of Isaiah, and some of Enoch...

...every one of those were actual servants called by the Lord. And we have today those who claim to be absolute, reliable, trustworthy advocates of Isaiah's works that can tell you (because Jesus made reference to "great are the words of Isaiah," you know; He commends them to us to study) that he is now a reliable servant and light to be yielded acknowledgment to because he's teaching you of Isaiah. These are liars who are thrust down to hell, and they say they are "of Isaiah."

Oh, and there are those who say, "Torah, Torah, Torah"—not as in the attack on Pearl Harbor, but as in, "You can't get there without Torah!" They are "of Moses." They are liars, and they are damned to hell. (I believe they'll be listening to this.)

...but received not the gospel, neither the testimony of Jesus, neither the prophets, neither the everlasting covenants...

They rejected the Holy Order in the form of the servant sent to them. They prefer to think themselves safe by acknowledging known but dead prior messengers, but they dare not risk letting a living, contemporary representative of the Holy Order to teach them.

Reestablishing the Holy Order involves a new dispensation with those who went before providing the foundation for the work to go forward. Angelic ministers needed to come at the start of Joseph's dispensation and were needed again.

...all declaring each one: Their dispensation, their rights, their keys, their honors, their majesty and glory, and the power of their Priesthood.

[Giving] line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little...there a little, giving us consolation by holding forth that which is to come and confirming our hope. (T&C 151:15-17)

This is required to restore the Holy Order any time it's been lost. The Order is not just a form of priesthood but also involves a family connection to the first fathers. For the holder, it establishes a role within that family. The senior-most living couple in that order stands in the same position as did Adam and Eve. It is essential that the Holy Order be reestablished prior to the Second Coming so that the events of Adam-Ondi-Ahman can take place. To link together God's Family necessarily follows the precedent of Abraham because it includes adoption of the living holder on Earth to the "fathers who are in heaven" (as Joseph Smith put it). The identity of those "fathers in heaven" and the identity of those who have held the Holy Order are the same. God's family must be linked together on both sides of the veil.

The fullness of the Gospel of Jesus Christ is open to everyone and publicly invites all to accept it and benefit. Each person must decide if they will repent, forsake their sins, be baptized, and accept Christ's offer. The fullness of the Priesthood or Holy Order is not open to everyone, but when it exists, it can benefit all those who accept the fullness of the Gospel. Only Adam, under the direction of Jesus Christ, can decide if a couple will be inducted into the fullness of the Priesthood or Holy Order.

Not all people are going to want the fullness of the Gospel. Every soul is different from every other soul, and no two have the same desire for light and truth. Some souls are added upon by only having the opportunity to witness light and dark each day and night or to experience hot and cold each yearly cycle. Newborn children experience hunger and thirst, and eat and drink to understand the contrast. This world presents contrasts to inform everyone of eternal truths in this mortal experience. The fullness of the Gospel has only been present intermittently, with long periods of apostasy. Even when present, the majority of those living at the time know nothing about it.

This is wise and fair. It's part of a grand design to patiently allow all of mankind to progress suitably. For behold, the Lord doth grant unto all nations, of their own nation and tongue, to teach his word[s], yea, in wisdom, all that he seeth fit that they should have; therefore, we see that the Lord doth counsel in his wisdom, according to that which is just and true (Alma 15:13). Apart from the fullness of the Gospel, there are deeply spiritual, singularly understanding, very pure souls who inherited Buddhism, Islam, Hinduism, or other forms of God's word. They are also remembered by and precious to the Lord. Contrast that with some who have the fullness of the Gospel, miss the point altogether, and are marred with conceit, animosity, and self-righteousness.

As the fullness of the Priesthood or Holy Order is restored, do not expect it to be broadly distributed, openly available, or discussed in public forums. Some portions of the Gospel have always been unlawful to disclose in that manner. The Apostle Paul wrote in his second letter to the Corinthians about being caught up to the third heaven: ...he was caught up into paradise and heard unspeakable words, which...is not lawful for...man to utter (2 Corinthians 12:4). The heavens were opened, and the witness ascended to hear something true and faithful. Yet it was not lawful for him to tell it.

Some things belong to God alone to tell. We have no right to impose those things on others, particularly if the result will be to condemn them for their rejection of the truth.

Yet all are invited to behold and learn from God. Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon reported after the heavens were opened to them:

Great and marvelous are the works of the Lord, and the mysteries of his kingdom which he shewed unto us, which surpasseth all understanding, in glory, and in might, and in dominion, which [we were] commanded...we should not write while we were yet in the spirit, and are not lawful for men to utter...(T&C 69:28-29)

There are true things that are part of the Gospel. God is willing to reveal them. They include:

- things not lawful for man to speak
- things man is not capable of explaining
- things God grants the privilege of seeing and knowing to those who love Him and purify themselves
- things that surpass all understanding in glory, might, and dominion.

But we don't get to teach them, and we aren't able to help others to understand them. They are God's (possessive, capital G, God's). And those who behold them are gods (small g, non-possesive).

Alma explained how any of us gain this sacred but hidden knowledge:

It is given unto many to know the mysteries of God; ...[but they're] laid under a strict command...they shall not impart — only according to the portion of his word which he doth grant unto the children of men, according to the heed and diligence which they give unto him. ...therefore, he that will harden his heart, the same receiveth the lesser portion of the word. (Alma 9:3)

Even as they get knowledge, “they’re laid under a strict command they shall not impart.” There are people who use their spiritual experiences as a credential. There ARE people who do that. One fellow tries to get people to listen to him because he claims to have meetings with Joseph Smith, Brigham Young, and even the ancestors of the person he attempted to persuade. He uses his spiritual experiences as a credential. Another fellow claims, without having accomplished anything to fulfill an assignment from the Lord, he is special, deserving deference, respect, and financial support for his mission.

Then we have so many versions of the sealed Book of Mormon that it would now require a library card catalogue to keep a complete inventory. And the “fan fiction” volumes of apocryphal, pseudo-prophetic materials multiplies at an astonishing rate. All around us, there are false claims of new Scripture.

More alarming, however, are our own weaknesses and foolishness. We gossip and assume and condemn. The Lord has told us how He deals with our failures: If men intend no offense, I take no offense, but if they are taught and should have obeyed, then I reprove and correct, and forgive and forget (T&C 157:58).

We welcome many false ideas and errors. We shouldn't. We can do better.

Alma's extensive teaching about the Holy Order continued in chapter 10 of The New Covenants. He wrote:

Now as I said concerning the Holy Order, or this High Priesthood, there were many who were ordained and became high priests of God. ...it was on account of their exceeding faith and repentance, and their righteousness before God, they choosing to repent and work righteousness rather than to perish. Therefore, they were called after this Holy Order and were sanctified, and their garments were washed white through the blood of the Lamb...

God's conditions are the same for everyone. We are all required to repent and work righteousness. That is required before the Holy Order is conferred. The words "ordain," "sanctified," and "washed" should be understood in the context of an ordinance (or a process). There is an initiation that is needed. It results in "white garments" or, in other words, a cleansed and forgiven soul through the Lamb of God.

To clarify, they should not be considered... When it says they "could not look upon sin save it were with abhorrence," they should not... That should be considered as absolutely refusing to return to a sinful life without that being abhorrent to them. Their gratitude to God is the product of knowing Them. The Family connection alters the way they view themselves, God, and this life. The "rest of the Lord" removes uncertainty about their relationship to God. They understand they have been made Theirs. On that subject, their minds are at rest; but in this world, there is continuing trouble and challenges. The term "rest" is characteristic of the afterlife, not something involving ease in this world where the sweat of our brow remains our lot.

...bring forth fruit meet for repentance, that ye may also enter into that rest...

Notice that, as in many other places, actual "repentance" requires "fruit" or action to be undertaken. It's not enough just to feel regret; behavior also has to change. Repentance is always accompanied by outward evidence of an inner change.

Now these ordinances were given after this manner, that thereby the people might look forward on the Son of God, it being a type of his Order or it being his Order...

Abraham was faithful and showed respect for the head of the Holy Order before he could be initiated. Alma confirms "these ordinances were given" to induct a couple into the Order. It's not just laying on hands. More was and is required, and even Father Abraham, with all he had experienced, still needed these ordinances. Alma understood this subject and wrote truthfully about that.

But Melchizedek, having exercised mighty faith and received the office of the High Priesthood according to the Holy Order of God, did preach repentance unto his people. And behold, they did repent. (Alma 10:1-2)

Preaching repentance was and is the distinguishing role for the Holy Order in this world. In this description, we should ask: Who was identified as "his people?"—meaning Melchizedek's people. I do not think it was just a random audience who heard him teach. I think "his people" were those few who heard him teach and responded by repenting. There were likely far more who heard him than who repented. As with any age in history, few will be gathered because only a few will ever respond and repent.

Melchizedek was qualified to teach and preach reliably and truthfully by his knowledge of God's great mysteries. Similarly, a messenger like Joseph Smith had far more experience beyond the veil than he ever taught or revealed. His First Vision ends with this comment: ...and many other things did he say unto me which I cannot write at this time (JSH 2:5). Melchizedek and Joseph were no different from many other messengers who likewise knew far more than they revealed. God does not trust a gossip, nor are the heavens supposed to be the object of voyeurism.

“Heed and diligence” are recited like a formula in the Scriptures. The great difference between Nephi and his older brothers was the heed and diligence present in Nephi and absent in the older brothers. The first verse of the Book of Mormon describes Nephi as being taught somewhat in all the learning of my father (1 Nephi 1:1). As a result, he was able to gain knowledge of the mysteries of God and had command of the learning of the Jews, and the language of the Egyptians (ibid). Later, Nephi reported about how he and his father had responded to God:

And it came to pass that thus far I and my father had kept the commandments where[fore] the Lord had commanded us. And we...obtained the record which the Lord had commanded us and searched them and found that they were desirable, ...even of great worth unto us, insomuch that we could preserve the commandments of the Lord unto our children. Wherefore, it was wisdom in the Lord that we should carry them [forth] with us as we journeyed in the wilderness toward[s] the land of promise. (Ibid. 23, emphasis added)

All of those are referring exclusively and solely to Lehi and Nephi, and none of it is referring to the other members of the family. This is about Lehi and Nephi and how they had treated the commandments and the Scriptures. Nephi’s older brothers lacked that same diligence in pursuing godliness. The older brothers apparently lacked even the ability to read the Scriptures, and therefore, Nephi read the plates of brass to them:

I, Nephi, did teach my brethren these things. And it came to pass that I did read many things to them which were engraven upon the plates of brass, that they might know concerning the doings of the Lord in other lands among people of old. And I did read many things unto them which were written in the [book] of Moses. ...that I might more fully persuade them to believe in the Lord their Redeemer, I did read unto them that which was written by the prophet Isaiah; for I did liken all scriptures unto us, that it might be for our profit and learning. (Ibid. 6:1)

Nephi’s ability to read and teach were the result of his heed and diligence over his lifetime. Like oil in the lamps of the virgins, heed and diligence secured for Nephi a lifetime of light and truth.

Although they claimed the right of government over Nephi, the older brothers could not understand the Scriptures even when they were read to them:

...after I, Nephi, had read these things which were engraven upon the plates of brass, my brethren came unto me and said unto me, What mean these things which [you] have read? (Ibid. 7:1)

Without heed and diligence, Nephi would not have been appointed by God to be a ruler and teacher over his brethren (ibid. 1:9). He studied, obeyed, and taught from the Scriptures.

The Scriptures are central to our discussions, teachings, and focus. The words of the Covenant ask us to receive the scriptures approved by the Lord as a standard to govern you in your daily walk in life, to accept the obligations established by the Book of Mormon as a covenant, and to use the scriptures to correct yourselves and to guide your words, thoughts, and deeds (T&C 158:3). Teachings should be anchored in the Scriptures. It should be rare when it becomes necessary to provide any new personal revelation. If there is any scriptural precedent that can be used to teach or reveal a point, then that should be used. Nephi taught and wrote using the words of Isaiah to introduce his great revelation. His brother, Jacob, also taught and wrote this way, using the words of Zenos as his own prophecy.

It takes experience to distinguish true revelation from false revelation. Every gift of the spirit can be the route of a lying spirit used to deceive us. Joseph Smith delivered a lengthy sermon on the presence of false spirits and the necessity of detecting and dismissing them. I adopt his words. I'm putting all of them into the paper. I'll read excerpts today:

...It is evident from the Apostle's [writing] that many false spirits existed in their day, and had "gone forth into the world," and that it needed intelligence which God alone could impart to detect false spirits, and to prove what spirits were of God...Spirits of all kinds have been manifested, in every age and [amongst almost] all people: if we go among the Pagans they have their Spirits, [and] the Mahommedans, the Jews, the Christians, the Indians; all have their Spirits, all have a supernatural agency; and all contend that their Spirits are of God. Who shall solve the mystery?...“many spirits are abroad in the world,” One great evil is that men are ignorant of the nature of Spirits; their power, laws, government, intelligence &c, and imagine that when there is any thing like power, revelation, or vision manifested that it must be of God:— ...is there any intelligence communicated? are the curtains of heaven withdrawn, or the purposes of God developed? ...they have not a key to unlock, no rule wherewith to measure, and no criteri[a] whereby they can test it; ...if Satan should appear as one in glory? Who can tell his color, his signs, his appearance, his glory? or what is the manner of his manifestation? ...who can drag into day light and develope the hidden mysteries of the false spirits that so frequently are made manifest among the Latter Day Saints? ...no man can do this without the Priesthood, and having a knowledge of the laws by which Spirits are governed; for as “no man knows the [thing] of God but by the Spirit of God,” so no man knows the spirit of the devil and his power and influence but by possessing intelligence which is more than human, and having unfolded through the medium of...Priesthood the mysterious operations of his devices; without knowing the angelic form, the sanctified look, and gesture, and the zeal that is frequently manifested by him for the glory of God:— together with the prophetic spirit, the gracious influence, the godly appearance, and the holy garb which is so characteristic of his proceedings, and his mysterious windings. A man must have the discerning of spirits, before he can drag into daylight this hellish influence and unfold it unto the world in all its soul destroying, diabolical, and horrid colors: for nothing is a greater injury to the children of men than to be under the influence of a false spirit, when they think they have the spirit of God.

...unless some person, or persons, hav[ing] a communication or revelation from God, unfolding to them the operation of spirit, they must eternally remain ignorant of these principles:— for I contend...if one man cannot understand these things but by the Spirit of God, ten thousand men cannot; it is alike out of the reach of the wisdom of the learned, the tongue of the eloquent, and the power of the mighty. And we shall at last have to come to this conclusion, whatever we may think of revelation, that without it we can neither know, nor understand any thing of God, or [of] the devil; ...The world always mistook false prophets for true ones, and those that were sent of God they considered to be false prophets; and hence they killed, stoned, punished and imprisoned the true prophets, and they had to hide themselves “in deserts, and dens, and caves of the earth”; and although the most honorable men of the earth, they banished them from their society as vagabonds; whilst they cherished, honored, and supported knaves, vagabonds, hypocrites, imposters and the basest of men.

...A power similar to this existed through the medium of the priesthood in different ages. Moses could detect the magicians power and shew that he was God’s servant, he knew when he was upon the mountain (through revelation,) that Israel was engaged in idolatry. (JSP Documents Vol. 9, pp.324-329, discourse Friday April 1, 1842 [spellings as in original], emphasis added; see also DHC, Vol. 4, pp. 571-576)

All of his comments are included in the paper.

Spiritual gifts or sensitivities are just as likely to be influenced by a lying spirit as a truthful one. This means the head of the Holy Order is required to gain experience to be equipped to tell the difference between the two. Adam and Eve witnessed Satan deceive their sons and daughters. The one they first expected to be their successor in the Order loved Satan more than God. Adam’s many experiences made him the one best to detect the Devil when he appeared as an angel of light to deceive Joseph Smith. By the time of the April 1, 1842 sermon I was just reading excerpts from, it’s clear that Joseph also knew the difference between a true and a false spirit.

Moses had no difficulty determining Satan’s demand that he worship him as a “son of God” was deceitful. Moses declared, I can judge between you and God (Genesis 1:3).

Other members of the Holy Order who have experience with and knowledge about the opposition have been qualified to distinguish true from false spirits by that experience and knowledge. That is necessary. That is why they are called to preach and teach, and their instructions are trustworthy. The efforts of false spirits to mislead are ineffective because, like Moses, they can say, For it is blackness unto me... (ibid.).

Comprehending these things about the Holy Order allows us to understand Alma’s (the father of Alma) account of his authority from God. Remember he had been one of the wicked priests of King Noah. He heard Abinadi’s warnings and was converted. He fled in order to save his life and began preaching, converting, and baptizing in the wilderness. Members of the Holy Order are commanded to not publish details of the Order. Therefore, the testimony that Alma gives us is discreet. But look carefully at what he tells us:

...after he had poured out his whole soul to God, the voice of the Lord came to him, saying, Blessed art thou Alma, and blessed are they who were baptized in the waters of Mormon. [For] thou art blessed because of thy exceeding faith in the words alone of my servant Abinadi. And blessed are they because of their exceeding faith in the words alone which thou hast spoken unto them...

The Lord calling Alma “Blessed” is significant. Alma is becoming something and acquiring status recognized by God. But the Lord is likewise blessing those who would accept Alma’s teachings.

...And blessed art thou because thou hast established a church among this people. And they shall be established, and they shall be my people. Yea, blessed is this people who are willing to bear my name, for in my name shall they be called, and they are mine. ...Thou art my servant, and I covenant with thee that thou shalt have eternal life. ...

For Alma, this was the Day of Judgment. He’s obtained the Lord’s favorable judgment and, with that, the promise of “eternal life.”

...And thou shalt serve me, and go forth in my name, and shall gather together my sheep. And he that will hear my voice shall be my sheep; and him [ye shall] receive into the church, and him will I also receive...

They’re hearing the Lord’s voice from what Alma is teaching to them because Alma is the one being sent by the Lord with the message. Therefore, when they hear the message from Alma, they are hearing the Lord.

Like Enoch, Moses, and others who are “gods, even the sons of God,” Alma is now a living doorway for salvation. The Lord trusts him with His (God’s) message. Therefore, the words taught by Alma are delivered as the messenger of God. Whoever receives Alma likewise receives Christ. Jesus taught: He who receives you, receives me. ...he who receives me, receives him who sent me. He that receives a prophet, in the name of a prophet, shall receive a prophet’s reward. ...he that receives a righteous man, in the name of a righteous man, shall receive a righteous man’s reward (Matthew 5:8).

The Holy Order, when it is present on earth, is the means provided for mankind’s salvation. When it is absent, then darkness prevails. The prophet Amos declared:

Behold, the days come, says the Lord...that I will send a famine in the land — not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord. And they shall wander from sea to sea, and from the north even to the east. They shall run to and fro to seek the word of the Lord and shall not find it. (Amos 1:27)

Because mankind refuses to allow God to gather them as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, this has been the condition of the world generation after generation. Mankind prefers apostasy. The Holy Order has not generally appealed to the children of Adam. Rejecting teachers from the Holy Order results in being cut off from God. When God appointed Nephi to be a “ruler and a teacher” over his brethren, it was accompanied by this condemnation: And inasmuch as thy brethren shall rebel against thee, they shall be cut off from the presence of the Lord (1 Nephi 1:9). Rejecting Nephi as a teacher was rejecting God’s presence. God’s presence is made available to the faithful through His messengers.

That having been said, remember that you can have your calling and election made sure without having the Holy Order. You can be redeemed from the fall and return to God’s presence without it. You can receive the fullness of revelation from before the foundation of the world through the end of this cycle of creation and still not have the Holy Order. Nor do you need it to enter into a covenant with God. It serves God’s purposes when He allows it to be restored, and it is governed strictly by Him. Because this same Priesthood which was in the beginning shall be [at] the end of the world also (Genesis 3:14), it needed to return to function again before the Lord’s return. Do not expect that to be a particularly spectacular thing or for the world at large to take any notice of it. God’s prophecies are always fulfilled while devout scholars, disbelieving skeptics, worldly fools, and disinterested mankind remain ignorant of His “strange act.” There will be no announcement. The Holy Order will set about teaching and working to obey the Lord’s every command. Of course, some day what has been accomplished will be shouted from the rooftops after the Lord’s return. When men complain that it was done in secret, the Lord will remind them that they are like the Jews who rejected Him: We have piped for you and you have not danced. We have mourned for you and you have not wept (Luke 5:18). Proud people never accept those the Lord sends. They always find reasons to not be persuaded. Like Joseph said, when a real servant is sent, “they banished them from their society as vagabonds; whilst they cherished, honored, and supported knaves, vagabonds, hypocrites, [and] imposters and the basest of men.”

Given the limited availability of the Holy Order and the limited way it can be exercised, the question arises: “Why have it at all?” Certainly it’s not designed to accomplish compulsion, control, or dominion in any degree of unrighteousness. Nor can it be asserted as holding any privilege entitling the holder to any automatic and unquestioned respect. It is merely a God-given opportunity to learn, made available for anyone who is persuaded to the truths that are taught. But when it has been here, there are always competing voices teaching contrary things and asserting claims that conflict with the Holy Order.

Moses gave a final, inspired blessing to the tribes of Israel. For the tribe of Joseph, Moses prophesied:

And of Joseph he said, Blessed of the Lord be his land, for the precious things of heaven, for the dew, and for the deep that crouches beneath, and for the precious fruits brought forth by the sun, and for the precious things put forth by the moon, and for the chief things of the ancient mountains, and for the precious things of the lasting hills, and for the precious things of the earth and fullness thereof, and for the good will of him that dwell[eth] in the bush. Let the blessing come upon the head of Joseph, and upon the top of the head of him that was separated from his brethren. His glory is like the firstling of his bullock, and his horns are like the horns of [the] re'ems. With them he shall push the people together to the ends of the earth. And they are the ten thousands of Ephraim, and they are the thousands of Manasseh. (Deuteronomy 9:27)

This blessing, hundreds of years after the blessing given to Joseph by Father Jacob whose new name was Israel, echoes the earlier blessing that was given by Israel:

Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well, whose branches run over the wall. The archers have severely grieved him, and shot at him, and hated him; but his bow remained in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob (from there is the Shepherd, the Stone of Israel), even by the God of your father who shall help you, and by the Almighty who shall bless you with [the] blessings of Heaven[s] above, blessings of the deep that lies under, blessings of the breasts and of the womb. The blessings of your father have prevailed above the blessings of my progenitors unto the utmost bound of the everlasting hills. They shall be on the head of Joseph...on the crown of the head of him that was separate[d] from his brethren. (Genesis 12:29)

Upon Joseph, who was separated from the other 11 patriarchs, blessings were conferred that foretold his posterity would locate in “the ancient mountains” and upon “the lasting hills.” HOW is that location to be identified? Will not authority from God be required to inform us? HOW will Joseph “push the people together to the ends of the earth”? Will not authority from God be required to accomplish it? HOW is a “crown” to be placed upon the head of Joseph if not by God?

We have a revelation from Joseph Smith that foretells some of what will be involved with the fulfillment of these ancient prophesied events:

And the Lord, even the Savior, shall stand in the midst of [the] people and shall reign over all flesh. And they who are in the north countries shall come in remembrance before the Lord, and their prophets shall hear his voice and shall no longer stay themselves, ...they shall smite the rocks, and the ice shall flow down at their presence, and a highway shall be cast up in the midst of the great deep. Their enemies shall become a prey unto them, and in the barren deserts there shall come forth pools of living water and the parched ground shall no longer be a thirsty land. And they shall bring forth their rich treasures unto the children of Ephraim, my servants, and the boundaries of the everlasting hills shall tremble at their presence, and there [they shall] fall down and be crowned with glory, even in Zion, by the hands of the servants of the Lord, even the children of Ephraim, and they shall be filled with songs of everlasting joy. Behold, this is the blessing of the everlasting God upon the heads of the tribes of Israel...and his fellows. And they also of the tribe of Judah, after their pain, shall be sanctified in holiness before the Lord, to dwell in his presence day and night, for ever and ever. (T&C 58:3)

HOW will the children of Ephraim be able to crown the Lord's people with "glory" unless they have received from God the knowledge to do so? If blessings are to be administered "upon the heads of the tribes of Israel," will it not require the Holy Order to accomplish it?

Ignorant people will not re-gather Israel and confer glory upon the "heads of the tribes." A great deal of missing knowledge is necessary, or the promises of God will not be fulfilled. The Family of God will have an order.

Remember the greatest fulfillment of prophecy in the past happened in relative obscurity, unnoticed by the world, and with very few directly involved. When the prophesied Messiah came to Israel, His birth was known to only a handful of people. When His ministry began, most who heard Him teach rejected Him. Ultimately, He was killed rather than welcomed by His people. Why should anything be different? Why should anything different be expected before His return in glory? Shouldn't we expect fulfilling the prophecies at the end to also seem uneventful? If His people did not recognize Him, why would they recognize someone commissioned as His servant who is far less than Him?

The purpose of the Holy Order is to serve God. It is not to get noticed or acquire fame or fortune. It serves only God's purposes. The return is related to the last-days' work. For Zion to put on her strength, it will require the Holy Order, or as Joseph Smith explained about Zion putting on strength:

[Isaiah] had reference to those whom God should call in the last days, who should hold the power of Priesthood to bring again Zion, and the redemption of Israel. And to put on her strength is to put on the authority of the Priesthood, which she, Zion, has a right to by lineage; also to return to that Power which she had lost. (T&C 129:4)

The only "authority of the Priesthood" that would be adequate to "bring again Zion" is that same authority held in the cities of Enoch and Melchizedek. It would be contrary to the Lord's consistent pattern for there to be a final City of Zion without the Holy Order that established these prior cities of peace.

Remember the words of the covenant our Lord gave to us in 2017:

All you who have turned from your wicked ways and repented of your evil doings, of lying and deceiving, and of all whoredoms, and of secret abominations, idolatries, murders, [priestcraft], envying, and strife, and from all wickedness and abominations, and have come unto me, and been baptized in my name, and have received a remission of your sins, and received the holy ghost, are now numbered with my people who are of the house of Israel. (T&C 158:10)

Everyone who entered into the covenant and abides by it has “now been numbered with my people who are of the house of Israel,” meaning that when the Lord returns, He will acknowledge you as His and spare you from condemnation as He did the people in Bountiful. That is a great gift from the Lord to us.

Zion cannot be imposed. There can be no hierarchy, no one greater and no one lesser. Even a teacher assigned by the Lord to teach others cannot be esteemed above another. We have a description in the Book of Mormon that gives us a correct pattern:

And when their priests left their labor to impart the word of God unto the people, the people also left their labors to hear the word of God. And when the priest had imparted unto them the word of God, they all returned again diligently unto their labors, and the priest, not esteeming himself above his hearers; for the preacher was no better than the hearer, neither was the teacher any better than the learner. And thus they were all equal; and they did all labor, every man according to his strength. And they did impart of their substance, every man according to that which he had, to the poor, and the needy, and the sick, and the afflicted. And they did not wear costly apparel, yet they were neat and comely. And thus they did establish the affairs of the church; and thus they began to have continual peace again... (Alma 1:5)

You can respect, even honor, the teaching. However, the teacher is no better than the learner, otherwise there is no equality. When there is a hierarchy that maintains a right to control others, it perverts the meaning of “keys” to get gain. Such churches always descend into the direful condition prophesied by Mormon: The power of God shall be denied, and churches become defiled and shall be lifted up in the pride of their hearts, yea, even in a day when leaders of churches and teachers, in the pride of their hearts, even to the envying of them who belong to their churches (Mormon 4:4). It cannot be like that for Zion to come.

There is still a great gulf separating us from the promised New Jerusalem. There is a need for order, and order should be the result of following correct principles. If we are taught correct principles, then we should be able to govern ourselves. None of us is better than any other. Some of us know a great deal more than others about framing, farming, masonry, engine repair, plumbing, electrical wiring, and other skills. Every one of those will be needed in a functioning community. When the Lord provides His people a teacher, then that teacher is no different or better than a framer. All of us should be willingly contributing, and no one should be prideful.

The Lord Jesus Christ does intend to accomplish a “strange act” that eludes the wisdom of the wise or the understanding of the prudent. But then again, that could be said of almost every significant achievement of the Lord from the beginning.

The final mention of the Holy Order in the Book of Mormon is this: Behold, it was by faith that they of old were called after the Holy Order of God (Ether 5:2). And that’s the right point to end with and leave for you to ponder.

Now, I've been asked if there could be questions, and I'm willing to do that just very briefly. Then we'll take a break, and then we're gonna move on to something altogether different, and Steph is gonna come join me.

So, is there any question relevant to the topic that doesn't readily violate what I've already said is inappropriate?

Yes! There's a hand.

AUDIENCE MEMBER: Me?

DS: What? Yes, you!

Hey, hey, wait a minute, wait a minute. We have to take a moment—ohmmm—and observe. The lady about to ask a question is a descendant of the very same...

AUDIENCE MEMBER: King Follett.

DS: King Foll-ett, whose funeral sermon...

AUDIENCE MEMBER: His name is pronounced "Follutt."

DS: Here she is, correcting the pronunciation of her own relatives! As if... Go ahead! What's your question?

QUESTION 1: You called them "12 patriarchs."

DS: Twelve.

Q1: But were all 12 "honorable priesthood holders"?

DS: No, no, not all 12 were honorable priesthood holders, which brings up a point that's really interesting because Jesus says to...

She's asking if all 12 of the patriarchs... I called them 12 patriarchs. And certainly they were, at least genetically and by seed they were. Jesus says to the 12 apostles that they're gonna sit on 12 thrones judging the 12 tribes of Israel. But there's an obvious, you know, question mark that immediately arises, because Judas was one of the 12. And yet, Judas was, you know... I think, in that reference to the son of Perdition that Christ makes after the Last Supper, I think it is possible that He viewed Judas as a son of Perdition, which would mean, of course, he fell—which means, then, that of the 12 that were appointed to sit on thrones and to judge the 12 tribes of Israel, that one of them fell. So there's an absence.

I studied this out and thought about it and came to a conclusion that it would not be Matthias who replaced him in the 12 that would sit on the throne, but it would be Paul who got called separately. And so, thinking myself ever so wise in coming up with that answer, I then—because I don't ask unless I've studied it out, and I've reached my own conclusion—I then prayed to know if that were the case. And as it turns out, I was wrong. But when you've done the work and you deserve an answer, even when you're wrong, you get an answer.

As it turns out, 11 of the original 12 patriarchs lost their position to 11 of the apostles. But there was A patriarch who never fell, who preserved the rest of the family, and who occupied that throne not just during his lifetime but thereafter. And so the 11 that Christ said would sit on thrones will include Joseph who never forfeited his position in the first place. And so, it's really useful to do what Oliver Cowdery failed to do, which is to study it out in your own mind and come to a conclusion, and ask the Lord if your conclusion is right, and then get an answer. Because He'll correct you if you're wrong.

I've studied out many things. Some things have required years of study in order to feel justified in the ability to ask a question of God and get an answer. But I don't perfunctorily say, "Hey, short-order-cook on High! Fetch me an answer to this bizarre, broad, ill-thought-out question." You take junk to the altar to offer to God, and He'll sort through the junk and hand you some of your crap back just so He can get it off the altar. But it's not going to be a divine revelation. It's gonna be, "Stop bothering me, kid."

There was another hand, and then we're gonna take a break.

Yes! What?

Question 2: So, you've said in another talk, which I feel like is related to all this, is it's not by way of a strongman but it's, you know, that Zion can't come by way of a strongman; it's gotta be by priesthood. And then I'm remembering your Priesthood talk where it talked about priesthood is more of a fellowship. And then in your Holy Order talk six or seven years ago, you said instead of using the word priesthood you're gonna use Holy Order, so I'm trying to put all that together. Do you want to define some of that?

DS: Ok, so he's asking something about the Holy Order and priesthood being fellowship and comments made in several different places and how they all harmonize together. Umm...not sure I understand the question, but I'll take a stab at saying something so we can take a break (because you want to use the bathroom; I can tell).

Look, in the beginning there was one singular—singular—priesthood that God gave that was a form of parenthood and priesthood and dominion and governance and family. Adam and Eve occupied positions as priest and priestess, as rulers, as parents. They occupied, essentially, two different roles in their relationship to their posterity. The role of Eve was to predominantly reflect wisdom; the role of Adam was to predominantly reflect knowledge. These are not automatic things. No one gets fairy dust: "Now you're knowledgeable!" The reason why Nephi was able to become knowledgeable was because (and he tells you) he studied it extensively. The reason why Eve, I mean... Women can be... In fact, if you read the Proverbs, one of the huge negatives that's talked about in the Proverbs is the foolish woman. The foolish woman is an absolute catastrophe, not only to herself, but she's a folly to her husband and to their family. And so, the role of wisdom is not something that is just magically conferred. When we read the account of what Eve was doing at the beginning, they'd had apostate child after apostate child after apostate child until finally she had someone that she thought, “Now I have gotten a child from God, so I know he’s going to choose the right.” And that was Cain, who would subsequently murder Abel. So, to what extent was Eve informed by the sad disappointment in Cain that gave her understanding, wisdom, and insight that before that catastrophe she didn’t have? I mean, very often wisdom is the product of sad failure, disappointment, bitterness... Yeah, you...

Look at how Nephi describes all of the things that he went through that were so terrible, followed immediately afterwards with “having been highly favored of the Lord.” Well, why is it that you put all of the ugliness out, followed by highly being “favored by the Lord”? It’s because every one of the bruises, every one of the cuts, every one of the breaks and the falls, every one of the failures and the slips and the falls, every one of those things informs you better.

I was thinking about Leroy [Smedley], and you know, he’s a boxer. And you know, when my dad was trying to teach me something and I wouldn’t get it, eventually he would just demonstrate the hole, okay? “Now, I’ve been telling you, ‘Do something about that.’ You haven’t done something about that. How’s the black eye feel? Okay? Stop it!” I mean, it’s comin’ for ya. Leroy, I imagine you’ve had dozens of learning opportunities in which you figured out, “Well, that didn’t work.”

Leroy: Hence the flat nose.

DS: Hence the flat nose. Ya, it’s where it comes from.

Okay, let’s take a break, and then we’ll regroup and do something else. And I would like to join all of you this evening (whoever’s going) over at wherever. But I would like NOT to talk about this or to answer questions because what I have to say has been put into the paper, it’s been here, it’s been taped, it’s on video, and I don’t want a bunch of, “Oh yeah, but afterwards I asked and then Denver said...” and now I’m accountable for whatever it was that you misunderstood me saying in an off-the-cuff remark at a later time. If it’s really important, send me an email. And if it’s REALLY good, I’ll put a post up on my website, and I’ll actually discuss it in an open way so that I don’t have to be accountable for all of the “Denver said this to me somewhere in sometime in someplace that’s ill-defined; at least that’s what I got out of it.” And I can’t be accountable for what you got out of it! But I’m happy to be accountable for what I put out there.

Okay, so let’s take a break and move on.

2024.04.07 Topics to Consider

April 7, 2024

Fulbright Auditorium, Hobart & William Smith Colleges

Geneva, New York

Stephanie & Denver Snuffer

Stephanie Snuffer: Okay, alright. 1-2-3, eyes on me! Works for second graders; sometimes works for fifth graders. Doesn't work so good for adults.

Denver Snuffer: She's a substitute teacher at Waterford. So, yeah, you're gonna...

SS: Alright. Okay. Are you gonna sit? What are you gonna do? We're supposed to be up here together.

DS: I'm gonna make faces.

SS: Okay, so we—I don't know, about two weeks ago, maybe?—we started talking about maybe some topics that, if he finished, that we could bring up and just briefly address or put some ideas out there for you that you can start to consider in terms of, you know, yourselves/your relationships. If anybody has ever heard me speak in the last year or so, I have a particular penchant for interpersonal relationships and the benefit of getting your crap together, which basically means you have to know stuff. And I love how much knowledge we can gain by reading Scriptures, books, whatever it is we're doing. And I don't want to leave this part of learning off of the table. So Denver's sort of really been a wonderful guinea pig for the last few years for me. We... He's willing to... He's taught me amazing things over the past 30 years that we've been married, and I've been, hopefully, lucky to offer up some stuff that maybe he hasn't known in the past.

DS: It's the electric shocks that bother me most. [laughter]

SS: Oh, stop it. Alright. (Kids, that doesn't really happen.) Okay, we have... We came up with like nine or ten; we're gonna maybe try and get through one or two—okay?—depending on how long it takes. The first idea we want to talk about is an idea... The idea of resilience. And every time I say, "resilience," I want to sing Chumbawamba. Anybody?

Edwin Wilde: "I get knocked down..."

DS: "...but I get up again!"

SS: Right? Yeah. Okay. If you didn't hear Edwin sing Chumbawamba, just ask him a little bit later. Resilience has a very specific definition: It is the capacity to recover quickly from difficulties. So inherent in that definition is, "Life is hard, and you are going to get knocked down." And then you have to get up again. And what I did is I tried to find scriptural representation of resilience, so...because there's nothing better than sort of marrying the two ideas, right?—some, you know, personal skills, some mental wellness, some self awareness—and then just see how that is represented scripturally.

So, in James 1:2-4, there's this scripture that says, My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; Knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience. But let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing (Epistle of James 1:2 RE). So, we were driving to Niagara yesterday and reading through these things, and I said... Okay, so then we're talking about the scripture, "Knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience. But let patience have her perfect work, that you may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing." And I asked, "What do you think that means?" And you gave your input...

DS: Feel free to repeat it.

SS: I don't remember what it was because I was actually looking for the...

DS: It was profound.

SS: I was looking for the RIGHT answer. And he didn't give me the right answer, so I had to wait 'til he finished, and then I had to say, "But what about THIS?" And so, what struck me was it says...

DS: [Chuckling] That's true.

SS: ..."let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing." So this idea of the trying of your faith, this idea of a difficulty or a fall down, if you will, and tying it with patience and perfect work and entire and wanting nothing just really sort of actually blew my mind. Because I think that what this scripture is trying to say is that we have the ability to be complete, we have the ability to be whole, we have the opportunity to want nothing in the patience...

DS: (I just want to see if this [mic] makes feedback.)

SS: ...of the trying of our faith. And so, if you tie this to resilience, the "getting knocked down" is a gift. It is the opportunity for you to do what the Lord wants you to do. Have faith. Pick yourself back up. Be resilient. And in that, you have the opportunity to be perfect, be whole.

DS: You know... Is this [the mic] working?

SS: Up... Very... All the way up to your mouth.

DS: Alllll the way up...

SS: All the way up to your mouth.

DS: So like...

SS: Come over here!

DS: ...like Jagger.

SS: Yeah, you're gonna hate this. Get over here.

DS: I get to speak like Jagger.

SS: Yeah.

DS: I've suggested that you read the account in Exodus and only look at what Moses said in the story of the deliverance from the pharaoh. Moses was told to go, do, and say some things. But it's pretty clear that when he went and he did and he said, that the whole process intimidated him, and he wasn't even confident about how well it would be vindicated—and Pharaoh wasn't persuaded. So he went, and he told the pharaoh that the sign would be given, and that sign was given. And however much Cecil B. DeMille may have distorted our view of what that looked like, to the pharaoh, it didn't look like enough to justify freeing the people. And Moses left there defeated and complaining and whining about it. If you think that adversity is something that only YOU get to experience...

It's universal. It's everywhere. And it includes extraordinary frustration, difficulty, setbacks (that we know about) in the life of Moses, in the life of Jesus Christ, in the life of Joseph Smith. We just don't have an adequate record to be able to fully assess all of the challenges, difficulties, and disappointments in the life of Melchizedek. I mean, why DID he need, by faith, to call rivers out of their course? What exactly was going on when that event took place? I mean, was he begging God and running for his life? It reads like "triumph," but I don't know of any life that gets lived without setback after setback and frustration after frustration. I referred to the first verse in the Book of Mormon (in the LDS version), Nephi telling you about himself—suffered all kinds of things throughout his life and, nevertheless, been "highly favored to the Lord"—is because he was resilient.

SS: Um-hmm.

DS: (Here, I'll take that.)

SS: Okie dokie. Job is another obvious representation of someone who was incredibly resilient: Though he slay me, yet I will trust in him (Job 5:10 RE). "Though he slay me..." This is Job talking about God: "Though he slay me, I will trust in Him." That's a pretty powerful recognition of where these bumps and knock-downs are coming from, right? Job knew what was happening to him, and yet, he views it as an opportunity to trust in God.

It doesn't take... You don't have to read very much or listen to too many different things to realize that we're not a particularly resilient population. We're actually quite soft, and it's getting worse by the HOUR, actually. It really is getting worse by the hour. And so, resilience is an important thing to understand, and it's an important thing to cultivate. And there are actually things you can do to increase your resilience. Many of the things that are talked about in the context of mental health or mental wellness are SKILLS. This is not the kind of stuff that distills on you like the dew—umm, I don't know—the dew, right? This is stuff you have to practice. Very often it doesn't come naturally. Very often we feel confused/unmoored, so to speak. We don't know where we're going wrong.

I won't name any names, but I was talking to a lovely woman who told me that she listens to my podcast and realized that she was doing something that she thought was right until I said otherwise. (I wasn't telling her she was doing it wrong.) But there are skills that can help in these kinds of concepts. And so, resilience is one of them. One of the things that you can do to increase your resilience is a gratitude practice. And a gratitude practice can be on paper, it can be in a journal, it can be with a buddy, it can be through text messages and group family chats, it can be some form of prayer, it can be said out loud, it can be said quietly. But a resilient person is grateful! They're grateful for their shoes and their most comfortable pair of pants. And they're grateful that the Airbnb had another set of pillows in the other bedroom because the ones in the bed that she was sleeping in were not sleepable (or something like that). And a gratitude practice is a wonderful way to increase your resilience. And it's easy. It's free. You don't have to ask anyone or pay anyone for this, right? You can do this on your own.

DS: I'm telling you, you would have paid money to use those pillows in a high school pillow fight [laughter]. You could dislocate some important body parts with 'em. So there's reason to be grateful for just about everything. The idea that you don't mourn your losses or deal with your frustrations and that the failure to do that is an absence of resilience...

It shows up over and over when Nephi is lamenting his life and when Alma is lamenting his sojourn. They both interrupt their complaints and say, "But I really ought to be grateful," and then they flip it. I mean, it's not just an idle idea that you can overcome your disappointment and frustration with gratitude. It's in the Scriptures by some pretty accomplished Scripture authors that they felt the same way we all feel from time to time. But then they stop and take an inventory.

There's a fairly... Well, you would know some of these guys who are now not only NOT Latter-day Saints, they actively engage in the business of being an ex-Mormon and do shows and collect money and... In private conversations, I have had people who appear for all the world to be faithless and hostile to the Restoration and disbelieving in Joseph say their lives were better when they believed, and they would trade nothing for the mission that they served when they went out preaching for two years. They were blessed, and they were benefited from that. However much they may have lost their faith now, it blessed and it benefited them. I can't help but think that in declining years, as people get a little more reflective and a little more sober about eternity, that there won't be a whole lot of people that we regard right now as faithless and hostile and apostate who, as they think back on their life, will realize their happiest moments came when they were trying to obey God, came when they were serving faithfully within a church organization or within a community of believers. And I think many of them may yet repent, as long as the disease that kills them lingers long enough. You take 'em in a heart attack, it may be too abrupt. But if you can give 'em something that they will suffer to die with, I think many of them are going to regroup and reconsider and repent. I think it's coming. Well, adversity serves not only a benign—but it serves a beneficial—purpose, and gratitude gets you there quicker. Yeah.

SS: We have... We would have nothing in terms of this particular religion (or Scriptures, for that matter) if the people who were not writing them or sacrificing or moving or crossing the ocean or...were not resilient people. That goes without saying, except that it is not a HIGHLIGHTED feature in what we read or what we take in; it's just this backdrop, and we don't realize how much of "what mental health is" existed in these people: Abinadi, Nephi, Lehi, Abraham, Isaac. I mean, I'm just gonna... I'm just... Pick out the names! It doesn't matter...

DS: Lehi's wife.

SS: Yeah, Lehi's wife.

DS: Yeah.

SS: It doesn't matter...

DS: She complained.

SS: She has a name. What is her name, honey?

DS: Sariah.

SS: Sariah. Thank you. Yes. I am not Denver's wife. I am Stephanie.

DS: [Chuckling] Yeah, there ya go. Yeah.

SS: So in the context of these ideas and these concepts, understand that there is a lot not written that we just take for granted or ignore outright as characteristics: a solid set of mental health skills that these people operated with. And we're running around here, willy nilly, you know, lo there, lo here, dismissing that, only taking this seriously because we don't know what we don't know.

So another way to increase your resilience is to meditate. Ahhhh. Have a mindfulness practice. A mindfulness practice will improve your ability to bounce back from difficult situations. And it's not going to be magic; you're not automatically going to wake up one morning and say, "Oh, yes, I'm so glad that I did that five minutes of mindfulness yesterday because, now, the fact that my dryer doesn't work and my fence blew down doesn't bother me in the slightest!" Okay? Might still bother you, but you will have a better capacity to tolerate that, right?

DS: Yeah. Because you can always use that same wind that blew the fence down to dry the clothes! It's like that Monty Python thing: "Always Look on the bright side of life!"

(I'm sorry. You were talking about something...)

SS: No, you're absolutely right. You're absolutely right. I love... That is resilience. Resilience is the ability to find the positive in something.

DS: [Chuckling] I hear whistling. [Whistles]

SS: The ability to look on the bright side of life is also a resilient skill, right? Use your friends, use your family. If you're low, if you're down, if you're struggling, reach out to someone who can help somehow build you up and give you something, you know, that sort of settles you down.

I have done... I... In fact, I looked while I was sitting over there: Podcast, 37, 38, and 39 are all on resilience. And the reason I did three podcasts on resilience is because I think it is pretty dang important. And we don't have a lot of it. And I think it's one of those things that, as a body of people whose goal is to come together in some meaningful way to further God's work (in whatever way you're called, in whatever way that will look like for you, at whatever time in your life you are at), this is something you have to have —because I assure you, you will get knocked down about a million and a half times. And if you don't have what it takes already to get back up, in the immortal words of Chumbawamba, you know, there's a whole community of people who got no use for you.

DS: Hey, I wanna comment on the...that idea of meditation. I think one of the most interesting passages in one of the shortest books in the Book of Mormon is when Enos goes out in the wilderness to hunt beasts, and the words that he often heard his father speak to him sank deep into his heart. Well, what that means is that he may be out there and he may be alone and he may be up to something else, but the word sank deep in his heart. He's meditative about something that matters to him.

Back when there was a Provo temple (it's been destroyed recently), you could go to the Provo temple, and every 20 minutes there was a session starting because they had six rooms in a circle. And as a law student and then after graduation, I went to the Provo temple so often (in the pre-1990 era) that I could recite the endowment ('cuz you'd heard it so many times). Well, once they started making dramatic revisions in 1990 (and have continued on apace), there are many, many things that were once there that are still in my memory that I DO reflect on, that I DO meditate on—because I think the whole purpose of it was to present, in a ceremonial form, vast ideas compressed into little, little symbols, so that if you could grasp the little symbol, it would spool out into something much, much bigger.

(I don't know; I may have already told this story.) But I was there in the temple one time with a group of missionaries, 'cuz missionaries came over and ate at our place all the time, and one of the permitted things you could do with them was to go to the temple. And so I was in the temple with a group of—I think it was a whole district—and we were in the celestial room, and I was talking to them about some of the symbolism that's embedded into the garments and how they relate to some of the things that go on in the ceremony. And there was this old, puckered fellow that looked rather more like a Baptist Sunday School teacher than a Latter-day Saint, and...

SS: Don't editorialize.

DS: Don't editorialize?

SS: [Chuckling] No.

DS: It makes the story better. [Audience laughter.]

And he scowled for a bit at me, and then he came over, and... Literally, I'm gonna try and replicate (as best I can) his whisper: "If you're talking about the meaning..."

SS: Stop it. That is not...

DS: "...of the symbols, you're wrong!..."

SS: I was there.

DS: "We don't know what they mean!"

SS: [Chuckling] That's not how it happened.

DS: I thanked him, and then I continued apace explaining what was going on. And it, really, it drew him in. He actually got interested.

SS: [Chuckling] That is not how it happened!

DS: Anyway, that's a long way to go from Enos in the wilderness hunting beasts to...

SS: What are you talking about?

DS: But meditating on things, particularly some of the prosaic words that we get in Scripture... Some of the passages that we've got in Isaiah are an amalgamation of things that will happen/have happened/are happening or patterns that are going to repeat themselves in history by multiple people, at multiple times, in multiple ways. And when Christ finally gets to the point in Third Nephi that he has now delivered, "I've now told you what the Father commanded me to tell you," and there's a line of demarcation; He's been doing and saying and teaching and accomplishing exactly what the Father wanted him to do, and when He gets done with that, then He just sort of freelances for a little bit. And Christ in Third Nephi is rather like Isaiah: He's future, He's present, He's past, He's future, He's present. It's as if there is no past, present, or future in the mind of the Lord or in the revelations given by the Lord, but that they amalgamate all into one—so that the past and the present and the future are present before God continually. And when He comments, He comments (basically) thematically. And so, when you get a thematic commentary by Isaiah or by Christ, maybe that's because we ought to be meditating about themes, about really big subjects, about really repeating patterns that come and get fulfilled—extraordinarily, clearly—in one life at one time and then get repeated in your own experience, and in the experience of your children, and in the experience of a body of believers, over and over again. Because when God interjects Himself into the course of events that we live, it turns out that everything mirrors what went on before and what will come after. And as you meditate on those things, sometimes you can see the very themes that were present in the book of Isaiah or in the comments of Christ are present in your life and that you're living a pattern—and the pattern is continual.

That meditation thing? That's big, whammy stuff there.

SS: Okay, and actually, what you said reminded me about the themes and the themes of life, because I know you're talking Scripture, and then you went personal and then community, but that's also a really important thing. Because there are themes in your life. There are patterns in your life. Your patterns are different than mine. Mine are different than his. And that self-awareness and that meditation and that opportunity to focus on the patterns in your life and the themes in your life (this is from that book we're listening to)...

DS: Oh, yeah.

SS: ...is an important way of bringing self-awareness and bringing an awareness to see where your strengths are.

- Where do you get stuck?
- Where are you blocked?
- What works for you?
- What doesn't?
- What relationships are difficult for you?
- Why?
- Are you quick to anger?
- Are you slow to calm?

These are themes and patterns that if you start to pay attention—through a meditative practice, by seeing where you're resilient and where you are not resilient—this will become obvious to you. And you will awaken to a new level of understanding, which by its very nature draws you closer to God. The work and glory of God is to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man (Genesis 1:7 RE). And we have the scripture side down: we have the “study the Scriptures,” we have the tools to study the Scriptures, we have a lot of really good resources and a lot of really good material to do all of that. That's one part. That's one part. It's a huge part. The other part is this part: it's the YOU part. It's the part you are trying to find those deeper answers to so that you can see why you're stuck. You can see why you can't break through in this way or that way—and resilience and mindfulness and journaling and gratitude. Those are real skills and real tools that have the potential to really open up in ways that you could not have foreseen before.

Okay, do you have anything else on resilience, 'cuz I think I'll move on.

DS: What was it...? What was it that...?

SS: (Give that to Q; she wants it.)

DS: (She wants this?)

SS: [Chuckling] (Just give it!)

DS: What was it that Ferris Bueller said to the guy at the restaurant when they ordered pancreas? It's because of...

SS: Oh, gosh!

DS: It's because of...

SS: People like...

Audience Member: Tolerance.

DS: Tolerance that...

SS: Yeah.

DS: People like us can put up with people like you.

SS: What does that have to do with anything? I like it, but...

DS: Resilience!

SS: What does it have to do with anything?

DS: That's just the way I "resiliate"!

SS: Okay, now this one, okay, this one is "wise mind."

DS: Oh, this is important.

SS: This is important, but...

DS: We should have started there.

SS: No. Okay, whatever.

DS: Okay. Yeah.

SS: The problem with this is I have a whole bunch of scriptures written down, but there's two things wrong: 1) They're King James Version Bible scriptures in Proverbs, and neither one of us brought our scriptures, and 2) I can't translate them into the new Proverbs. So I don't know what they say. I just went through and found them. But let's start with "wise mind," okay? "Wise mind" is this concept that is the balance between rational thought and your emotional experience. That's important. "Wise mind" is the balance between your rational thought and your emotional experience.

Now I want you just for a minute to close your eyes, and just briefly, remember the last emotional experience you may have had.

DS: Like, really emotional? Like...?

SS: (Shush, don't leave 'em.)

Could have been...it could have been a calm emotional experience.

DS: Hmm... No, no.

SS: It could have been a very agitated emotional, right?

DS: Ah, yeah. There we are. Yeah.

SS: There is a very distinct difference between your rational thought and your emotional experiences—like HUGE, like to the point of, “Oh gosh, I wish I hadn’t have acted like that,” right? “Oh, shoot, I wish I hadn’ta said that,” okay? So there’s this idea of balancing this all out in a wise mind. Practice: meaning skill, meaning this is something you can actually get better at! This is what I love about this stuff. Not one of us is stuck where we are. It doesn’t matter how old you are, it doesn’t matter how young you are, if you are willing to learn some things, practice some skills, you can improve.

So “reasonable mind”: this is where your logic is, it’s where your facts are, it’s where you see things objectively. This is where you just describe something. ~~Decisions are made from this state~~ The decisions that are made from this state are typically analytical and based in evidence.

DS: Oh, yeah. We talked about this yesterday.

SS: Well, kind of, but... So don’t go there yet.

DS: Okay. Alright.

SS: But this is “the lawyer.” This is “the facts.” This is “how it is.” It is “this way,” and if it’s not this way...

DS: “Just the facts, ma’am.”

SS: ...(right), it can’t be any other way.

DS: ‘til Friday.

SS: Right? Okay. “Emotion mind” is where your emotions drive this state: Decisions are made based on feelings, and responses are governed by the emotional reaction to a situation.

DS: [With great exasperation] “Are you kidding me?!!”

SS: You have very little control over your emotions.

DS: Yeah.

SS: They just come unbidden. What you do have is the ability to control the management of your emotions, right? So there is no... Not one of you out there should be saying to yourself, “Well, I have a hard time controlling my emotions,” because you’re not supposed to control your emotions. You’re not supposed to control whether they come, whether they go away, what they are, how they are. You’re not supposed to care whether it surprises you or it doesn’t surprise you. What you’re supposed to care about is how you ACT. That’s what you’re supposed to care about. You’re only supposed to care about how you act—because that’s what other people are gonna care about.

So we had a discussion (I don’t know if this was about this one), but we were talking about how the person...

Okay, I come in, and I’m crying. (I’m trying to think of a good reason why I would be crying. Whatever. It’s okay.)

DS: Red Sox lost.

SS: That’s not why I’m crying [audience laughter]. So I come in, and I’m upset about something. All right, maybe I’m crying, maybe I’m not crying; maybe I’m just plain old upset, who knows? And I’m upset, and I come in, and I’m ranting and raving, and I’m upset, and we’re in the kitchen—right?—and everybody can see me. My kids can see me. Whoever’s there can see me. They can clearly see that mom’s upset. And dad steps in, and he’s like, “Hey, it’s no big deal. You don’t need to be upset.” And he tries to calm me down. In that—my emotional experience, okay?—in that moment, who is looked at as the better person?

[Audience response.]

The rational one! That is nonsense! Okay, so HE gets... I mean, not in MY family, because we’re all like me. I mean, we’re... This is the... I mean, there’s three therapists and whatever. So that’s not praised in my house, right? But in the world, the person who looks good to the world is the rational one, the one who calms the emotional child down, the one who says, “There, there. You don’t have to cry,” right? That is a profoundly misunderstood concept.

DS: You’ve reversed it.

SS: Yeah, the person who actually is in some sort of healthy engagement in their life experience is the one who is actually emotional...

DS: They’re dealing with it.

SS: ...(right?), the one who’s actually feeling the frustration or the tears or the crying or the sadness or the whatever it is. In that moment, what I have control over and what I should do is make sure that my BEHAVIOR in my emotional state does not hurt anyone, is not offensive, is not lashing out, is not threatening or in any way aggressive, right?

But the wise mind and the rational mind are both important. They have a place. The wise mind is the convergence of “reasonable” and “emotional” mind, leading to intuition and knowledge, where you can make balanced decisions. My favorite part of this is that the balance between those two things leads to intuition—right?—this sense, this felt sense, that what you’re doing is right because you are neither too emotional or too rational.

DS: Yeah. Have you ever thought about how Christ could tell what the other people were thinking? They haven't articulated it yet. It was intuitive. And I don't think that that was because of a magic trick. I think it was because of the wise mind. He could look at their demeanor, He could look at their body language, He could look at their facial expression, He could tell from that—and because of the circumstance, and the situation, the setting, and the subject at hand—He could tell they were about to oppose Him on this topic. So He could say, “Yeah, I know what you're thinking,” and then address that without them ever having said a word. He was intuitive because it was the wise mind.

SS: Okay, so then I wrote a whole bunch of Proverbs scriptures on the back of my paper, but I can't do anything with them. So... Okay, so what I want YOU to do with them is I want you to read Proverbs.

DS: Hmm. Yeah.

SS: And I want you to read Proverbs with this idea in mind. Where is there some sort of representation of the wise mind in the Proverbs? Because we all know that Proverbs is full of, you know, comments and discussions about wisdom. So find the scriptures in Proverbs that deal with the wise mind. And then go further than that. Just continue to look for these concepts in your Scriptures, because you will find them. They are there. This is the material in mental health concepts, whether it's a therapy, in and of itself, or... I can't even think of what I'm...the words I'm looking for. It is the gospel in secular language. That's all mental health is. It is a way for a non-believing population to still have the opportunity to develop a spiritual, grounded side.

DS: Let's go there next, and we'll finish there.

SS: Okay.

DS: Yeah.

SS: Alright. Okay, so nothing more on wise mind?

DS: It eludes me!

SS: Okay. (I'm sorry. I just put a mint in my mouth.) Alright, so the next one is: We're gonna talk about assumptions. And I have to... We keep having these conversations. I cannot... (I don't know what this is.) I refuse to talk or have a conversation or listen to a conversation if the premise of the conversation starts on an assumption. If the premise of the conversation starts on an assumption—meaning you just think you know something, and so you're going to start to have a conversation—I will literally stop you. Because I cannot do that. It is such an enormous waste of time to talk about something that is not grounded in any kind of fact or truth whatsoever. And when you start to pay attention to it, you will stop talking to a lot of people! And the rest of us should just shut our mouths because we're not actually saying anything. We're just walking around, opening our mouths, saying, “Hey, did you hear this?” And I'll say, “Where did you hear that?” And they'll say, “Oh, so and so said, ‘So and so,’” and I'm like, “Stop there, okay?” Not a conversation I'm willing to have, because there's nothing to it. And so, this idea of assumptions and operating from a place of assumptions is incredibly toxic to interpersonal relationships. Even, I mean...

And it's amazing how assumptive we actually are, right? So it is as simple as: He comes home from work, you know, kind of cranky or... I don't know, maybe he comes home from work, and I'm cranky; let's do it that way. He comes home from work, and I'm cranky (had a tired day; I'm hungry; I didn't have plans for dinner), and I snap at him because—I don't know why—because I'm cranky! And he just, for some reason (maybe he's not feeling particularly resilient that day), and he just sort of goes into a spin, and he thinks that I am mad at him. And then he starts to think of a conversation we had this morning that maybe didn't go perfectly. And he's like, "Oh my gosh, that's why she's mad at me." And then we spend three hours just kind of poking at each other unnecessarily because he assumed—because I was cranky—that I was mad at him. How is that fixed? Well, it's generally not, right? We go to bed, and then we wake up in the morning, and everybody's fine. But we actually wasted three hours of some amount of emotional dysregulation and disconnection because of a 30-second exchange when he walked in the door. [Addressing Denver] What could you have done?

DS: I could have stopped at McDonald's and...

No, umm, the... There's a statement that kind of stuck with me. Carl Jung, the psychologist, this is a quote from 1937. It said, "In the absence of facts, we project what happened," meaning: When we don't know the truth about something, then we draw on ourselves and we project the things that we fear (or we are) into assumptions about the other person. So when you don't have facts BUT you are viewing someone narrowly and critically, what you're probably doing is you're revealing something TO yourself ABOUT yourself, not about them. I thought it was a profound insight, because we really do let our fears inform what we think of others, and often our fears are based upon what our own internal problems are.

This was the one where we talked about the law.

SS: Yes. Yeah. Okay, hold on just a second. I want to brief... And then we'll probably end with that.

So assumptions erode trust. I'm just going to tell you what happens when you operate from a place of assuming something. I mean, besides the fact that it makes an ass out of you and me, right? Do you remember when your teacher used to write that on the board or whatever? ASS-U-ME, which is really ironic because that is the very... That's the bedrock of what assumptions are. Assumptions erode trust. They break down healthy communication—assuming you have healthy communication. Assumptions break down healthy communication. They build and breed resentment and conflict. They are barriers to intimacy and personal growth. There is a loss of self expression and agency, especially if someone is making assumptions about YOU. If I assume that my child is intentionally misbehaving and that is the way I deal with that child, then that child has lost the opportunity to express him or herself and be autonomous in sharing with me what is actually going on for them. So I want you to pay attention, because you will be SHOCKED at how much of your life is built on assumptions and conversations that take place around them.

So this was where we talked about it because...

DS: Yeah.

SS: So let's... Yeah, let's talk about it. We were talking about how assumptions play into our lives but particularly him—because his life is literally built on facts, right? I mean, 30 years in the law practice, it's facts and only facts! So what were we talking about?

DS: You cannot—under the rules of evidence, both state and federal—you can't offer opinion testimony except within extremely narrow confines that require you to have some kind of basis for offering the opinion, and it has to be qualified, based upon knowledge, experience, education, training. Other than that, you can't offer an opinion. So a witness says, "Well, he was at fault in causing the car accident." That's an opinion. That's a conclusion. Why are you saying that? If that was the testimony, there would be an objection, the objection would be sustained, and if the witness managed to say that before the objection, the judge would say, "Strike it from the record."

- What did he do?
- Where was he at?
- What time was it?
- Where were you located?
- What opportunity did you have to observe?
- Describe what it was, then, that you saw.

All of those things are foundational before you ever get to a fact. You're not allowed to just spew things in the courtroom because the courtroom is a fairly serious moment in which you're trying to resolve a problem. If the problem were easily resolved, you would never have a trial. The only cases that go to trial are the ones where there are two legitimately different stories, and if you believe one story, they will win, and if you believe the other story, they will win. And both sides believe so intensely on the story they're telling that they can't resolve it between them—because they simply disagree on what the facts are. So when you finally get there and you're presenting the case, you don't get to say, "She's a bad woman. She was mean. She treated me badly." Okay, I... Maybe. Yeah, okay. I object. And let's talk about:

- Who? (Her)
- When?
- Where?
- Was anyone else present at the time?
- Are there other witnesses who saw the same thing you claimed to have beheld?
- Can we get corroborative evidence for this?
- Was it recorded?
- Is there anything other than your word that will allow me to accept the fact that you're about to offer about what she did that was so troubling?

And at the end of all that, if the final statement—once you’ve laid a foundation so that you know who, what, when, where, and your opportunity to observe, you put out a fact—it is possible that the trier of fact is gonna say, “Yeah, but my wife does that to me every day. She... I wouldn’t call her ‘mean.’ I would call her ‘forthright’ or something a little more laudable.”

We tend not to ever get down to the fact. We tend to “high-level” our descriptions of what went on in characterizations, conclusions, opinions—and completely devoid of facts. And we do that just as a matter of common conversation because it takes a lot of time. Trials take a lot of work. It takes a lot of training for people to finally get to the point that the presentation is focused on the facts that happen.

There have been cases where I knew—I knew!—I could absolutely tear apart the nonsense that the judge was going to hear from the other side, and they offered a bunch of objectionable opinion and conclusions, and I didn’t make any objections. And I’ve got a judge sitting up there looking at me like, “Did you take the day off, Counselor? What are you doing?” I’ve even had them ask me, “Are you not going to object?” And I’ve had to say on occasion, “No, Your Honor, I don’t have an objection to this line,” but that’s because I have photographs, and I have recordings, and I have documents, and I have other witnesses, and every one of them is consistent, and the nonsense you just heard from the witness, I am going to utterly undermine. And so I want them to do this. Because when you hear the facts and when we finally get to the bottom of it, then you’re going to say, “I can disregard everything that that witness said because it was simply a bunch of negative opinions without any foundation.”

Look, we tend to be far more sloppy, careless, disrespectful, unkind, and frankly, incredible (meaning lacking credibility) in our everyday conversation. I don’t expect you all to become trial lawyers overnight, but it would be nice—particularly if someone has something critical to say about someone else—if you tried to find where the fact was. Because the opinion may be very negative and honestly held, and perhaps, in that person’s experience, not only understandable, but maybe that’s the right way they should view the person because of their own life’s experience. But it doesn’t mean that you should share the view unless you make a reasonable enough inquiry to try to get to the bottom of it to figure out what they did. What people do is bad enough. We don’t need to pile on with our opinions.

SS: Yeah, I want to say, too, that this... We practice this wrongly in our relationships, right? This is... We... This is our standard mode of operating (going back just to the basic, you know, example that I used with Denver). And so, it IS a lot of work. It IS a lot of work to build resilience. It IS a lot of work to operate from a wise mind and marry the rational and the emotional together. It IS a lot of work to get to the bottom of what is potentially an assumption. Make no mistake, it IS a LOT of work. It’s not trial-level work but close. And the payoff is much better than trial-level work.

The reason the payoff is better is because everything that you practice in terms of these kinds of skills will improve your relationships, create greater intimacy, build bridges, bring you together. What we’re doing is either keeping us apart or it’s keeping us at the status quo, right? And if our goal is to become, you know, exalted (holy crap), if that's our goal (our goal is to be exalted), that's where the work is—right?—because I'm pretty sure we have a set of Heavenly Parents who are still doing this stuff because I don't think this ever ends, right? As long as you are in a relationship with someone, this is your work. And so when we practice making assumptions (with our kids and with our spouses and with our siblings and with our co-workers), and when we have a imprecision of language and we do not use the correct words for the correct things, and we're sloppy in our emotional expression, and we're sloppy in our, you know, we don't get back up as quickly as we should, that takes a toll on us.

DS: Um-hmm.

SS: It is disconnecting from God when we are not doing this work.

(And that's four out of the ten... ish.)

DS: Yeah, we're gonna wrap it up there.

SS: K, I'm done.

DS: So there! Take that!

SS: Alright. Works for me.

DS: (Are those your glasses?)

SS: (No, those are your glasses.)

DS: What? What? [Audience question.] Yeah, SHE'LL answer.

Question 1: Good. It sounds like intuition and assumption are fighting against each other.

SS: Okay, tell me how.

Q1: How is intuition NOT an assumption?

DS: Intuition is based upon the wise mind, which is taking evidence that's before you and reaching a conclusion based upon a premise that you're entertaining from both your own experience, your own emotions, your own background, AND thinking it through.

SS: Assumption... [Mic feedback] (Aaaa, what just happened, Reed?) Assumption is... (Red button. This one? Okay, you hit the red button.)

Assumption is just believing anything you see or hear, without any kind of corroboration. OR assumption is "not actually seeking" for clarification.

DS: Yeah...

SS: So I don't know. I mean, you tell me!

DS: ...the wise mind is marrying both rational thought and emotional reaction. Look, our emotional reactions are exactly the same as the emotional reactions of a little child. When you have a one-year-old, a two-year-old, a three-year-old, a four-year-old and their emotions, their emotions may be closer to the surface and put on display with greater frequency, but an adult's emotions are exactly the same; there's no difference between the two. And the problem is that we tend to express that emotional outburst in more colorful language when we're an adult (and just a lot of noise when you're a child). But it's this... It's grounded in the same thing. So if you're reacting to something emotionally, you're reacting the same way a child would, and it doesn't do any good to tell the child to settle down! You have to let that process play through. And then you can think about, and you can reflect on.

SS: Okay, let's...

DS: The wise mind gives some distance between the emotional outburst and the opportunity to think it through rationally.

SS: Okay...

DS: Assumptions are not based on anything but innuendo—and especially when assumptions are negative (because we tend to allow the assumptions to run in favor of the negative). But we also find people whose assumptions run to the positive. Joseph Smith did that. He thought people generally had the same motivation as did he. As a result, there were a lot of con-men that got over inside the Latter-day Saint community in Kirtland and in Missouri and in Nauvoo. And it was because he trusted people that were untrustworthy. It was an assumption that he made, and it was the wrong one.

SS: K, let's go!

DS: What's that?

SS: I said, "Let's go." It's 4:15.

DS: Oh, yeah, it's 4:15. We're supposed to end now! And you figure it out!
